
THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF SPAINE,

Containing all the memorable things that haue paſt in the Realmes of Caſtille, Leon, Nauarre, Arragon, Portugall, Granado, &c. and by what meanes they were vnited, and ſo continue vnder Philip the third, King of Spaine, now raigning;

THOMAS Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine to his Maieſtie.

MY moſt Honoured Lords, I might iuſtly feare, that my continuall deſire to acknowledge my dutie vnto your LL. by ſome acceptable kind of ſeruice, would be held importunitie, if your Noble diſpoſitions, and mine owne experience in particular of your Honours gratefull acceptance of the meaneſt ſeruice that is well meant, had not freed me from that feare, and enabled my weake faculties to adde this vnto the reſt of my oblations, which I conſecrate vnto your LL. vpon the Altar of my deuotion. I muſt confeſſe that your fauorable reception of my French and Netherland Hiſtories hath added courage to my will, to paſſe the Pyrenee Mountaines, and to take a ſuruey of this Hiſtorie of Spaine: the which I held (in my weake judgement) for many reſpects, as worthie the knowledge of our Nation, as any other. It is a generall Hiſtorie of all the Continent of Spaine, wherein the ſeuerall Hiſtories of thoſe ſeuerall Kingdomes, as they were in former times diſtinctly diuided and gouerned by diuers Princes, are vnited; being collected out of all the best authors that haue written of that subiect. These considerations I say, were the inspiring meanes to moue me to vndertake the traduction of this Historie of Spaine, and haue giuen me resolution, and constancie to finish it, and to send it forth to the view of the world. The worke I hope will giue good content, it being a faithful relation of so many variable and strange accidents as haue happened in those Countries, during the manie alterations and changes of that State, and the long and cruell wars betwixt the Moores & Spaniards. If I, in my plaine maner of translation, haue not giuen it that grace which a more eloquent penne might haue done, I most humbly craue pardon, and intreat that my desire to benefit others, may giue satisfaction for my disabilitie and defects. I haue presumed to shroud the fruites of my poore endeuors, vnder your LL. countenance and protection; desiring to leaue a testimonie to all posteritie how much I am

Your LL. deuoted in all duetie and seruice,

EDVVARD GRIMESTON.

To the Reader.

GEntlemen, in the last edition of the Historie of France, I did willingly omit all matters acted by the Spaniards, wherein the French were not principally interressed, hauing then a resolution to make the Histories of those countries distinct and priuat. And for that I would not leaue you long in suspence, I promised within the yeare to publish this Historie of Spaine: wherein (notwithstanding my publique seruice, and many other difficulties) I haue forced my selfe to keepe my word, and to giue you satisfaction, though it be with some preiudice to my health. I will not vse many complements in the behalfe of the Author, his worke shall plead for himselfe: This Historie was written by a Frenchman, who is yet liuing, a man of grauitie and iudgement: It is no translation, but a collection out of the best writers that haue treated of that subiect. his chiefe Authors were Stephen Garebay, Ierome Surites, Mariana, Ambrose Morales, Iohn Valee a Fleming, with many other Spanish, Italian & Latin writers: out of all which he hath compyled this worke, and as it were vnited and tyed together the discourse of all these realmes with a continued style, by reason of the warre, accords, marriages, and other treaties and alliances which they haue had common among them: yet hath he so distinguished them, as seeing them all, you may easily read any one seuerally by it selfe, by the direction of notes and inscriptions set in the margent at euerie section or breach, whereby you may choose what belongs to Nauarre, Portugall, Castille, or to any other of those realmes, and read the Historie apart from the beginning to the end.

The antiquiti of this Spanish Nation (wherof he hath breefely made mention in the beginning of the first Booke) he confesseth to be obscure and vncertaine, and the writers thereof ignorant or negligent, so as it may be his discourse agreeth not with some authors which treat of the same men of whom he maketh mention, as of Hercules, Cacus, Gerion, Denis, and such like; but he pleads thus much for himselfe, that he could not contemne nor reiect the Spanish authors which haue so written of them, the which are to be receiued as obserued and produced by them. This Historie comes but to the winning of the Terceres, which was in the yeare 1583: he hath finished the rest vnto these times, I my selfe haue seene it in his studie at Paris, but he hath not yet put it to the Presse, so as I haue beene constrained, in the continuance thereof, to helpe my selfe out of the best that haue written of these later times, wherein I haue been assisted by some worthie gentlemen in the relation of some great actions, and haue continued the Histo-

rie, vnto my Lord Admirals returne out of Spaine. You must not hold it strange, if you find a great part of Philip the seconds raigne barren of any great actions done in Spaine: his chiefe designes were against foreine States, imploying his braueſt men abroad, either against France, England, or the vnited Prouinces, at the Indies, or at Sea; all which actions are either related here, or in their distinct Histories.

I must aduertise the Reader, that, from the yeare 1530, I haue not directly followed my Author, for I haue both inserted diuers things out of other Authors, whereof he makes no mention, and haue related some more at large then he hath done, for your better satisfaction, as I haue found them written in other approued Authors. My last suit must be for my selfe and the Printer, yet will I not vse any great circumstances to captiuate your fauors in mine owne behalfe: my stile (I confesse) is plaine and harsh; it were folly (nay madnesse) in me to seeke to conceale it, being so well knowne vnto you: yet let me intreat so much fauor at your hands, that as I haue spent my spirits to giue you content, so you will spare your spleenes, and censure fauorably, vntill you come to the like tryall: then shall you find, that either by your owne mistaking, or by the errors of the Presse you shall haue iust cause to sue for the like grace; which is, to supply all escapes and errors with your iudicious reading. And so I rest

Yours,

E. G.

A GENERALL HISTORIE OF SPAINE:

Collected out of diuers Authors, as well auntient as moderne.

The Contents of the first Booke.

1 A discourse of the auntient and first beginning of the Spaniards.

4 Many petie kings, or Italian pirats, spoyling Spaine.
5 Discourse of the absurdities of these antiquities.
6 Greekes spoyling Spaine.
7 Affricanes entring and wasting Spaine.
8 Confusion and medley of the people which vsurped the countrey of Spaine.
9 Phenicians and Gaditanes, their offspring.
10 A Chorographicall description of the firme land of Spaine.
11 Islands about Spaine.
12 Distinction of the gouernments of Spaine, according to the Romans and Carthaginians, and others after them vnto the Arabians.
13 Distinction of the kingdomes of Spaine, which are now of fame.
14 The fertilitie of Spaine, both antient and moderne.
15 The manners of the antient Spaniards, and of those which now hold it: their armes and discipline.

1 THe beginning and antiquitie of nations farre fetcht, is alwaies fabulous: for most of them that haue vndertaken to write histories, either generall, or particular of some one nation, haue thought it expedient (for their reputations) to offer a perfect worke vnto the world; and not to passe any season without some memorie of them of whom they write: imagining that the studious Reader would hold it an argument of their sloth or negligence, to leaue any thing in blancke. And therefore when as they wanted the testimonie of graue authors, they haue countenanced their owne imaginations; or haue imitated the fabulous inuentions of others, imploying their time, toyle, and eloquence in vaine things: wherin they may haply satisfie some curious heads, but not such as desire to learne. For as a lye cannot be so disguised, but either the conference of ages doth discouer it; or a spirit knowing the force and effect of things created, doth reject it; or the religious condemne it, as it is fit; when it shal once appeare that the author of any historie hath supposed things doubtfull and vncertaine, for true, thereby to enlarge his volumes. He that is studious, and loth to loose his time, growes disconſuch as read their writings,may be encouraged by the worthy acts of ſome,to liue vertuouſly, and diuerted by the diſhonour and vnfortunat ſucceſſe of others,from all bad affections: and the rather,for that they do therein find imitable ſteps of vertue. And for that the memorie of many things is buried in obliuion,or miſcaried,they haue not been ſo ſtrict, as to forbid them that find themſelues ingaged in the deſars and obſcuritie of the antiquitie of nations, to ob- H ſerue ſome ſteps,and go by probable conjectures,to a way paſſable. This is allowed them, ſo as they doe it by conſtraint, and with judgement; remembring, that a good huntſman can Spaine vnknown before the Carthaginians.

The hiſtorie of Spaine,which we reſolue to write,is herein defectiue, as in a manner all others be: for before the comming of the Carthaginians into that country,and the wars of the Romans,it cannot be directly ſaid,by what people Spaine was held,nor at what time, nor by what policie it was gouerned, but by ill grounded conjectures. For of the acts of the firſt men which were diſperſed vpon the face of the earth after the deluge, we haue no author but Moy-ſes, who is carefull to deſcribe the eſtate and ſucceſſion of the Hebrues,in that chiefely which concernes the eſtabliſhing of the Church of God. Of other nations he ſpeakes but by occa- I ſion, and as God would doe good vnto this nation by them,or puniſh it for their ingratitude.
Wee muſt not then ſeeke for any mention of Spaine or Spaniards in him. The Grecians had ſo little care of other nations,& haue ſo much reſpected their own,as they haue ſcarce vouch-ſafed to ſpeake of them,but with contempt; and to amplifie their own glorie,they haue ſometimes fed the Latines with fables: who haue adorned and enriched their Rome and Italie,and haue had care to proclaime their geſts, making vſe (in regard of antiquitie) of Grecian fables, or of conjectures; as the moderne haue in like manner done. What can we then do in matters which are ſo doubtfull, but onely touch theſe conjectures as farre as they ſhall ſeeme receiuable; paſſing that ſlightly ouer, which the Hiſtorians haue written of our firſt Spaine, to the end we buſie not our ſelues in a vaine labour more than is fit. K

Tubal.

Wherefore, according to Ioſephus report,and vpon their conſciences which haue ſuppoſed vnto vs a Beroſus, we ſay after many others, that Tubal, one of the ſonnes of Iaphet, otherwiſe called Iubal, or Iobel, is father to the Spaniards, although it be verie likely, that he neuer ſet foot in Spaine, being then a countrey without a name: but that from Armenia or the neighbour places, taking his way towards the North, he ſtayed in a region ſince called Iberia, ſitu-ated vpon Mont Caucaſus, which couers it from the North, betwixt the Caſpian and Euxine ſeas: a countrey then inhabited by them which we call Georgians, whereas afterwards the Chalibes, or Alibes were,a name approaching to Iubales, as ſome would wreſt it, changing ſome letters, as it happens in the corruption of tongues. Theſe people were Smithes, handling yron,whereof the countrey abounds,and applying it by their art to many good vſes. L
The deſcendants of Iubal in theſe places,were afterwards called Iberians,and the country Iberia,by ſome man of qualitie which caried that name,and whoſe memory they would preſerue, as it is likely. From thence the moſt receiuable authors doe maintaine, that the Iberians Spaniards parted ſome ages after Tubal, or Iubal, and that the people being ſo multiplied, as the countrey could not well feed them,nor containe them,a part of them were conſtrained either by force,or by caſting of lots,to abandon the place, and ſeeke ſome new abode: the which hath beene ordinarie among all nations,and in all ages, but eſpecially in the firſt age, when it was neceſſarie the world ſhould be peopled and inhabited: and it is credible, that nature was at that time wonderfull fruitfull, God prouiding for the propagation of mankind. The common opinion is,that theſe Iberians hauing wandred much,being arriued vpon the frontiers of M the region whereof we treat,ſtaied in the vallies of thoſe mountaines,which were ſince called Pyrenee mountaine: full of yron mynes.

Pyrenee,and that they did liue long there, finding them fit to entertaine them in their firſt inclination and breeding: for that country abounds in yron mynes as much as any in Europe; and therefore they found means wherewith to imploy themſelues, and to feed, for that theſe mountains were ful of all things wherof theſe new come men,and ill prouided,had need, that

2 That there was either good religion, knowledge, gouernment, or any thing elſe, but great ſimplicitie, ignorance, and pouertie, we can hardly beleeue: and wee perſuade our ſelues, that ciuilitie, induſtrie, experience and knowledge of valour and profit of things, was taught them by neceſſitie, the miſtreſſe of Artes, and by ſtrangers which came into their countrey from Phenicia, Ægypt, Greece, Carthage, Gaule, and elſewhere; to whom they were for a long time a prey, and in the end they learned armes, and many other malicious practiſes, whereof they had the root in their hearts, but groſly planted. As for
B religion, wee ſhall find by this diſcourſe, that it was moſt barbarous and infamous among them. And who doubts, but the ſucceſſours of Tubal did ſuddenly forget the true God, and his pleaſing ſeruice, ſeeing this corruption did ſo ſoone enter among the ſonnes of Sem, and namely thoſe of the family of Heber, of whom the Eternall did frame his choſen people and his church. I wil not buſie my ſelf to contradict them which belieue, that their firſt language was that of the Biſcanes in thoſe times; diſcourſing, that ſeeing it hath ſo long maintained it ſelfe in that proprietie, and that it cannot be diſcerned that this tongue hath taken any tearms from other auntients, nor from other nations which inhabit about their countrey, with whom notwithſtanding they conuerſe and traffique, wee muſt beleeue that there is ſomething verie remarkable in this language, and thereby conclude, that it was one of the firſt tongues which
C did confound the builders of Babel, and by conſequence the whole world, God being pleaſed to haue preſerued in Spaine this note of the firſt inhabitants thereof. Admit it be ſo, and that the Baſcongade, which the Biſcanes at that time did vſe, a part of Nauarre, and they of Alaua, are the firſt, or of greateſt antiquitie vpon the frontiers of Spaine.

The firſt Spaniards were groſſe, without arts or religion.

Biſcane tongue verie antient, & held the firſt the Spaniards vſed.

3 Let vs be no leſſe difficult to beleeue the opinion of a certaine Spaniſh doctor, who maintaines, That one of the nephewes of Sem, or elſe of Cham, called Sepharad, came along the coaſt of Affricke to the ſtrait, and hauing croſt it with great troups, he did people the bankes of the Ocean and the Mediterranean ſeas, whereas the riuer of Guadalquiber doth ingulph, grounded vpon that the Hebrews call the Spaniards Sepharadin, & that they may apply the beginning of many names of towns, riuers, iſlands, and mountains of the country, to the He-
D brew, Caldee, and Syriake tongues; as Gaddir, Sepyla, Betis, Calpe, Auila, and the like. All this is not ſtrange, although there were no danger to deriue theſe names from the Phenicians, who vſed the Syrian tongue, and had great affinitie with the Hebrew which was vſed among the Iewes, a nation alſo of Syria: and to beleeue that they were brought into Spaine by the Tyrians and others which inuaded thoſe quarters, when they came to ſpoyle the treaſures thereof. That Spaine hath alwayes from the beginning beene peopled in two ſeuerall parts, vpon the Eaſt and Pyrenee mountaines by the Iberians of Aſia, and Caucaſians deſcending from Tubal; and towards the South at the ſtrait, by Sepharad and his troups, which came out of Syria and Affricke: and that of either ſide, as the people multiplied, they aduanced farther into the countrey: we may vndoubtedly beleeue, that thoſe of the Pyrenee mountaines paſ-
E ſing the vallies by little & little on the Weſt ſide, did people ſuch a part of the country as they gaue their name to the firſt nauigable riuer, and to the whole region, celebrating the memory of their natiue countrey, and of this Iberus, of whom they were named, whatſoeuer he were.

Coniectures vpon that Sepharad did hold Spaine.

Iberians gaue the name vnto Spaine.

4 Among the moſt auntient captains or kings of this vagabond nation, they make mention of one Idubeda, of whom the mountaine of Iubalda, or Idubeda, might be named, whereof we will ſpeake hereafter. Then they produce Brigus king or gouernor of theſe troups, who began a ciuile gouernment, and built (as they ſay) many caſtles in Spaine, which carried the marks of his name, all in a manner ending in Briga, as Nemetobriga, Mitobriga, and ſuch like, by reaſon whereof he carried painted in his ſtandard a caſtle (although the skill to blaze Armes was not then well knowne:) and the authors of the Spaniſh antiquities ſay, That of him the aſſem-
F blies of people were called Brigies, and afterwards Brigues, and Brigades: the which did ſo multiplie vnder his gouernment and conduct, as they were forced to ſend whole armies out of the country, to ſeeke new habitations; wherof ſome of theſe Brigues comming into Thrace, and then into Aſia, they brought the name of Brigie thither, the which ſince by corruption hath beene turned into Phrigia: and that Caſtille, now called Viegia, was in old time tearmed Brigia, and that the new Spaniſh tongue hath ſince turned it into Biegia, calling it Caſtille la Biegia, in ſtead of Brigia. For my part I beleeue, that this word Briga, was brought into Spaine by the Celtes, which did hold a great part of that countrey, for that it is of the language of the old Gauls, by the which was ſignified people, town, or aſſembly. Moreouer, there were many townes in France, which had their names deriued from it; as the lake Brigantin vpon the Alpes, which is that of Conſtance at this preſent; and Brigantium, which is Brianſon in Daulphine; the Latobriges neere vnto the Suiſſes, and others, wheras the Celtes did in old time inhabit. And if there were a king ſo named, it is verie likely he was a Gaule, captaine of ſome troupe of Celtes, in whoſe time there were great alterations of people, and by conſequence ambitious theſts, the beſt exerciſe the noble men then gaue themſelues vnto. This is what may be ſpoken of this Brigus.

Coniecturs that the Celtes were mingled with the Iberians from the beginning.

Tagus.

Betus.

Betus came after, who was alſo called Turditanus, hee gaue that name to the countrey which is betweene the holy Promontorie, now called Cape S. Vincent, and the riuer of Guadalquibir, the which was alſo called Betis: and in ſucceſſion of time did communicat that name to a great part of the neighbour countrey, whereof they did afterwards name one of the chiefe prouinces of Spaine. In regard of him that countrey vpon the ſtrait towards the Weſt and South, began to be famous, and knowne to ſtrangers, eſpecially to the Ægyptians, and other Affricanes, nations which were then mightie and warlike, and withall cunning and politique, good mariners, and abounding in ſhips, to whom the entrie into this part of Spaine did offer it ſelfe, and was more commodious than any other. And therefore the names of other inhabitants within the countrey, did for a long time after remaine obſcured and vnknowne. They doe attribute ſome lawes and policie vnto this Betus, and the bringing in of ſome learning into Spaine, but what it was, is vnknowne.

5 To confirme that which is ſaid, That in the raigne of Betus ſtrangers began to taſt the riches and commodities of Spaine: Authors report, that preſently after his death, a captaine, mightie in ſhipping and men, came out of Affricke, landed in Turditane, and ſeiſed thereon. Hee was a Libian, and was called Gerion, and by ſome Deabus, ſurnamed by the Greekes Chryſee, as one would ſay, of gold, or gilt; by reaſon of the treaſures he gathered by violence and tyrannie. For knowing that Spaine was full of mynes of all ſorts of mettals, he became curious to ſearch for them, forcing the people to worke with ſuch rigour, as if they had beene brute beaſts; many fainting vnder their burthens, ended their miſerable liues: ſo as the brute of his crueltie (an inſeperable companion to couetouſneſſe) infected in a manner the whole earth, in places moſt remote, and was abhorred of all thoſe that had any feeling of humanitie.

Gerion.

Strange trinces tyrannize spain

Oſiris Denis then raigned in Ægypt, who mooued with pitie, and of a generous ſpirit, came into Spaine with a great armie of Ægyptians, Syrians, Arabians, and other neighbour nations, to ruine this deteſtable tyrant; whom he vanquiſhed in battell, and ſlew: which is the firſt that was giuen in Spaine, that any mention is made of ſince the deluge. And for that he came neither to conquer, nor to enrich himſelfe, being mooued with a zeale of juſtice, hauing ſetled the affaires of the countrey, he deliuered the ſeigniorie of the Turditanians to three of his children, who had beene puniſhed for his wickedneſſe, admoniſhing them not to follow the wretched auarice of their father, leaſt their ends were like vnto his. Some Arabians Scenites of his troupe, would needs remaine in Spaine, to whom he aſſigned the countrey about Cape Saint Vincent.

Curetes.

Neere vnto it (and where as the riuer Anas diſgorgeth it ſelfe) dwelt the Curetes, diſcended from Curis, nephew (they ſay) to Champ among the Tercenian, or Tarteſſian foreſts, which did run along the ſhore vnto the iſland of Gadir, then called Tarteſſe (in our time Calis:) in which iſland Gerion was interred, the firſt of any dead bodie that was put in the ground in Spaine; for before the cuſtome was to caſt dead carkaſſes into the ſea, or into riuers, or to hang them vpon trees, or elſe they left them in the fields.

Gadir and Tarteſſe.

Oſiris left in this iſland a ſiſter of his, called Erythree, who (it may be by one of theſe young Gerions) had a ſonne called Norac, who (as ſome ſay) did build Nora, the firſt manſion in the iſland of Sardinia.

Nora the firſt habitation in Sardima.

Theſe

A Theſe three young princes, who were called Lominians, were ſo like in face and manners, and did agree ſo well together, as the Poets haue fained, that they were but one king which had three bodies. They gouerned their ſubjects with more modeſtie than their father. Imagine that the feare of puniſhment kept them in awe, yet could they not ſo ſubdue their courages, but they ſought all vnworthie meanes to reuenge their fathers death. Wherefore the ſeas being now open to the Turditanes, & commerce brought in from the Weſt to the Eaſt, they had ſecret practiſes with Typhon, whom they knew to be ambitious, and procured him to kill king Oſiris his brother, and to ſeiſe vpon the kingdome of Ægypt. The deſire of reuenge a brutall vice in man.

B the Ægyptian Apollo, Mars, & Oron: by him the Gerions Lominians receiued a worthie reward for their ingratitude. For hauing gathered together a great armie of diuers nations, he paſt into Spaine, whereas theſe three brethren were readie to make head againſt him: yet Hercules grieuing that ſo much innocent bloud ſhould be ſpilt for the offence of three men, heoffred to fight alone with them all three in ſingle combats: which being accepted by the Gerions, they loſt their liues. They ſay, that this paſſage of Hercules, was at the ſame time when as Iacob and his family went into Ægypt, or a little before. By this victorie Hercules was receiued and honoured of the Turditanes, and other Spaniards: who after that he had ſetled their affairs, and planted two pillars vpon the ſtraits, the one in Europe, and the other in Affricke; and two others in the iſland, ſince called Gadir: which ſome hold were towers, and not pillars, for a Great equitie of Hercules the Ægyptian.
C marke and teſtimonie of his conqueſts and toyles, he tooke his courſe towards Italie, leauing the gouernment of Spaine to one of his captaines called Hiſpal, which ſome will haue to bee his ſonne. They ſay alſo, that he left in thoſe iſlands, which are now called Majorca and Minorca, a Gouernour called Balee, of whom they ſince tooke the name of Baleares: although that moſt men beleeue they were ſo named, for that the inhabitants were expert in ſlings. Hiſpal ſonne to Hercules.

Hiſpal remaining Gouernour of this part of Spaine, which is at the ſtraits and thereabouts neere vnto the two ſeas (for as we haue ſaid, thoſe that liued within the countrey, had not felt much of theſe forraine inuaſions) he began a towne called by him Hiſpalis, ſince named Sepila, and at this day Seuille. Hiſpalis or Seuille.

Hiſpan ſucceeded him, a wiſe and an actiue man, and a louer of vertue, as they write of him: Hiſpan.
D and we muſt beleeue that he was ſome great perſonage (if there were euer any ſuch in being) ſeeing the whole region whereof we treat hath retained his name, and preſerued it in ſuch ſort as it hath not beene changed ſince. Others notwithſtanding acknowledging in no ſort this Hiſpan to be the author of the name which hath remained to Spaine, affirme, and it may bee not raſhly, That it came of the people of Iberia in Aſia, the which in old time was called Pana, of the name of one Pan, who gouerned there vnder his father Liber: and therefore this of Europe was indifferently called Iberia and Pana: but thoſe that came after, corrupting the word, did adde ſome letters, and called it ſometimes Spana, and ſometimes Spania, as in truth the Latines did name it in the beginning, terming it Spania, and not Hiſpania. The Spaniards comming afterwards to imbrace the Roman tongue, added an E, and called it Eſpania, as they Spaine why ſo called.
E haue beene accuſtomed to do to all Latine words which begin with S; as Eſcola, Eſcala, Eſcudo, Eſcriber, and the like. Theſe Iberians did alſo call themſelues Abaſgi, whereof it may bee came Vaſco, Baſco, and Baſcongado. Such as beleeue that Hiſpan raigned in Spaine, ſay, That he was the firſt which tooke the royall diademe, and that he cauſed towers to bee built in the iſland of Tarleſſe, and in Galicia, which they call Phares, or Beacons, for the helpe of ſaylers: yet others hold with more reaſon, that that in Galicia, which is yet ſtanding, was the worke of Octauius Cæſar.

Hercules hauing done many great exploits in Italie, he left Atlas Kitin there to gouerne, carrying back his brother Heſperus, he returned into Spain, where he found Hiſpan deceaſed: wherfore he himſelfe did gouerne it in perſon for many yeares, and dyed there, as they ſay. His bo- Heſperus, of whom Italie and Spaine are named.
F die was buried in the iſland of Tarleſſe, where at that time the kings court was, in a ſumptuous and ſtately tombe.

After him raigned Heſperus, brother to Atlas Kitin, of whoſe name they ſay that Spaine and Atlas.
alſo Italie were called Heſperies; that is, Italie Heſperia the great, and Spaine the later Heſperia, for that he raigned ſometime both in the one and the other. But Atlas enuious of his brothers greatneſſe, came with an armie and diſpoſſeſſed him of the kingdome, forcing him to flie into Italie, from whence Hercules had brought him: where hee was well entertained, and raigned. The which Atlas vnderſtanding, hee ſuffered him not long quiet, but returned into Italie with a good number of Spaniards, and chaſed him away; meaning to hold Italie as his royall ſeat, and Spaine as an acceſſarie, to draw gold, ſiluer, and all other commodities from thence. G

Oris. Atlas parting from Spaine, he left the gouernement to Oris his ſonne, who was called Sic Oris, Sic ſeruing as a fore-name. Of him they ſay the riuer Sicoris, now called Sigro, was named: the which paſſeth by Lerida, and falls into Ebro. But no man can tell vpon what occaſion he was ſo called, nor how hee extended his limits thither, being ſo farre from the ſtraits, and iſle of Gadir. H

Anus. Anus ſucceeded Oris, whom they alſo called Sicanus, and of his name the riuer of Guadiana tooke the auntient denomination. Wee muſt conjecture, that his predeceſſour Oris did eſtabliſh ſome eſtate and principalitie, or made ſome fort and retreat about the riuer of Sigro, whereof this that ſucceeded him had the firſt gouernement: ſeeing they place along the bankes thereof, the people which are called Sicanians, ſo named of this Sicanus, who it ſeemes were his ſouldiours, and the troupes which he commaunded. Some of thoſe bands hauing paſt into Italie, to helpe their countrey-men, which had beene led thither by Atlas Kitin, and hauing inhabited the countrey of the Latines (which is the territorie of Rome) they were there encountred by the naturall Italians. Paſſing on, they carried the name of Sicanians, into the iſland then called Trinacria, and ſince Sicile: into the which, they ſay, that Sicanus paſt in perſon, hauing in Italie fought with the Ligurians, Oenotrians, Leſtrigons, and others: and that he was there encountred by the Cyclopes, cruell and barbarous men, who would not ſuffer the Sicanians to come and dwell in their iſland: but they were forced to yeeld. I Sicanians Spaniards.

Sicile, why called Sicania.

Siceleus the ſonne of Sicanus raigned in Spaine, after his father, and paſſed in like manner into Italie and Sicile, where he changed the former name, calling it Sicile, the which it holds. The occaſion of his paſſage, was the controuerſie betwixt Dardanus and Iaſius, his couſins, ſonnes to Electra the daughter of Atlas, for the rule of Italie; the which he reconciled. But Dardanus hauing afterwards ſlaine Iaſius his brother treacherouſly, Siceleus purſued the reuenge ſo vehemently, as Dardanus was forced to abandon the countrey, and to go into Samothracia, and then into Aſia, to ſeeke a new habitation. This mans raigne concurres with the time that God ſent plagues vpon the Ægyptians, by Moyſes and Aaron. K

Siceleus gaue the name to the iſle of Sicile.

Luſius, of whom comes Luſitania. Siceleus being dead, his ſonne Luſus held the ſcepter of Spaine; of whoſe name ſome will haue Luſitania (a part therof) to be called. He paſt alſo into Italie, and at his returne brought many Italians into Spaine. Where, after him, Vlus, or Siculus, his ſonne, raigned: whom they called Neptune, for that he entertained many ſhips and gallies at ſea. He paſt, as his predeceſſors had done, into Italy and Sicile, to ſuccour the Spaniards which were ſeated in thoſe regions, againſt whom the Cyclopes and others of the countrey renewed the wars. After him many ſtranger thruſt into Spaine, vpon diuers occaſions, but for one only cauſe, which was, for ſpoyle, being eaſie to take, by reaſon of the ſimplicitie of the Spaniſh people. L

Vlus.

Hee that ſhall conſider duely hereof, will not thinke it to agree with that which we haue ſaid before, as in truth it doth not: For if theſe kings (of whom we haue made mention ſince Atlas) which haue raigned, according to Hiſtorians and Croniclers, for two hundred and fiftie yeares, haue not onely had the meanes to defend Spaine from ſtrangers, but to lead forth many armies, and to ſubdue the people of Italie and Sicile; to make themſelues vmpiers of kings quarels, to build townes there, and to commaund the ſeas: and that from Spaine to Italie, and from Italie to Spaine, the paſſage and commerce was ordinarie: How could it be, that ſo ſoone after the death of Siculus, the Spaniards ſhould grow ſo ſimple and vnwarlike, as if they had neuer ſeene armes? And that it was in the power of the firſt pyrat that came from Affricke, Phenicia, or Greece, to ſeiſe vpon it, and inſult ouer them, without any reſiſtance? Had they learned nothing? had they gotten no courage in ſo many warres which they had ſeene in Italie? What was become of thoſe captaines which theſe late kings had ſo happily imployed? had they all curſed their countrey, or found ſome Lethe ſloud, to make them forget it, and to ſtay in Italie? Or if they were dead, did they leaue no diſcipline, nor any impreſſion of vertue in their youth? It is not likely, and therefore M

A fore we muſt put all theſe diſcourſes among idle tales, or find ſome meanes to vnfold this difficultie. Euery one hath free libertie to diſcourſe: For my part I beleeue, that theſe men which they ſay had reigned in Spaine ſince Atlas, haue beene Italians, acknowledging the Soueraignetie of Italie, and gouerning Spaine as a ſubdued Prouince: or elſe reſpecting onely their profit, they made voyages like vnto pyrats, ſhearing them to the bloud, and then carrying their ſpoyles into Italie, employing the lewdeſt people in the countrey to oppreſſe the reſt; and in the meane time, through the fauour of ſome fort, which they did maintaine to aſſure their landing and their ſhipping, they cauſed themſelues to be called Kings. Then ſeeing that the Spaniards (which had joyned with them to doe ill) did multiplie too faſt, or
B grew more cunning than was fit for their purpoſe, they found meanes to embarke them, and to ſend them into Italie vpon ſome vaine hopes, whereas being once arriued, there was no more any meanes to returne into Spaine. Such in my opinion were the armies which thoſe kings led out of Spaine into Italie, that is, troupes of theeues, of whom they would be aſſured, that they ſhould not conſpire againſt them, nor take their practiſe from them, after they had inſtructed them in their trade. By theſe ſubtile practiſes they did ſpoile Spaine both of men and treaſure, holding the groſſe and rude multitude in ignorance, and ſetling an opinion in them, that they were good men, and louers of juſtice; yea religious, for that they dealt in the pacifying of controuerſies, which happened among the people, and ſometimes they payed vowes, or made ſome ſuperſtitious dedication of a Temple or Chappell. I ſay
C moreouer, That thoſe which we haue before named were not alone, which made this worke in Spaine; but in their times, and whileſt they were buſie in one part, other nations did the like in ſome other quarter of the countrey. So as it is no maruell, ſeeing the Spaniards had yet no meanes to ſee a lawfull and ſetled Eſtate among them, and that thoſe which did gouerne them, had alwayes this affected end, to entertaine them in their ſimplicitie; an aſſured marke of Tyrants. So as the race of theſe men fayling, this poore nation was preſently made ſubject to the firſt that did inuade them, the children prooving as vnable as their fathers.

What the firſt kings of Spaine were.

Religion is a cloake for Tyrants, with the rude multitude.

6 They report, That about that time ſome Greekes of the Iſland of Zante, in old time called Zacynte, arriued vpon that coaſt whereas ſince the towne of Valencia was built, and
D there made a little fort, or ſtore-houſe, for their traffique, the which they called Zacynthium; the which did ſince encreaſe in people and building, and became a good towne, from whence Sagunte had her beginning, renowmed for the loyaltie of the citizens to the people of Rome, and for the occaſion which ſhee gaue of the long and bloudie warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which they called the ſecond Punicke warre. Theſe Zacynthians traffiquing with them of Iberia, which dwelt within the countrey, and were neighbours to the mountaines, did receiue from them gold and ſiluer, little eſteemed by theſe ſimple men, for that theſe mettals grew in their countrey, giuing them in exchange trifles of ſmall value: ſo, as growing rich in a ſhort time, they publiſhed among the other Grecians, and among the nations of Aſia, the fame, happineſſe, and aboundance of treaſure in Spaine, inciting ma-E ny thereby to goe and diſcouer the countrey, and to attempt ſomething. And for that (as we haue ſaid before) religion hath alwaies beene a lure for cunning and malicious men to aſſure the ſimple, to whom they intend ſome miſchiefe, theſe Zacynthians cauſed a goodly Temple to bee built to Diana, in the place which is now called Denia, according vnto ſome, but falſely, prouiding by that meanes and maske of religion, for their Zacynthium, which they had built vpon that coaſt, that by the reuerence of this Temple they might be aſſured from all violence.

The beginning of Saguntum.

7 In the meane time an Affrican called Teſta ſeized vpon Gadir, and of all the maine land thereabouts, calling himſelfe king of Spaine. It may be that of his name they were called Conteſtans, which did inhabit along the bankes of the Mediterranean ſea, whereas Mur-
F cia and Carthagena are at this preſent.

Teſta.

After him he left the gouernment to his ſonne Romus, to whom they attribute the building of the towne of Valencia (yet Titus Liuius doth not make it ſo auncient) the which was firſt called Rome, of his name, ſince by the Latines, holding this name to be Greeke, they turned it in their language to Valencia, which was all one; for Rome in Greeke, and Valencia in old Latine, is power and force.

Romus.

In

Falſe Denis.

In this kings time there came a pyrat into Spaine, well followed by men of his owne ſort, G who ſpoyled the whole countrey adjoyning vnto the ſea, and then hee returned with his ſpoyles, leauing an opinion of him, that hee was the father Liber Denis, or Bacchus: for the cuſtome of thoſe obſcure times was, That great pyrats and heads of vagabond people (whereof the world did then abound) did take vpon them the names of great perſonages and famous men, who had gone before them, and whom fooliſh ſuperſtition had deified; giuing the people where they came to vnderſtand, That they were gods, which came to viſit them, to deliuer them from tyrants, and to doe them good; ſo as they were often deceiued. By ſuch fained deuices theſe Harpies found leſſe reſiſtance in their enterpriſes. It may be this Denis was the ſonne of Semele, and nephew or grand child to Cadmus king of Thebes in Beoce, but H not that great Denis, Conqueror of the Indies, who was much more auncient. They ſay, that he built the towne of Lebriſſa (the which he called Nebriſſa) vpon one of the chanels of the riuer Betis; the which in thoſe dayes fell into the ſea with two gulfes. Nebros in Greeke is a Hynds calfe, with the skins whereof they did attire thoſe that did celebrate the Bacchanalia. It was at the ſame time when as the Phœnicians began to encroch much vpon the Spaniards, and to come with whole armies into their countrey, and to make their prey, as the Grecians, Ægyptians, and others of Affricke did.

Lebriſſa, and the beginning.

Pala'uus. Palenza.

To Remus they make Palatuus his ſonne to ſucceed him; who as they ſay was founder of the towne of Palenza: but there did riſe a petie king or captaine againſt him, out of the mountaines, neere vnto the riuer Ebro, called Cacus Licinius, who in the end became maſter there- I of, and Palatuus was forced (being yet young) to flye out of the countrey, and to ſue for ſuccours in vaine, begging his bread in a manner for many yeares, of forraine princes and potentates. This Cacus was induſtrious, and the author of many ſubtile inuentions; to purge and forge yron, and to faſhion it to diuers inſtruments fit for the warre: for hee taught how to make breaſt-plates and other furniture for the defence of the bodie: and ſome beleeue, that he had the art to make that infernall pouder, which they vſe for artillerie. For theſe inuentions, wherein he was very expert, he was celebrated by the Poets, as the ſonne of Vulcan, the god of Forges. Palatuus after that he had long ſued in vaine to princes and townes, whereas hee expected ſome ſuccours, to recouer his eſtate, hee reſolued in the end to returne into Spaine, and to obſerue, if the inconſtancie of humane things had not prepared him ſome K meanes to recouer his dignitie, and to chaſe away his enemie: whereas he arriued ſo happily, as the Spaniards, whether mooued with pitie of his calamitie, or wearie of the others commaund, they receiued Palatuus, and gaue him men and meanes to recouer his kingdome. So Cacus being diſpoſſeſſed of that which he had held, fled into Italie, where they ſay that Hercules the Grecian ſlew him (whereof we will make mention) although that the author thereof doe not agree well vpon this point. There Cacus bred diſcord betwixt all the people and townes of Italie by his leud practiſes.

Palatuus being dead, the Tyrians of Phœnicia, who had now learned the way to Spaine, Erythree.

came with their king Erythree, and good ſtore of ſhips, who giuing them to vnderſtand, That he had beene commaunded by the Oracle to come and build a Temple to Hercules Libique, in L the Iſland of Tarteſſe, that is, Calis; they were not onely receiued, but Erythree was alſo choſen king of that part of Spaine; who built a ſtately Temple in the Iſland to Hercules, changing the name thereof, and cauſing it to be called Erythree, or elſe renewed that name, which it might haue had from the ſiſter of Oris aboue mentioned, or of the Erythreans of the Eaſt, who followed Hercules Orus, which had dwelt there. To this Temple, which ſome hold was built vpon the maine land, where at this preſent Medina Sydonia ſtands, was due the tenths of all the theſts and ſpoyles of the Weſt, by a perpetuall decree, the which was long obſerued.

Of this king Erythree there is nothing more ſpoken: to whom they giue for ſucceſſour

Gargoris.

Gargoris, a Spaniard: he taught the people the vſe of honey, and was therefore called Mielle. M The chiefe force of this kings eſtate and others his predeceſſors, were the Curetes, a brutiſh and ſauage people, dwelling in the forreſts of Tarteſſe, which contained a great part of the Ocean ſhore, from the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, vnto the Iſland of Erythree.

Hercules the Grecian.

In his time Hercules the Grecian, ſonne to Alcmena, paſſed into Spaine, to whom the Greek Poets, and others that haue followed them, did attribute ſuch proweſſe, but falſely: for this

A this Hercules was but an inſolent man, yet well beloued of the Grecian princes, by reaſon of his boldneſſe and his ſtrength of bodie fit to rob and ſteale, whereunto the nobilitie of that age was commonly addicted. The wealth of Spaine, which was ſo much ſpoken of in Greece and Aſia, made him affect this voyage, after the firſt Trojan warre, againſt Laomedon. Hauing then gathered together all the pyrats and theeues he could, as well in Europe as in Aſia, hee ſet ſayle, and coaſting along Italie, he landed in the place of Tuſcane, which ſince hath beene called Port Hercules. From thence he arriued in Sardinia, where he found ſome few inhabitants, where he left one Sardus, with ſome of the idle multitude that was in his armie. Of this Sardus, Sardinia tooke the name. Before he paſſed on, he made a great ſacrifice vnto the gods,

Theeues countenanced by princes in old time.

B in a little Iſland, betwixt Corſica and Sardinia, the which for that cauſe doth ſtill retaine the name of Iſle Hercules. Then he directed his courſe towards the Iſlands of Baleares, then called Gymnaſies, whereas the inhabitants made ſome weake reſiſtance with their ſlings: in the leaſt of which Iſlands he dedicated a Temple to Ianus, whereas ſince the towne of Ciuitella was built. Then continuing his voyage, he toucht the Iſlands of Pituyſes, and gaue the name of Ebuſa to the greater. In the end he arriued vpon the maine of Spaine, whereas Dianaes Temple was built, the which he enriched with gifts, and did reuerence with ſacrifices, for his proſperous voyage; and for that Diana was held to be the goddeſſe which had care of trauellers. Then ſayling along the coaſt, hee came through the ſtrait into the Ocean, and to the Iſland of Erythree, where he landed his armie vpon the firme land, and ſtayed there ſome few Baleares called Gymnaſies.

C dayes to refreſh his men; he in the meane time honouring his Temple (whoſe name he carried, and did challenge his acts) buſied himſelfe in making of playes and ſacrifices. Hearing then that the Curetes and other Spaniards had put themſelues in armes to fight with him, he went to meet them, gaue them battaile, and did eaſily defeat them, repulſing them into their forreſts, out of the which they durſt not ſally like enemies. This combat is ſuppoſed by the Poets for that of the Titanes againſt their gods, faining, that the Herculeans were gods, and the Curetes and Spaniards the Titanes.

Hercules defeats the Curetes.

After this victorie, the whole countrey was at Hercules deuotion: who imitating the auncient Hercules of Lybia, planted pillars in the ſtraits; the one in Europe, the other in Affricke; enlarged the towne which was in the Iſland of Erythree, and left many Tyrians and Sydoni-

D ans, which had followed him, there: and it may be it then tooke the name of Gadir, or Gades, which in the Phenician tongue ſignifieth a Terme, or Limit: and tearming himſelfe a god, would haue all diuine honours done vnto him. And ſome hold, That it was he which made a law, to pay the tenth of the enemies ſpoyle, and to offer them to Hercules Temple: at the leaſt he did exact it being in Spaine, that he might haue part of other mens ſpoyles, and know the greateſt theeues. This done, he marched towards the Pyrenee mountaines, ſpoyling the coaſt vpon the Mediterranean ſea, and drawing after him a great traine of all nations, which came at the bruit and fame of this great theefe, and the treaſures of Spaine: He paſſed into Gaule, and from thence into Italie, polluting all good families where he paſſed, as hee had beene accuſtomed to doe all his life time. The cauſe of his ſuddaine departure, was the news

E he heard of the great preparation which the Grecian princes made, to warre againſt the Trojans, for the rape of Hellen, whither he was inuited by his friend Telamon of Salamine. Thus was Spaine in a ſhort time beaten, and deliuered from a great ſcourge. Of this Hercules the Poets haue fained all that is written, of the conqueſts, proweſſe, and trauels of many other Hercules, more auncient and better men than he: he was a Grecian, but not of Greece it ſelfe, but of that part of Italie which they call the great Greece, and of Tarentum, conceiued in a-

dulterie by Alcmena, the wife of Amphitrion, a priuat man, and an vnknowne father, bred vp at Thebes in Beoce, and nouriſhed in theft, fornication, and execrable murthers: a companion and counſellor to Iaſon, in the voyage of Colchis, at the ſpoyle of the treaſures of Æete, and the rape of his daughter Medea: the author and executioner of the ruine and death of

F Laomedon king of Troy; whoſe daughter Heſione, a noble and innocent virgine, he did proſtitute to his companion Telamon, bold and hardie in all bad actions: ſo as hee purchaſed the name and reputation of a valiant captaine, and was readily followed into Spaine by men of his owne ſort, whereof there were ſtore, and finding nothing left to ſteale in Aſia.

As he carried away many bad perſons when he went into Spaine, ſo he left others of diuers nations behind him, who built cities and townes, or finding ſome of their countreymen

alreadie

Calpe. alreadie ſeated, planted themſelues among them. Calpe, which was called Heraclea was then G Barcelone. built. In this paſſage alſo, Barcino, ſo named of fiſhermens Cabbins, made of oyziers, which were firſt there, was enriched with a Temple, which this Hercules cauſed to be built to Iupiter.
Auſonia. Turiaſſo neere vnto Montcaio, was the Tyrians worke; Auſonia the Italians, it is now called Lerida. Vic: Ilerda, now Lerida, the Illyrians, and others of other nations, whereof Hercules army was compoſed. To Dianaes Temple (which the Zacynthians had begun before his comming) there were (by him, or by the Zacynthians of his companie) great beames of Iuniper ſet; the which were ſpared by Hannibal when as he ruined thoſe places, and continued vnto the time of the Roman Emperors. There remained many other marks of this paſſage long after in Spaine.

As for Gargoris, who was king, he recouered his authoritie with great difficultie, and kept it H with more paine; yet he reigned ſome yeares, and left the realme to his grand child, which his Crueltie of a grandfather. daughter had by ſtealth: wherewith Gargoris was ſo much offended, as he cauſed this child to be left in the fields, to be deuoured of wild beaſts; the which, by the will of God, did not only leaue him vntoucht, but did alſo nouriſh him with their vrine: whereof the old man being aduertiſed, he commaunded him to be laid in the high wayes, that oxen, horſes, hogs, and ſuch like going and comming, might tread him vnder their feet: yea, he cauſed him to be preſented to famiſhed maſtiues, which had bin kept hungry of purpoſe: but he was ſtill preſerued by the fauor of heauen; and the brute beaſts (more kind than his grandfather) turned from the infant, and did not hurt him. In the end, this cruell man not content to put the poore child to an ordinarie death, he cauſed him to be carried far into the Ocean ſea; yet could not his deſire ſucI ceed: for the infant was caſt by the waues vpon the ſands, wheras a hynd hauing newly calued, was ſo farre in loue with it, as ſhe forgat her own fruit, and nouriſhed the child, vntill he grew great, and got his liuing in the woods and rocks, feeding vpon wild fruits; who in the end grew ſtrong, and ſo actiue, as he ran as ſwiftly as any ſtagge. He was often ſeene, and purſued by the huntſmen of the countrey, who could not conceiue what it was; yet they layd ſo many ambuſhes, as in the end they tooke him, and preſented him vnto Gargoris their king: who hauing carefully conſidered and viewed the countenance of this ſauage priſoner, he was of opinion, that it was his grand child: whereof he was the better aſſured by certaine marks which he had made vpon his bodie, and cauſed him to be attended on as his Eſtate required; then dying, he left him heire of his realme of Spaine: where he ſhewed himſelfe wiſe, vertuous, and a louer K of the good of men, notwithſtanding that he had bin bred vp among wild beaſts in his youth. For they ſay he made politicke lawes, and taught them to tyll the land; accuſtomed the barbarous people to a more ciuile life, and ſought the meanes to better the fruits of the earth by manuring, remembring his hard and rough breeding in his younger yeares. Hee is called by Albius, Habidus, or Habis. ſome Albius, by others Habidus, or Habis. He appointed exerciſes for the Spaniards, and diuided the people into ſeuen townes or cantons.

8 After him there is no mention of any kings in Spaine for many ages: which giues ſome occaſion to conjecture, that they erected many Commonweales; or that this region lay open to the inuaſion of many ſtrangers, which came from diuers parts; namely, after the deſtruction
The Celtes paſſe into Spaine. of Troy, which happened in the time of this Habidus; in whoſe life time certaine Celtes com- L ming out of Gaule, came into Iberia, where they had long and ſharpe warre againſt the inhabitants of the country, with whom they would ſhare their lands; & in the end forced the Iberians to receiue them, and to contract alliances with them, giuing them their daughters in mariage: and ſo communicating both ayre, country, and names with them, they made of two na-Celtiberia. tions one, which was called Celtiberian, and the countrey of Celtiberia; which is, all that lyes betwixt the Pyrenee mountaines and the riuer of Ebro. Other Celtes and Gaules had paſſed farther into Spaine, it may be, before the Iberians came there, and had run beyond the riuer of Ebro, vnto the Weſt Ocean, where they had held a part of Portugal and Betica; in which prouinces they did alſo carry the names of Celtes, Celtiques, Galates, and Gallicians, and there did build townes. Ephorus (for that the Celtes did hold all that North part of Spaine, and part M of Portugal) extended Gaule vnto the Iſland of Gades. Habis reigned yet, when Elna, a towne in the countie of Roſſillon, was firſt founded; the which ſome haue ignorantly written, was named by Helene, mother to Conſtantine the Great, or built by her grand child Conſtans.

Many Grecians in thoſe times came into Spaine, among the which (as they ſay) was Teucer the ſonne of Telamon, who (hauing beene chaſed away by his father, and after his death ex-

A cluded from the ſucceſſion) landed whereas new Carthage now ſtands, and ſo paſſed on into Galicia. They attribute vnto him the foundation of the towne of Salamanca; a name which commeth neere vnto that of Salamina, where Teucer was borne: yet ſome affirme, That in auncient time it was called Elmantica, and more properly. Diomedes alſo came into Spaine with certain Ætolians, and they hold, that the towne of Tude vpon Mynio was his worke, for that this name hath ſome affinitie with Tydeus, the father of Diomedes. Aſtur, who was coachman to king Memnon (no ſmall office in thoſe dayes) being come with the Grecians into this Region, gaue the name vnto the Aſturians, and to the towne and riuer of Aſtorga. Some maintaine, That Lisbon, Olyſſippo or Vlyſſippo, hath beene built by Vliſſes, and in it a Temple
B to the goddeſſe Pallas. Of Mneſtheus of Athens (to whom there were diuine honours conferred after his death) was named the port of Mneſthee, neere vnto Gades. Finally, infinit Grecians, which could not or would not returne into their country, after the deſtruction of Troy, came into Spaine, and erected many pettie Eſtates: and among them there were many other nations, who had ſome ſtrength at ſea, and were expert in nauigation, but at diuers ſeaſons, and very vncertaine; as the Thracians, whereof the towne of Veta, or rather that of Almerie, giue ſome teſtimonie: for in old time it was called Abdera, as another which was in Thrace. The Rhodians did build the town of Roſes, now deſart, at the foot of the Pyrenee mountains, whereas the Conſull Cato firſt landed, when hee came to make warre in Spaine. Theſe men taught the Spaniards the vſe of hand-mylls, and to coyne money. The Phocians of Aſia did
C build Marſeille, and founded the towne of Empurias, which in like manner is now ruined. It was in auncient time inhabited by three kinds of people, of diuers manners and languages, diuided by wals, and liuing in continuall jealouſie one of another, which were naturall Spaniards. Theſe Phocians, and afterwards Romans, which were added by Iulius Cæſar, who hauing reduced Spaine vnder his obedience, and chaſed away Pompeyes children, and their faction, made one bodie of theſe three nations, and a towne well vnited. The Mileſians and the Caryſtians came alſo to inhabit there; and the Lesbians iſſued from the Maſſegetes, to whom they attribute the foundation of Concauo, Caſtulo, at this preſent Caſlona, in old time a great towne, and the limit of two gouernments of Spaine: vnder the Romane Empire it was called Parnaſia; which maketh ſome thinke, that they of Phocide in Europe were the founders, for D that Parnaſſus hill is in their country. Then came the Phrygians, which were extract (as ſome ſay) of Spaine and the Ægyptians, vnder the leading of a captaine called Tarracon, of whom the towne of Tarracone tooke the name. Hauing taken great ſpoyles along the Mediterranean ſhore, he went and payed the tenths of his thefts to Hercules temple at Calis, according to the auncient order. He had a nobleman of the country, whoſe name was Teron, that oppoſed himſelfe, but he could not hinder him from ſpoyling of the countrey: For in truth the Spaniards, vntill the warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, had no commendation to bee good warriors, in regard of other nations. When as the Ægyptian was gone, Teron demaunded of the Gaditanes the offerings which this theefe had made vnto their Temple, as taken away by violence and injuſtice: whereunto the Gaditanes oppoſed themſelues, and did ſo well
E defend the rites of their god, as they ſlew Teron, and defeated his men in a battaile at ſea.

Some Cipriots came alſo to dwell in Spaine, and moreouer they beleeue, that the towne of Biana, in old time Alba, and of Madrid, firſt called Mantua, be the worke of the firſt Latines and Italians.

The reaſon why ſo many nations came into Spaine, was the aboundance of mynes, and the ignorance of the Spaniards, which made them leſſe couetous, and by conſequence leſſe giuen to armes, and therfore they were a prey to all theſe theeuiſh nations: whom (as all things haue their changes and reuolutions) they haue in this laſt age not only imitated, but exceeded them farre in crueltie, couetouſneſſe, and inſolencie, to ſimple rude nations diſcouered by them, as will appeare by the diſcourſe of the Hiſtorie.

F About 880 yeares before the Natiuitie of Ieſus Chriſt was that memorable fire in the Pyrenee mountaines (I ſpeake it according vnto the Spaniſh Authors) the which diſcouered more plainly the treaſures of Spaine: For the heardſmen hauing ſet fire of the woods (whereof the mountaines were full) and it continuing many dayes, the veines of the earth were ſo mooued with this violent heat, as the ſiluer melting ran downe by ſtreames: whereof pyrats and ſtrangers which did traffique there, being aduertiſed, they came running to this booty.

The Phenicians among others, vnder a kind of traffique, and with the exchange of certaine trifles of ſmall value, laded their ſhips aboue once, being conducted (as ſome write) by Sichee, husband to Eliſa Dido; yea, in ſo great abundance, as they made the anchors of their ſhips of ſiluer; ſo as Sichee grew ſo rich, as his brother in law Pigmalion through enuie and couetouſneſſe ſlew him: who afterward bent his courſe for Spaine; but running vp and down the ſeas, he died: wherefore his companie wanting a head, came to Gadis, to their brethren and countrymen, which were planted in this Iſland; who entertained them courteouſly, and the towne was better peopled by them: ſo as in the end it became a mightie Commonweale, inhabited firſt without all doubt by this nation of Tyr. G

Tyrians did firſt people Calis.

9 Tyr was at that time, and long after, one of the moſt famous cities in the world, and and moſt abounding in people and wealth; which the townes that haue taken their beginning from her, in diuers parts of the earth, doe witneſſe. And although it had in a manner no territories, and that it was often taken and ſpoyled by the kings and potentates of Aſia, and by Alexander the Great, yet did they eaſily recouer their firſt happineſſe, by reaſon of the induſtrie of the inhabitants, and the commoditie of the ſea; the which they did frequent with more experience and knowledge than any other nation of that age. It was the mother citie of that mightie Commonweale of Carthage, which for ſo long a time did contend for Emperie with Rome; the firſt foundation whereof was layed by one Carchedon a Tyrian: it was afterwards enlarged by Dido, ſiſter to Pigmalion, about 135 yeares before the foundation of Rome, and did encreaſe daily both in people and wealth. The citizens whereof ſome 562 yeares before the Natiuitie of Chriſt, bent their courſe for Spaine, to ſpoyle as others had done, by reaſon of them of Gades: who hauing gotten a great territorie in Spaine, which made them to bee feared and honoured of their neighbours, yet not contenting themſelues with their owne, they ſought to take from others: yea, being right merchants, and ſeeking to make their profit of all things, they tooke away men from the neighbour townes and villages, and caried them to ſell as ſlaues in ſtrange countries: a traffique which had beene alwayes vſed by the Phenicians of Syria, their progenitors, to the prejudice of the people of Paleſtina and Iudea, who bordered vpon them. Theſe inhumane faſhions did in the end ſtirre vp the other people of Spaine againſt the Gaditanes, whereof followed much warre of ſmall fame, by reaſon of the weakeneſſe of the Commonweales and Potentates which did manage them, if wee will compare them with others of thoſe times. Tyrians great ſea men.

Tyrians made profit of all things.

Onely there is an honourable mention made of a noble man commaunding vpon the coaſt of the Ocean, neere vnto this Iſland of Gadis, called Arganthon, happie in wealth and long proſperitie of his affaires; for they ſay he liued 155 yeares, and reigned 80, and withall loued juſtice: whoſe time is conferred with that of Ancus Martius, reigning in Rome about 150 yeares after the foundation thereof. The Gaditanes were kept ſomewhat in awe by him and others; yet not ſo ſubdued, but they tooke armes vpon all occaſions; ſo as the people round about conſpired againſt them: who finding not themſelues ſtrong ynough to oppoſe againſt ſo many enemies, they reſolued to call the Carthaginians to their aid; who in the end became maſters of Spaine, vntill the Romanes ſtayed the courſe of their victories and conqueſts: the which ſhall be related in the following Bookes with more delight, for that we are better aſſured than of theſe things. Carthaginians called into Spain by the Gaditanes

Hitherto we haue diſcourſed of the beginning and antiquitie of thoſe nations which came firſt to inhabit Spaine, following the obſcure ſteps of thoſe that haue left any thing in writing, or read or conjectured, hauing ſcarce obſerued any order of times, being without any ſure grounds: for euen the places, whereas euery one of the Gouernors, Captains, or Kings, whereof we haue made mention, did reigne, is not very certaine. Yet it is moſt apparent, that the Iſle of Gades hath been the moſt famous place of all Spaine, and that the ſuperſtition of idolatrous people hath preſerued it from the inuaſions and ſpoyles of ſtrangers, by reaſon of the famous Temple of Hercules, which was built there: and that the maine land which is about this Iſland, and the ſtrait which is neere vnto it, haue beene ſooner and more particularly knowne than other places within the heart of Spaine, by reaſon of the commodious landing for Armies, and the abourd of merchants ſtrangers, which came thither by ſea. And it is credible, that within the countrey there were many pettie kings, heads of people, without fame, and it may be without any good and lawfull policie; and it is not impertinent, that ſome M

Religion whatſoeuer it be, is naturally reuerenced.

A townes, famous in after ages, and euen in our times, whoſe beginning is not known, haue had their firſt foundations from theſe vnknowne people.

Wee haue willingly omitted many diſcourſes written by others, for that wee haue held them fabulous, or at the leaſt very doubtfull: as the comming of Noe into Spaine, and the voyage and conqueſt thereof by Nabuchodonozor, and ſuch like, which we may read in counterfeit Beroſus, or in Ioſephus, being deceiued by the memorials of the Chaldeans, who put this laſt Nabuchodonozor aboue all the Hercules that euer were, to whoſe acts (the which in truth were great, as we may gather by the holy Scriptures) wee doe not any way derogate, by calling in queſtion his comming into Spaine, for that Aſia, Ægypt, and Africk, which were neere, might
B furniſh him wherewith to erect his trophies.

The great drought (whereof ſome haue left remembrance) ſeemeth as incredible vnto vs; the which continued ſix and twentie yeares, and burnt all the trees and plants in Spaine, except ſome Oliue and Pomegranet trees, as they ſay; as if theſe trees could not be hurt by the extreame heat, as well as the reſt: it dried vp all the riuers, except Ebro and Guadalquibir, which became ſmall vnprofitable riuers; ſo as the people were forced to goe out in great troupes, to ſeeke for other dwellings. Theſe things, for that they haue not beene written by any auncient and good Authors, who would not haue paſſed ouer ſo memorable an accident with ſilence, and for the abſurdities which follow, they are with reaſon rejected. A prodigious drought.

C And for as much as in that which we are hereafter to treat of, we ſhall find Spaine more manured, better peopled with men, townes, and burroughes, limitted and diſtinguiſhed by more apparent bounds, and hauing ſome better forme of gouernment and policie than it hath hitherto had, we haue thought it expedient (for the Readers eaſe) before we enter into the ſubject, to make a particular and briefe deſcription thereof, making ſome mention of the fertilitie of the ſoyle, qualitie of the ayre, and nature and manners of the Spaniards, both auncient and moderne.

rall limits, as they are at this day; vnleſſe they will ſay, that the continuall beating of the waues of the ſea hath made ſome breaches, or hath diuided it from Africke, to the which D ſome beleeue it was joyned in the beginning, or that the forme hath beene changed by ſome other accident. There may well be ſome diminution: for in Iſlands, the which (for that they are little) are better comprehended and meaſured by the ſences, we find without all queſtion, that ſome at this preſent are much leſſe than they were in former ages, and others that haue beene famous, are now periſhed, and are no more, hauing beene vndermined by the waues, and ſwallowed vp in the ſea. But whatſoeuer hath happened ſince that Spaine had any fame vnto this day, it doth not appeare that there hath beene any great portion cut away, or that it is much altered or changed.

This Region hath beene very fitly compared by the Auncients to an Oxes hyde ſpread abroad: for beginning by the necke ſomewhat narrow (which is the paſſage of the Pyrenee Spaine like to an Oxes hyde.
E mountaines, by the which it is joyned vnto Fraunce) it extendeth it ſelfe to the right and to the left, going towards the Weſt: ſo as making in a manner a ſquare forme, the Promontories or heads which thruſt into the ſea, on the one ſide vpon the coaſt of Biſcaye, and at Finis terræ, and on the other at Cap de Gates, and at the ſtrait of Gibaltar, repreſent the legs; then the point of Cap S. Vincent, ſtretcht forth behind towards the Weſt, makes the tayle.

That which is taken for the Eaſt part of Spaine, runs along the Pyrenee mountaines, beginning neere vnto the towne of Bayonne, vpon the limits of Fraunce, where was heretofore the Promontorie Eaſo, and runs vnto Cap de Crux, whereas Venus Temple was in old time; that is, from the Ocean to the Mediterranean ſea, being 80 leagues, or thereabouts, taking the F way by Fraunce: for theſe mountaines haue no ſtrait courſe, but bend much towards Spaine, and hold a great part of that countrey: ſo as he that would goe from the Ocean to the Mediterranean ſea within the countrey of Spaine, on that ſide of the mountaines, ſhould find it much more than 80 leagues. Although that this coaſt of Spaine be called the Eaſt, yet all this paſſage of the Pyrenee mountaines turnes much towards the North, and is ſubject to that wind which the Italians call Grec, and by our mariners Northeaſt. The Eaſt part of Spaine.

From Cap de Crux, or Venus Temple, along the Mediterranean ſea, and paſſing by the ſtrait into the Atlanticke Ocean, vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent, is the South part of Spaine; the which notwithſtanding turning towards the Eaſt, is for the moſt part ſubject to the wind which the Italians call Siroco, and we Southeaſt, and contains about 275 leagues; that is, 202 leagues to Gibaltar, and 73 leagues from thence to Cap S. Vincent, the which are diſtinctly meaſured after this manner. G

Prouinces out of Spaine vnder the iuriſdiction thereof.

We are not ignorant, that in old times was comprehended vnder the juriſdiction of Spaine, on the one ſide the Prouince of Gaule Narbonoiſe, which is now called Languedocke, and on the other ſide a portion of Mauritania in Africa, beyond the ſtrait, as well in the times of the Romane Emperours, as of the Gothes: but for that it was an acceſſorie onely for a time, and vpon extraordinarie occaſions, and that it is moſt certaine that theſe people are by nature excluded out of the limits of Spaine, and haue alwaies had diuers humors and manners to the Spaniards, wee will containe our ſelues within the compaſſe which wee haue deſcribed and meaſured, in the whole courſe of this Hiſtorie; and if we be forced to goe out of it, wee will hold our ſelues there as ſtrangers. Hauing turned round about Spaine, let vs now come into the heart of it, and before we ſpeake of the particular Prouinces, let vs ſee what mountaines and riuers are famous in the whole country, the better to diſtinguiſh euery nation, both auncient and moderne. L

Pyrenees, why ſo called.

The Pyrenees, which haue taken their name either of the great fire, whereof mention hath bin made (for Pyr in Greeke, is fire) or from the ordinarie lightening which fals vpon the tops of the hils, or elſe (if we will receiue fables) of the nymph Pyrene, daughter to Bebrix, whom Hercules did get with child as he paſſed that way, extend their greateſt maſſe from Venus Temple, or Cap Crux, vnto Bayonne, that is to ſay, from the one vnto the other ſea, ſtretching farre into Spaine, where they doe hold a great part of the countrey, which lyes betwixt them and the riuer of Ebro, caſting moreouer many braunches along and croſſe this Region, from whence doe fall many riuers and ſmall ſtreames, the which ſome haue numbred to be 150, M

A meriting the names of riuers. The front of theſe mountaines, which ſtretch vnto the Ocean neere vnto Bayonne, bending in that part, runs along the Cantabrians, Aſturians, & Gallicia, vnto the laſt Weſterne limits, extending it ſelfe far into the country, and making almoſt halfe Spaine crooked and hilly, whereas the riuer of Duero doth paſſe, and further. Theſe hils were heretofore called Cantabres and Vindius, and ſince they took diuers names, which were giuen them by the people which dwell thereabouts, and in the vallies thereof. At this preſent they be the mountains of Biſcay, Nauarre, Sentillana, the mountains of Oca, Aſturia, and Gallicia. Out of them doth flow the riuer Ebro, in old time Iberus, neere vnto a place which they call Fuent Ibre, & hauing run a little towards the Eaſt, ſhe turneth her courſe to the South, by the
B ancient country of the Autrigones, Vardules, Vaſcons, Ilergetes, Edetanes, and Ilercaones, the which are in our time the Nauarrois, Arragonois, and Cattelaunians, and hauing run aboue 120 leagues through the country, it fals into the Mediterranean ſea, beneath Tortoſe. Duero doth alſo take her beginning in theſe mountains, a great riuer, and the auncient limit betwixt Portugall and Tarraconeſe, two of the principall Prouinces of Spaine, neere vnto a Bourg called Aquilar, not farre from Soria, bending in the beginning towards the South, but afterwards ſhe takes her courſe to the Weſt Ocean, into the which it diſchargeth it ſelfe neere vnto the towne of Porto Galego, hauing run about 120 leagues by the Areuaces, and betwixt the vallies of the Galliques and Luſitanians, which in our time are thoſe of Caſtille the old, Leon and Portugal, towards the North. Into it fals the riuer Auia, vpon the banks whereof they ſay
C that no tree that is pricking will grow; although that all the countrey thereabouts is full of Pomgranets, Oranges, Cytrons, and ſuch like, the which it hath common with another riuer in Galicia, called Aleſte.

From the ſame Pyrenees, as from a common ſtemme, parts the mountain, called in old time Idubeda or Iubalda, the which thruſts forth into two other branches, the which diuides Spain from the Eaſt vnto the Weſt, and paſſing by diuers people, gets alſo diuers names: for in the beginning they call it Sierra, or mountaine of Acienca, by reaſon of the auncient towne of Auca, the ruines whereof are yet to be ſeene, aboue the towne of Bourgos: then it is called Sumo Sierra, Puerto de Tablada, of Palomera, of Abilo, Pico, of Tornauacas, & in the end enters into Portugal, making a great front neere vnto the Ocean, the which they call the mount
D of Strella, vpon the top of which is an admirable lake: for they doe often find in it pieces of ſhips which haue ſuffered ſhipwracke vpon that coaſt, notwithſtanding that the mountaine is very high, and a good way from the ſea: and they ſay moreouer, that when the ſea is troubled with tempeſts, they doe heare the waues beat, and all that lake and mountaine make a noyſe, with the horrible ſound of the winds and tempeſt, as if they were in full ſea.

This courſe of the mountains running betwixt the riuers Duero and Tayo, doth now cauſe a diſtinction of the people of the Prouinces of Spain; for which reaſon they are called, on this ſide, or beyõd the mountains. The other branch of this moũt Idubeda runs towards the South, neere vnto the towns of Siguenſa and Cuenca, keeping in the riuer Ebro, that it bend not towards the Weſt, the which in our time hath alſo gotten diuers names, that is, Solorio, Sierra
E Molina, Sierra d'Alcarras & Sigura, in old times, Mons Argentum; and ſometimes riſing high, and ſometimes falling and opening in ſome places, it is in a manner plain neere vnto Valence: then it riſeth againe, and paſſeth to Carthagena, and to Cap de Palos, in former times called Scombraria, the ancient limit of two gouernments of Spaine, at what time this mountain was called Oroſpeda or Ortoſpeda. Paſſing on by the ſea ſhore riſeth the mountaine, in old time called Illipula, and now Sierra Vermeia, Sierra de Rondas, and other hils of the kingdome of Granado, which extend vnto the ſtrait whereas they make Mont Calpe, called at this time Gi-
F baltar; the which ſhould properly be called Gibal Tarif, a name gotten by the diſcent of a captaine Moore, called Tarif, who landed in this place with the firſt armie of Moores that came out of Africke into Spaine, when as the Gothes kingdome went to ruine. Other mountaines diuiding themſelues from this, and going far from the ſea, run aboue Cordoue and Seuille, the which in old time were called Mariani Montes, and Caſtulonenſis Saltus, now Sierra Morena.

Out of theſe aboue named mountaines, which keepe in the riuer Ebro, bending from the North to the South, there flowe three great flouds or riuers, Tagus, Anas, and Betis, according to the ancients, but now called Tayo, Guadiana, and Guadalquibir, beſides many others of leſſe fame, which theſe doe receiue and carrie into the Ocean.

Tayo, Tagus, Guadiana, Anas, Guadalquibir, or Betis.

The courſe of Tagus.

Tayo hath his ſpring at a place which is now called Sierra Molina, neere vnto the towne G of Cuenca and Toralba, the which paſſing almoſt through two parts of Spaine, runneth by Toledo, the country of Eſtrema Dura and Portugal, towards the Weſt Ocean, where it enters by a large and ſpacious channell beneath the royall citie of Lisbone. This riuer was famous among the Auncients, by reaſon of the little graines, and as it were ſcrapings of pure gold, which they did often find in the grauell and ſand, which the torrent and ſtreames of water had brought from the mountaines.

The beginning and courſe of Guadiana.

Guadiana commeth out of the countrey which in old time they called Campus Laminitanus, and now Campo de Montiel, a place which is otherwiſe drie and wanting water. This riuer directeth her courſe in the beginning towards the Weſt, neere vnto the towne which was H called Pax or Pezauguſta, but now Badaios: turning there to the South, it diſchargeth it ſelfe into the Atlanticke ſea, bounding in at this day the kingdome of Portugal on the South ſide, as in old time it diuided the prouince of Betica from Luſitania. Towards the Spring they
A ſingularitie of Guadiana. call it Rodiera, and from thence (which is admirable) hauing run ſome leagues in the countrey, it hides it ſelfe vnder the ground, neere vnto a place called Argamaſilla, and runneth ſo hidden aboue eight great leagues: then it comes forth againe into certaine moores, continuing her courſe in that manner, neere vnto the auncient townes of Cecilia, Gemela, Emerita, and Pezauguſta, towards the ſea; by reaſon whereof the Spaniards breed admiration in ſtrangers, bragging, that they haue a bridge in their countrey, vpon the which aboue ten thouſand cattell feed daily. I

Guadalquibir, the name, ſpring, and courſe.

As for Guadalquibir, ſo named by the Moores, which is as much to ſay, as a great floud, and in old time Betis, her beginning is vpon Mont Argent, called now Sierra d'Alcarras, and runneth towards the Weſt into the Atlanticke ſea, beneath Seuille, by a large channell; although in old time it had two: whereof the one paſſed along the wals of Nebriſſa, which at that time was Lebriſſa; the which is at this day aboue two leagues off, for that the channell is filled vp: vpon the which Aſta did alſo ſtand, which in thoſe times was alſo called Zeres de la Frontera.

Cayo.

The ladders of Hannibal.

There are other mountaines in Spaine of leſſe fame, as Mont Cayo, neere to Tarraſſone in Arragon, in old time Caunus; M. Iui or Mons Iouis, neere to Barcelone; the ladders of Hannibal, called in that time the coaſt of Garaph, and others. Moreouer, there are many ri- K uers beſides thoſe which we haue deſcribed, giuing the names or bounds to Prouinces: as the riuer of Ruſcino, whereof the towne and countrey was named; of the ruines whereof Perpignan was built: Aſtorga, which ſeemeth to giue the name vnto the Aſturians: the riuer of Calybs, which paſſeth according vnto ſome, neere vnto Tarraſſone, and in his name carrieth the marks of the beginning of the Spaniards, the water whereof is excellent to ſteepe yron: Sicoris, or Sigro, which paſſeth at Lerida; about the which were the Sicanians, which paſſed into Sicilie, Cinpa or Senga, and the greater and leſſe Arragon; flouds whereof the kingdome of Arragon is named, with others which are obſerued by the curious. But it ſhall be eaſie for vs, among theſe great mountaines and riuers which we haue deſcribed, to find out euery people and prouince, and the particular places of Spaine, as well according to the L diſtinctions of the Auncient, as their limits and diuiſions, ſince the euerſion of the Romane Empire.

Turditanes.

Beginning then with the Weſterne point, we ſay, That from Cape S. Vincent vnto the Iſland of Gades or Calis, did dwell the auncient Turditanes, vpon the ſea, and within the land, holding both bankes of the riuer Anas, and the countrey which lieth betwixt it and Betis, beyond the which they did occupie ſome leagues of the countrey towards the South. This Region was in the beginning full of woods and forreſts, which they called Tercenians and Tarteſſians, but being cut downe, it hath beene alwaies very fertile and abounding in all things. The towne of Hiſpalis, called after Sepila, and ſince Seuille, was of this nation, being alſo called Romulenſis Colonia, ſituated vpon the bankes of Betis, a great and nauigable ri- M uer, and lower towards the ſea, Nebriſſa, and Aſta Colonia, and within the countrey Italica, whereas the Emperours Traian, Adrian, and Theodoſius were borne, with the Poet Silius, and Carmon retaining ſtill the name, Pax Iulia and Beia, at this preſent Portugall.

Turdules.

Neere vnto them towards the Eaſt were the Turdules, whoſe countrey is alſo bathed by Betis, and vpon this riuer is the towne of Cordoue, called Colonia Patricia, built by the Conſull

A Conſull M. Claud. Marcellus, about the yeare of the foundation of Rome 602. Which countrey of the Turdules did extend to the Turditanes and the Baſtules, from the Iſle of Gades, vpon the Ocean, vnto the Mediterranean ſea, neere vnto the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gates. The places which the Turdules did hold lying vpon the Ocean ſhoare, towards the ſtrait, were the port of Mneſthee, the Temple of Iuno built by Hercules, and the citie of Belon, on which ſide there are at this day S. Marie, Trafalgar, and Tariffe: and within the countrey the mountaine Ilipula, and Ilipula Magna, at this preſent Ilpa; Illiberis, or Liberia, which ſome thinke was Granado in thoſe times; and Aſtigi, one of the judiciall ſeats of Spaine, which may be Eccia at this day, although B there were another of that name vpon the ſea ſhoare. Among this nation it may well be the Meleſſians were, and their towne Oringe, taken by L. Scipio, which they ſay was Aryona.

After were the Baſtules, within the ſtraits, and along the Mediterranean ſea, who were ſurnamed Pœni, continuing vnto the Promontorie of Charidemum, or Cap de Gates, and to Balaria, now Bara, or Vera, next vnto the Turdules, of which nation Calpe was, otherwiſe called Heraclee, the which at this day they name Gibaltar, neere vnto the which in old time was the towne of Carteia, called alſo Tarteſſe; the which was a common name in old time for the riuer Betis, the Iſland of Gades, and all the neighbour countrey. It is likely, that this towne of Carteia was ſituated whereas Algezire now ſtandeth. Titus
C Liuius ſetteth it without the ſtrait, vpon the Ocean. Then Malaga, a port which retayneth his name; and Abdera, which is Almerie, vpon the Mediterranean ſea, belonging vnto the Baſtules; and it may be Munda, whereas Pompeyes eldeſt ſonne was defeated, if it be that Ronde which is at this day, as ſome will haue it. The countries inhabited by theſe three nations, are at this day comprehended in Granado, Andaluzia, and a part of Portugall, and made the Betique Prouince one of the chiefe members of the kingdome of Spaine.

Next vnto them, and continuing along the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea, were the Baſtitanes and Conteſtanes, whereas in our time lyeth Murcia and Valence, ſeperated by the mountaine Oroſpeda. The towne of Baſa was in old time the chiefe manſion of the Ba-D ſtitanes, otherwiſe called Baſitanes, to whom Acci did belong, now called Guadix, and vnto Beiar and Origuela, in old time called Bigerra and Orcelis. But Murcia, then called Menlaria, Sætabis, which is Xatiua, and towards the Promontorie Scombaria, now called Cap de Palos, new Carthage, Alone, which at this day is Alicant, Illici, it may be Elches in our time, and the citie of Valence, were belonging vnto the Conteſtanes, among the which it may be Illiturge was, lying farre from the ſea, or elſe among the aboue named Baſtitanes.

Baſtitans. Conteſtans.

Then followed the Editanes and Ilercaones, from Valence vnto the mouth of the riuer Ebro. The townes and places renowmed among the Editanes, or, as others tearme them, Seditanes, were Dianium vpon the ſea, and Sagunt higher, deſtroyed by Hannibal, E whereas now Moruiedro ſtandeth, Cæſar Auguſta, farre off from the ſea, is Saragoſſa, in old time Salduba.

Among the Ilercaones were Dertoſa, in theſe times Tortoſa, and old Carthage, ruined by the two Scipios brethren.

Ilercaones, a people.

Ioyning vnto them, and ſtill coaſting along the ſea ſhoare, and on this ſide the riuer of Ebro, were the Acetanians, Laetanes, Caſtellanes, and Indigetes, all which are comprehended at this day in Catelogne, vpon the ſea. To theſe Acetanians (who were alſo called Coſetanians) belonged Terraco; of the which, the greateſt part of Spaine was named; a towne peopled by the two brethren Scipios, to oppoſe it againſt new Carthage.

Acetanians.

F Barcelone growne great of a ſmall beginning, by the ruines of Rubicata, a Colonie of the Africanes, ſituated vpon the riuer Rubricatus, at this preſent Lobregat, was of the Laetanes or Laletanes.

Barcelone. Laetanes.

The Caſtellans (who, according vnto ſome, haue left their name to our Catelogne) were whereas it may be the Duchie of Cardone now is.

Caſtellans.

Indigetes. Vpon the declining of the Pyrenee mountaines, were the Indigetes, or Endigetes, whereas the towne of Empurias or Emporium now is, and Rhoda, or Roſes, now ruined, and in old time the Temple of Venus, whereas now Cœlibre ſtands, a name taken from Illiberis, which was at the foot of the Pyrenees, as ſome ſuppoſe. G

Ruſcino Roſsillon. For a frontier to Spaine on that ſide, we will place Ruſcino, which is the Countie of Roſſillon, although it were in old time of the Prouince of Gaule, but it hath of long time beene annexed vnto Spaine: there was Elna, which hath not changed her name, and Ruſcino, both riuer and towne, of whoſe ruines Parpignan was built. Neere vnto it is a ſmall riuer, called Illeris, and ſince Tetrum, that is to ſay, filthie, for that the water thereof is blacke, by reaſon that it paſſeth among the mynes of mettall, whereof thoſe mountaines are full. In this countrey there was alſo a towne called Illiberis, as that of Grenade, whereas the firſt Councell of Spaine was held: but at this day there remaineth no marke of it. H

Comming now to the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, from whence wee are parted, we will deſcribe the people dwelling along the Weſterne and Northerne Ocean, vnto the other end of the Pyrenees, neere vnto Bayonne; whereof the firſt were called Celtiques, who came without all doubt from Gaule, after that the Celtes and Iberians were mingled together, comprehended partly vnder the Luſitanians, who held a great Continent of the countrey, as well by the ſea ſide, as within the land, and gaue the name vnto one of the chiefe members of Spaine, containing the Vergons, of whom wee will make mention hereafter. Celtiques. I

Luſitanians. Theſe Celtiques and Luſitanians comprehended a great part of our Portugall, of Eſtrema Dura, and Caſtille the new, and entred as farre as Andelouzia into the Celtiques countrey. The auncient townes which they had, and the places moſt renowmed, were Vlyſippo or Olyſippo, now Lisbone, at the mouth of Tayo, the mouthes of the riuers of Monda and Duero, and within the countrey Scalabis, or Turris Iulia, now Trugillo, Talabriga, Talauera now, Ebura, Norba Cæſarea, at this time Alcantara, Auguſta Emerita, now Merida. Theſe two laſt were betwixt Tayo and Guadiana, and Norba Cæſarea was ruined by Pompeyes faction, for that they had beene two faithfull vnto Cæſar: of the ruines whereof, and the remainders of which people, Emerita was afterwards built, in Auguſtus his time. There were alſo Euandria, Cecilia Gemellina, now called S. Marie of Guadalupe: Aronda among the Celtique Betiques, called alſo Munda, not that whereas Pompeyes eldeſt ſonne was defeated. Beſide theſe townes, there were vpon the marches of the Luſitanians, Ilipa, which it may be is Niebla at this day; Oxtraca, Carmel, Ituca, and others, whereof there remaine no markes. Lubone. K

Callaiques or Gallegos. Beyond the riuer of Duero were the people called Callaiques or Galliques, now Gallegos, ſo named of the Gaules, Galates, or Celtes, holding a great countrey, which was barren and hillie, for the moſt part, but where it joyneth vpon the Luſitanians; which is that which is contained betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, belonging at this preſent to the realme of Portugall; the which hath taken this name ſince the comming of the Moores; of the towne of Porto, right againſt the which, they or the Gaules pyrats built a fort, which was called Gal: it may be it is that which is called the tower of Gaya, the which is in this countrey, whereas Duero falleth into the ſea. Theſe people of Callaiques were diuided into two; thoſe which were called Brecaires, by reaſon of the towne of Brecar Auguſta, which was among them (the which is now Braga, Metropolitane of Portugal,) and the Callaiques Lucenſes, by reaſon of the towne called Lucus Auguſti, now Lugo. Of the Brecaires was the riuer Lemia, called Lethes, for that the Celtes inhabiting about the riuer of Guadiana, comming with other of their neighbours into this countrey, after ſome tumults, and the loſſe of their captaine, being vagabonds, and without counſell, they wandered vp and downe without conduct, and without any care to returne from whence they came, as if they had forgotten their firſt abode. The Brecaires and their towne Brecar tooke their name from certaine ſouldiors of Affricke, which were leuied about the riuer of Bragada, in the Prouince of Carthage, and then mingled with the Celtes, or Gaules, were called Callaiques, or Galliques Brecaires. Portugall whence it was ſo named. L Brecaires. M

Among

A Among the Lucenſes were the Artabres, about the Promontorie Nereum, which is now Finis terræ: there were the altars of the Sunne, and Flauium Brigantium, it may be Compoſtella at this day, or Betauzos, or rather Corunra, and Trileucum, a Promontorie, and Iria Flauia, at this day S. Marie of Finis terræ, or Padron, and Aquę Calidæ, now Orenſe. Artabres.

Aſturia joyned to theſe Callaiques, at that time diuided into many juriſdictions: there was Lancia the chiefe towne, taken by Auguſtus captaines, Legio Germanica, or Gemina, at this time Leon, a royall towne: Bregetium, called ſince (according vnto ſome) Ouiedo, an aſſured refuge for Chriſtians, when as the Moores did ouerrun Spaine: Aſturica Auguſta, at this day Aſtorga: Forum Egurrorum, Medina of Rioſecco, and towards the ſea Flauionauia, Aſturians.

B neere vnto the which began the Cantabrians, which are now the Biſcanes, thoſe of Guipuſcoa, and part of Nauarre. Their ſea townes were Flauiobriga, now Bilbao, Eaſo, S. Sebaſtian, neere Fonterabie, the furtheſt limit of Spaine, where as in old time was the Promontorie Olarſo, or Oeoſo. Among them was the towne of Segiſama, taken by Octauius Cæſar. They did comprehend the Antrigones, Cariſtes, Bardules, and Vaſcons, the which extended themſelues farre from the ſea into the countrey, on this ſide the riuer of Ebro, and coaſted the Pyrenee mountaines. The neereſt vnto Aſturia were properly called Cantabrians, to whom Vellica did belong, about the place where as now Victoria ſtands, the chiefe towne of the Prouince of Alaua, Iuliobriga, at this day Logrogne. The riuer of Ebro did run through the middeſt of the Autrigons. Alba was among the Vardules, ſince called Viana: and to the Vaſ- Cantabrians. Vardules.

C cons belonged Pompelon Martua, which is now called Pampelone Iacca, which according to Ptolome hath held the old name: Calagorina, now called Calaorra, or Calahorra: Baſconton, of the name of Baſco, or Vaſco: Sueſſa, which may be Sangueſſa, and others.

Hitherto we haue briefely deſcribed the people and prouinces of Spaine, which joyne vpon the ſeas, and obſerued the chiefe places thereof, applying them as neere as might bee to theſe times: Let vs now enter into the countrey, beginning with the confines of the Callaiques, Aſturians, and Cantabrians, towards the North, and comming to the South.

The Vacces did joyne vnto the Gallicians Brecaires of the Weſt, to whom the Murboges, Areuaces, thoſe which were called Belli and Titthi, confining with the Celtiberians, the Pelendones, and Berones were neighbours, approching neere vnto the riuer of Ebro, which Vacces.

D was to the Eaſt of them, and that of Duero vpon the South. All this compaſſe is comprehended in our time within Caſtille the old, and the realme of Leon.

The townes of Viminacium, Auia, or Liuia, which is now Villalon, Segiſama Iulia, at this preſent called Tordeſillas, which they call otherwiſe Turris Sillana; Palantia, which hath preſerued the name of Palence; Pincia, which is Vailledolit, Septimance, or Simanca; Sentice, or Sarabris, at this day Zamora, and Cauca, where as Lucullus committed great crueltie, and Intercatia. Theſe townes I ſay were among the Vacces: But Branum, or Auca, of whoſe ruines the towne of Burgos hath beene built, belonged to the Murboges.

Among the Areuaces, whoſe country is waſht with the riuer Duero, running through the Areuaces.

E middeſt thereof, were the townes of Clunia Colonia, Segortia Lacta, at this preſent Sepulueda, Ocilis, Segobia, which keepes his name, Termantia, and the old Numance, whereas at this day Soria ſtands.

Vnder the ſaid nation were the Vergones or Vectons, confining vpon the Luſitanians, and making a part of that prouince: which countrey is now comprehended betwixt the frontier of Portugall, towards Cite Roderigo, the kingdome of Leon, Caſtille the new, and Toledo. To theſe people Elmantica did belong, now called Salamanca, a famous Vniuerſitie. On the Eaſt ſide were the Carpetanians, there ſtood Toledo, which retaines the name, called alſo Serezola, Æbura, Hippo, Complutum, now called Alcala Enares, Mantua, now Madril: and it may be among them were the Olcades, and their townes Althee. Vergones and Vectons. Carpetanians.

Towards the South were the Oretanes, confining on the Eaſt with the Celtiberians, and Oretanes.

F on the Weſt with the Beturians, neighbours to the Luſitanians, which are thoſe of Eſtrema Dura. The countrey of the Oretanes makes at this day a part of the realme of Toledo; it comprehends the fields of Calatraua, the paſſage called the fields of Alcocer, and part of the mountaines Marianes, at this preſent Sierra Morena, vnto Iaen, and to the frontiers of Granado. Oreton of the Germanes, which ſome thinke to bee Calatraua, Caſtulo, then a great and mightie towne, and now a ſmall burrough, called Caſlona, vpon the riuer Guadiana, ana, where Himilca the wife of Hannibal was borne, iſſued from the race of Milicus, who built it: Mentiſa, which is Iaen, according vnto ſome, and Aſtapa, a famous retreat of deſperat theeues; Nobilia, Cuſibis and Illuſia, were of the Oretanes. G

Celtiberians. Among the Celtiberians were Ergauica, Alce, Turiaſſo, (that is Taraſſone) Bilbilis, at this preſent Calataiub (whereas the Poet Martiall was borne) Saguntia, now Siguenza, Contrebia and Valeria, which is Concha.

Lobetanes. Betwixt the Celtiberians and the riuer Ebro, were the Lobetanes, and on this ſide Ebro, vnder the Vaſcons and mount Edulius, dwelt the Ilergetes, and towards the Pyrenee mountaines, and at the foot of them, the Sueſſetanes, Lacetanes, Authetanes, or Auſetanes, and Cerretanes, being all contained partly in Nauarre and Arragon, and part in Catalogne at this preſent. Sueſſa the chiefe towne of the Sueſſetanes, may be Sangueſſa in Nauarre: and Iacca at that time was of the auntient Lacetanes. The towne of Ilerda, which is Lerida, gaue the name to the Ilergetes: to them there alſo belonged Oſca, Hueſca at this day, and Bergidum, which is Vrgel, and Anitorgis, or Athanaſia. H

Sueſſetanes. Lacetanes. Auſetanes. Cerretanes.

As for the towne of Iliturgis, it is obſcurely limited by the auntients. Some of the later will haue it among the Ilergetes, others place it in the Oretanes countrey, and others in the Betique prouinces, places farre diſtant one from another.

The Authetanes, or Auſetanes, did poſſeſſe Geronda, in our time Girone: and among the Cerretanes, were Auſonia the auntient, and Iulia Libica, which ſome hold to be Linca. I

This is all which I haue thought fit to gather of the people inhabiting the firme land of Spaine, the which were found there, and augmented by the Carthaginians and Romanes, when as they contended for the poſſeſſion thereof, whereof ſome markes appeared at that time, and that they had immutable limits, the which doe now aſſure vs of their habitations.

Iſlands about Spaine. 11 There is mention made by ſome authors, of many iſlands about Spaine, whereof ſome are no more, others are yet famous. The Caſſiterides, fertile in tinne, were placed by the Coſmographers neere vnto Cap Finis terræ: but there is no more any mention of them; whereby it ſeemes they haue been ſwallowed vp in the ſea, vnleſſe they will ſay, they be thoſe of the Axores, which are too far from Spaine. K

Caſſiterides, loſt iſlands.

Iſlands of the gods. The iſlands of the gods in the Weſt Ocean, may be thoſe of Bayone, neere vnto Ponteuedra in Gallicia.

Calis and the antient names. The iſland of Gades was in old time called Tarteſſe Erythrea, or according vnto ſome Erythie, Cotynuſia, Aphrodiſia, Gadira, Gadir, and Gaddir (although that Gaddir in the opinion of ſome, is a common name to the iſland, and to other places of Betique Spaine, neere vnto it, as well as Tarteſſe) and now they haue named it Gadiz or Galis. It hath beene the moſt famous of all others about Spaine, and is yet renowned and rich, but much more in auntient times. For although that in the Romanes time they had ſcarce any territorie, yet was it one of the greateſt, the richeſt, and beſt peopled townes in Europe. It appeares by the deſcription of Cenſures at one time, That there were fiue hundred heads of families, of the order of Knights, among the inhabitants thereof. One Balbus a Gaditane enlarged the towne almoſt halfe bigger than it was, and called his new worke Neapolis. L

In this iſland there was a fountaine flowing and ebbing dayly with the ſea. Ioyning vnto it there were two other ſmall iſlands, whereof the one was called Didima. They write, That in old time the iſland of Gadis was much greater than it is now. It hath in length from the South to the North, ſome ten or twelue miles, and is ſeperated from the maine land by a narrow channell, and diſtant from the ſtrait of Gibaltar ſome threeſcore miles, or fiftie leagues.

Iſlands Baleares Maiorca, Minorca. In the Iberique, or Mediterranean ſea, are the two iſlands Baleares, called in theſe times Majorca, and Minorca; for that the one is bigger than the other. Their firſt name was Gymnaſies, for that the inhabitants thereof went all naked: Gymnos in Greeke, is naked in our language. But for that the men of this iſland were good Archers, they were called Baleares, vnleſſe wee will beleeue that this name was giuen them by one Balee, whom Hercules gaue them for their Gouernour, as ſome write. In thoſe dayes great Commonweales drew good ſouldiours from thence, who did commonly vſe ſlings, M

A and did euer carie three; with the one he did bind his head, with another he did girt himſelfe, and the third he held in his hand: and with theſe armes they wrought great effects, and did much amaze their enemies; for they were practiſed in it from their youth by their mothers, who ſet their breakfaſt bread vpō the top of a poſt, the which they muſt beat down with their ſlings, or elſe they faſted. Theſe iſlanders were long before they would vſe either gold or ſiluer, remembring the great calamities which Spaine had ſuffered, by reaſon of theſe mettals: wherfore they held themſelues to bee well aſſured in forbidding the vſe of it. They did ſometimes capitulate with the Carthaginians, who often imployed their ſouldiours in their warres, that they ſhould guie them wiues and wine for their pay, and no ſiluer.

Gold and ſiluer forbidden by the antient Maiorquins.

B Theſe are two fertile iſlands, hauing this benefit moreouer, that they doe not breed any hurtfull beaſt, although the warre which they had with the conies be no fable; but they were brought from other places, and of one bucke conie and a doe, they did multiplie in ſuch great numbers, as with the working of their holes and burroes vnder ground, they vnrooted trees, and vndermined the foundations of houſes, ſo as the inhabitants ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to demaund helpe and ſuccour of the Senat againſt theſe beaſts (a certaine argument of their ſimplicitie) but afterwards they learned to take them. The greateſt of theſe iſlands is about fifteene leagues long, and verie narrow. The leſſer yeelds nothing to the other in bountie and fruitfulneſſe. About them are the little iſlands of Cabrera and Dragonera. Neerer vnto the maine land, and more Weſterly, are the two Pityuſes, whereof the greater was called E-

Cabrera and Dragonera.

Pityuſes.

C buſus, which hath about twentie miles circuit of hard acceſſe, hauing a port vpon the South ſide: It is now called Yuica, the which they ſay hath no ſerpents, and, if they bee brought from any other place, they die. But the other, Ophiuſa in old time, and now Fromentaria, is ſo full of them, as the iſland hath remained deſart and not inhabited. In Yuica they make excellent ſalt. Theſe iſlands are right againſt the ſhore betwixt Barcelone and Valence.

The iſlands of Sardinia and Corſica were in old time giuen by the Popes in fee to the kings of Arragon, who haue contended by armes for the right thereof, againſt the Geneuois and Piſans, for many yeares, till that in the end the Arragonois got the quiet poſſeſſion of Sardinia; of which conqueſt we ſhall ſpeake often; wherefore wee will deſcribe it briefly, without making any particular mention of that of Corſica, which the Geneuois hold.

D The iſle of Sardinia lies in the Mediterranean ſea, hauing that of Corſica neere vnto it vpon the North. It runs out in length from North to South, neere threeſcore leagues, accounting foure miles to a league. It is held to be about an hundred and fiftie leagues in circuit: It is fiue and thirtie leagues from Africke, the neereſt place vnto it is Tunes or Bizerte. Betwixt it and Corſica are but foure leagues, and in ſome places but three: in the which there are many ſmal iſlands, which they cal Buſinares. This iſland was in old time called Ico, Ichnuſa, and Sandaliotis, for that it hath the forme of a ſole, or of a mans foot. The firſt inhabitants were Tuſcanes, and then Grecians, led by Iolaus and Sardus, companions to Hercules. After which there arriued ſome Troianes, and then Athenians. After them the Carthaginians ſeiſed vpon this iſland, who were diſpoſſeſt by the Romanes, which was the cauſe of the third warre betwixt

Hauing beene long vnder that commonweale, and conſequently vnder the Romane empire, the Saraſens got footing there, againſt whom the Geneuois and Piſans, then mightie commonweales, did arme, by the Popes perſuaſion; conquered it, and planted themſelues there. But for that it was a ſubject of their warre and quarels, and withall the Popes bearing a ſpleene againſt the Piſans, it was giuen in fee to the kings of Arragon. It was heretofore a ſtore-houſe for the Romanes, it was ſo fertile, and would be ſo ſtill, if the people were induſtrious; much better for tillage than Corſica, eſpecially that part which lies towards Africk, which is a plaine, and lyes lower than the other towards Corſica, which is hilly. In it there grow vines and all ſorts of fruites, as in Corſica, except oyle, by reaſon of the negligence of

F the Sardinians: for nature bringing forth in the woods and mountaines, infinit ſtore of wild oliues, ſhewes it is their owne fault if this plant be not made good. The iſland abounds in cattell of all ſorts, as it appeares by the great quantitie of hides and cheeſe which they tranſport into Italie and other places. There are great ſtore of wild goats, called by the countreymen Muſines, or Muſles, which haue their haire like ſtagges, and their heads like rammes, but their hornes bending backwards: they are verie light and nimble, and liue in the mountains, where-

of the Sardinians (who are better huntſmen than the Corſicans) take three or foure thouſand G at a time, the which they flea to ſell their skinnes, whereof the Cordeuan leather is made, leauing the carkaſſes in the fields, notwithſtanding that the fleſh be reaſonable good to eat;
The aire in Sardinia corrupted by nature and by accident. wherewith it may be the ayre is impaired, the which doth naturally infect that countrey, by reaſon of certaine South windes which blow in Summer. The horſes of Sardinia are hot, ſtrong headed, and hard to be broken, but they laſt long; and there are many wild. Among their tame cattell there are certaine ſmall bullockes, which amble naturally, which the countrey men vſe like Aſſes and Mules, to goe from one place to another. Heretofore there Mynes. haue beene mynes of ſulpher or brimſtone, alume, ſiluer, and ſalt; and it is but the negligence of the people, that they are not found at this day, and with good profit. Neither H Bathes. doth it want bathes which are good for many infirmities, eſpecially betwixt Montreal and Saint Iohn. In Sardinia (as ſome maintaine) there are no wolues, nor any venimous nor hurtfull beaſts, the which they haue common with many other iſlands: yet they haue verie great foxes, fierce and cruell, which eaſily kill a ſheepe or a goat. There growes the hearbe Sardonique, which cauſeth death, with ſuch a contraction of the ſinewes, as they ſeeme to ſmile when they are dead.

This iſland hath in former times beene better inhabited than it is at this day, and they haue beene more warlike than now they are. When as the Geneuois and Piſans did hold it, they diſtinguiſht it into two prouinces, that of Cap Caillery which lookes towards A-fricke, the which was the Piſans part, and the greater; and Cap of Lugodori, joyning vpon I Corſica, which the Geneuois held for them. Then the Sardinians had their rulers and Go-Iudges in foure iuriſdictions. uernours, whom they call Iudges, diuided into foure juriſdictions or prouinces; one at Caillery, another at Arborea, ſince called Oriſtagny; one at Turrita, or Torre, and the fourth at Galluri. This kind of gouernement was entertained vntill the conqueſt of the iſland by the Arragonis, and the Spaniards rule. At this day there is a Viceroy reſident at Caille-ry, with abſolute authoritie, who of neceſſitie muſt bee a Spaniard, and is aſſiſted by a Councell, or royall audience, conſiſting of a Preſident, and a certaine number of Coun-ſellours. The two prouinces aboue mentioned, into the which the iſland is diuided, haue either of them a Gouernour, who is a Spaniard, or of the iſland indifferently, which doe gouerne and haue authoritie in the abſence of the Viceroy, but hee beeing preſent, it K ceaſeth.

Chiefe townes in Sardinia. The townes and chiefe places of this iſland, bee Caillery, commonly called Calger, a towne ſeated vpon the ſide of a hill towards Africke, hauing a goodly port, haunted by merchants and ſaylers from all parts: it is well built, and enriched with diuers towers, and a ſtately temple, built by the Piſans, and an Archbiſhops ſeat. This citie hath by priuiledge a juriſdiction apart, beſides the Viceroyes authoritie, and is gouerned by the citizens themſelues. Next is Oriſtagny, in old time called Arborea, the which is alſo a biſhopricke, and was ſometimes a marquiſate with a particular lord: but one of them rebelling, the kings of Arragon haue vnited it vnto their demaines. There is a port alſo towards the Weſt. Ar-ghero, or Alguero, followes on the ſame Weſt part, the which hath no port, but onely a L road. Boſſa vpon the Sea, the tower in old time was called Libiſſon, a Colonie of the Ro-manes, and afterwards called Torre, or Turrite, the which is now ruined. Saſſari, ten or twelue miles from the ſea, where there is an auntient conduit of water, the which continues about twelue miles, vnto Saint Gauins temple. Then caſtle Arragonois towards Corſica.

There are many other burroughes and caſtles in the iſland, of ſmall fame. The ruines of old buildings which are to bee ſeene in many parts of the iſland, ſhew that in auntient time there were many cities and great buildings. In places not inhabited there yet are many towers to bee ſeene of a round forme, built of a verie hard ſtone, hauing the doores and entries narrow, and the ſtayres in the maine walls. Thoſe buildings are called by the inha- M bitants Noracs, a marke of great antiquitie, ſome thinking that Norac ſonne to Erithree did firſt inhabit this iſland, by whom the buildings were ſo called. The iſlands which are about Corſica and Sardinia, are few, and of no fame. Aſinara and Tolaro, are towards Cap Logudori, the one of the Eaſt ſide, the other of the Weſt, the reſt are rather ſhelfes than iſlands.

The

A The Sardinians had in old time a proper language, but the often change of their lords, and the acceſſe of diuers nations, hath corrupted their ſpeech: The moſt ciuile at this day ſpeake Spaniſh Cattelan: the vulgar ſort haue a language mixt of the Cattelans, Italians, Moors, and other ſtrange and barbarous words. Among the ruder ſort, there is not in a manner any religion, and not much in townes; for in all Chriſtendome you ſhall not find Churchmen more ignorant than in Sardinia. Their religious exerciſes are to heare maſſe on Sundayes, and on ſome Saints daies, and then they feaſt and daunce euen in their Churches, men and women together, with immodeſt ſongs and jeſtures. The Sardinians language.

In townes their apparell is verie ſtately, eſpecially of the women; but the countrey Their habit.
B peoples is ſimple and groſſe. The men are of a ſmall ſtature, but ſtrong and rough, and great huntſmen with croſſebowes: quiet and peaceable among themſelues, and courteous to ſtrangers.

Spaine, as wee haue deſcribed it by the prouinces and particular people, was diuided into three principall members, or three great prouinces; that is, Betica, Luſitania and Tarraconoiſe. Betica was ſo named of the riuer Betis, that is, Guadalquiber, which paſſeth through the middeſt of it. It did containe that which is incloſed by the riuer Anas, or Guadiana, on the one ſide, and by the Ocean ſea, from the mouth thereof ſtretching towards the ſtrait, and then running along the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea vnto Carthagena, or the Promontorie Charidemum, called Cap de Gates: From whence going by Diuiſion of Spaine according to the auncients. The confines of Betique.
C land to Caſtulo, or Caſlona the old, it was bounded in on that ſide by the mountaine Idubeda, which is at this day called Sierra of Alcarras, and others, as if they would draw a direct line from Muxacra, which is neere vnto Cap de Gates, vnto Almagra. This prouince was the beſt and moſt fertile of Spaine, and the firſt affected and vſurped by the Phenicians, Africanes, and other ſtrangers.

From the riuer Anas, or Guadiana, and his entrie into the ſea, mounting to the place whereas Duero falls into it, was the Weſt part of Luſitania, the ſecond member of Spaine, the which did lye betwixt thoſe two riuers, on the North and South ſides, and within it had for the Eaſterne limits, the Carpetanes and Oretanes, going from Caſtulo, or Caſlona, vpon Guadiana, vnto Septimanca, at this preſent Simanca, in Caſtille. The riuer Luſitania and the confines.
D Tayo paſſeth through the middeſt of this region, where in ſome places there are ſtore of all ſorts of fruits.

All the reſt of Spaine, from the mouth of Duero along the ſhore vnto Fonterabie, or Eaſo, and from the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gates, or elſe Bara, or Vera, or Muxacra on the Mediterranean ſea, vnto Venus Temple, or Cap de Crux, and all the people which are betwixt the Pyrenees and the limits which wee haue giuen to the prouinces of Betica and Luſitania, made the third member of Spaine: yet if wee ſhall beleeue Mela, the Calaiques, that is, the inhabitants of Gallicia, were comprehended among the Luſitanians; and that others haue made a fourth prouince of them during the emperours: accounting alſo the Carthagenoiſe for a fift, and adding the ſixt in Africke: for as much as all that Tarracenoiſe & the limits. Gallicia the fourth member. Carthagena the fift.
E which the Romane Emperours did poſſeſſe beyond the ſtrait in Mauritania, was ſubject to the juſtice of Spaine. But this tripartite diuiſion of Spaine, is the moſt auntient, and is not entertained by the Romanes, during their great exploits of armes, and conqueſts thereof; eſpecially for the gouernement of juſtice among thoſe nations, hauing wholly ſubdued them: for they erected Courts, which they called Conuents, appointing to euerie prouince his juriſdiction. In Betica there were foure eſtabliſhed, at Gades, Corduba, Aſtigi, and Seuille. In Luſitania three, at Emerita, Pax, or Pezauguſta, and at Scalabita, or S. Iren. And in Tarraconoiſe ſeuen, at Carthagena, Tarracone, Cæſar Auguſta, Clunia, Aſtorga, at Lugo, and at Bracar. Mauritania the ſixt member.

12 As for the diuiſion of Spaine into the hither and further, that happened in the begin- Another diuiſion of Spaine in regard of the war.
F ning when as the Romans came to make war againſt the Carthaginians, who held it in a maner all, or at the leaſt had reduced it vnder their obedience. The riuer of Ebro made this ſeperation, and the Romans called that part of Spaine where they firſt entred, the hither part, and the other beyond Ebro, the further: for they came firſt by ſea vpon the coaſt of Cattelogne, to Roſes, to Empurias, or to Turracon, notwithſtanding after they had enlarged their command on the other ſide Ebro, they did alſo extend the limits of Spain by little & little on that ſide, ſo

as in the end it was bounded by the Promontorie of Scombraria, or Cap de Palos, neere to Carthagena, and the deſcent of the mountaine Idubeda, and ſo through Caſtille, by the townes of Cuenca and Seguenza, vnto the Cantabres, or Biſcanes. And this diſtinction continued in two principall gouernments, for matters of warre and ſtate, till Auguſtus Cæſar, the Romanes ſending ſometimes Conſuls, ſometimes Proconſuls, or Pretors, euerie one to gouerne in his juriſdiction. Afterwards Auguſtus reduced Spaine into one prouince, the which was entertained by his ſucceſſours in the empire, at the leaſt vnto Conſtantine the Great, who changed the Courts of juſtice into another forme, making fiue chiefe towns, and as many prouinces, that is, Tarracone, Carthagene, Seuille, Merida, and Bracar; the which was afterwards entertained by the Gothes, vpon the declining of the empire, who notwithſtanding made it but one kingdome while they enjoyed it.

Fiue ſeats of iuſtice eſtabliſhed in Spaine by Conſtantine the Great.

13 But after that the power of the Arabian Mahometiſts, who had ſubdued the empire of the Perſians, and extinguiſhed the name of other Potentates in the Eaſt, had extended it ſelfe vnto the fartheſt bounds of Africke, and into the prouinces of Europe, which lay neere vnto it; Spain which was not without vices and defects in the chief members therof, being ſuddenly inuaded & ouerrun by this nation, being euer an enemie to peace and good gouernment, was diſmembred, & diuided again into diuers principalities, the names wherof we retaine vnto this day; that is. Ouiedo and Leon, Nauarre, Arragon, Cattelogne, Valence, Murcia, Granado, Tolledo, Caſtillia, Gallicia, and Portugal, which for the moſt part had diſtinct titles of kingdomes, ſome being held by the Moores, and others defended by the Gothes and them of the countrey. Of euerie of which kingdomes we meane to make mention in this hiſtorie, and to continue it, with the helpe of God, vntill that all Spaine was reduced vnder the command of one king, although it hold ſtill the former diuiſions, and their limits, as they were ſet downe in the time of the Arabians and Moores.

Many kingdoms erected in Spain by the Arabians and Chriſtians.

Cattelogne and his limits.

For Cattelogne, which comprehends the auntient Indigetes, Caſtellans, Leetanes, and Acetanes, runnes along the Mediterranean ſhore, from Cap de Crux, vnto Alfaques, to the mountaine of Moncia, and S. Peters fountaine, where there is a little brooke called Cinia, which makes the limits.

Valence.

Hauing paſt this riuer, the Bourg of Vimero is the beginning of Valence, which holds on to Alicante, and in this realme in old time were comprehended the Edetanes, Ilercaones, and Conteſtanes.

Murcia & Carthagena.

Then they enter vpon the borders of Murcia and Carthagene, which extend as farre as Almerie, by the Conteſtanes, Baſtitanes, and ſome part of the Baſtules.

Andeluſia.

From Gibaltar to the mouth of Guadiana, are the bankes of Andelouzia, which ſome ſay was ſo called, for that it is before Luſitania, as if they would ſay, Ante-Luſitania. Others deriue the name from the Vandales, which haue held it, and cal it Vandaluſia: There did the Turditanes, and a part of the Celtique people dwell.

Portugal.

After which they enter into Portugall, which runs on vnto the riuer Minio, where it fals into the ſea, the auntient limits of the Luſitanians, and of the Gallique Brecaires. This realme according to the ſuruey which king Sebaſtian cauſed to bee made in our time, containes 260 leagues in circuit, whereof there is an hundred and twentie towards the ſea, and an hundred and fortie to the land.

Gallicia.

Gallicia follows from Minio, Bagone, and Ponteuedra, vnto Ribadeo; they were in old time the Lucenſes.

Aſturie and Ouiedo.

Then they come to the Aſturians of Ouiedo; from Caſtropol to Llames, from Llames to Caſtro Deordiales, are the bankes of the Aſturians of Sentillana. Theſe people alone haue retained their auntient name. After which followes the coaſt of Biſcaie, where is Portugalette and Bilbao, and ſtretcheth vnto Ondarroa. Then they come to Guipuſcoa at Montrico, which ends at Fontarabie. Theſe were antient Cantabrians, and part Autrigones, Cariſtians, Vardules, and Vaſcons vpon the ſea.

Nauarre.

Nauarre lyes for the moſt part vpon the ſides and vallies of the Pyrenees, which enter into the countrey of Spaine by Romſeual, by the valley of Saleſar, and the valley Roncal, vnto Hiſana, which is the limit of Arragon, and paſſeth vnto Logrogno, where it confines with Caſtillia the old. It was the countrey of the Vaſcons, Vardules, Cariſtians, and other their neighbours.

Arra-

A Arragon of a ſmall beginning hath imbraced part of the Vaſcons and Ilergetes, on this ſide Ebro, and on the other ſide a part of the Celtiberians country. And it was determined in the time of king Iaques the firſt, from the riuer Cinga at Fariſa, and of S. Chriſtine, to the top of the Pyrenees at Aluentoſa. Arragon.

Leon was in old time part of Aſturia. Leon.

Caſtillia the old and new, comprehended all the middle countries of Spaine, betwixt the nations aboue named. Caſtillia.

As for the paſſage of the Pyrenees, if theſe hills went in a direct line, the paſſage would bee ſhort betwixt the two ſeas, for they ſay, that both the one and the other may be eaſily ſeene in B a cleere day from the tops of ſome of them, yea from that of S. Adrian.

Spaine is then both in generall and in particular, as we haue deſcribed it: and if we conſider well the ſituation of this region, we may rightly ſay, that it is rampared and defended by nature againſt all the attempts and enterpriſes of ſtrangers, as much as any countrey in the world, being compaſſed in with the daungerous gulfes of the two ſeas, and walled vp behind with the hard paſſages of the Pyrenee mountaines: being moreouer of a temperat and wholeſome ayre, and hauing a ſoyle fit to nouriſh all things. For there are neither violent winds, nor thicke foggie vapours, nor any inſupportable heat of the Sunne: but the aire is ſweet and calme, being continually refreſht with the North and Weſterne winds which come from the ſea. Spaine rampared vp by nature. Spaine a temperat ayre.

C 14 Of the fertilitie of Spaine, and the great diuerſitie of good things which it produceth, the auntients haue left vs ample and true teſtimonies, whereof the moſt autentique are, That the Romanes hauing made warre in the heart thereof, both againſt the Carthaginians and them of the countrey for aboue two hundred yeares, it did in a manner continually feed theſe great armies on either ſide, with that which it did bring forth, and did not onely ſupplie them with victuals, but alſo with treaſure to entertaine their ſouldiours, and to ſatisfie the greedie deſire and couetouſneſſe of their commaunders and captaines; and moreouer hath filled their treaſuries full of ſpoiles both at Rome and Carthage, as ſhall appeare by the particularities in the progreſſe of the Hiſtorie. Fertilitie of Spaine.

It was Spaine which gaue courage to the Carthaginians to attempt thoſe high enterpriſes
D which wee read of them, and did furniſh them with meanes to entertaine ſo many mercinarie ſouldiours, wherewith for ſo many yeares they did trouble and annoy the Romane empire, and other nations, without coſt or daunger to their owne citizens, who in all theſe wars did hunt after nothing but honour and profit, to the prejudice of Spaine, and with the bloud of other people.

Wee haue before made ſome mention how rich it was in mynes of gold, ſiluer, and all other kinds of mettall: let vs now ſay boldly, that nature had heapt vp mountaines of treaſure there, and that the auntients did rightly ſay in tearmes befitting their Idolatrie, That Pluto dwelt vnder the couering of this earth: the which was the cauſe of infinit calamities to the Spaniards. For theſe greedie robbers came from all parts, being drawne thither
E with the deſire of gaine: ſo as the beſt aduiſed were forced to forbid the vſe of gold and ſiluer among them by an expreſſe law. Among others the Betique prouince, which now hath the name of Andaluſia, Granado, and thereabouts, was exceeding rich of mines of gold and ſiluer, and yet the ſoyle was verie fertile in fruits, the which ſeemes to bee againſt naturall reaſon. Riches of Spaine.

When as the Carthaginians came firſt into Spaine, vnder the conduct of Amilcar Barca, they found among the Turditanes, the verie mangers for their horſes, and hoggeſheads, made of pure ſiluer. Then they began to digge new mynes, and did cruelly toyle the people in thoſe workes; and it is ſaid, that out of one onely myne or pit called Bebelo, of his name that found it neere vnto the frontier of Aquitaine, Hannibal did draw aboue three F thouſand crownes profit euerie day. The Romanes diſcouered others neere vnto Carthagena, where they had foure hundred daily at worke, and did receiue euerie day fiue and twentie thouſand Drachmes, amounting in a manner to two thouſand and fiue hundred French crownes. Yea the plough-men many times in their tillage, raiſed vp with their ploughſhares cruſts of gold: and many times vpon the ſands the fiſher-men did find great ſtore of Bebelo a rich myne. Rich mynes neere vnto Carthagena.

graines of this mettall, verie pure, which had beene brought from the mountaines with the G flouds: yea if they carried water into a drie ground, and watered the earth, the gold would preſently ſhine: ſo as there were more found in Spaine gathering vp of gold, than in digging Copper, Iron, and Tinne. it out of their mynes and pits. There was as great aboundance of copper, yron, tinne, and all other ſorts of mynes, and exceeding good.

Their large and ſpacious plaines and mountaines did feed infinit troupes of all ſorts of cattell: the foreſts were full of red deere, wild boares, and other wild beaſts, and all ſorts of foule. They ſay, that in South Spaine there was oftentimes ſuch aboundance of conies, Conies ſpoyled their fruits. as they were a great ruine vnto their fruits, ſpoyling the roots vnder the ground, with their working, ſo as they were much annoyed with them, being ignorant by what meanes H to take them, vntill they were taught to vſe ferrets, the which were brought them out of Africke.

The ſea fruitful If the land did ſo abound in all things, what ſhall wee thinke of the ſea? The ſhore (ſaith Strabo) is full of oyſters, and of all other ſhell-fiſh: yea in the Ocean, whereas all things exceed in greatneſſe and multitude thoſe which are in the other ſea, by reaſon of the flowing and ebbing thereof. There are to be ſeene huge Whales, Grampaſſes, and other ſuch monſters of the ſea, which ſpout out water, the which ſeemes a farre off, to bee great pillars or towers of cloudes. How much ſhall we ſay that the Congres and Mullets of that Ocean doe exceed ours? About Carteia the Pourcelaines are of ten pounds weight, but without the ſtrait the ſmaller Mullets and Congres weigh commonly foureſcore pounds, the Poulpe I or many feet, threeſcore, the fiſh called the Cuttle, are two cubits long: the Thon comes thither in great aboundance, delighting in the acornes which fall into the ſea, from a certaine kind of ſmall oake which growes along the ſhore, yeelding ſuch aboundance of this fruit, as being afterwards caſt vp by the waues of the ſea, the bankes both within and without the ſtraits, are exceeding full, but eſpecially the Ocean, wherewith this fiſh (which is verie common in that ſea) is much delighted, and growes verie fat with it. Many other commendations are giuen by the auntients to Spaine, whereof they might well judge, that neuer went out of Italie, by the number of great ſhipping laden with merchandiſe and prouiſion of victualls, which came daily out of that countrey, to the ports of Oſtia, Puzzol, and others of Italie, wherein Strabo, Plinie, Mela, and other authors, may ſatisfie the curious. So as K it hath not beene impertinent, if the Poets haue placed the delightful Eliſian fields in this part of the world.

Wee cannot with reaſon doubt of that which they haue written: for although that the mountaines of Gallicia, Aſturia, Biſcaie, Nauarre, and Arragon, which containe a great countrey, ſeeme rather to bewray a defect than any great aboundance of fruits; and that in Caſtille, and part of Portugall, the drought is not fit to bring forth corne: yet conſidering Spaine in generall, and the whole circuit, wee ſhall find daily by experience, that it is rich and plentifull of all thoſe things, wherewith it was in old times furniſhed. For if at that Spaine fertile as this day. time they did feed whole armies, ſo doe they at this day great and well peopled cities and townes, better frequented and inhabited than in thoſe times. L

As for rich mettals, we muſt confeſſe, that it yeelds now to antiquitie, and no wonder, for how could the earth ſupplie the greedie couetouſneſſe of men, who haue not ceaſed for many yeares, and with great toyle to digge into the bowels of the earth? Wee ſee at this day the pits and caues, out of the which the Romanes drew their ſiluer, neere vnto Carthagena, with great heapes of droſſe like vnto mountaines. But yet this countrey is not ſo bare and waſted, but that they haue found in our age, at Guadalcanal, a myne as rich as any at the Indies, which our elders doe witneſſe: and there is no doubt, but that gold, ſiluer, and copper, are to be found in other places.

Iron and ſteele abounds there. Biſcaye and Guepuſcoa alone can furniſh yron and ſteele ynough for a world, and with workes which are made of this mettall, namely with Armes, beeing the verie ſtore- M houſe of Spaine. Vitriol, Brimſtone, Alum, Orpigment, minerall ſalt, and ſuch other things, are found in Spaine, both for their owne vſe and their neighbours. What wanteth it of the fertilitie and diuerſitie of all ſorts of good fruits in a good part of Portugall, Andaluſia, and almoſt all alongſt the Mediterranean ſea? But who can condemne

A euen the montaines of this region, of barrenneſſe, which beare ſo good wines, and ſo many ſorts of fruits?

To conclude, Fraunce, England, and Flanders, are familiar witneſſes of the fruitfulneſſe and delights of Spaine: and if they will not ſerue, wee will appeale to Aſia it ſelfe. Their raiſins, oliues, figges, oranges, limons, dates, cytrons, pomegranets, ſugar, ſaffron, and ſuch things, are diſperſed into all countries, and are better, and more ſauorie than in any other place.

In what place of the world doe you find more ſorts of good hearbs, or more pleaſant gardens, than in the prouince of Valence? From thence wee haue the beſt ſilkes in the B world, cotton of Murcia, ſcarlet, crimſon, and other precious colours, with ſweet and pleaſant perfumes. Finally, all the ſences of man are wonderfully pleaſed with that which comes from thence, and growes in that happie region. Gardens of Valencia.

And as for the hilly countrey, which they hold to be barren, and the plaines to be drie, euerie one knowes what commoditie thoſe places doe yeeld: and wee find it by experience in Spaine. There they feed infinit troupes of ſheepe, whoſe wooll is admired throughout the world: and yeeld vs alſo infinit ſtore of Spaniſh leather, neceſſarie for many vſes, and verie profitable for their neighbours.

They haue timber to ſerue them as well for the building of houſes, as for ſhipping, whereof they haue great ſtore. And who can denie, that in Nauarre, Aſturia, and Gal- C licia, there are goodly and fruitfull vallies? Can wee deſire a countrey more abounding in all good things, than that which is betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, at this time belonging vnto the Realme of Portugall? the which being ſcarce a day and a halfs journey in length, and much leſſe in breadth, hath an Archbiſhopricke, which is that of Braga, Porto Gallego, a biſhopricke, and containes in it aboue one thouſand and foure hundred pariſhes, fiue hundred Colledges of Canons, and one hundred and thirtie Conuents: it hath ſix ports of the ſea, aboue two hundred bridges of ſtone, and two thouſand and fiue hundred fountaines. Fertilitie of the country betwixt Duero and Minio.

But who doth not admire the Genets of Spaine, which I had almoſt forgotten, their beautie, ſwiftneſſe, and eaſineſſe to breake, eſpecially of thoſe of Andaluſia, which drinke D of the water of Guadalquibir, whereby, according to the Spaniards opinion, they are made more nimble and ſwift? Of this race was the horſe which Iulius Cæſar eſteemed ſo much, as when hee was dead, hee cauſed his image to be ſet vp in Venus Temple at Rome. Of them and of the Luſitanians their neighbours, the auntients would make vs beleeue, that they were conceiued by the winds which the mares did receiue when they were deſirous of the horſe, blowing from the Weſt, namely from the places where the horſes feed; the which ſome thinke not impoſſible. Of all theſe things no man that hath any knowledge of the world can doubt. The horſes of Spaine. Mares conceiuing by the wind.

And if any one would obiect, That Spaine cannot bee ſo fertile as wee make it, for that they are ſupplied with corne from Fraunce, England, Sicile, and Germanie: and that they E carrie great ſtore of linnen cloth, and other merchandiſe, out of Brittaine, Normandie, Flanders, Holland, and elſewhere, without the which the Spaniards muſt of neceſſitie periſh: Let him conſider the great regions diſcouered by the Spaniards, within theſe hundred and twentie yeares: what great fleets Spaine hath continually entertained, rigged, and victualed, as well for the Eaſt as Weſterne voiages; and what need they haue to furniſh thoſe countries with ſuch things as they borrow, whereof without doubt they ſhould haue ſufficient for themſelues, but not to furniſh a new world: the which doth alſo waſt their men daily to people theſe diſcouered countries: And withall let him adde the haughtie and couetous diſpoſition of the Spaniſh nation, who doe willingly leaue their labour, to goe vnto the mynes, or to goe to the warres, and neuer follow any worke, but when they are F forced by neceſſitie. The nature of the Spaniards.

15 Hauing hitherto diſcourſed of the ſituation and fertilitie of Spaine, let vs ſpeake ſomething of the manners and kind of life, which the Spaniards haue from time to time obſerued; that being entred into our diſcourſe, wee may not bee interrupted therewith. When as the Carthaginians came into Spaine, and long after the Romanes had got ſome The manners of the Spaniards.

footing, there were few walled townes in the countrey, but many great burroughes and villages. The moſt ciuile were they of the Betique prouince, and the worſt ſouldiours of them all, giuing themſelues to trade of merchandiſe by ſea, and ſomewhat to letters, and in a maner like vnto thoſe that liue vpon the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea. But as for the reſt, they were all ruſtick and barbarous, namely the Mountainers, and aboue all the Gallicians, Aſturians, and Cantabrians, whoſe ordinarie trade was to rob and ſteale, contemning labour, vntill that the Romanes taught them to liue more ciuilly and peaceably, ruining their forts and retreats. They were traitors, ſpies, and readie vpon all occaſions to ſteale. They carried targuets two foot long, & a dagger at their ſides, clothed in a doublet of linnen cloth ſtifned and quilted: and theſe were their armes. For there were no cuiraſſes nor head-peeces among them, but on their heads they carried high hats made of ſinewes, and on their legges boots of haire, and in their hands many darts: ſome of them carried jauelins whereof the heads were of copper. They wore long haire like women. Their exerciſes were fencing and running both on foot and horſebacke, and their combates by troupes: They loued libertie aboue all things, which made the Romanes to ſee many examples of crueltie, euen in the weakeſt ſex: for there were many mothers among the Cantabrians, which ſlue their own children, many daughters who for the like cauſe murthered their parents: ſo deere libertie was vnto this nation; to maintaine the which, and fearing they might be forced in any thing, they did vſually carrie poyſon about them: and if they were ſurpriſed and made ſlaues, they ſought by ſome notable villanie to giue their maſters occaſion to kill them. It was often ſeene, that when they were tyed to the croſſe to be executed, they did ſing for joy of their approaching death: but ſome haue ſhewed this reſolution vpon good and commendable occaſions, as to conceal the ſecrets of their maſters and friends, or after they had reuenged their death, or the wrong which had beene done them.

Their religion was infamous, for they ſacrificed humane creatures vnto their gods, euen their priſoners, cutting off their right hands, to offer them vp: Their Prieſts and Diuines tooke their conjectures from the intrals both of men and beaſts; but aboue all they tooke their diuination from their countenances, when as they receiued the deadly blow, and fell to the ground.

The Spaniards religion infamous.

As for their manner of liuing, it was ſimple and rude: they dranke water, lay vpon the ground, and did eat the fleſh of goats which they did ſacrifice vnto Mars: they made cakes of dried acornes, the which they did eat warme. They did willingly banquet with their parents, and had tables and ſeats of ſtone, againſt the wall, where they did appoint the moſt honourable places according to their ages and dignities. They had no vſe of ſiluer coined, but did exchange ware for ware. They had a beaſtly and filthie manner of waſhing and perfuming themſelues, with vrine which had ſtood long ſtinking, with the which both men and women did rub their bodies and faces, yea euen their teeth, imagining that it was a preſeruatiue againſt many infirmities; the which is not diſallowed by the Phyſitians. This filthie obſeruation was common then in Spaine among them all.

The Spaniards liuing ſimple and rude.

They did ſeuerely puniſh malefactors, and eſpecially parricides, whom they did ſtone without their confines. If any one were ſicke, they carried him into the highwayes, and corners of the ſtreets, after the manner of the Ægyptians, to take counſell and helpe of ſuch as had beene troubled with the like diſeaſes. Vntill the time of the Romane emperours, they had vſed boats made of beaſts skins; afterwards they began to make them of wood, taking the bodies of great trees, and making them hollow like vnto troughes.

Their manner of boats.

In this ſimplicitie and rudeneſſe did the auntient Spaniards of the mountaines liue, which were thoſe of Gallicia, Aſturia, and Cantabria, and the inhabitans of the Pyrenees, whoſe countrey was full of wood and water, but otherwiſe verie barren, by reaſon whereof they enjoyed their libertie long, and were laſt of all ſubdued by the Romanes; ſo as in the time of the emperour Tiberius Nero, there was yet ſome contention. The Iberians, and Celtiberians were ſomewhat more ciuile, for that they had more commerce with ſtrangers, and were neere vnto the Mediterranean ſea, which was more frequented than the Ocean. In the war they carried round targuets, fortified with ſinewes, ſhort ſwords, darts, and ſlings: in their battails they did mingle ſome light horſemen with their footmen: they did accuſtome their horſes

A horſes to hills and vallies, and by that meanes kept them in breath, and made them ſwift, yea they did teach them to kneele when they made a certaine ſigne. They attired themſelues of blacke wooll and ſhort. They prepared yron to forge their armes and harneis, driuing it out into plates, the which they buried in the ground for certaine dayes, vntill the ruſt had eaten away that which was vnprofitable, & then they made their ſwords and other cutting weapons. They did commonly carie two ſwords, and did fight more willingly on foot than on horſe-backe: for when as they found themſelues to haue any aduantage vpon the enemie, they left their horſes, to joyne with their footmen, purſuing them that fled with great agilitie, the which was naturall to all Spaniards. They were reaſonably courteous to ſtrangers; but they B did puniſh them that had done them any wrong verie cruelly. They did liue of fleſh and fruits, and did drinke water with honie, whereof their countrey did abound; and ſometimes they had wine, which they bought from ſtrangers comming from the neighbour coaſts. Their neighbours with whom they had the greateſt amitie and commerce, were the Vaccees, and Areuaces, at that time a part of Caſtillia the old: they agreed well with them in all ſorts of traffique. Euerie yeare they made a diuiſion of their lands, and aſſigned them by portions and lots to certaine particular perſons, who did till and ſow for the reſt, whileſt that others were imployed in the warres, or about ſome other affaires: then they diuided the fruits which they gathered. And if any one were conuicted, that he had embeſiled any thing, he was puniſhed with death. In time of peace they did banquet and daunce, leaping and friſking with C great agilitie: and they went to the warre according to the meaſure of inſtruments, ſinging ruſticke and militarie ſongs.

Such in a manner were the Luſitanians, with whom the Celtes were mingled, and ſeated in their countrey, leading their liues for the moſt part as theeues, which they learned from them of Gallicia and Aſturia, their neighbours. Generally all the moſt barbarous Spaniards were nimble and actiue, ſo as they could eaſily eſcape from their enemies, or purſue them when they had the better; neither were their ſpirits leſſe actiue than their bodies: great vndertakers: of few words: patient and hardie in trauell, enduring hunger, thirſt, and other diſcommodities. Their women were nothing daintie, but did exerciſe themſelues like vnto the men: and if they were deliuered of child, they lay not long, but fell ſoone to their worke: they waſht their chil- D dren as ſoone as they were borne in the neereſt brooke, and then they wrapt them vp in their ſwathing clothes. But after that the Romans were entred, and ſomewhat ſetled in Spain, theſe people were forced by little and little to learne another diſcipline, and to frame themſelues to a more ciuile kind of life, being gouerned by more politike lawes, they of Betica and the Turditanes exceeding the reſt alwaies in mildneſſe and humanitie: for theſe were preſently changed to the Romans manners and diſcipline, forgetting their owne language, to imbrace the other. Many townes were alſo built and peopled in diuers parts of Spaine, and the Romans and Latines mixt with the Originaries of the countrey, who accuſtomed themſelues ſo well to the Latine tongue, as it ſince continued in Spaine: for the Caſtillian tongue at this day is nothing in a maner but a corrupted Latine. And the Spaniards grew ſuch, as many a- E mong them did make their fame equall with the moſt eſteemed among the Romans: the two Senecas were Spaniards, with Silius, Martial, Lucan, Pomponius Mela, Portius Latro the Orator, Quintillian, Columella, and the good emperors Traian and Theodoſius, were Spaniards.

The Romans by the experience which they had, and the more to augment their owne glorie, giue great titles of honor and commendation to this nation, whom they found ſomewhat inſtructed in armes, and ſome diſcipline, by the Carthaginians. They call it rich in ſouldiours, and a ſeminary of the enemies armies, which had faſhioned that great captain Hannibal; and in all they ſpeak highly of Spaine, & not without reaſon: for the great courage and reſolution of them of Numantia, was memorable, a towne without walls, without towers, and without defences, ſeated only vpon a little hill, and couered on the one ſide with a riuer, and defended by F a few ſouldiours, who notwithſtanding withſtood the force of mightie Roman armies for the ſpace of 14 yeres, & not only made head againſt them, but alſo repulſt them oftē to their great loſſe. In the end being beſieged by aboue 40000 men, or, as ſome ſay, 60000, being preſt by famine, and forced to demaund a peace, finding no grace with their enemies, who had compaſt them in with forts and trenches, being reſolued vpon the laſt refuge, which was death, they made ſo furious a ſallie vpon the Romanes, as an infinit number of them were ſlaine vpon the place, which was a deere purchaſe vnto the enemie. This happened during the Celtiberique warre, which continued twentie yeares. This magnanimitie, courage, adreſſe and militarie diſcipline, were thus begun, and by little and little augmented in this nation by the Carthaginians and Romanes, in making warre againſt them: whom without doubt they might haue bin able to haue reſiſted, if they had knowne their owne force and wealth, and if they had ſooner learned good lawes and policie, which maintaine people in amitie and concord. This was the firſt prouince which the Romanes did aſſaile vpon the firme land, and the laſt which they ſubdued. The ſtrength of Pompeyes armie when he encountred Cæſar in Macedonia, were the Spaniſh bands, which were in his armie, if he could haue vſed them. H

Faith and conſtancie in the end tooke place among this nation, whereof Hannibal had often made triall. But what example can we find more memorable, than the fidelitie of the Saguntines to the people of Rome, for the which they loſt wiues, children, citie, and liues?

By little and little they alſo left that diueliſh ſuperſtition of ſacrificing of men, accuſtoming themſelues to more mildneſſe and humanitie, and practiſing daily better diſcipline vnder the Romans commaund; as if God would reforme them by their meanes, and prepare them to receiue the true and wholeſome doctrine of Ieſus Chriſt: the which this nation did imbrace happily in the beginning, with great fruit and notable examples in the Church of God. But after that the barbarous nations were diſperſed ouer all Europe, hauing troden vnder foot the Majeſtie of the Romane empire, and inuaded the chiefe prouinces thereof, chaſed away all learning, and good diſcipline, and infected the earth with hereſies and ſuperſtitious ceremonies, the ignorance of God and of his ſeruice, entred into Spaine, which our age doth yet feele. Then was a time when as they kept publike ſchools of Magicke arts and conjuring, to the which they had made ſubject Philoſophie, Aſtrologie, Phyſicke, yea and Diuinitie it ſelfe. I

The true religion receiued with great affection by the Spaniards

Damnable arts in Spaine.

But leauing theſe things which belong to other diſcourſes, let vs ſay, That the Spaniards in thoſe dayes were of diuers conuerſations, as they were a mixture of diuers nations. They are apt to receiue diſcipline in all things, according to the diſpoſition of princes and lords, whom they ſerue, they are faithfull and conſtant vnto them, deſiring to be in perpetuall action, by reaſon of the agitation of their ſpirits, which is like vnto the agilitie of their bodies, who for the moſt part are leane and drie. They are ſober and vigilant, but verie couetous, patient of heat, cold, hunger, thirſt, and all other diſcommodities, eſpecially if there be any hope of profit or honour, for the which they hazard themſelues reſolutely to all dangers: they deſire to bee well apparelled, and eſteeme armes and horſes aboue all things: they are impudent braggers of their owne actions, vertue, and nobilitie: ciuile to conuerſe withall, louing good townes, copious in their language, much giuen to women; for the moſt part vnlearned, ſhewing little art in that they do, diſdaining labour, & a country life. The women are ſober, louing their huſbands or their friends deerely, but wonderfull delicat, and curious of painting and perfumes, retaining therein nothing of the auntient Spaniards: they nor their children drinke not any wine. The countrey language at this day, is for the moſt part Roman or Latine corrupted and mingled with ſome other words of ſuch nations as haue held it in theſe laſt ages. The Biſcane tongue is preſerued in Biſcaie, and part of Nauarre, and other their neighbours: but in Granado, Andaluſia, Murcia, and Valence, eſpecially among the ruſticke multitude, the Mooriſh and the Arabian tongue is in great vſe: and in all ages almoſt, the people of Spaine haue vſed diuers languages, and were different one from another. Making an end of this booke, we will relate in the following, by what meanes and titles euerie nation hath from time to time held it. K L

Some

SOme ages before the firſt warre betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which grew by reaſon of the Iſle of Sicile, the Gaditanes extracted from the citie of Tyr, couetous and malicious according to the nature of ſlaues, from whence it may be they were iſſued (for we read, that the bondmen of the Tyrians on a time ſlew all their maſters, and made themſelues Lords of the towne; the which they held vntill Alexander the Great, who did root out the race of them) began to torment the Spaniards their neighbours, chaſing them out of their lands and poſſeſſions, making them ſlaues, and entreating them in the vildeſt manner they could; which was the cauſe of great warre and diuiſion in that quarter of Spaine: ſo as injuries on either part encreaſing daily, the naturall borne diſdaining the arrogancie of theſe ſtrangers, and enuying their greatneſſe, made a generall league of many Communalties againſt them: whereupon they of Gades finding themſelues too weake to make head againſt ſo great a multitude, they reſolued to call in to their ſuccour, and to the ſpoyle of Spaine, the Carthaginians of Africke, their brethren, comming from the ſame race and towne. The citie of Carthage was then a great Commonweale, the which had a great juriſdiction among the Africanes, and ſought onely to enlarge their Empire; ſo as they were readie to run into Spaine, with this honeſt and religious pretext, to ſuccour the oppreſſed: whereas they not onely freed the Gaditanes from all feare of the Spaniards, but did alſo ſubdue the people of Spaine, ſetled themſelues there, and gouerned it as their Prouince: from whence they drew afterwards ſo great treaſure and other commodities, as they preſumed to aſſayle the greateſt Potentates in the world.

The Tyrians of the race of ſlaues

Carthaginians deſire more to be great than iuſt.

The name of Spaniards, before this warre, had beene great among other nations, onely in regard that they ſerued as a prey to all ſtrangers: which were they only which held the lower countrey, and the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea, and part of the Ocean, South and Weſt: among the which, ſome nations of Europe and Aſia had built and peopled ſome townes. As for thoſe which liued in the heart of the countrey, and in the mountains, their fame was more obſcure, being for the moſt part rough and barbarous, hauing ſcarce any commerce with ſtrangers, but to rob and ſteale, which was their beſt practiſe: and therefore vntill the comming of the Carthaginians, they had beene as it were free, and aſſured both from inuaſion and trade, doing wrong rather than taking any: but afterwards they did all in generall learne to manage armes with diſcipline, they vndertooke parties, contracted alliances among themſelues, and with other nations, growing by little and little more politicke, ciuile, and courteous. The Celtes were alreadie mingled with the Iberians about the riuer of Ebro; and paſſing on, they obtained lands and habitations in Luſitania, and in a corner of Betica, which was neere vnto them: then paſſing the riuer of Duero, they planted themſelues betwixt it and Minio; and conſequently to the mountains, in the countrey, which from them tooke the name of Gallicia, and doth ſtill hold it; whereas they built the towne of Porto, vpon the confines of the Luſitanians, which is at this time a Biſhopricke, retaining the name of Portugall, and ſo goes on to the Weſterne ſea.

2 The Celtes, Iberians, and other Spaniards farre from the ſea, as they were almoſt like in manners, had (as is ſayd) maintained their reputation free and vnited, vntill this deſcent of the Carthaginians: who hauing reſolued to ſettle themſelues in Spaine, ſeized firſt vpon the Iſland of Iuiſa, and fortified it, Maſee being Generall of this Armie. This was fiue hundred ſixtie two yeares before the comming of Chriſt, and an hundred eightie nine yeares after the foundation of Rome. After which time, watching their opportunitie, eight and fortie yeares after, they ſent a great fleet of ſhippes into Spaine, led by one Maherbal, vnder colour to relieue the Gaditanes, who had beene vanquiſhed by Baucius Capis, then reigning ouer the Turditanians, their neighbours. The name of the protection and ſupport of this puiſſant Commonweale of Carthage, purchaſed the Gaditanes a peace and free trade; the which drew ſo manie families from Carthage into the Iſland and Citie, as exceeding the reſt, they got the abſolute commaund thereof, Maherbal yet liuing.

The Carthaginians continued for a time without any care of the affaires of Spaine, beeing very much afflicted with drought and other diſcommodities, they hauing great warre

A warre in Sicile and Sardinia, but about the yeare 255 they vndertooke againe the conqueſt of Spaine, whither they ſent Aſdrubal and Amilcar, ſonnes to Mago. Paſſing by Sardinia, Aſdrubal was ſlaine there, leauing three children, Hanniball the eldeſt, Aſdrubal, and Pſappho. Amilcar was diuerted from Spaine by the warres of Sicile, where he was alſo ſlaine, and had three ſonnes in like manner, Himilco, Hanno, and Giſgo. The yeare 272 after the foundation of Rome, they ſent a ſmall ſupplie of nine hundred ſouldiors into Spaine, whom they would haue land in the Iſlands of the Baleares; but they were repulſed: and ſoon after Pſappho, ſonne to Aſdrubal, had charge to keepe the Spaniards in awe (who were ſollicited by the Africane Moores their neighbours, to joyne with them againſt the Carthaginians) who by his wiſe-
B dome reſtrained them; and moreouer, got ſufficient forces from them to force the Moores to ſue for peace, and to giue ouer their enterpriſes againſt the citie of Carthage. In this warre the vertue of Saruc of Barce (a towne neere vnto Carthage) author of the Barcinian faction, was very famous. Pſappho liued in great reputation, who after his death was by opinion receiued into the number of the gods; the which he had procured during his life. For he had cauſed certaine birds to be taught to ſpeake, and made them learne to ſay, That Pſappho was a great god. Which birds being let flye, they chattered out thoſe words in the fields, to the great admiration of the people. After his deceaſe the Prouince of Spaine was committed to Himilco and Hanno (the ſonnes of Amilcar) his couſins, who tried by faire and plauſible means to draw the inhabitants of the Baleares to liue in amitie with their Commonweale.

C Hanno being arriued at Gades, and deſiring to diſcouer the country, and the coaſt of Spaine without the ſtrait, he ſayled vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent: and hauing giuen aduice vnto the Senat of that which he had ſeene and vnderſtood, he obtained leaue to continue his diſcouerie as well vpon the coaſt of Spaine, as Africke, in the Ocean ſea: whereupon he prepared two fleets; the one for the coaſt of Europe, and to paſſe vnto the Gaules, and farther if he might; the charge whereof he gaue vnto his brother Himilco, and of the other he would be captaine and conductor himſelfe, and ſayle towards Africke: ſo in the beginning of the yeare 307 of the foundation of Rome they ſet ſayle, either of them taking his courſe. Himilco parting from the port of Heraclee, which was in the ſtrait, coaſted the Meſenians and Selbitians, paſſed the Promontorie of Iuno, and the mouth of the riuer Cylbis,
D which runneth betwixt Barbarie and Huelua, neere vnto the which in old time was the Iſland of Erythrea, which is not to be ſeene at this day, vnleſſe it be that of Gades it ſelfe: and then he diſcouered the Tarteſſian forreſts, and did ſee the Turditanes coaſt, whereas the riuer Betis fell into the ſea at that time by foure mouthes, afterwards reduced to two, but now there is but one. Paſſing on, there came into his ſight Mont Caſſius, rich in veines of Tynne, from whence it is likely it tooke his name: beyond the which, the riuer, which they now call Tinte, (whoſe water is excellent good to dye blacke) fals into the ſea, neere vnto Palos of Moguer. This riuer was in old time called Iberus, as that which paſſeth and looſeth it ſelfe at Tarracone. From thence Himilco paſſed neere vnto Proſerpinas Temple, built vpon a point which runneth farre into the ſea; vnto which place come the Marian hils: and a little more forward
E riſeth Mont Zephirus, whoſe top is alwaies hidden in the clouds: about the which for a good diſtance the ſhoare is full of rockes vnto Mont Saturne, the which is among the Cenits, by the which the riuer Anas or Guadiana doth run; at the mouth whereof were two Iſlands, whereof the greateſt was called Agone. Paſſing on by a long courſe towards the holy Promontorie, and hauing doubled it, this Carthaginian armie came to the port of Cenis, neere vnto the Iſlands which they now call Perſegueres. Not farre from thence dwelt the Dragans, a people of Luſitania, compaſſed in by the mountaines Cephis and Sempis, right againſt the Iſlands of Stremnie, the which ſtands farre into the ſea: but neerer vnto theſe Dragants was another Iſland called Acala, about the which the waters were blew and wonderfull cleere, but very ſtinking, whereof there are at this day no markes. Aboue Alcala was the mountaine
F Cyprilian. Himilco hauing ſayled along the coaſt, hee diſcouered the Iſland Pelagie, full of greene trees, the which he durſt not touch, being conſecrated to Saturne, hearing, that if any ſaylers would land there, the ſea was troubled. The ſhoare which goes vnto the mouth of Tayo was inhabited by the Saries, a cruell and a barbarous people, whoſe Promontorie was for that cauſe called Barbareſque. There notwithſtanding was planted the Greeke Colonie Olyſippo, which is Lisbone at this day. Theſe Nauigators came to the Promontorie Nerium,

which is Finis terræ, and to the neighbour Iſlands called alſo Stremnies, for that the inhabi- G tants of the Iſland of Stremnie aboue mentioned, being forced to leaue it for the multitude of Serpents which were there, they retyred into theſe Iſlands. There is no further mention made of Himilcos nauigation.

Hannos voyage vpon the coaſt of Africke.

As for Hanno, he made a longer voyage: his armie conſiſted of many veſſels, carrying aboue thirtie thouſand perſons of both ſexes: hee planted a Colonie vpon the ſea coaſt of Africke (the which is now Azamor) the which he called Thimateria: he paſſed on beyond the foot of Mont Atlas, towards Numidia and Lybia: he diſcouered the fortunat Iſlands, which are the Canaries, and thoſe of Cap Verd, which is the point of the Heſperides; the Iſland of Argin, in old time Cerne; and the Gorgones, ſo named by him; the mouths of the great riuer H
Niger, the which hath Crocodiles in it, and ſea horſes as well as Nil, vntill he came vnto the Iſland named at this day S. Thome, vnder the Equinoctiall. Some ſay, that hee doubled the point of Africke, or Cap bonne Eſperance, and paſſed as farre as the Arabicke ſea, and from thence returned to Carthage by Ægypt, reporting, That he had ſeene men all couered with haire; which it may be were Apes, for there are very great and dangerous ones in ſome part of Africke; and other wonders. He returned to Carthage fiue yeares after his departure.

It was in the yeare 312 of the foundation of Rome, when theſe two captaines vndertooke their voyages; Giſgo their brother gouerned Spaine in their abſence: and thinking to returne to Carthage, to be partaker of the feaſts and joy which were made in regard of their proſperous voyages, he periſhed with all his ſhips at ſea. I Hannibal ſent into Spaine.

Hannibal brother to Pſappho, and couſin to theſe, ſurnamed the ancient, was ſent into Spaine, and with him Mago his kinſman. Mago ſtayed at the Baleares, and he paſſed to Calis: and ſome hold, that he built a fort at the place which is called Lagos, the which was named Port Hannibal: there was alſo built in his time, at the mouth of the riuer of Betis, Lucifers Temple, dedicated to the goddeſſe Venus, whoſe ſtarre was called Phoſphoros, or Lucifer: it is S. Lucar of Barraneda at this preſent. During their time and gouernment there grew great warre betwixt the Spaniards of Betica and the Luſitanians, dwelling by the riuer Anas, the which was nouriſhed by the Carthaginians and their captaines Hannibal and Mago.

Warre in Sicile by the Carthaginians.

The Commonweale of Carthage had then great warres in the Iſland of Sicile, kindled about the yeare 346 of the foundation of Rome, by the Agrigentines, who did murther the K Carthaginian garriſons, being buſie at their ſacrifices: wherefore by decree of the Senat there were leuies of men made in Spaine, and in the Iſlands of the Baleares. But the Agrigentines were defeated in battaile, and then beſieged for the ſpace of two yeares, who in the end were forced to yeeld to their mercie, who entreated them very roughly: whereupon they had recourſe vnto Denis the old, by whoſe aduice they freed themſelues of thoſe that did oppreſſe them, and tooke from the Carthaginians the townes of Camerine and Gele. Denis although he diſſembled, ſeeming to be a neuter, found himſelfe ſo ingaged, as he was forced to take armes againſt the Carthaginians, by whom hee was vanquiſhed, but with great loſſe of their men: the reſt of the Carthaginian armie, where Himilco Sepas had the leading of tenne thouſand Spaniards, was conſumed by the plague: whereat Himilco was ſo grieued, as being returned to Carthage, refuſing to ſee either children or friends, he ſlew himſelfe in his houſe. After theſe ruins, by the induſtrie of Denis a peace was concluded betwixt the Carthaginians & the Sicilians, or rather a truce for 30 yeres. This was in the yere 356 of the foundation of Rome. L

About that time ſome ſhips of Carthage, diſperſed by tempeſt, or elſe of ſet purpoſe following Hannos diſcouerie, or imitating his deſignes, came vnto a great Iſland, which wee may thinke to be that of S. Dominique at this day: which made them of Carthage to affect theſe voyages with ſuch vehemencie, as to diuert them, the Senat reſolued to cauſe them to be ſlaine which were returned, and had brought the newes, fearing leaſt their citie and countrey ſhould be vnpeopled.

New warres in Sicile.

The truce being expired, the Carthaginians prepared againe to warre in Sicile; during the M which truce, they had aduanced their authoritie and credit among the Spaniards, entertaining diuiſions among them, and taking parties: ſo as they had meanes at one time to bring to the warres of Sicile 20000 foot and 1000 horſe of that nation, making them by this means weake againſt their own deſigns: to which forces they added 300 Majorquins, which vſed ſlings, and 10000 Africanes, making Hanno chiefe of this armie, who ſhould ſuddainly inuade the Iſland, whileſt

A whileſt that Denis made warre in Italie. But Suniat a Carthaginian enuying Hannos charge, aduertiſed Denis of this preparation; and as he continued in this trecherie, he was diſcouered by the taking of a ſhip in the ſtrait by them of Carthage, in the which were found his letters and aduertiſements to Denis, written in Greeke; whereupon he was taken and puniſhed: and it was decreed at Carthage, That no Carthaginian ſhould learne the Greeke tongue: but Denis his armie at ſea was defeated, whereby the Carthaginians affaires proſpered in Sicile.

Denis being dead, and his ſonne of the ſame name ſucceeding him, vnder the gouernment of Dion his kinſman, the warre ended by a long truce betwixt the Carthaginians & Sicilians, and Hanno returned with great treaſure which he had gottē óf thoſe ſpoiles. He was preſently ſent Truce with the Sicilians.

B to Calis, and Boſtar to Majorca, and to that part of Spaine which is oppoſit: Hanno tyrannizing ouer the people in his gouernment, prouoked them to rebell; ſo as to ſubdue & puniſh them, he called the Moores into Spaine, who afflicted them cruelly. The complaints being come vnto Carthage, Hanno was called home and diſcharged of his gouernment; who in diſdain thereof attempted to poyſon the whole Senat in a banket which he prepared for his daughters mar- Hannes trecherie againſt the Senat of Carthage.

riage. This trecherie being diſcouered and diſſembled, they preſently made Sumptuarie law, limitting the number of perſons, and the ſorts of meats at ſuch feaſts. But hauing eſcaped puniſhment, yet fearing it, he ſought notwithſtanding to trie his force, with a multitude of ſlaues which he, his kinſmen, and friends had: wherewith the people being incenſed, they beſieged him, & tooke him in his houſe, and then deliuered him to the Iudges; by whoſe decree his eies

C were put out, his lims broken, his body torne with whips, and then hung vpon a croſſe: his children and all his kinsfolkes were alſo put to death, that they ſhould haue no deſire of reuenge. A cruell example, but excuſable in the Africans, for the foulneſſe of the offence and the intereſt of their countrey. without any diſturbance, ſending good Gouernors and wiſe captains: wherein they proſpered daily in ſuch ſort, as they might terme themſelues maſters therof, and ſo did enjoy it for aboue 350 yeares, all the people of Spaine being their ſubjects or allies; vntill that the Romanes began to make ſome practiſes, ſeeking to draw the people vnto them, and to be aſſured of them, The Romanes ſeeke to get footing in Spaine by emulation.

when any occaſion ſhould be offered. So either of theſe Commonweales made way for their great deſignes, yet not entring into any ouert action: but the Iſland of Sicile aſſayled by the warre, preparations for warre, or a counterfeit peace betwixt the Romans and the Carthaginians. They entred into this hoſtilitie 489 yeres after the foundation of Rome, and about 262 yeres before Chriſt. This firſt warre was decided in Sicile, and in the Mediterranean ſea, during 24 yeares; in which time the people of Spaine did adhere ſometimes to one partie, ſometimes to another, as their affaires ſucceeded: the Carthaginians being in the end forced to demaund a peace of the Romans, the reſt of their hatred and ſplene continued yet in Spaine for a time: for Spain nouriſheth the hatred betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians.

thoſe which had rebelled againſt the Carthaginians, ſought to maintaine their liberties by the fauour of the Romanes, who encouraged and aſſiſted them vnder hand: yet Amilcar, ſurnamed

E Barca, father to Hannibal, being appointed Gouernor and Lieutenant generall for the Carthaginians in Spaine, ſubjected vnder their obedience almoſt all the nations and townes which had beene diſtracted, and did ſhake the allies of the contrarie faction. He was an irreconciliable enemie to the Romanes, and would that his ſonne Hannibal ſhould ſucceed him in the like Priuat paſſion in Amilcar was the ruine of his countrey.

affection, and (as we ſay) ſhould ſucke it from his mothers breaſts; binding him thereunto in his youth by othes and religious ceremonies. For as he prepared to paſſe into Spaine with the armie, offering the accuſtomed ſacrifices vnto their gods, to haue a proſperous voiage, he cauſed his ſonne Hannibal (being then ſcarce nine yeares old) to approach vnto the altar, and hauing commaunded him to lay his hand vpon the ſacrifice, he made him ſweare, That as ſoone as he ſhould be able to beare armes, he ſhould employ them to annoy the Romans, and declare him-

F ſelfe their enemie. Whileſt that Amilcar relies too much on his good fortune, and purſues the rebels in Spaine inconſideratly, he was ſlaine, hauing done great exploits in nine yeares ſpace. Amicar ſlaine by the Spaniards

They attribute the reſtoring and enlarging of Barcelone vnto him, and according vnto ſome, the naming of it.

Aſdrubal his ſonne in law ſucceeded him, a wiſe and a valiant man, vnder whom Hannibal learned his firſt precepts of warre. And as the troubles did not onely continue, but alſo

encreaſe

The Carthaginians tyrannie aduanced the Romans credit in Spaine.

encreaſe in Spaine, new rebellions growing daily, by reaſon of the Carthaginians crueltie G and tyrannie, the Romanes were ſollicited by many to take them into their protection; whereunto they did willingly giue eare. Wherupon theſe two Commonweales were vpon tearmes to enter into a more cruell warre than euer: to auoid the which, it was aduiſed by the Senate of Rome to ſend Quintus Luctatius into Spaine, to treat with the Carthaginians, and to ſettle ſome good courſe for the affaires of that countrey. So as betwixt Luctatius for the Romans, and Aſdrubal for the Carthaginians, there was a peace renewed and confirmed betwixt thoſe two Eſtates, and the friends and allies of either part in Spaine; appointing the riuer of Ebro for a limit and barre betwixt them, beyond the which they might not lead any armie. And for that the towne of Saguntum being then rich and populous, held them long in debate, either H deſiring to haue it on his faction, in the end (not able to agree) it was concluded, That it ſhould remaine neuter, vſe her owne lawes, and be maintained in her libertie, and that neither partie ſhould attempt any thing to the preiudice thereof.

A new accord betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians.

The Eſtate of Spaine being thus ordered, the peace (which was not well aſſured betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians) continued three and twentie yeres, or thereabouts, accounting from the day that it was concluded in Sicile. Aſdrubal gouerned Spaine beyond Ebro eight yeares, and aduaunced the affaires of his Commonweale more by mildneſſe than by armes; whom they make the founder of new Carthage: but returning to a rigorous courſe, his crueltie incited a Gaule, who ſerued him, to murther him, reuenging the death of a Lord of Luſitania his maſter, whom Aſdrubal had cauſed to bee ſlaine, whoſe head he cauſed to bee I carried through the countrey vpon a launce, after that he had hanged the bodie vpon a croſſe. This ſeruant being taken, died in the extremitie of his torments, ſinging and laughing for joy that he had done the deed.

The great reſolution of a ſeruant louing his maſter.

4 Before the death of Aſdrubal it was propounded in the Senat of Carthage, If it were expedient to ſend Hannibal into Spaine, vnder the diſcipline of his brother in law, who demaunded him? Among the Senators there was one of great eſteeme, called Hanno, being of a contrarie faction to the familie of the Barciniens, which alſo was great and rich, either hauing their partiſans. Theſe pleaded vehemently, letting the Senat vnderſtand on the one ſide, that Hannibal was bred vp in armes, and by that meanes did imitate his fathers vertues: the others to hinder this reſolution, feared leaſt the hatred which Hannibal bare vnto the Romans, K and whereof he made publicke profeſſion, would ingage and draw their Commonweale into new troubles and calamities: For although the Carthaginians were exceeding ambitious, and in that regard enemies to all mankind, yet did they feare the magnanimitie and conſtancie of the Romans, and their valour, which they had tried. Beſides, the forepaſſed warres as well againſt them, as againſt others, yea, againſt their owne mercinarie ſouldiors, had waſted their treaſure, vnfurniſht them of ſhips, and conſumed their beſt captaines; ſo as it behoued them to liue many yeares in peace, before they vndertooke any difficult warre. But their miſerie, and that of Italie, would haue the Barciniens preuaile; and ſo Hannibal was ſent into Spaine to his brother in law Aſdrubal, vnder whom he liued ſome three yeares: after whoſe deceaſe, he was demaunded for head and Generall by the men of warre, and by their fauour obtained L of the Senat and people of Carthage the gouernment of Spaine, being then about two and twentie yeares old. There was not in any age a more remarkable man than this, as well for his great vertues as vices: for he was of a generous ſpirit for great attempts, and inuincible in all dangers: bloudie combates were his delights, neither did he want judgement nor counſell: in the warre few men had better practiſed the knowledge how to obey, and how to commaund, than he: he was neuer tyred with any toyle: he endured heat and cold indifferently: he gouerned his feeding as nature required: he hated reſt, and ſlept onely when hee found himſelfe idle, not vpon a ſoft and delicate bed, but moſt commonly vpon the ground, in a Corps de guard, among the ſouldiors: he was not curious in his habits, but delighted much in faire Armes and good horſes; being alwayes the firſt in fight, and the laſt at a retreat. So M many vertues had for companions in the ſame ſubject, a brutiſh crueltie, damnable infidelitie, ſacriledge, and contempt of all religion. When as he found himſelfe poſſeſſed of theſe forces, he ſought all meanes to breake the peace with the Romanes; propounding within himſelfe, not onely to chaſe them out of Spaine, but alſo to aſſaile them in Italie within their owne ſtrength, and in the very ſeat of their Empire. He began to make warre againſt the Olcades,

A cades, a people beyond the riuer of Ebro, who were in good termes with the Carthaginians, but not their ſubjects, and tooke Althee their chiefe towne, and ſackt it; the which did very much terrifie their neighbours. Then he quarrelled with the Vaccees; ſometimes pretending a right, as being ſubject to the juriſdiction of Carthage; ſometimes doing them injurie, or pretending that he had receiued ſome wrong from them, hee ſo prouoked them, as among many acts of hoſtilitie, after the taking of Hermandica and Arbocala, townes of the Vaccees, and a great defeat which he gaue vnto the Carpetanians and the reſt of the Olcades and Vaccees, and in the end the conqueſt of all thoſe Prouinces, he came vnto that which he had propounded vnto himſelfe; which was, to beſiege Sagunt. The complaints of his exceſſe
B came daily to Rome; yet the Senat being buſied with the warres of Gaule, and againſt the Illyrians, were not much mooued, vntill that the Saguntines ſeeing a ſiege comming before their towne, quickened the Romanes by their embaſſadours, letting them vnderſtand, That if they made any account of Spaine, it was now high time to oppoſe themſelues againſt the violence of Hannibal; who hauing broken their treaties and accords in a thouſand ſorts, might be at that inſtant about their walls with an hundred and fiftie thouſand fighting men. This did moue the Senat of Rome not to neglect their allies, and to apprehend the dangers which did threaten themſelues, if they ſuffered the Carthaginians their enemies to proſper. Wherefore they ſent two embaſſadors to Carthage, which were, Publius Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Tamphilus, with charge to paſſe to Hannibal, and to ſummon him to retyre, and to
C leaue their allies in peace; otherwiſe to let both him and the citie of Carthage vnderſtand, that they would not endure the wrongs and injuries which had beene done them. But Sagunt was beſieged vnder colour of ſome controuerſies and quarrels which they had with their neighbours. Hannibal being entred into their territorie, abandoned it to the ſpoyle of the ſouldiors, and then aſſayled the towne in three places. There was one part plainer and more acceſſible than the reſt, where he intended to begin his batterie: but hauing made his approaches with great toyle and difficultie, the ſucceſſe was not anſwerable to his deſigne: for there hee found a ſtrong tower, and the wall rayſed higher; beſides, the place where there was moſt danger was manned with their moſt valiant ſouldiors; who at the firſt repulſed their enemies with their arrowes: but in the end not contented to ſhoot from their tow-
D ers and defences, they made ſallies, and came to fight with them hand to hand: in which skirmiſhes there was no great aduantage on either ſide. Hannibal himſelfe approching too venturouſly neere the wals, was wounded with a jaueline in the thigh, and ouerthrowne; the which did much amaze them that were about him, ſo as they fled; and it did ſo trouble the reſt, as they abandoned all their workes. Then had the Saguntines ſome leyſure to breath, and the towne was for a time rather beſieged than aſſaulted, whileſt that Hannibal was vnder cure; yet they ceaſed not to make all ſorts of engines to batter the towne: the which was done afterwards, and more violently than before, and in ſo many places, as the beſieged were ſcarce able to make their defence: and there were three towers with their courtines betwixt them alreadie ruined, ſo as the towne was diſcouered, and ſeemed to lye open; which made
E both aſſaylants and defendants to run thither: where they did fight with ſuch obſtinacie, both parties being in battaile betwixt the ruines, not as at the entrance of a breach, but as in an open champaine, animated by two ſeuerall paſſions, the one hauing hope to vanquiſh, and the other no hope of mercie in their enemies. In the end, the Carthaginians were forced to retyre; and ſoone after the Romane embaſſadours arriued in the rode of Saguntum: but Hannibal would not heare them, but let them vnderſtand, That a man buſied with ſo many affaires as he was, could not ſpend his time in words, and that he ſaw no great ſafetie for them, if they landed among ſo many ſouldiours, of diuers barbarous nations. Whereupon they paſſed into Africke, and hauing deliuered their charge vnto the Senat of Carthage, and demaunded in vaine, That Hannibal (the author of the warre) ſhould be deliue-
F red vnto them, after many proteſtations, they returned with bare words: For after much contention among the factions in the Councell of Carthage (whereas Hannibal had manie kinſmen and friends) anſwere was made vnto the embaſſadours, That the warre had beene begun by the Saguntines, and that the Senat and people of Rome ſhould not embrace their quarrell againſt the Carthaginians, with whom they had liued in peace and amitie for ſo many yeares.

The ſimplicitie of the Romans.

Whileſt the Romans were thus buſied to reſolue and to ſend embaſſadours, Hannibal purſues his ſiege, and preſſeth Sagunt by all means poſſible: He builds new engines, animates his ſouldiors, and promiſeth them the ſpoile of a rich towne: the Saguntines rampar vp their breaches, and labour day and night: the batterie begins afreſh, and they haue many aſſaults giuen, and with greater furie than before. In the end, being tyred with the multitude of aſſaylants, who had freſh ſupplies continually, they could not keepe the Carthaginians from entring by their breaches, their walls being newly repaired with earth, after their accuſtomed manner, and therefore eaſie to pierce: ſo as they ſeized vpon an high place within the precinct of the towne, whereas they planted many of their great croſſe-bowes and artillerie after their manner, and caſting a wall about it, they made as it were a citadell; againſt the which the Saguntines did preſently make a trench, diuiding it from the reſt of the towne, which was not yet taken. And as it happened diuers times, that the one getting the other, muſt needs retyre, the towne was reduced to a ſmall compaſſe, and withall they had great want of victuals, and of all other neceſſaries, by reaſon of the long ſiege, Hannibal was then forced to march into Oretania and Carpetania, where there was ſome likelyhood of a tumult, for that thoſe which he had ſent to enroll ſouldiors, were retained by them of the countrey, by reaſon of the great rigour which they vſed. As his abſence from the campe gaue ſome reſt vnto the Saguntines, ſo his comming among thoſe people cauſed peace, and reduced them to obedience. In the meane time Maharbal, ſonne to Himilco, who had the charge to continue the ſiege, vſed ſuch diligence, as there was no ſhew of Hannibals abſence. To conclude, hee wrought ſo well, as at his returne he ſhewed him large breaches, ſufficient to giue a generall aſſault, which were made on the ſide of the caſtle, the which the Carthaginians did win. The miſerable Saguntines being thus preſt, and out of all hope of ſuccours, which could not come vnto them but from Rome, which was farre from them, Alco one of their citizens caſt himſelfe from the rampar, and went to Hannibal, without the priuitie of the Senat, that he might moue him to ſome reaſonable conditions: but Hannibal offered them their liues onely, and that they ſhould depart the town with one robe only, and to go and dwell where they ſhould be appointed: whereupon Alco durſt no more returne vnto Sagunt, beſeeching him to giue him leaue to remaine within the campe: then there was a Spaniſh ſouldior named Alorco, who offered himſelfe to carrie theſe conditions vnto the Saguntines, and to perſuade them to accept thereof. But he preuailed as little as the other: for being heard in their Senat, they were ſo farre from yeelding in that manner, as by a common conſent they reſolued to bring all their gold, ſiluer, and other goods into the market place, where they ſet it on fire, and conſumed it: and there were ſome ſo deſperat, as they caſt themſelues into the fire, to be conſumed with their goods. In the meane time there was a great noiſe heard from a tower which fell ſuddainely, hauing beene long battered, the which gaue free entrie vnto the enemies: a band of ſouldiors then being entred by that breach, they made a ſigne vnto the campe: whereupon Hannibal being vigilant to embrace all occaſions, marched thither with the whole bodie of the armie, and tooke the towne, hauing giuen charge to his ſouldiors, to kill all that had paſt the age of foureteene yeares: a cruell ſentence, but he held it neceſſarie, ſeeing hee had to deale with ſuch obſtinat enemies, who being in fight, neuer yeelded but by death, and being ſhut vp within their towne, with their wiues and children, would rather burne themſelues in their houſes, than yeeld. And although that many things were ſpoyled and conſumed by the fire, yet the bootie was great. Thus Sagunt fell into Hannibals hands, eight moneths after the beginning of the ſiege. And during this ſiege, his wife Himilce was deliuered of a ſonne called Aſpar, which doubled his joy. Then did the Romanes reſolue to proclaime warre againſt Carthage, mooued partly with the vnworthie calamitie of their friends and allies, and partly with the feare of their owne eſtate: the which happened 536 yeares after the foundation of Rome, Pub. Cornelius Scipio and Titus Sempronius Longus being created Conſuls.

ſaued themſelues in the ſea. The confuſion was ſo great, that hindering one another, the ſoul-diors could not vſe their armes, nor the marriners launch out, nor doe their duties, ſo as they were forced to cut their cables; and doing all things in haſt, they were defeated more by their owne diſorder than by the Romanes; who aduancing, tooke two gallies at their firſt joyning, rying all away that were not run on ground, or broken vpon the coaſt, ſo as the Romans drew 25 out with them to ſea. This victorie did not only diſarme the Carthaginians of their ſea forces, but alſo made them forſake all that coaſt. Wherfore the Romans being landed at Onuſta or Honoſca, became maſters thereof without any reſiſtance, ſpoyling the countrey vnto the gates of new Carthage, whereas they burnt the ſuburbes. Returning from thence laden with ſpoyle to Longuntica (which at this preſent is Guardamar) they found great ſtore of a kind of broome, wherwith they did vſe to make cables for ſhips, the which Aſdrubal had cauſed to be gathered together, whereof they tooke what they pleaſed, and ſet fire on the reſt. Then returning to their ſhips, they paſſed into the Iſland of Ebuſus or Iuiſa, and battered the fort that was in it; from the which they were repulſed. So as after they had ſpoiled and burnt the coun- K try, they embarked againe, and being ready to weigh anchor, embaſſadors came to them from the Iſlands of the Baleares, to demaund peace and friendſhip with the Romans.

Scipio being returned into Spaine, he gaue audience to the embaſſadours of all the people that dwell about the riuer Ebro, and not onely to them, but to others of farther regions, deſi-ring to enter into league with the Romans. They hold, that he receiued hoſtages at that time of aboue 120 Townes or Communalties. Scipio being fortified by this means, and thinking he ſhould be able from that time to keepe the field againſt his enemie, he led his armie towards Caſtulo, & the mountaines which are now called Puerto Muladar, Aſdrubal being retired into Pro-conſul; in whoſe abſence Cn. Scipio his brother had vntill that time gouerned the warres:

for

for it was the Prouince which had fallen vnto him the yeare before, being Conſull.

7 His gouernment then being continued, he arriued at Tarracone with 30 ſhips of warre, and many of burthen, carying 8000 ſouldiors, and great ſtore of victuals and other prouiſion: where hauing landed his men, he went and joyned with his brother; and from that time the affaires were gouerned by two captaines well vnited, and agreeing in all things: who whileſt that Hannibal was in action againſt the Celtiberians, reſolued to goe directly to Sagunt; in which towne they knew, that all the hoſtages which Hannibal had drawne from the townes and people of Spaine, were kept with a ſmall guard; which was the onely gage which the Carthaginians had to aſſure them of the Spaniards fidelitie, and the onely bond wherewith they tyed them: but one man brake it. He was a gentleman, who was then in garriſon at Sagunt, a Spaniard by nation, called Acedux, who had alwaies before ſhewed himſelfe very faithfull to the Carthaginians, but then (according to the manner of the Barbarians) he applied himſelfe according to the time and euents. This man hauing a deſire to follow the Romans partie, and imagining, that ſuch as reuolt, are commonly eſteemed but baſe and infamous creatures, if withall they doe not bring ſome notable commoditie to them that doe receiue them, he bethought himſelfe of an occaſion, whereby he might purchaſe the grace and fauour of the Romanes, by one of the greateſt aduantages they might haue, if he could find meanes to deliuer all theſe hoſtages into their hands: but for that they were ſtraitly guarded by men that were appointed by Boſtares, Gouernour of the Prouince, there was great difficultie in the execution of this enterpriſe. He came therefore vnto the Gouernour, who lay in campe without the towne, to defend the landing vpon the ſea ſhoare, being ſomewhat farre off, and letting him vnderſtand the dangerous eſtate of the Carthaginians affaires, after ſo many defeats, and how little faith and conſtancie there was in the townes and confederat people of Spaine, ſeeing ſo great a power of the Romanes neere them, fortified by ſo many people which had taken their partie, and the goodly ſuccours which the Pro-conſull Scipio had brought out of Italie, he aduiſed him to make the Spaniards more bound vnto the Carthaginians by an honourable bountie, than they were by the gages which he had from them, in ſending backe to euery Towne and Communaltie their hoſtages. And to the end hee ſhould aſſure himſelfe he would be readie to put in practiſe all that he ſhould hold fit for the good of the Carthaginians, he offered to conduct theſe hoſtages to their parents, and to goe from towne to towne, confirming and encouraging his countreymen to be loyall to the Carthaginians, and that thereby they ſhould find they had ſo good an opinion of them, as without any neceſſitie they had freely ſent home their hoſtages vnto them. To conclude, he could ſo well perſuade this Gouernour, as (notwithſtanding it ſeemed hard vnto him at the firſt) he conſented, appointing a conuenient time to ſend the hoſtages to their houſes, vnder conduct of this traitour: who in the meane time found meanes to ſlip vnto the Romanes campe, and hauing met with ſome Spaniards in the armie, he cauſed them to bring him vnto the Pro-conſull as ſecretly as might be; to whom he imparted this buſineſſe as he had deſigned it; and a fit concluſion was taken betwixt them for this enterpriſe. This merchant being returned againe to Sagunt, and hauing againe conferred with Boſtares the Gouernour vpon this reſtitution at the time appointed, the hoſtages were in the night ſent out of the towne with a good guard, as it ſeemed: but they went not farre, before they fell into an ambuſh which the Romanes had layed for them, where they were all taken, and led vnto the campe. The ſame counſell which this Spaniard had giuen to Boſtares, was by him propounded to the Romanes, who made good vſe thereof, and reſtored the hoſtages to their parents and friends, and by that meanes made a wonderfull breach in the Carthaginians Eſtate in Spaine: For the people and townes did ſoone find what an aduantage it was to change their maſter; for that in ſtead of the Carthaginians commaund, which was imperious and proud, the Romanes were entred with bountie and mildneſſe. So euery one commending the wiſedome of this Acedux, ſought ſome fit opportunitie to reuolt as he had done. And if Winter had not forced them to ſurceaſe, the effects had followed without delay. Aſdrubal finding himſelfe too weake, was retyred into places of ſtrength, farre from the Romanes. The two Scipioes hauing diuided their charges, Publius conducted the armie at ſea, and Cneus that at land. Aſdrubal durſt not oppoſe himſelfe neyther againſt the one nor the other, but hauing after many petitions and much ſolliciting obtained from the Carthaginians a ſupplie of foure thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe: as ſoone as they G arriued, he went to field with his armie, approched neer vnto the enemie, began to repayre his ſhippes, and to make a fleet for the defence of the coaſt and Iſlands. Being buſie about theſe things, the reuolt of the ſea captaines, which had beene defeated the Summer before, troubled him much. Theſe after the battaile hauing beene much blamed by Aſdrubal, did neuer afterwards ſhew themſelues neither faithfull to their Generall, nor well affected to the affaires of the Carthaginians: ſo as by practiſes there were ſome townes yeelded to the Romanes in the countrey of the Carpeſians, where the Realme of Toledo is at this day; and had taken one by force: ſo as all the warre was drawne by the Romanes into this countrey. Wherefore Aſdrubal entring the countrey in hoſtile manner, affronted a captaine of H this nation called Galbus, who lay in campe neere vnto the towne which had beene taken. Hauing ſent ſome ſouldiours lightly armed to the enemies trenches, to draw them forth to skirmiſh, and ſome others againſt them that were gone to forrage, there was at one inſtant a great tumult in their campe, and ſlaughter and flying without it, ſo as manie ſaued themſelues within their fort: yet in the end they were ſo well aſſured, as they not one-ly defended their rampiers, but alſo ſallied forth, and preſented themſelues in battaile a-gainſt the Carthaginians, going reſolutely to the charge, leaping and skipping after their accuſtomed manner, the which ſtrucke terrour into the enemie, who retyred as hee could with credit. Aſdrubal hauing recouered a hill flanked with a riuer, he brought his armie thither, thinking it needfull to fortifie himſelfe there. So theſe two armies giuing feare for I feare, there were ſome skirmiſhes among the ſouldiours on either ſide, whereas to ſpeake truth, the Numidian horſeman was not equall to the Spaniard, nor the Moores darts able to pierce their aduerſaries targuets, who were as nimble and actiue as they, and had more force and courage. The Spaniards ſeeing that by running about the Carthaginians campe they could not draw them forth to battaile, and that it was not eaſie to force, they went to beſiege a towne called Aſena, whereas Aſdrubal comming into that Prouince, had made trey about it: but after it there was neither order, obedience, nor conduct among them, as it happeneth often after a good ſucceſſe. Aſdrubal ſeeing their diſorder and negligence, Aſdrubal takes aduantage of his enemies negligence. thought good to embrace this occaſion: Wherefore hauing aduertiſed his ſouldiors there- K of, he left his place of ſtrength, and led his armie in good order againſt theſe Spaniards, who were diſperſed here and there in diſorder, and without enſignes. Being diſcouered by them that were in ſentinell, euery one runs to armes, and ſo went to encounter the enemie diſorde-red, without enſignes and without commaundement. Some began the fight, whilſt that other arriued in troupes, the greater part being not yet come out of their campe: yet they encountred them with ſuch furie, as they ſtayed the firſt charge of the Carthaginians: but finding themſelues few in number, faint, and not well vnited, againſt many in good order, they were ſoone broken, and forced to ſeeke their companions; and in the end they were ſo preſt, being on a heape, and not able to vſe their arms, as they were for the moſt part ſlaine; ſome making way by force through their enemies, ſaued themſelues in the mountains and forreſts neere ad- L joyning. Their campe was in this amazement abandoned, and the whole Prouince was in one day reduced vnder the obedience of the Carthaginians.

The Councell of Carthage thinking to get Italy, neglect Spain. During theſe actions, Aſdrubal receiued commaundement from his ſuperiours at Carthage, That hee ſhould march with all ſpeed with his armie into Italie: the which being knowne in Spaine, all the people in generall began to wauer, and to follow the Romane par-tie: whereof Aſdrubal did aduertiſe the Senat, letting them vnderſtand what prejudice this bruit did bring vnto the affaires of the Commonweale of Carthage; and that it was apparent, if he parted from thence, before he ſhould paſſe the riuer of Ebro, all Spaine would fall into the Romanes power: for beſides that he neither had men, nor a ſufficient captaine to leaue in his place, to guard that Prouince, the Romane captaines were ſuch, as they could M hardly be reſiſted with equall numbers: wherefore he aduiſed them (if they had any care of Spaine) to ſend a good Commaunder and a ſtrong Armie in the place of that which he ſhould lead away: and although that all things ſhould ſucceed as they deſired, yet ſhould they euer find ſome alteration among the people of that countrey. Aſdrubal his letters did ſomewhat mooue the Senate, but for that they did more affect the affaires of Italie,

A they did not alter any thing that had beene decreed touching his departure with his army, but they onely ſent Himilcon with ſome bands, and did arme ſome ſhips, which they held ſufficient to keepe the people of Spaine in awe, as well vpon the ſea coaſts, as within the countrey. This captaine hauing paſt the ſea with his forces, layed vp his ſhips in ſafetie, and fortified his campe, he tooke ſome of his beſt horſemen, and paſt through friends and enemies countries, vntill he came to Aſdrubal, to whom he preſented this decree of the Senat: and hauing conferred with him, and vnderſtood the courſe that he was to hold in the warres of Spaine, he returned to his troups, hauing nothing that did aſſure him more from encounter vpon the way, than his diligence and ſpeed: For before they could haue meanes to aſſemble their forces,
B they had news of his returne. Aſdrubal ſeeing that he muſt needs go, he exacted great ſummes of money from all the townes and people that were vnder the Carthaginians iuriſdiction, being well aduertiſed, that he muſt purchaſe the paſſage and fauour of the Gaules with readie money, as Hannibal his brother had done. This done, hee tooke his way towards the riuer of Ebro.

Aſdrubal prepares to goe into Italie.

The Romane captaines being aduertiſed of all theſe things, and knowing of what conſequence Aſdrubals paſſage into Italie was, whereas Hannibal alone did much trouble the Romane ſtate, they imployed all their wits and meanes to ſtop him. Wherefore leauing all other affaires, they joyned all their forces in one body, and paſſing the riuer of Ebro, towards which Aſdrubal approached, being doubtful whether they ſhould fight, or by aſſailing ſome towne
C or countrey that was confederat to the Carthaginians, ſeeke onely to ſtay and diuert him. In the end they made a ſhew to beſiege Ibera, a towne which was rich and mightie in thoſe quarters. But Aſdrubal to diuert them, and to ſuccour his allies, marched with his armie towards another towne, which a little before was yeelded to the Romanes: wherefore they left the towne, and went directly towards Aſdrubal. The armies were ſome dayes within a league and a halfe one of another, before they came to battell, making light ſallies one vpon another. In the end, as if it had beene agreed vpon, they put their armies in battell. The Romanes diuided their troupes into three; ſome of their footmen were placed before, and ſome behind their enſignes, and the horſemen vpon the wings on either ſide. Aſdrubal ſet the Spaniſh footmen in the middeſt of the battell, the Carthaginians on the right hand, and the A-D fricanes on the left. To the Carthaginians he added the Numidian horſemen that were mercinaries, and the other Africanes in the head of the battell; yet he put no Numidians on the left hand, but ſuch as had beene accuſtomed to go with two horſes together to the warre, and when they had wearied one, they leapt nimbly on the other, which was freſh, being armed, in the hotteſt of the fight: ſo actiue and nimble they were, and their horſes ſo gentle and tractable. Being thus in battell, the Generals had equall hopes, for there was no great difference betwixt their forces, either in number, or qualitie of men of warre: but among the ſouldiours it was not ſo. The Romanes were perſuaded, that the ſafetie of Rome and Italie, and their returne to their houſes, depended vpon this battell; and therefore they were reſolued to vanquiſh or die. But the Spanrards (whereof the moſt part of the other armie did conſiſt) had
E not that reſolution, deſiring rather to be beaten in Spaine, than to be drawne into Italie, conquerours: Wherefore at the firſt charge their battailons in the middeſt were forced, and turned their backes, the fight was more furious on either hand, for the Romans were furiouſly charged on the one hand by the Carthaginians, and on the other by the Africanes, and in a manner compaſſed in, when as their whole armie (being joyned together in one bodie) eaſily repulſed them. So fighting in two parts, the Romans had the aduantage euery where, and were maſters of the field. The ſlaughter was great, and had beene greater, if the Spaniards had not fled ſo faſt in the beginning. The horſemen did not in a manner fight: for when as the Moors and Numidians did ſee their ſquadron in the middeſt wauer, they began to flie, leauing their wings naked, and leading the Elephants away with them. Aſdrubal hauing continued
F vntill the end of the fight, retired out of the preaſe with ſome few that followed him. The enemies campe, and all their baggage, was ſpoyled by the Romans. Through this victory, if there remained any people in Spaine which were not firme and conſtant to the Romans, they were now confirmed. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal ſaw himſelfe not onely out of hope to lead an armie into Italie, but alſo in ſome doubt where he ſhould find a place of aſſurance in Spaine. Theſe newes being aduertiſed to Rome by the two Scipioes, were verie pleaſing; not ſo much

This Summer was proſperous for the Romanes affaires, but they began to want victuall, and the ſeamen, both mariners and ſouldiors, were in a manner naked. Wherfore the captaines gaue the Senat to vnderſtand, That they muſt of neceſſitie prouide for theſe wants, elſe they ſhould not be able to entertaine neither the armie, nor the countrey. Illiturgis beſieged by the Carthaginians, releiued by the Romans.

Aſdrubal accompanied by Mago, and Amilcar ſonne to Bomilcar, Carthaginian captaines, were come to beſiege the towne of Illiturgis, which had reuolted from them to the Romane party: about the which they had made three camps, through which the Scipioes, two brethren, paſt by force, with great ſlaughter of their enemies, and put victuals into the towne, whereof they had great need: and hauing encouraged the inhabitants to carrie themſelues valiantly in the defence of their walls, as they had ſeene them do which came to ſuccour them, they reſolued to make a furious ſallie vpon the enemies fort, in Aſdrubals quarter. Which Mago and Amilcar ſeeing, they ran thither with all their forces; ſo as that day the Carthaginians had 60000 men in battell without their campe, againſt 26000 Romans, or thereabouts; who notwithſtanding had the victorie, without any doubt, hauing ſlaine more of their enemies than they were themſelues, taken aboue 3000 priſoners, woon about 1000 good horſes of ſeruice, caried away 59 enſignes, ſlaine fiue Elephants in fight, made the enemies to raiſe their camps, and (which was their chiefe deſigne) freed the towne of Illiturgis from ſiege. H

A memorable defeat by the Carthaginians.

Spain fit to ſupplie armies.

The Carthaginians to recouer their honour, went to beſiege Incibile, another place allied to the Romans, hauing filled their bands, and made new ſupplies in the country, who demaunded nothing more than warre, ſo as there were any hope of ſpoyle: for at that time Spaine did abound in youth. I

Another victory by the Romans.

There they did rather increaſe their ſhame: for being aſſailed by the Romans, they loſt 13000 ſouldiours more, which were ſlaine vpon the place, 3000 priſoners, two and fortie enſignes, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all Spaine did adhere vnto the Romans, to whom this Summer was verie ſucceſſull.

The yeare following, when as Q. Fabius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were Conſuls, and the fift of the ſecond Punicke warre, had diuers euents: for Aſdrubal and Mago defeated great armies of Spaniards, which were allied to the Romanes, before they had left their garriſons, where they had wintered, to paſſe the riuer of Ebro: and in a manner all that part of Spaine was recouered by the Carthaginians: but the diligence of P. Scipio, who marched thither with his armie, kept them play, and aſſured the country. Hee came firſt and camped at a place called Haut-Chaſteau, or High-Caſtle, famous by the death of that great Amilcar; the which was ſtrong, and well furniſhed with corne which they had brought thither a little before: but the countrey round about was full of enemies, and ſome of the Romans, which had taried ſcattered behind from the bodie of the armie, had beene charged by the enemies horſe, who ſlew two thouſand, and retired without any loſſe. This made P. Scipio retire into a countrey of more ſafetie: who fortified his campe, and entrenched it neere vnto the mount of Victorie, whither Cn. Scipio his brother came with all his forces. And in a manner at the ſame inſtant, Aſdrubal, ſonne to Giſgo the third, a Carthaginian captaine, preſented himſelfe with a complet armie, in view of the Romanes, and planted his campe right againſt them, hauing a riuer betwixt them. There P. Scipio hauing taken certaine men at armes with him, parted ſecretly to diſcouer the enemie and the countrey: but being himſelfe diſcouered by the enemie, hee was in daunger to be defeated, had hee not recouered a little hill neere adjoyning, whereby hee had meanes to defend himſelfe, and to make head againſt them that did enuiron him, vntill that his brother Cn. Scipio came to vngage him. The towne of Caſtulo which was ſo great a friend, and ſo ſtrictly allied vnto the Carthaginians, as Hannibal had taken a wife there, yeelded vnto the Romanes. The Carthaginians returned vnto the ſiege of Illiturgis, in the which there was ſome garriſon of Romane ſouldiours, hoping to take it by famine. Cn. Scipio to releeue both the garriſon and the inhabitants allied to the Romanes, marched that way, paſt valiantly betwixt two armies, and put a legion of reſolute ſouldiours into the towne, with great ſlaughter of the enemie. The next day was no leſſe happy vnto him, in a braue ſally which he made, where there were ſlaine

A ſlaine in theſe two encounters twelue thouſand Carthaginians, and aboue ten thouſand priſoners, with fiue and thirtie enſignes, ſo as Illiturgis was againe freed from ſiege. The enemie being chaſed from thence, they went to beſiege Bigerre, another towne allied to the Romanes; but they retired preſently vpon the brute of Scipioes approach, and marched towards Munda, where they were alſo purſued by the Romanes. There they had a ſharpe encounter, which continued foure houres; but as the Romanes had the victorie, they ſounded a retreat, for that Cneus Scipio, Generall of the armie, had beene thruſt into the thigh with a Numidian launce: which wound his ſouldiours that were fighting about him feared to haue been mortall; without which accident it is certaine the Carthaginians campe had been taken that day, Cn. Scipio hurt.

B and the victorie abſolute. For the ſouldiours with their Elephants had been repulſt vnto their paliſadoes and rampars, vpon the which there were nine and thirtie ſlaine with darts: Yet they ſay, that in this fight the Romanes ſlew aboue twelue thouſand of their enemies, and caried away ſeuen and fiftie enſignes. The Carthaginians being defeated, retired to Auringe, where they were purſued and preſt by the Romanes, during this amazement; and were againe charged before they had leaſure to aſſure themſelues, and to recouer their ſpirits, Scipio cauſing himſelfe to be carried through the battailons in a litter. Here he had an abſolute victorie, but with much leſſe ſlaughter by the halfe, for the enemies were reduced to a ſmaller number. But as thoſe people were prompt by nature, to renew the warres, and preſently to ſupplie their armies, the countrey being fertile of ſouldiours, their bands were preſently filled The Carthaginians put to rout. Another defeat of them.

C by the diligence of Mago, brother to Aſdrubal, being ſent to make new leuies, ſo as they durſt hazard another battell: the euent whereof was like vnto the former, moſt of the Carthaginian ſouldiours comming faintly to fight, as for a partie which had beene often beaten, and in few dayes. They loſt in this conflict eight thouſand men ſlaine vpon the place, and almoſt one thouſand priſoners, with eight and fiftie enſignes, and great ſtore of baggage, rings, chaines, and bracelets of gold: two great noblemen of Gaul were alſo ſlain, the one called Mœnicaptus, the other Ciuiſmarus: eight Elephants were taken, and three ſlaine. Thus the Romans affairs proſpered in Spaine, who in the end were aſhamed, that the townes of Sagunt, for the which this war was begun, had continued fiue yeares in their enemies power. Wherefore they approached neere vnto it, and by fauour of the battels which they had woon, did eaſily chaſe a- Carthaginians againe defeated.

D way the garriſon that was within it: and hauing conquered the place, they called home all the old inhabitants, and reſtored them to the poſſeſſion of their goods, raſed the Turditans towne, which had beene the motiue of their deſolation, and ſold the inhabitants thereof for ſlaues, to them that would giue moſt. Saguntines reſtored to their goods.

The Romanes to haue the better meanes, not onely to repreſſe the injuries of the Carthaginians, but alſo to aſſaile and annoy them, did ſtirre vp new enemies againſt them neere vnto their towne, and drew vnto their alliance Siphax, king of a part of Numidia, who was alreadie ſomewhat diſcontented with them: ſo as they were forced to haue their recourſe vnto Gala, another king of the ſame nation, and to incenſe him againſt Siphax. This Gala was father to Maſiniſſa, from whom the Romans did afterwards draw many good ſeruices: but at that time he The Romans ſtir vp enemies to the Carthaginians in Africke. Gala father to Maſiniſſa.

E ſhewed himſelfe a bitter enemie to Siphax, and did often defeat him. In the meane time nothing was done worthie of memorie in Spaine; only the Celtiberians which were in pay with the Carthaginians, were drawne away by the Romanes, whom they entertained with the ſame conditions: and theſe were the firſt mercinarie ſouldiors which the Romans vſed, to their great prejudice. Moreouer, the two Scipioes ſent aboue 300 Spaniſh gentlemen into Italy, to ſolicite them of their nation, which were in Hannibals armie, to leaue his partie, and to joyne with the Romanes.

After this, there were two yeres ſpent before there was any memorable act done in Spain, both parties encountring one another rather by counſell and practiſes, than by open hoſtilitie. The ſeuenth yeare of this warre, the Romane captaines aſſembled their forces, and it was

F reſolued in counſell, That they muſt not content themſelues onely to haue ſtopped Aſdrubals paſſage into Italy, but they muſt ſeeke ſome meanes to end all the warre in Spaine: preſuming they had forces ynow to doe it, hauing this Winter drawne vnto them, and armed 30 thouſand Celtiberians. The enemies had three camps, two whereof were commaunded by Aſdrubal ſonne to Giſgo, & by Mago, being both joyned together. They were diſtant from the Romanes ſome fiue dayes journey: But that which Aſdrubal, ſonne to Amilcar, the auntient of the Roman armie would firſt giue him a charge, hoping to defeat him eaſily. One onely difficultie troubled them, which was, how they ſhould hinder the other two armies (after the defeat of this Aſdrubal) from retiring into ſome place of aduantage among the mountaines

The two Scipioes attempting too much, ruine themſelues. and foreſts, and by that meanes ſhould draw the warre in length. Hauing then a conceit to make warre againſt all Spaine at one inſtant, they reſolued to diuide their forces betwixt them: ſo as P. Scipio with two third parts of the Romane armie, and the bands of their allies, ſhould goe and affront Aſdrubal ſonne to Giſgo, and Mago; and that Cneus Scipio ſhould lead the reſt of the old legions and the allies againſt Aſdrubal Barcin.

This being concluded, theſe two armies with their commaunders parted at one inſtant: the H Celtiberians marching before, came and encamped neere vnto Anitorge, in view of the ene-mie, being ſeperated the one from the other by a riuer. There did Cneus Scipio ſtay with his troupes, and P. Scipio marched on where he was to make warre. But when as Aſdrubal ſaw them diuided, and one farre from the other, being a wiſe and politique captaine, conſidering that the ſinewes and ſtrength of the Romane armie conſiſted of their allies, and in mercina-rie ſouldiours, and knowing the treacherous and inconſtant diſpoſition of the barbarous, euen of the Spaniards in thoſe times, by the experience he had had in that long warre, hee reſolued to trie all meanes poſſible, to corrupt the Celtiberians, which were vnder the Romans pay, being 30000: the which he did happily effect, by the meanes of ſome of the ſame nation which were in his camp; who vſing the ſame language, and hauing meanes to haue ſecret conferences I
The mercinarie Spaniards make no account to abandon the Romans at need. one with another, they concluded with the captaines of the Celtiberians, that for a good ſumme of money they ſhould retire with their men, and returne to their houſes. It ſeemed a matter of ſmall moment to them: for they were not preſt to turne their armes againſt the Ro-manes, but onely to retire, and not to make warre: beſides, moſt of the ſouldiors were glad to reſt, and deſired to ſee their kinsfolkes and friends, goods and poſſeſſions. Wherefore it was eaſie for the captains who were corrupted, to perſuade them to diſlodge, being without feare to be ſtaied, or forced by the Romanes, who were but few in number. Let this be an example had warre at home, and that they muſt goe and defend their owne houſes. Cneus Scipio ſee-ing himſelfe thus abandoned, and not able to preuent it neither by intreatie, force, nor any good counſell, finding himſelfe too weake to hold the field againſt ſo great and mightie an armie, hauing alſo no meanes to joyne with his brother P. Scipio, he meant to trie if he might retire ſafely and with his honour, and flie all occaſions to be forced to fighr. But Aſdrubal holding him vanquiſhed, would giue him no reſt, but followed him continually at the heeles.

Two Romane armies in preyto the enemie. The like terrour, but a farre greater daunger, did at the ſame time preſſe P. Scipio, being freſhly charged by a new and a valiant enemie: it was Maſiniſſa a young prince, then allied to the Carthaginians; who afterwards was famous, and made mightie by the amitie of the L Maſiniſſa a fierce aduerſarie to the Romans. Romanes. P. Scipio at his firſt arriuall found him in front, with goodly troupes of Numidian horſemen, comming continually day and night to his trenches, keeping his armie in perpetuall alarme, ſo as not any one durſt goe farre out, either for forrage or for wood, diſlodging their ſentinels oftentimes, and purſuing them euen within their gards, and to the ports and rampars of their campe, whereas the Romanes were ſhut vp as if they had beene beſieged, and in want of all things, wherewith they were likely to be daily more and more oppreſt, if a Spaniard called Indibilis ſhould come and joyne with the Carthaginians, where he was expected with ſeuen thouſand and fiue hundred Sueſſetanians. For ſo graue and wiſe a commander as P. Scipio was, he tooke a bad and raſh reſolution: for hauing left his campe to the gard of a few men, vnder the commaund of T. Fonteius his lieutenant, hee parted about midnight M to goe and encounter Indibilis, and to fight with him: the which he did, and had eaſily defeated him, if the Moores and Numidian horſemen (who had watched Scipioes departure) had not come and charged the Romanes in flanke, the which cauſed a great terrour among them; and beſides they were charged in the rereward with all the Carthaginian armie, which had followed them. Being thus enuironed of all ſides, doubtfull where they ſhould make head, or

A which way they ſhould force through the enemies, and eſcape that daunger, their Generall P.Scipio fighting and encouraging the ſouldiors, and going to all places where his preſence was needfull, was thruſt through the right flanke with a launce, ſo as he fell downe dead from his horſe. Then the enemies which had charged that troupe which was about Scipioes perſon, ſeeing him on the ground, went running throughout the armie, leaping for joy, and crying out that the enemies Generall was ſlaine. This accident gaue the Carthaginians an aſſured victorie, the Romans (being deſtitute of a head) thinking onely how they ſhould flie and ſaue themſelues. It was eaſie for them to make way through the Numidians, who were but lightly armed, but to ſaue themſelues by flying againſt ſo many horſemen, and footmen who did run in

P.Scipio ſlaine, and the Romans defeated.

B a manner as ſwift as horſes, there was no meanes: ſo as the ſlaughter of the Romans was very great, both in the fight and in the flight, and hardly had any one eſcaped, if the darkeneſſe of the night had not fauoured them. The happineſſe of ſo great and important a victorie of the Carthaginians, was no whit impaired by the negligence of their captaines, but making good vſe thereof, preſently after the conflict, hauing giuen ſome little reſt vnto their ſouldiours, the armie diſlodged, and marched with all ſpeed to Aſdrubal Barcins campe: being aſſured, that all their forces vnited together, they ſhould eaſily vanquiſh the other Romane armie which remained, and by that meanes end the warre in Spaine. Being arriued, the joy was great among the captaines and armies, rejoycing at this late obtained victorie, whereas ſo great and redoubted a captaine of the enemies had beene ſlaine, and all his armie defeated:

The victorious Carthaginians purſue the victorie.

C wherefore being full of hope, they aſſured themſelues to doe as much vnto the others.

There was yet no newes of this lamentable defeat in Cneus Scipioes armie, but there was ſeene a ſad mournefull ſilence, as if they had had ſome ſecret preſage, as it happens often to ſuch as doe diuine of an approaching miſchiefe. The Generall of the armie, beſides that he found himſelfe weakened, and abandoned by his allies, hearing that Aſdrubals armie was ſo much renforced, was much perplexed, and could not by any conjecture and reaſon of warre imagine other, than what had happened: For what reaſon were it to thinke, that Aſdrubal and Mago could paſſe without fighting, if his brother had beene liuing? Why did he not hinder them? or at the leaſt coaſt them and follow them, to come and joyne with his brother, if he could not keep the enemies armies from joyning? Being in this perplexitie, ſee-

Heauineſſe in Scipioes armie without any apparant cauſe.

D ing no other meanes to aſſure himſelfe, but by a retreat, hee parted ſecretly in the night, vnknowne to the enemie, cauſing his armie to make a long march: But the day hauing diſcouered his departure, the Numidian horſemen were preſently ſent after; who ouertooke the Romane armie toward the euening, and skirmiſhing, ſtayed them much, charging them ſometimes behind, and ſometimes vpon the flankes. Scipio gaue order, that in fighting the armie ſhould ſtill aduance, fearing the enemies battailons of foot, which marched with all ſpeed after their horſe. In the end night approached, and yet the Romanes had not much aduanced, being forced to make often ſtands againſt the Moores, who did continually annoy them. Wherefore Cneus Scipio retired with all his troupes to a little hill, a place of ſmall aduantage for them that were alreadie wauering, yet the ſeat was ſomewhat higher than the fields

E about it: There he lodgeth, and puts his horſemen and all his baggage in the middeſt, and his footmen make a circle round about, and ſo did eaſily reſiſt the attempts of the Moores. But when as the Generals with their complete armies were joyned together, hee ſaw there was no meanes to make it good by fightiug, if he did not intrench himſelfe after the accuſtomed manner: Wherefore he began to aduiſe by what meanes he might make his paliſadoes; but he was come into a bare, barren, and drie ſoyle, where there was neither trees nor buſhes, nor any ground fit to make flagges; neither could they digge into it, nor make it hard for the enemie to approach, for the aſcent was eaſie on all ſides: yet to make a kind of rampar, hee cauſed them to take their packe-ſaddles and dorſers, and to tye them together, wherewith the ſouldiours made as it were a wall of a conuenient height round about them, filling vp the pla-

F ces which wanted, with ſuch baggage as they had.

The Carthaginians being arriued, put themſelues in order to aſſaile this little hill, but diſcouering a new kind of rampar, and not accuſtomed, they were ſomewhat amazed: but their commaunders began to crie; How now ſouldiours, why ſtay you? why doe you not ſpeedily pull vp and ſcatter this baggage which doth amaze you, and is not fit to ſtop women nor children? The enemie is ours, wee hold him faſt, being hidden behind thoſe

cofers and burthens. Thus contemptuouſly did the captaines ſpeake, yet was it not ſo eaſie G to make a breach, nor to paſſe ouer them: but in the end they forced them, and the ſouldiors found paſſage in diuers places, ſo as they made a great ſlaughter of the Romans; yet the greateſt part of the vanquiſhed ſaued themſelues by flight, who finding woods and foreſts, a good number of them, after a long and tedious journey, came vnto P. Scipioes campe, commaunded by T. Fonteius, the lieutenant. Cn. Scipio was alſo ſlaine in this aſſault at the hill, as ſome ſay, in the beginning of the fight: others notwithſtanding affirme, That he thought to ſaue himſelfe with ſome few men, in a tower which was there adjoyning, the which being enuironed by the enemie, and the gates ſet on fire, they were all taken and ſlaine. Behold two great captaines, brethren, dead, and their armies defeated, in leſſe than a moneth, leauing the Ro- H mans affaires in Spaine ſo troubled, and in ſuch deſpaire, as they might well ſay, all was loſt:
But humane things are gouerned by a higher power, who doth not alwaies impart his decrees to our diſcourſes.

The Roman armie forced and defeated.

Cn. Scipio ſlaine.

Anno 541 of Rome.

9 There was a Roman knight called L. Martius, ſonne to Septimius, a yong man, actiue, hardie, and of greater courage than could be expected in a man of his condition, who aſſured the remainders of the legions, and the faithfull allies of the Roman ſtate, and reuiued Spaine from their ſorrow and mourning, for the loſſe of two ſuch great perſonages, and of ſo many good men, and from the calamitie and daunger they were then in: and in the end recouered the honour and fame of the Romanes, which was growne contemptible. Hee had with his generous diſpoſition learned good diſcipline vnder Cn. Scipio. And hauing gathered many I of them together which had fled from the defeat, and drawne a good number of ſouldiours out of the garriſons and vnited townes, he made a little armie, and came and joyned with *T.
Fonteius*, P. Scipioes lieutenant. This armie being on this ſide Ebro, in a campe well fortified, it was reſolued to chuſe a head that ſhould commaund ouer all, and that they ſhould take their voyces therein, as the bands ſhould enter into gard one after another. L. Martius being but a knight, was ſo gracious, as all in generall gaue him their voyces, and he was choſen Captaine Generall of the Roman armie. After which time hee was verie carefull to fortifie himſelfe in places of ſtrength, and to prouide ſtore of victuals and munition, finding the ſouldiours readie to execute whatſoeuer hee commaunded. But it was not long before there came newes vnto the campe, That Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſgo marched towards K them, to make an end of the warre, and to free the countrey of thoſe few Romanes which were yet remaining in Spaine. Then the ſouldiours remembring their old captaines, began to faint at their new captaines commands; ſo as the centeniers and other officers and bands, yea and L. Martius himſelfe had much adoe to reuiue them, reproaching them, that they be-haued themſelues faintly like women, making fruitleſſe lamentations, which was not the meanes to reuenge the deathes of their Generals, nor to recouer their loſt honour. The enemies were not far off, and it was time to preach to them; when as ſuddenly there was ſeene a ſtrange alteration throughout all the Romane campe: Their mourning was conuerted into furie, euerie man fell to his armes, and they cried out, that they ſhould bring them to the ene-mie. They ſally forth of their gates, and with great courage receiue the Carthaginians, who L came diſordred, and in a manner contemning them whom they had alreadie vanquiſhed. This reſolution of the Romanes amazed them, wondering at the number and order of theſe men, who had gathered them together, or what captains they had remaining after the death of the two Scipioes. But in the end they were forced to flie, and were hotly purſued that day, vntill that Martius thinking the ſouldious did abandon themſelues too much, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and himſelfe ſtanding before their enſignes, ſtayed their raſhneſſe, which might haue drawne them into ſome diſorder, and ſo (deſiring nothing but reuenge and bloud) hee brought them backe to the campe. The Carthaginians being thus roughly repulſed from the Romane trenches, ſeeing they were no more purſued, they preſumed it had beene feare, and therefore they retired ſoftly, and without care. Being in their campe they vſed the like M negligence in their gards and watches: for notwithſtanding they did ſee the enemie neere them, yet they did eſteeme them to be but the reliques of two armies which they had beaten and defeated ſome few dayes before.

The courage of L. Martius reuiues the Romans from deſpaire.

L. Martius choſen Generall of the Roman army

The Carthaginians proud of their great victorie, are defeated by the Romans.

L. Martius reſtraines the furie of the Romans.

Martius being aduertiſed by good ſpies, what was done in the enemies campe, hee vndertooke rather a raſh than hardy attempt, but the iſſue was fortunat. Knowing that he had the armie

A mie of Aſdrubal Giſgo now in front, the which was followed by the two others, hee thought it leſſe daunger to aduenture to fight with that alone, than to attend and bee beaten by all three together: If he vanquiſhed, he ſhould reſtore their affaires, which were almoſt ruined, and if he were beaten, at the leaſt he ſhould haue the honour to bee the aſſailant. Hauing therefore aſſembled the captaines, centeniers, and chiefe ſouldiors, he deliuered vnto them the pitifull eſtate of their affaires, and how that for the honour and reputation of their countrey, for the loue they bare to the deceaſed Scipioes, and for the intereſt of their owne liues, they were to carrie themſelues valiantly and couragiouſly againſt their cruell enemies which purſued them; whoſe negligence and contempt did inuite them to goe and aſſaile them, and
B did promiſe them a certaine and eaſie victorie, eſpecially if they made haſt before all their forces were vnited: the which afterwards they could not withſtand, concluding, that there was no other meanes to make warre, than to iſſue forth the next night, and to goe and force the Carthaginians in their trenches. He found the ſouldiours well diſpoſed at this motion, wherefore he commaunded them to prepare their armes, and to be readie to depart when he ſhould commaund. The Carthaginian armie made two lodgings, about a league and a halfe one from the other: betwixt both was a great valley couered with trees. In this foreſt was an ambuſh of Romane ſouldiours layed, with ſome horſemen, to ſtop the paſſage for ſuch as would runne from one campe to the other: the reſt of the Romane armie was led with great ſilence againſt the enemies, where finding neither gards nor ſentinels, nor any thing elſe to C ſtop their paſſage, they entred farre, as if they had beene within their owne campe: then ſuddenly the trumpets ſounded, and making great cries they fell to the execution, killing all they met, without mercie, and ſetting fire of the enemies lodgings and tents; but aboue all they ſeiſed vpon the ports and iſſues, that not any one might eſcape. The amazement, fire, cries, and ſlaughter, did ſo trouble the Carthaginians, as they could not heare one another, nor giue any order for any thing. They found themſelues among troupes of armed men: thinking to flie, they were ſlaine at the gates, if any leapt ouer the rampars, they fell into the ambuſhes, ſo as the enemies which were in the other lodging, could haue no intelligence of this ſurpriſe, but by death, which was preſented vnto them at the Romanes comming, who with great celeritie (boyling with furie, and implacable deſire of reuenge) came thither, and D there found greater negligence than they had done in the firſt campe: For theſe were farther retyred from the enemie, and vpon the breake of day many were gone forth for forrage and wood. There were armes at the ports, but no ſouldiours, ſome here, ſome there, ſome aſleepe, and ſome walking in their gownes in the trenches. The Romans fell vpon theſe careleſſe people, hauing no reſiſtance made at the ports: they entred within the campe, and in the middeſt thereof began a bloudie fight, the enemies running from all parts at the firſt crie and tumult, ſtriuing vertuouſly to repulſe the Romanes. Which conflict was likely to continue long: but when as the Carthaginians diſcouered their enemies targuets all polluted with bloud, they fainted, hauing thereby an aſſured argument of the deſeat of their companions. This feare put them in rout, and to a miſerable flight, euerie one ſauing him-
E ſelfe where he found any way open to eſcape, and abandoning the campe. So in one night and the day following, there were two campes taken, vnder the conduct of L. Martius. The number of the dead, according vnto ſome, was ſeuen and thirtie thouſand, and aboue eight hundred priſoners. The ſpoyle was verie rich, and among other things, there was found a great targuet of ſiluer, weighing one hundred thirtie and eight pounds, on the which was grauen the picture of Aſdrubal Barca, the which was afterwards ſet in the temple of the Capitoll, and it was called Martius targuet, remaining for a memorie of the victorie which hee had gotten againſt the Carthaginians, where it continued vntill the Capitoll was burnt.

The ouer great boldneſſe of Martius, which proued ſuc eſfull by the enemies negligence.

A great deſeat of the Carthaginians.

A targuet of ſiluer a monument of Martius victorie.

This action reſtored the Romans power and authoritie in Spaine, and was the cauſe that
F ſome time was ſpent without any enterpriſes of either ſide, either fearing to hazard any thing after ſo great loſſes.

10 Theſe diuers and contratie accidents teach vs how little wee ſhould relye vpon the euents of war, and that it is not in the power of man to maintaine himſelfe one day: wherefore if modeſtie be neceſſarie in humane things, yea in greateſt proſperitie, and to beare a re-ſpect to the diuine power, preſuming little vpon our owne judgements, wiſedomes, happi- G neſſe, and fame, it is chiefely in the conduct of warre. There wanted no qualities in the two Scipioes, to make them great and famous captaines; yet they tooke bad counſell, both together, and diuided and ruined themſelues by their ouerweening, and by too much attempting at one inſtant. The Carthaginians by the victorie which they had gotten, had made the way open to ouerrun all Spaine at their pleaſures: and moreouer, conſidering the cruell warres which the Romanes their aduerſaries endured with much difficultie in Italie; they had now time, and a wiſhed opportunitie to ruine them quite, drawing all their forces into thoſe parts: but being growne inſolent and careleſſe in this great proſperitie, they are ſuddenly ſtaied by a ſouldiour of no fame, without qualitie, and almoſt vnknowne, whom the diuine pro- H uidence would make an inſtrument to ſhew that it is he, and not the wiſedome of man that doth raiſe or ruine eſtates. The griefe which they had conceiued at Rome, for the defeat of their armies, and the death of ſuch excellent captaines as the two Scipioes, was ſomewhat appeaſed by the ſucceſſe of Martius enterpriſes: and conſulting in the Senat touching that which hee had written, there was not any one but did allow his actions to be high and generous, and did much commend him: But as for the title which he gaue himſelfe, of Propretor, or Lieutenant to the people of Rome, the gouernement being vacant, that ſeemed vnto them all arrogant and ambitious, yea a verie bad example, and of worſe conſequence; For that (ſaid they) if they ſhould ſuffer the ſouldiors to chuſe captaines at their pleaſure, it would blemiſh and ouerthrow the authoritie of the Senat, of the people, the lawes and magiſtrats. I

Some were of opinion, they ſhould treat of that in Councell before all other things: but it was thought fitter to deferre it for a time, and to ſend backe thoſe knights which had brought theſe letters to Rome, with a good anſwer. Wherefore they did write vnto L. Martius (without giuing him any other title) touching the prouiſion of victuals, apparell, and other things belonging vnto the armie.

God onely doth raiſe and ruine eſtates.

A commendable ſeueritie in the antient Romans.

Theſe men being diſpatched, it was firſt of all reſolued by the Conſuls and Tribunes, to propound vnto the people, to name ſome one to be ſent into Spaine, to commaund the army whereof Cn. Scipio had had the charge. But this was deferred vpon ſome new accident, ſo as by way of prouiſion they ſent C. Nero with twelue thouſand foot, halfe choſen out of the Ro-mane legions, and halfe of their allyes, three hundred Romane knights, and eight hundred K of the confederat townes. With which forces he paſt into Spaine, and landed at Tarracone, whereas he preſently went to field, hauing armed all the mariners, to make the greater ſhew. To him, as Propretor, and lieutenant generall for the people of Rome, T. Fontcius, and L. Martius, deliuered vp the legions, and all the forces which they had preſerued, and happily imployed after the defeat of the two Scipioes. With this armie Nero went to ſeeke out the e-nemie, who was camped at a place called Pierres noires, or Blacke ſtones, in the country of the Oretanes, betwixt the townes of Illiturgis and Mentiſa. Nero had ſeized vpon the ſtraits, and ſo preſt the enemie, as Aſdrubal for feare of a worſe accident, ſent a herauld vnto him, to offer and promiſe him, That if he would ſuffer him to goe out of thoſe paſſages, hee would breake vp his campe, and ſend his ſouldiours out of Spaine. This was pleaſing vnto Nero, L wherefore a day was appointed to conferre and capitulate betwixt the heads of the armies. At their firſt meeting there was propounded by the Romanes, That the Carthaginians ſhould deliuer vp their citadels, and at a certaine day draw their garriſons out of the townes which they held, and that they ſhould haue libertie to carrie away all that was theirs. All this being granted them, Aſdrubal gaue order in the night (whileſt that the Romanes were fed with a hope of peace) that they ſhould begin to packe away their baggage ſecretly, and to draw away that which was moſt troubleſome in the army, which way they could: yet he prouided, that few men ſhould goe out of the campe, leaſt the enemie ſhould diſcouer his fraud. The day following they entred againe into conference, where as many friuolous things were propounded, to paſſe away the day: and at night the Carthaginians did as they had M done before, ſpending many dayes after this manner, in diſputes and difficulties, and ſtill diſcharging that at night which hindered them moſt. After that they had drawne all their footmen and baggage into a place of ſafetie, there remained nothing but the horſemen and Elephants.

Anno Rome 542 C. Nero ſent Propretor into Spaine.

Aſdrubal a politique captaine, circumuents Nero.

Aſdrubal,

A Aſdrubal, as his feare decreaſed, ſo did his faith diminiſh, hauing no care to keepe that which hee had promiſed: Yet they were to meet againe one morning, when as a thicke foggie miſt had couered all the earth. Aſdrubal making vſe of this occaſion, ſent to intreat Nero to excuſe him, if he came not to the parley, for that it was a feſtiuall day with the Carthaginians, and therefore he could not with a good conſcience treat of any buſineſſe. This was well taken by Nero. In the meane time Aſdrubal through the fauour of this miſt, eſcaped with all his horſes and Elephants. The third part of the day being ſpent, the Sunne diſperſed this fog, and then the Romanes found that they were deceiued, and that the enemie was eſcaped: whereat Claudius being much grieued, began to follow him, but hee could not force him to B fight, there were onely ſome light skirmiſhes made betwixt the forerunners of the Romane armie, and the Carthaginians rereward.

Aſdrubal makes no conſcience how to deceiue his enemies.

All things ſtanding in this eſtate, Spaine remained quiet: ſuch as had forſooke the Romans after the aboue mentioned defeats, returned not; and ſuch as had continued conſtant vntill that time, reuolted not. At Rome the Senat and people were troubled to ſend a commaunder into Spaine, that were of ſuch authoritie and vertue, as he might deſerue to ſucceed the two brethren, the Scipioes. Euerie one was carefull to whom he ſhould giue his voice: and as there was much diſſenting in ſuch a choice, in the end it was decreed, that the election of him which ſhould be ſent Gouernour into Spaine, ſhould be made in a generall aſſemblie of the people, by the voyces and ſuffrages of the companies: For the which a day was appointed by
C the Conſuls. They ſuppoſed this charge would haue beene affected and ſued for, like vnto other dignities; and that ſome would preſent themſelues, and deſire to be admitted: but no man appeared: for euery one feared to go thither, where as two of the greateſt ſouldiours that were among the Romane captaines, had beene defeated and ſlaine in leſſe than thirtie daies, one after another.

The people being aſſembled at the appointed day, in great care and amazement, to ſee the magiſtrats and prime men of Rome gazing one on another, without a word ſpeaking, euerie one apprehended the ruine of their commonweale: but P. Corn. Scipio, ſonne to him that had beene ſlaine in Spaine, ſhewes himſelfe in a place ſomewhat higher than the reſt, and declares openly, That hee demaunded the gouernement. Euerie one then began to crie out
D for joy, and to ſhew him ſome ſignes of fauour, as preſaging vnto him a happie and proſperous ſucceſſe in that charge. The voyces being gathered, he was by a general conſent choſen head and Gouernour of Spaine for the people of Rome. Scipio was not then foure and twentie yeares old: wherefore after this election made, the people repented them to haue been ſo inconſiderat, as to giue ſo great a charge to ſo young a man, euerie one calling to mind the late misfortune of that houſe, and euen with horrour of his name, who was ſo neere allyed to two ſuch deſolate families; who went to make warre in a place where both his father and vncle had beene ſlaine, and euen among their ſepulchres. But Scipio finding this ſuddaine alteration, ſpake vnto them, of his age, and of the charge hee vndertooke, with ſo great an aſſurance, as hee purchaſed a good opinion with the people, and filled them all with

Great confidence of P. Corn. Scipio ſon to P. Scipio ſlain in Spaine.

People inconſiderat do often repent.

If there were euer any one among the Romans indued with ſingular vertue, and that could put it in practiſe, and make good vſe of it, from his youth, it was this Scipio, ſo as wee may rightly ſay, that he had both the apparence and effect of vertue. He was I ſay, both vertuous and an hypocrite both together, making vſe eſpecially of religion to win the peoples fauour, and the obedience of ſuch as he commanded; an vſuall policie which hath beene practiſed by the great and wiſe men of this world in all ages, ſaying, that they muſt keep the people in awe with the terrour of religion: the which were commendable, if they would adde vnto it, the title of True: and that in ſtead of making men religious, they would not draw them to ſuperſtition. Scipio did neuer begin day, but by prayers vnto his gods, faining often, that hee had viſions
F in the night, and receiued diuine commandements; and finally, that he had ſecret conference with the gods, which in his time they did worſhip at Rome. Such was the peoples opinion of his vertue, as they held him to be ſomewhat more than an ordinarie man, and they told a fable of his birth, ſomewhat like vnto that of Alexander the great: which was, That he had been ingendred of ſome god, who in the forme of a great ſerpent came & lay with his mother, and that oftentimes ſuch as entred into her chamber, had ſeen this apparition, but it vaniſhed preſently.

Scipio vertuous and hypocriticall.

The antients vſed religion to keepe the people in awe.

A fable of Scipioes birth.

He maintained himſelf in this reputation with ſuch art, as neuer any one complained that he had been deceiued by his reuelations or myracles, finding means to breed an impreſſion ther- G of in the hearts of men, without affirming or denying them directly. The people of Rome referred to the direction of a man thus qualified, and ſo young, one of the moſt important gouernments, and of the greateſt charge in their whole eſtate. At the ſame time when as he laboured for the gouernment of Spaine, Marcellus returned out of Sicile, where hee had taken Siracuſe, by the treaſon of Meric, a Spaniſh captaine, entertained by the Siracuſans. There were appointed for Scipio (beſides the forces that were in Spaine) 10000 foot, and 1000 horſe;

M. Iulius Syllanus lieutenant and counſellor to Scipio.

and there was giuen him for his lieutenant and aſſiſtant, M. Iunius Sillanus: who parting out of the mouth of Tiber with 30 galleaſſes, hauing fiue oares on a ſide, and coaſting along the H ſhore of Tuſcane and Gaule, they arriued at Empurias, at the foot of the Pyrenee hills, a Grecian towne, founded by the Phocians, where Scipio landed with his armie, the which hee led along the ſhore to Tarracone, cauſing his fleet to follow cloſe by the ſhore.

Being at Tarracone, he held a generall aſſemblie of all the confederat townes of Spaine, who ſent their deputies and embaſſadours vpon the brute of his arriuall. He laied his ſhips on ground, according to the auntient manner, and ſent backe foure Marſilian galliots, which had come to doe him honour. There hee heard the embaſſadours of the countrey, which wauered, and were amazed at the accidents paſt. And although he had a great preſumption of himſelfe, and of his vertue, yet did hee neuer let ſlip any proud ſpeech, or that was ill taken by any: but carried ſuch a majeſtie in his words, as they were forced to beleeue what I he ſaid.

Maieſtie ioyned with modeſtie in P. Scipio.

Parting from Tarracone, he went to viſit the confederat townes, and came vnto the place where as the old armie did winter; whereas he did commend the ſouldiours, that after two ſuch great defeats, they had vertuouſly defended and preſerued the prouince, not ſuffering the enemie to enjoy the fruits of his victorie, but hauing chaſed him out of the countrey on this ſide Ebro, had aſſured, and faithfully defended the friends and confederats of the people of Rome. Hee did greatly honour L. Martius, yet ſo, as he would haue the world know, that his owne glorie could not be ecclipſed by another mans. Syllanus tooke the place of C. Nero: and lodgings were appointed for the new come ſouldiours to winter in. Scipio hauing thus diſpoſed of all things, and viſited all places where his preſence was required, hee returned K to Tarracone. His fame was no leſſe among his enemies than friends, and euen now their hearts were ſeiſed with ſome feare, but could giue no reaſon for it: which was as a preſage vnto them of that which ſhould happen. The Carthaginian armies were retired into diuers places to winter. Aſdrubal ſonne to Giſgo, was lodged farre off, about Calis, neere the Ocean, Mago more into the land, aboue Caſtulo, in the ſtraits and neere foreſts: and Aſdrubal ſon to Amilcar, about Sagunt, ſomewhat neere vnto the riuer of Ebro.

13 In the beginning of the Spring, P. Scipio hauing put his gallies to ſea, and called the ſuccours of his allies to Tarracone, he commanded that both the ſhips of war and of burthen, ſhould bend their courſe towards the mouth of Ebro: thither the legions were appointed alſo to come from the places where they had wintered. Then he himſelfe parting, with 5000 L of the aſſociates, from Tarracone, came vnto the armie. There he ſpake much in commendation of the old ſouldiours, which had beene in ſo many vnfortunate encounters, incouraging them to better hopes vnder his commaund, not forgetting his fained reuelations. Hee layed before their eyes the diuiſion of the Carthaginian captaines, who kept their forces diſperſed: which was the cauſe of the defeat and ruine of his father and vncle. Finding the armie willing and reſolute, he left M. Syllanus to gard that which lies on this ſide Ebro, with 3000 foot, and 300 horſe, and he himſelf paſt on with the reſt of the armie, the which conſiſted of 25000 foot and 2500 horſe. Some were of opinion, that the enemies armies lying farre diſtant one from another, he ſhould goe and fight with the neereſt: But he thought otherwiſe; for he doubted, that whileſt he ſhould ſpend his time to draw the enemie to fight, and to ſeeke his ad- M uantages, the others would make haſt to come into thoſe parts: ſo all three armies being vnited together, he ſhould not be able to make head againſt them. Wherefore he reſolued to go and ſuddenly to beſiege new Carthage, a towne verie rich of it ſelfe, and abounding with all ſorts of prouiſion, of victuals, armes, and treaſure, which the enemies had laid vp there for the warre, and in the which the hoſtages of all the good townes and prouinces of Spaine were kept:

A kept: ſituated in a commodious place to paſſe into Africke, hauing an ample port, and capable of any great fleet, and the beſt of all that coaſt of Spaine. Yet hee did not acquaint any man liuing with this his reſolution, but onely C. Lelius, who commanded the armie at ſea, hauing giuen him charge ſo to direct his courſe, as at one inſtant they ſhould come before the towne with both armies. The ſeuenth day of their departure from the riuer of Ebro, Carthage was beſieged both by ſea and land. The campe was planted on the North ſide, and fortified with a paliſadoe. The ſituation of Carthage was after this manner. In the middeſt of that coaſt of Spaine, is a gulfe, which runnes fiue hundred paces into the land, and hath not much leſſe in breadth. The mouth of this gulfe is couered with a little iſland, which de-

B fends it from all winds, except that which carries the name of Africke, of the place from whence it comes, which we may cal Southeaſt, or Libecchio, according to the Italians. Within this gulfe there riſeth a peece of ground, almoſt like an iſland, on the which the towne is built: Which peece of ground is enuironed with the ſea on the Eaſt and South ſides, hauing towards the Weſt a mariſh, which doth couer ſome part of the North, the which is not verie ſafe, being in ſome places deeper than in others, as the ſea doth riſe and fall. A little hill joynes the towne vnto the firme land, being ſome two hundred and fiftie paces. This part was left open by Scipio, without any fortification: whether hee did it to braue the enemie, or leaue this paſſage open to make continuall courſes, and attempts vpon the towne, and then to haue his retreat eaſie. Hee alſo planted his gallies within the port, ſeeming as if hee

C would alſo beſiege the towne by ſea: giuing charge vnto the captaines to be watchfull, and to ſtand vpon their gards: For in the beginning of a ſiege, he that is ſhut vp doth moſt commonly make greateſt ſallies.

Silence required in a great captaine.

C. Lelius Generall of the gallies

The ſituation of new Carthage.

Hauing therefore prouided for all things neceſſarie for a ſiege, he then reſolued to impart his deſigne vnto his ſouldiors, and to ſhew them the reaſons which had mooued him to begin warre by a ſiege: and to perſuade them, that it was eaſie to take it ſuddenly, whileſt their forces were farre off. Hee ſhewed them, That new Carthage was of ſuch conſequence, as the taking thereof would conquer all Spaine for the Romanes: by reaſon of the hoſtages of the princes, potentates, townes, and commonweales of the countrey, which were kept there: the which being taken, the enemie, who had not any but mercinarie ſouldiours

D (which muſt alwayes haue money) would ſoone bee abandoned by their men: for that the money appointed for their pay, was within the towne, in the which the Carthaginians made their treaſurie, the magazine for their victuals, and for all ſorts of munitions and engines: All which things, ſaid hee, the towne being taken, will come into our hands, and the enemie ſhall bee left naked of all meanes to make warre. We on the other ſide, ſhall be furniſhed of all things neceſſarie, but aboue all, wee ſhall get a good towne, and commodious port, to receiue all things whereof wee ſhall haue need, as well by ſea as land: yea we ſhall haue an eaſie paſſage into Africke, if it be needfull to go thither.

He made ſo liuely an impreſſion of the opportunitie, profit, and eaſineſſe of the ſiege and enterpriſe, as they began to crie, that he ſhould lead them to the aſſault, the which he did pre-

E ſently. Mago commanded within the towne, who ſeeing that they prepared to come vnto an aſſault, gaue order on his ſide to withſtand their furie. He aſſured himſelfe of the caſtle for his retreat, putting fiue hundred ſouldiours into it, and as many vpon a high ground within the towne, on the Eaſt ſide. He appointed two thouſand ſouldiours to make a furious ſally vpon the enemie, and the reſt of the multitude were put in conuenient places to ſuccor where need ſhould require. Theſe Carthaginians opening their gates, iſſued out vpon the Romans, comming to the aſſault, and ſtaied them, wher as the fight was long doubtfull: but the Romanes hauing ſtill freſh ſupplies, the Carthaginians were in the end forced to turne their backes, in ſuch feare and diſorder, as, if they had beene eagerly purſued, they had entred pell mell with them into the towne, in the which the tumult and confuſion was no leſſe, than

F in the fight: for many of them left their gards for feare, as if the towne had beene taken. Scipio obſeruing what was done, and watching all occaſions from an eminent place, ſeeing the walles abandoned in ſome places, hee put all his armie in battaile, commaunding them to march towards the towne with their ladders. He himſelfe being couered with ſome ſoldiours that were well armed, goes among the troupes, to encourage them, and to be an eye witneſſe of the valor & cowardiſe of euery one. The wals were again furniſht with ſoldiors by the diligence of Mago, wherefore the ſouldiours comming to the aſſault, were entertained with G a ſhower of darts and arrowes which fell vpon them, more vpon their flanks than in afront:

beſides the wall towards the firme land, was very high. Notwithſtanding the ſouldiors animated by their Generals preſence, and with a deſire to vanquiſh and ſpoile, planted their ladders of all ſides, and mounted couragiouſly, ſtriuing who ſhould get firſt to the top of the wal.
But many of the ladders, being ouer-laden with the multitude, brake, and they fell into the ditch; beſides moſt of them were too ſhort. They gaue an aſſault in like manner towards the ſea, but with more amazement than danger, and of euerie ſide there was more brute than effect: ſo as for this time the Romans were repulſt, which gaue courage vnto the enemies, and hope they ſhould be able to keepe the towne; perſuading themſelues, they were out of ſcala- H doe, and that their armies ſhould haue time ynough to come and ſuccour them. But Scipio, who was reſolued to take this towne, did not ſuffer them to continue long in this errour: for as ſoone as he had cauſed them which had giuen the firſt aſſault to retire, being wearie and wounded, he made other freſh ſouldiours to aduance againſt the towne, to renew the aſſault, taking the ladders from their companions. He had beene aduertiſed by fiſhermen of Tarra-cone, which were in his campe, and who had waded through the mariſhes on the Weſt ſide of the towne, That there was no great ſtore of water along the wall, when the tyde was ſpent, and that it was eaſie to goe to the foot of it: and withall had obſerued, that on that ſide the wall was but low, ill rampared and fortified, and without gards, for that they aſſured themſelues of this ſtil water. Wherfore vpon the ebbe, and a ſtrong Northerly wind, which draue I out the water, it was eaſie to wade through: he embraced this occaſion, and ſent ſome troups thither, ſhewing them the eaſie acceſſe; ſaying, That the gods did inuite them, and aſſure their paſſage, cauſing the ſea to retire, whereby they might take the towne, as it fell out: For finding no man to reſiſt them, whileſt that all were buſie in other places, where as they feared moſt, they entred into the towne, and marched directly towards the port where as the combate was hotteſt, where they were ſooner felt than heard; and the enemies were charged both in front and in flanke, before they knew that the towne was taken: ſo as the number increaſing ſtill, one helping another ouer the wall, euerie one ſought to ſaue himſelfe, and not any New Carthage taken. one made any more reſiſtance. Wherefore the gate being broken, and an entrie made for the armie, they entred in battaile into the towne, with their commaunders and enſignes, and ſei- K ſed vpon the chiefe places. Thoſe which had paſt ouer the walls, made a great ſlaughter of the inhabitants. The Carthaginian ſouldiours retired themſelues into two forts, the one was to that high peece of ground aboue mentioned, on the Eaſt part of the towne, garded by fiue hundred ſouldiours, and the other was the caſtle, which Mago had reſerued. The mount being aſſailed by a part of the Romane armie, was preſently forced: Soone after Mago ſeeing there was no more hope, hauing made ſome reſiſtance, yeelded the fort alſo, and all that was within it. Vntill that time the Romanes ſlew all they met aboue foureteene yeares of age:
but the caſtle being yeelded, they were commaunded to ceaſe from killing: then they began
The number of the priſoners taken at Carthage to fall to the ſpoile, which was verie great, where they had ten thouſand priſoners, all men of free condition. Thoſe that were naturall citizens were ſet free, and the towne reſtored vnto L them, and all that was found belonging vnto them. There were alſo found about two thouſand artiſans, whom Scipio adjudged to the publique of the people of Rome, giuing them hope of ſpeedie libertie, if they carried themſelues like good men, and did imploy themſelues valiantly in the warres. With the reſt of the youth which was able and ſtrong, he furniſhed his gallies: and encreaſed his armie at ſea, with eight gallies taken from the enemie. Be-ſides this multitude, there was found within the fort the Spaniſh hoſtages, whom hee treated Scipio intreats the Spaniſh hoſtages kindly. as honourably as if they had beene allyed to the people of Rome. Thus this wiſe Generall by his mildneſſe and humanitie woon the hearts of the people, with more honor, and much leſſe paine and daunger, than if he would haue forced them by armes, the which notwithſtanding he could well employ at need. The engines to batter and defend townes and forts, were infi- M nit: there were threeſcore and fourteene enſignes taken: the gold and ſiluer was carried to the Generall: there were two hundred threeſcore and ſixteen cups of gold, euery one weighing a pound; and in ſiluer coined eighteene thouſand and three hundred pounds weight, with great ſtore of ſiluer plate. All which things were deliuered by weight to C. Flaminius the treaſurer. Beſides, there was found 40000 buſhels of wheat, and 270000 of barley. There were

A taken within the port an hundred and thirteene ſhippes of burthen, whereof many were ſtill laden with armes, corne, ſiluer, yron, cloth, ſtuffe to make ropes, and other things for the vſe of ſhippes: ſo as in regard of the ſpoyle, the towne of Carthage was eſteemed of leaſt value.

14 The heat and furie of the ſouldiours being paſt, and Scipio in quiet poſſeſſion of the towne, without any contradiction, the ſame day leauing the towne in gard to Caius Lelius, with the ſouldiors of his gallies and mariners, he brought backe the Armie and Legions to their campe, very much tyred with ſo many exploits of warre which they had done in one day: for they had fought hand to hand in field, had giuen an aſſault, and taken the towne with
B extreame paine and danger, and that being taken, they had been ſtill forced to fight with great diſaduantage againſt them that held the caſtle: wherefore he ſuffered them to reſt vntill the next day, when as he cauſed the whole armie both of ſea and land to aſſemble, thanking firſt of all the gods, who not onely had deliuered into their hands the richeſt towne of all Spaine, but had gathered together in it as it were a ſpoyle of all that was precious in Spaine and Africke; ſo as their enemies were left naked of all things, and they were abundantly furniſhed with ſuperfluitie. Then did he publikely acknowledge the valour of his ſouldiors, commending ſuch as had done their duties, according to euery mans vertue and reſolution, where-
C with they had repulſed the enemies, who had ſallied out ſo furiouſly againſt them; and notwithſtanding the height of their wals, the dangers of vnknowne paſſages in the moores, and the munition of their forts and citadels, they had paſt all, and ſurmounted all obſtacles. Wherefore although he knew that all deſerued much, yet it was expedient to haue an eſpeciall regard to thoſe that had firſt mounted vp the wals, and therefore he commaunded they ſhould ſhew themſelues. There were two ſouldiors which pretended this honour to be due vnto them: it was a crowne of gold made with battlements, which the cuſtome and auncient militarie order of the Romanes did giue vnto him that mounted firſt vp the enemies walls. One of theſe was Q. Trebellius, a Centenier of the firſt Legion; and the other, Sextus Digitius, a ſouldior of the ſea armie; who (as it happeneth often) had put the whole armie into factions, either being ſupported by them of his ranke. C. Lelius maintained them of the fleet, and D M. Sempronius Turditanus the Legionaries; which contention had almoſt bred a mutinie, but Scipio gaue them arbitrators, which were the two abouenamed, and P. Cornelius Caudinus for a third, who ſhould examine the cauſe, and informe him. Notwithſtanding, after they had taken from them theſe men of reſpect, who ſhould be judges in ſtead of ſupporters, the diſorder grew greater: for although they ſeemed partiall, yet they did reſtraine the violent paſſions of both parties, rather than maintaine them: which C. Lelius perceiuing, leauing the aſſembly, he went and informed Scipio, that this buſineſſe was handled without modeſtie, order, or reaſon, and that they were like to fall to armes: and although they proceeded not ſo farre, yet was it diſhoneſt and a very bad example, that honour due to vertue ſhould be ſought in that manner by corruption and falſe witneſſes: for on the one ſide the Legionaries, and on the other the mariners, offered to ſweare what they would haue them, not knowing the truth, E nor conſidering that in ſo doing they made themſelues guiltie of perjurie, and did draw the puniſhment of that crime not onely vpon their owne heads, but vpon the whole armie, and on the Romane Enſignes and Eagles, violating and contemning in this manner the reuerence of an oath: Hee aduertiſed him of theſe things by the aduice of Cornelius and Sempronius, the two other arbitrators. Scipio gaue him thankes, and did much commend him for it: wherefore hauing called the ſouldiours together, he let them vnderſtand, That he was duly informed, how that Q. Trebellius and Sext. Digitius were the firſt that mounted vp the wals of Carthage, and the one as ſoone as the other, and therefore in witneſſe of their vertues he did honour either of them with a murall crowne. And thus he wiſely pacified a great ſeditiOn among the ſouldiors, and did auoid a deteſtable profanation of all religion; the which F was of great conſequence among the Romanes, who were no leſſe deſirous, that the world ſhould be as well conceited of their pietie and juſtice, as of their valour. He afterwards rewarded euery one according to his merits, and among others, Lelius Generall of the armie at ſea, to whom he did as great honor as he would haue done vnto himſelfe, giuing him a crowne of gold, and thirtie oxen. Hee cauſed all the hoſtages of Spaine to be brought before him, which were found in new Carthage, to whom he ſpake courteouſly, giuing them good hope, and

Scipio ſeekes to win the Spaniards hearts by his great bountie. to conſtraine them by feare or force; and had rather haue other nations for their faithfull companions, than to ſubdue by an odious ſeruitude. He cauſed the names of the Townes and Communalties of Spaine to bee giuen him in a Liſt, and enquired of the number of priſoners of either of them, to whom he ſent meſſengers, willing them to come and receiue their owne. If at that time there were any embaſſadours of any of thoſe places within his campe, hee preſently cauſed theirs to be deliuered vnto him. C. Flaminius Treaſurer generall had the charge of the reſt, with commaundement to entreat them well. Whileſt theſe things were in hand, a Spaniſh Ladie, who was very old, ſtept out of the troupe of H
A Spaniſh ladie having honor in recommendation hoſtages, and caſt her ſelfe at Scipioes feet: ſhee was wife to Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, Lord of the Ilergetes: beſeeching him to giue eſpeciall charge vnto the gards, to entreat the women well and honeſtly: To whom Scipio anſwered, That they ſhould not want any thing: But (ſayth ſhe) it is not the feare of any want that maketh me thus carefull: for what doth not ſuffice them that are in our eſtate? I feare another thing; it is the youth of thoſe that are about me, whom I ſee in danger to receiue diſgrace: as for me, my age doth free me from that misfortune. There were about her the daughters of Indibilis, and manie others of great houſes, very faire, and in the flower of their ages, which honoured this Ladie as their mother. Then Scipio with a noble and vertuous courage anſwered thus: Truely, the diſcipline which I haue learned among the Romanes, and which I obſerue, doth admoniſh me, I that whatſoeuer is held worthie of reſpect in any part of the world, ſhould not bee violated or

Then they brought vnto him a young virgine a priſoner, fit to be married, and ſo exceeding faire, as ſhe drew vnto her the eyes of all that beheld her. Scipio enquired of whence, and what parents ſhe was of? Among other things he vnderſtood, That ſhe was promiſed to a young Nobleman of the Celtiberians, called Allucius: He cauſed her to be carefully kept; and ſent K vnto the virgines parents, and to her future husband, that they ſhould come vnto him: who being arriued, he ſpake vnto this yong man (whom he knew to be exceedingly paſſioned with loue) vſing a more artificiall ſpeech vnto him than hee did vnto the virgines parents.

I am (ſayd hee) young, and ſo are you, wherefore my deſire is, that wee conferre more freely together: Your Spouſe being brought before mee by our ſouldiours, and vnderſtanding that you loued her with great affection, I did eaſily beleeue it, ſeeing her beautie: for if it were lawfull for me to ſeeke the pleaſures which youth demaunds, and that my mind and thoughts were wife: wherefore I fauour yours as much as I may. Your Spouſe hath beene kept here with mee with ſuch honour and reſpect, as if ſhee had beene with her father and mother, and hath beene garded to make a pure and abſolute preſent vnto you, worthie of my qualitie and yours. I demaund onely in recompence of this gift, that you will be a friend to the people of Rome, and if you thinke me thereby to be an honeſt and a good man, ſuch as they of this countrey haue heretofore knowne my deceaſed father and vncle to haue beene, know that there are many ſuch in the citie of Rome; and remember, that there is not any nation vpon the earth, whoſe hatred you and yours ſhould more ſeeke to auoid, and to ſeeke their friendſhip, than ours.

This vnexpected fauor, the which could not be comprehended nor equalled by any recompence or thanks, held this Spaniard ſeized with joy and ſhame: who taking Scipio by the right M hand, prayed all the gods to requite the great fauour he had done him, ſeeing he found himſelfe inſufficient to make any ſatisfaction as he deſired. Then were the virgins parents called, who ſeeing their daughter alreadie freed without any ranſome, entreated Scipio very earneſtly to receiue the gold which they had brought to redeeme her, which was of a good quantitie, ſaying, they would hold it for a great grace, that he had preſerued their daughter vndefiled.

Scipio

A Scipio being much importuned by them, was content to pleaſe them: whereby hee cauſed theſe preſents to be brought before him, and hauing called for Allucius, hee ſayd vnto him: Beſides that which you are to receiue of your father in law in dowrie with your wife, take this preſent from me, commaunding him to carrie this gold away with him. Allucius hauing receiued theſe honours and preſents from Scipio, he returned joyfull and content to his houſe, filling the whole countrey with his prayſe and merits: and in truth it was an act as generous, liberall, chaſt, and religious, as hath beene in the memorie of any age done by a Pagan in his youth and vigour, and who had commaundement and ſoueraigne power in that behalfe ouer the enemie; but it may be it was not without ambition, nor humane conſi-
B derations. Scipio addes liberalitie to his continencie.

There was a bruit throughout all Spaine, That there was a young man come like vnto a god, who ſurmounted all things, as well by force of armes, as by his courteſie and bountie: wherefore Allucius hauing made a leuie of his friends and vaſſales, came within few dayes vnto Scipio, being accompanied with foureteene hundred horſe, to doe him and the people of Rome ſeruice. Vertue giues to euery one his due reward.

Scipio after hee had ſtayed C. Lelius with him ſome dayes, to diſpoſe of the hoſtages, the ſpoyle, and all other things with his aduice and counſell, he ſent him to Rome with a galeaſſe, and Mago with him, who was late Gouernour of new Carthage, and about fifteene Senators priſoners, to bee meſſengers and aſſured witneſſes of his victorie. During his abode at Car-
C thage, he exerciſed his ſouldiors in all exerciſes fit for the warres, as well by land as ſea. The firſt day he cauſed the Legions to run armed foure myles together, which makes a league: the next day he made them to ſcoure their armes before their tents: the third day they fought in forme of battaile with poles and darts blunted: the fourth day they reſted, and the fifth they ran againe with their armes. Thus he did employ his ſouldiors during his abode at Carthage. The mariners did exerciſe themſelues in rowing vp and downe in their gallies, and made ſea fights to trie the ſwiftneſſe of their gallies. Theſe things were done without the wals of the towne, to faſhion their minds and bodies to all warlike exerciſes: but within Carthage there was nothing but preparation to armes, the Generall being carefull to ſee all things himſelfe in perſon. Sometimes he went aboord the gallies, ſometimes he ran with the D Legionaries, ſometimes he went to viſit the workmen in the Port and Arſenall, vſing incredible care and diligence. Hauing thus prouided for all things neceſſarie, repaired the breaches of the towne, and manned it with good ſouldiours, he went to Tarracone. In the end the deputies of many townes of Spaine came vnto him, where he had aſſigned an aſſembly for all the allies of the people of Rome, as well old as new, whither came many deputies on this ſide Ebro, and ſome beyond it. Militarie exerciſes done by Scipio. The care and diligence of a good Generall.

The Captaines and Commaunders of the Carthaginians did what they could to conceale the loſſe of Carthage; and when as they found it was generally knowne, they ſought with good words to repaire their loſſe, ſaying, it was but a towne loſt, ſurpriſed by a young man, who perſuaded himſelfe, that he had thereby woon all: but when he ſhould ſee three great
E captaines and three victorious armies approach, he would abate his pride, and remember the miſerable end of his houſe. This they bruited among the people, yet knew they that the loſſe of Carthage had much weakened their forces. The Carthaginians diſſemble their loſſe.

The 34 day after that Lelius was parted from Carthage, he arriued at Rome with his priſoners, to the great contentment of the people. The next day hee deliuered vnto the Senate what had beene done in Spaine; the towne of new Carthage (the chiefe of the whole countrey) taken in one day, and many townes which were reuolted, returned again to the Romans, and many others receiued into a new league; the which was verified by the priſoners anſweres. The Romans aboue all things feared Aſdrubals paſſage: for they had worke ynough to reſiſt Hannibal alone. Lelius was ſent backe into Spaine in the ſame veſſell which had F brought him.

The yeare following, when as Qu. Fab. Max. for the fifth time, and Qu. Fulv. Flacc. for the fourth time were Conſuls of Rome. Scipio hauing ſpent all the Winter to win the hearts of this barbarous nation, ſome by preſents, others in deliuering them their hoſtages and priſoners, Edeſco a famous captaine among the Spaniards came vnto him: His wife and children were with the Romanes, the which was partly the cauſe of his reuolt: and withall, he found Ann. Roma 544 all the Spaniards to affect the Romanes, and to abandon the Carthaginians, as Indibilis G and Mandonius did, who were then the greateſt noblemen in Spaine, and were diuided from Aſdrubals campe, lodging with their troupes on the ſides of certaine hils, from whence their paſſage was ſafe and eaſie vnto the Romanes. Aſdrubal finding this disfauour in the Carthaginians affaires, reſolued to hazard a battaile, before they were quite abandoned by their allies; and Scipio on the other ſide demaunded nothing more: for beſides the happie ſucceſſe of his enterpriſes, which puft him vp, he thought it more expedient to fight, thinking it more ſafe to charge Aſdrubal alone, than to ſtay vntill the other two Commanders and armies were joyned with him. Notwithſtanding all this, he had prouided for all euents, if he ſhould be forced to fight with many: for ſeeing that all the coaſt of Spaine H was cleere from the Carthaginian gallies, and therefore hauing no vſe of his, hee diſarmed them at Tarracone, and put both the ſouldiors and mariners among his Legions, and thereby did much encreaſe his armie: for he had found wherewithall to arme them within Carthage, beſides the armes which hee cauſed to be daily made. With this reſolution he departed from Tarracone, after the returne of Caius Lelius, without whoſe aduice Scipio did not attempt any matter of conſequence, and croſſing a great countrey, hee found all things quiet and fauourable for his armie: vpon the way he encountred Mandonius and Indibilis, who came to meet him with their troupes. Indibilis ſpake vnto Scipio for them all, not raſhly or fooliſhly, after the manner of the Barbarians, but with great grauitie, modeſtie, and pertinent reaſons, rather excuſing than glorifying themſelues, that they were I come vnto him, leauing the Carthaginians partie; letting him vnderſtand, That they did it not lightly, or vpon the firſt occaſion: for they knew well, that the name of reuolt was execrable among old allies, and alwaies ſuſpect vnto new, by the generall cuſtome of all nations, the which (ſayd he) I doe not diſallow, ſo as the hatred which is borne vnto ſuch men, be grounded vpon the cauſe, and not meerely vpon the name of reuolt. Afterwards he made a diſcourſe of that which they had done for the Carthaginians, and of the pride, couetouſneſſe, ingratitude, and wrongs which had beene done vnto them by their ſouldiors; proteſting, that for theſe conſiderations they had long before reſolued to addreſſe themſelues vnto the Romanes, with whom they thought that juſtice and reſpect had place, although their perſons were in the Carthaginians armies. Moreouer he ſayd, That they K had recourſe vnto the gods by prayers, who neuer ſuffer the violences and inſolencies of men vnpuniſhed; and they entreated Scipio not to eſteeme them leſſe for their retreat vnto him, nor to value them more, but that he ſhould hereafter vſe them according to their merits, and according to the zeale and affection hee ſhould find in them. Scipio anſwered, That he would doe ſo, and that he did not eſteeme them rebels, which held not themſelues tied to any alliances made with men, which make no account of any diuine or humane lawes; commaunding, that their wiues and children ſhould be preſently deliuered vnto them: which was a pleaſing and acceptable gift vnto theſe Spaniards. The next day Scipio hauing taken their oathes, and contracted with them, he ſent them into their countries, to make new leuies of men: afterwards, by the direction of theſe noblemen of Spaine, the Romane armie went to L meet with the enemie.

Mandonius and Indibilis reuolt vnto the Romans

In reuolts the cauſe and not the name is to be regarded.

It is no rebellion to leaue them which deſpiſe God and nature.

• Aſdrubal was come to lodge his campe neere vnto Becula, a towne or riuer (for in this point the Authors are doubtfull, it may be it was both) beyond the riuer of Ebro, and had ſet gards and ſentinels on horſebacke vpon the approches; the which were at the firſt charged by the fore-runners, and by them of the Romane fore-ward; who made ſo ſmall reſiſtance, as they might eaſily judge, how much the two parties did differ in courage. Theſe horſemen made a ſpeedie retreat towards their campe, being purſued by the Romanes, who carried their colours euen vnto the enemies trenches and rampiers; and hauing that day onely quickened their courages a little, they planted their campe. In the night Aſdrubal remooued his armie vnto the ſide of a hill, where there was a large plaine, hauing a riuer be- M hind him, and on either ſide ſteepe craggie rockes. This place commaunded another plaine, the which had alſo a ſteepe deſcent round about it, the which was hard to mount vnto. Aſdrubal ſeeing the Romane armie in battaile in this lower plaine, he ſent downe the Numidian horſemen, the ſouldiors of Maiorca, which were lightly armed, and the Africanes. Scipio went from ranke to ranke to encourage his men, telling them, That the enemie fled the fight, and Aſdrubal comes towards the Romanes.

Scipio encourageth his armie to fight.

A and durſt not come downe to battaile, but ſought places of ſtrength, as one that had no confidence in his vertue, nor armes: wherefore they ſhould remember, that the walls of Carthage (which were much higher than thoſe rampiers) could not hinder their entrie, and that there was no obſtacle could repulſe the vertue of the Romanes. To what end ſhall thoſe high clyffes where they are lodged, ſerue? but to make them haue the greater fals when you ſhall chaſe them, and they flye to ſaue themſelues; but I will ſtop that paſſage: and thus he encouraged his ſouldiours. Hee then ſent two companies, the one to ſeize vpon the ſtrait of the valley by the which the riuer did run, and the other to keepe the way, by the which they came from the town by the vallies and paſſages of thoſe hils into the open field. Then he led the moſt actiue
B and light ſouldiours, which had the day before broken the enemies gards, directly to them which were vpon the edge of the firſt plaine. When they began to mount, they found no other hinderance but the roughneſſe of the way, but when they came to approch within the reach of their darts, they were preſently entertained with a ſhower of arrowes, darts, and ſtones, whereof the ſouldiors and horſe-boyes had abundance in that place. Although the place were hard to aſcend, and the Romanes much galled with their darts, yet thoſe which had beene accuſtomed to the aſſaults of townes, growing obſtinat againſt all oppoſition, in He chargeth the enemie. the end got vp; then was the chance turned: for as ſoone as the Romanes could get any ſure footing, and come to handie blowes with the enemie (where they were not ſo expert as in running and leaping) they were ſoone diſlodged, and chaſed with great ſlaughter vpon their
C owne battaile, which ſtood in order vpon the hill. Then Scipio hauing commaunded his victorious ſouldiors to purſue and to charge this battaillon in the middeſt couragiouſly, he diuided the reſt of his troupes betwixt himſelfe and Lelius, whom he commanded to compaſſe in that little hill on the right ſide, and to ſeeke ſome eaſie way to get vp vnto it, and he in the meane time went and charged the enemies vpon the flanke, who were much amazed and troubled, thinking to turne the head of their battaile againſt the Romanes, whoſe cryes they heard on euery ſide, when as ſuddainely Lelius came vpon them: ſo, as being preſt on all ſides, they were ſoone diſordered, they themſelues opening their rankes, to giue paſſage to their Aſdrubal and the Carthaginian armie defeated by Scipio. companions which fled, hauing no meanes to retyre in good order, in a place which was ſo ſtrait and of ſuch diſaduantage. Here there was a great ſlaughter made, and it preuailed lit-
D tle to flye: for the gards which were ſet by Scipio vpon the paſſages, ſtayed them; yea, the multitude was partly ſtayed by the Captaines and Commaunders, to ſaue the baggage, whileſt the reſt did fight: beſides, their Elephants being terrified, were as hurtfull to them as to the Romanes. There died eight thouſand of the Carthaginian armie. Aſdrubal ſtayed not to the end of the battaile, but hauing ſent ſome of the Elephants before with his ſiluer, he retyred almoſt in the beginning of the fight, following the riuer of Tayo, vntill hee got vnto the mountaines, where hee gathered them together that fled. Scipio ſeized vpon the enemies campe, and gaue all the ſpoyle vnto the ſouldiors, except the priſoners of free condition, whereof there were ten thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; among the which, Scipio ſeekes to win the Spaniards by his bountie. ſuch as were Spaniards were ſet free without ranſon, and ſent home to their houſes: the E Africanes were deliuered to the Treaſurer to be ſold. The Spaniards which were in the Romane armie, as well thoſe that were before yeelded, as priſoners, rejoycing at the happineſſe of this victorie, honoured with his bountie, running about Scipioes lodging, began to ſalute him with the title of King; but he let them vnderſtand, that he was not pleaſed therewith: wherefore hauing enjoyned them to ſilence by a trumpet, he ſayd vnto them: That he held himſelfe ſufficiently honoured to bee called by his ſouldiours by that name which the Romanes in their tongue gaue vnto their Generall; which was, Imperator, as one would ſay, he that commaunds an Armie, which was a great title for him. As for the name of a King, it may be it was eſteemed among other Nations, but the Romanes could not endure it: yet hee had a royall heart, and if they found ſuch a diſpoſition to be worthie of reſpect, they ſhould be content to thinke ſo, and vſe no Scipio as a Roman deteſts the title of a King.
F more that word of King. The Barbarians did obſerue an admirable greatneſſe of courage in Scipio, that being ſeated in ſo high a degree, yet hee contemned the title which all other men doe ſo highly eſteeme. After this, he beſtowed preſents vpon the noblemen of Spaine, and gaue three hundred horſes to Indibilis, ſuch as he would chuſe of thoſe which had beene taken.

As

As they were ſelling of the Africane priſoners, by the Generals commaund, there was a goodly young ſtripling, whom the Treaſurer (hearing that he was royally deſcended) ſent to Scipio: being demaunded by Scipio, What he was, and of whence, and why he followed armes being ſo young? he anſwered with teares, That he was a Numidian, and that his name was Maſſiua, who being left an Orphan, retyred to Gala king of the Numidians, his grandfather by the mothers ſide, and there had beene bred vp, and had followed his vncle Maſſiniſſa, who came lately into Spaine to ſuccour the Carthaginians with ſome bands of horſe: That before that time hee had neuer beene in any combat, for that his vncle reſtrained him, by reaſon of his tender age: but the day of the laſt charge he had ſtolne from him, and hauing found meanes to recouer horſe and armes, he had thruſt himſelfe into the battaile with the reſt, where he had beene ouerthrowne by the default of his horſe, and was taken by the Romanes. Scipio commaunded, that this Numidian ſhould be kept, vntill hee had finiſhed that which concerned the publicke. Being afterwards retyred to his tent, he ſent for him againe, and asked him if he would returne to his vncle; who anſwered with great ſignes of joy, That he would be very glad. Then Scipio hauing giuen him a gold ring, a rich embrodered robe, a caſſocke after the Spaniſh faſhion, with a claſpe of gold; and hauing mounted him vpon a good horſe, with rich furniture, he ſent him away, giuing him certaine knights to conduct him where hee pleaſed. Theſe things being thus paſt, as they conſulted among the Romanes touching the affaires of the warre, many were of opinion, That he ſhould purſue Aſdrubal; yet Scipio was content to place a garriſon in the ſtraits and paſſages of the mountaines, employing all the reſt of the Summer to win the Spaniards by gifts and other fauours, receiuing many into the alliance and protection of the people of Rome.

17 In the meane time the two other captaines Mago and Aſdrubal ſonne to Giſgo came into baſe Spaine, to joyne with Aſdrubal Barcinien, ſomewhat too late after his deſeat, but very fitly to conſult of their affaires. They ſaw the Spaniards were daily practiſed to reuolt, and that the Carthaginians ſhould not be able to hold any one place in Spaine, if they did not ſpeedily preuent it. Aſdrubal of Giſgo relyed much vpon the Spaniards which dwelt along the Ocean, and about Gadiz, whereas the Romanes had not yet beene: but the other two did foreſee that the Romanes bountie would corrupt them as well as the reſt; aſſuring themſelues, that there was not any Communaltie, nor priuat man in Spaine, which began not to wauer, and would neuer ceaſe to reuolt, if they did not vſe one meanes to preuent it: which was, That Aſdrubal Barcinien ſhould gather together all the Spaniards he could, and lead them into Italie, as it had beene formerly concluded: and by this means Spaine ſhould be diſarmed of her owne forces, and more eaſily kept in awe by feare; and as for their armies, they would ſupply them with other ſouldiors: and therefore they were of opinion, That Mago ſhould leaue his troupes to Aſdrubal Giſgo, and paſſe ſpeedily into the Iſlands of Maiorca and Minorca, with ſtore of treaſure, to make good leuies of that nation: In the meane time Aſdrubal of Giſgo ſhould retyre into the fartheſt bounds of the Luſitanians, to auoid all occaſion of fighting with the enemie: That Maſſiniſſa with three thouſand horſe choſen out of all the bands, ſhould ſpoyle the enemies countrey on this ſide the riuer of Ebro, and ſuccour their friends and faithfull allies. Theſe things being concluded by the Carthaginian captains, were preſently put in execution.

The Carthaginians reſolue to carry all the Spaniſh ſoldiors out of Spaine, to preuent reuolts.

In the eleuenth yeare of the ſecond Punicke warre, M. Marcellus and T. Quintius Criſpinus being created Conſuls at Rome, the gouernments of Spaine were confirmed for another yeare to P. Cor. Scipio and to M. Sillanus. The ſea Armie in Spaine being eightie gallyes, as well of thoſe which came out of Italie, as were taken at Carthage, were reduced vnto thirtie by a decree of the Senate, commaunding Scipio to ſend fiftie into Sardinia, as well for the defence of that Iſland, as of Italie, by reaſon of the great preparation which was made in Africke, whereas they ſaid the Carthaginians did arme two hundred ſayle, to come vpon the coaſt of Italie. This yeare Spaine was ſomewhat quiet, Aſdrubal thinking onely of his voyage into Italie, and to prepare his armie, wherein he vſed exceeding great diligence, vntill he had paſſed the Pyrenees. Being entred into Gaule with great ſtore of treaſure, hee leuied ſouldiors of that nation, and aſſured his paſſage by the Alpes; the which did much trouble the Romanes: for they had then worke ynough to make head againſt Hannibal: but the wiſe-

A dome of C. Nero and M. Liuius, the new Conſuls for the yeare following, freed them of that care: who by an aduenturous, but a neceſſarie ſtratageme of warre, whileſt they kept Hannibal play in Apulia, defeated and ſlew Aſdrubal, neere vnto Senegaille, with almoſt all the Spaniards, Gaules, and Ligurians, whereof his army conſiſted: a defeat which did recompence that of Canes, yet was it not without great effuſion of bloud on the Romanes ſide, who loſt aboue 8000 men. Yet this did aſſure their eſtate, which vntill that time had beene in great danger; and Hannibal vpon the newes of his brothers death, began to diſtruſt his owne good ſucceſſe and his countries.

Aſdrubal and his armie defeated in Italie.

Spaine during Aſdrubals preparation, and a while after his paſſage into Italie, had ſome reſt
B from warre, but they fell ſoone againe to armes. At that time Aſdrubal, ſonne to Giſgo, kept about the Iſland of Gades, and in the Weſt marches, neere vnto the Ocean. The Romanes commaunded all along the Mediterranean ſea, and held all that part of Spaine which lies towards the Eaſt. In the place of Aſdrubal Barcinien they had ſent Hanno from Carthage, with a new armie; who hauing paſſed the ſea, joyned with Mago. Theſe two had leuied among the Celtiberians (which is in the middeſt of Spaine) great troupes of ſouldiors, in a ſhort ſpace. Scipio ſent M. Syllanus againſt this armie with 10000 foot and 500 horſe; who making great marches, by difficult and ſtrait paſſages, which are ordinarie in Spaine, he approched by the meanes of certaine Celtiberian guides (who had changed their partie) neere vnto the enemy, before they had any newes of him, being alſo aduertiſed by the ſame Celtiberians, when hee
C came within two leagues of them, that vpon the way hee ſhould encounter two of their campes; that of Celtiberians, newly leuied, on the left hand, being ſome 9000 men; and the other of Carthaginians, on the right hand. As for theſe, they obſerued good diſcipline, kept their gards, and had their ſentinels placed in good order; but the others regarded it not, but were ſecure and careleſſe, like new ſouldiors: who thinking themſelues at home, apprehended nothing that was to be feared. Wherefore Syllanus marched firſt towards them, cauſing his troupes to goe on the left hand, as cloſely as they could, leaſt the Carthaginians in the other lodging ſhould diſcouer him. Then he ſent forth ſome to diſcouer the enemies countenance, and marched ſpeedily after them. He was now within leſſe than halfe a league, before the enemie had any notice of his comming: for he went by broken wayes and deepe vallies
D full of trees, where he fed his armie: there they returned vnto him, whom he had ſent forth to diſcouer, who confirmed that which the reuolted Spaniards had deliuered vnto him. Then the Romanes (leauing their baggage vpon the place) put themſelues in battaile, and marched againſt the enemies, whom they found in great amazement, ſeeing the Romane armie ſo neere. Mago, who was in the other campe, poſted thither vpon the firſt bruit, to put them in defence. There were ſome 4000 good ſouldiours among the Celtiberians, carrying targuets, and 200 horſe, the which were ſet in the front, and the reſt to ſecond them were lightly armed; and in this manner they came to fight. They were ſcarce come without their rampiers, when as the Romanes caſt their darts at them, but the Spaniards ſtooped to auoid them: then riſing ſuddainely againe, they caſt theirs againſt the Romanes, who ſtanding
E cloſe, and couered with their targuets, defended themſelues from any harme; but approaching neerer, they came to the ſword. The place where they did fight was of great aduantage for the Celtiberians, by reaſon of the vneuenneſſe, whoſe cuſtome was to skirmiſh with leapes and jumpes, contrarie to the Romanes, who fight cloſe, and ſtand firme: and therefore this vneuen ground did not much trouble them, but that they were ſometimes conſtrained to breake their rankes, by reaſon of the ſtraits and little groues, wherewith the countrey is full, fighting ſometimes one to one, and two to two; the which did alſo hinder the enemies from flying, and expoſed them to the ſlaughter. All thoſe of the fore-ward which carried targuets, were in a manner ſlaine, and they continued killing and ouerthrowing thoſe that were lightly armed, and the Carthaginians which were come to their ſuc-
F cours, led by another Hanno, who was taken aliue: but Mago retyred in the beginning of the battaile with about 3000 foot and all the horſe, and the tenth day after came vnto Aſdrubals campe. The Celtiberian ſouldiours which remained, got home into their countrey through the woods and forreſts. This victorie was very pleaſing vnto Scipio, who did greatly extoll Syllanus his vertue, and was in hope to end the warre, if he did ſpeedily ſet vpon Aſdrubal, who remained in the remoteſt part of Spaine, in the Betique Prouince, which now

Scipio being aduertiſed,that the enemie had no armie in field, and ſeeing that he muſt make warre in diuers parts of the countrey, and beſiege one towne after another, a matter of ſome difficultie,and of more toile than profit,he turned head again:yet for that he would not wholly abandon that part of Spain to the enemy,he left L.Scipio his brother with an army of 10000 foot and 1000 horſe,to trie if he could take Auringe,the chiefe place of the country, ſituated H in a fertile ſoyle, vpon the marches of the Melleſians, the inhabitants whereof were naturall Spaniards. There were certain mynes of ſiluer found,& it was Aſdrubals retreat,from whence he made his courſes into the countrey. L. Scipio being come neere the towne, before he did wholly beſiege it,he ſent ſome to parle with the inhabitants,to know their minds,and to perſuade them rather to trie the Romans friendſhip than their armes. Preuailing nothing,he beſieged it,and caſt a trench about it,with a double palliſado, diuiding his armie into 3 troupes, the which ſhould keepe the towne in continuall alarme. The firſt aſſault giuen by one of the three troupes was valiantly maintained,and their ladders,with the ſouldiors which mounted, throwne into the ditch,and the aſſailants were often in danger to be drawne vp with hooks of to retire. L.Scipio finding that the ſmall number which he had ſent to the aſſault made the partie vnequall,hauing therefore cauſed the firſt to retire,he ſent all the reſt of his armie to giue a new aſſault: the which did ſo amaze the beſieged,being tyred with the firſt aſſault,as the inhabitants abandoned the wals; and the garriſon of Carthaginians thinking that the towne had bin yeelded,left their gards where they had bin ſet,and put themſelues into one body. The inhabitants fearing,that if the enemy forced the town,they ſhould be all put indifferently to the ſword,reſolued to preuent this danger by yeelding:and hauing opened a gate,they went forth in troupes,carying only their targuets,to defend themſelues from the Romans darts, and holding vp their right hands naked in ſign of peace,they let the Romans vnderſtand that they yielded. It is doubtfull whether they did vnderſtand their meaning,ſeeing them come a far off,or K Auringe taken by L. Scipio. whether the Romans did doubt ſome fraud; but they charged theſe poore Spaniards, and cut them all in peeces,and by the ſame port entred the towne with their colours flying, killing all they met without exception,& in the meane time ſome of their troups forced the other gates, and made way vnto their companions. The horſemen being entred,ſeized vpon the chiefe places,as they were commaunded, being followed by them which they called Triaires, which are footmen,fighting alwaies in the rereward,to ſecond where need required. The reſt of the legionaries diſperſed themſelues throughout the towne,putting all to the ſword. In the end the Carthaginians were taken priſoners,and ſome 300 of the inhabitants:the reſt which remained after the furie were pardoned,and their houſes and libertie yeelded them. There died at the taking of this towne 2000 of the enemies,and ſome 90 of the Romans. It was a pleaſing exploit L to them that did execute it,but eſpecially to P.Scipio,who commended Lucius his brotherwith all the honorable tearmes he could,equalling the taking of Auringe to that of Carthage: and ſeeing winter approched,& that there was little reaſon to purſue Aſdrubal,& leſſe to vndertake the ſiege of Calis,he retired with his campe on this ſide Ebro,& ſent his ſoldiors to winter. He ſent L.Scipio to Rome,with newes of that which had bin done,and with him he ſent Hanno,one of the enemies captains,and many other great priſoners: this done,he retired to Tarracone.

19 The Romans after this good ſucceſſe were in hope to chaſe their enemies out of Spain: for hauing defeated one of their armies, taken one of their chiefe commaunders, the reſt of their forces being disbanded,and forced to liue within their forts and garriſons,in the fartheſt parts of the countrey, Scipio thought there was now no cauſe of any preſent feare,but that he M might diſpoſe of his affaires at leyſure: yet he was deceiued: for Spaine by reaſon of their ſtirring ſpirits, and the opportunitie of places, was in that reſpect as fit as any Region in the world (after ſuch defeates) to leuie new armies, and to reuiue the warre. Aſdrubal then, ſonne to Giſgo (who did ſecond the Barcins in wiſedome and valour worthie of a great Commaunder) being aſſiſted by Mago, ſonne to Amilcar, did ſo deale with the Spaniards,

A as he leuied 50000 foot and 4500 horſe of that nation, beyond the riuer of Ebro: he muſtered them neere vnto the towne of Sylpia, and there did the two Carthaginian captains encampe, being reſolued to accept of a battaile if it were offered. Scipio aduertiſed of this great vnexpected preparation, drew his Legions to field, although he held them not ſufficient to oppoſe againſt ſo mightie an armie. As for the ſuccours of Spaniſh allies, his meaning was to make ſome ſhew vnto the enemie: yet would he not fortifie himſelfe with ſo great troupes, as he ſhould haue cauſe to feare his ruine by their trecherie, as had happened vnto his father and vncle: wherefore he ſent Syllanus to Colca, who commaunded ouer 28 townes, to demand the ſuccours of horſe and foot, which he had promiſed to enroll during the Winter: and he him-

Scipio truſts not vnto mercinaries, as his father had done.

B ſelfe going from Tarracone, as he paſſed by the townes of his allies, tooke vp ſuch ſouldiors as he thought good, and came to Caſtulo, whereas Syllanus met him with 3000 foot and 500 horſe. From thence he marched beyond Becula, hauing in his armie, as well of citizens of Rome, as of allies, of foot and horſe about 45000 fighting men. As they made their lodging, and did rampier it after the accuſtomed manner, behold Mago and Maſſiniſſa come with all their horſemen, and charge them that were buſie at worke; whom they had put to rout, if Scipio had not cauſed certaine bands of horſemen to gard them, being in battaile behind a little hill, who aduaunced againſt the firſt that were approched neere the rampiers, forcing them to retyre in the beginning without any great difficultie. The fight was long, and ſomewhat doubtfull againſt them which came afterwards cloſe and in good order, but when as Mago and Maſſiniſſa charge the Romans.

C the Romane bands which were diſperſed here and there approched, and that the ſouldiours which laboured at the rampiers, left their worke and fell to armes (being ſo commaunded) the wearied refreſhed with new ſupplies, and greater numbers comming ſtill from the campe, then the Numidians and Carthaginians finding the charge hote, retyred in the beginning in good order, but being ouerpreſſed by multitudes, they could no longer make head, but were put to rout, euery man ſauing himſelfe as he could. This encounter did puffe vp the hearts of the one, and abate the courage of the others, yet there were daily skirmiſhes betwixt the horſemen and them that were lightly armed. In the end Aſdrubal put his army into battaile, the which Scipio did alſo on his part: but either armie continued in that manner neere his fort, vntill the euening: whereupon firſt the Carthaginians and then the Romanes retyred into

The two armies in battaile readie to fight.

D their campes, and thus they continued for certaine dayes together, Aſdrubal comming firſt to field, and making his retreat firſt, without any attempt one againſt another. The Romans held the middle part in their battaile, and the Carthaginians did the like in theirs, being mixt with Africanes: vpon the wings in either armie were their allies, all Spaniards: before the Carthaginians battaile were their Elephants, which a farre off ſhewed like caſtles, and it was giuen out, That the armies ſhould fight in that manner, and that the Romanes and Carthaginians (betwixt whom the quarrell was, holding the middeſt of the battailes) ſhould encounter with like armes and courage. Scipio hearing that this opinion was generally beleeued, changed the order of his battaile: wherefore at night hee cauſed warning to bee giuen ſecretly throughout the campe, That euery one ſhould be readie for the breake of day, that both men

E and horſe ſhould refreſh themſelues, the horſemen ſhould be armed, and the horſes ſadled and bridled: And when as day began to appeare, he ſent all his horſemen, and the footmen that were lightly armed, againſt the Corps de gard, which were vpon the approches of the enemies campe, and then he marched himſelfe with the whole armie, hauing againſt the expectation both of his own ſoldiors and of the enemie ſet the Romans vpon either wing, and the troupes of their allies in the midſt. Aſdrubal moued at the noyſe which his horſemen made, goes out of his tent, and ſeeing the tumult which was before the trenches and paliſadoes of his campe, the ſmal aſſurance of his ſoldiors, the enemies colours gliſtering a far off, and all the fields couered with their troups, he preſently ſends forth his horſemen againſt the Roman horſe, and he himſelfe hauing put his footmen in battell, goes out of his campe, without changing any thing of

F his former order. The horſmens encounter continued long, without any aduantage: for whē as any one was forced to giue back (the which was ordinarie on either ſide) they had a ſafe retreat to their ſquadrons of foot: but after that the bodies of both armies were neere one vnto another, Scipio giuing a ſigne, cauſed his horſe to retire, & opening the ranks of foot, receiued them within the battell: then he placed them in two ſquadrons behind the points of it, to reenforce and ſupport his foot; and when he ſaw it was time to charge, he commanded the battaillon in the middeſt (which were all Spaniards) to march ſoftly: he himſelfe leading the right point, G had giuen charge to Syllanus and Martius (who had charge on the other ſide) that as they ſhould ſee him aduance, they ſhould doe the like, and begin the battaile with the enemy, with the moſt reſolute of their horſe and foot, before the two ſquadrons in the middeſt ſhould come to joyne. Wherefore ſtretching forth in this manner both the wings, either of them with three companies of foot and as many horſe, and ſome forlorne hopes lightly armed, went with all ſpeed to affront the enemie, whileſt the others followed. Betwixt both wings there was a void place, for that the Spaniards marched more ſlowly; and they had alreadie begun the charge on either ſide, when as the chiefe ſtrength of the enemie (which conſiſted in the Carthaginians and old African ſouldiors) was yet a croſſe-bow ſhot of, and durſt H not turne towards the wings to ſuccour their companions, leaſt they ſhould leaue the battaile naked and open to the enemie, who came againſt them. The horſemen and Romane ſouldiours did wonderfully gall the enemies wings vpon the flankes, the companies of foot which made the point, preſt them in front, and ſought to cut off the wings from the reſt of the battaile, and euen now the partie was not equall in any part: for beſides that the points of the Carthaginians armie were furniſhed with horſe-boyes and Spaniards newly leuied, who had to deale with Romanes and braue Latine ſouldiors, the day being far ſpent, Aſdrubals armie grew weake, for that they had beene ſurpriſed by the alarme in the morning, and were forced to put themſelues in battaile without feeding; the which Scipio had done of purpoſe, and to that end had delayed the fight for many houres, beginning it as I late as he could. It was paſt noone before the foot companies which were in the wings began to charge, and much later before the battaillons in the middeſt did joyne, ſo as before that all their forces came to fight, the heat of the Sunne, the toyle being ſo long on foot, laden with armes, hunger, and thirſt, had ſo tyred the Carthaginians and young A-fricanes, as they were forced to ſupport themſelues vpon their targuets, they were ſo faint.

Beſides the Elephants (terrified with the furious combate which was vpon either wing) had run through their middle battaillon. Wherefore the Carthaginians tyred in bodie, and fainting in courage, began to recoyle, but without diſorder, euen as if they had retyred by their Generals commaund. But the victorious Romanes charging them with great reſolution on all ſides, when as they found them to ſhrinke, notwithſtanding all the perſuaſions K of Aſdrubal to keepe their rankes vnto the next hils, where they had a ſafe retreat (being not able to withſtand the enemies force) they all turned their backes and fled, feare being of more force than ſhame. Being come vnto the foot of thoſe hils, they would haue ſtay-ed their enſignes, and rallied themſelues to make head againſt the Romanes, who had made a ſtand to put themſelues in order to aſſayle them: but when they ſaw they were eagrely purſued, they fled into the fortification of their campe, with great amazement, being chaſed ſo neere by the Romanes, as they had almoſt entred pell-mell with them. There fell ſo great a ſhower after the heat of the Sunne, as they which purſued, were forced to ſtand ſtill, and to retyre with great toyle vnto their campe: yea, there were ſome which did ſuperſtitiouſly beleeue, That it was not good to proceed any farther that day. Although L the night and the raine did inuite the Carthaginians (who were tyred and wounded) to take ſome reſt; yet feare and danger made them to fortifie their campe with all expedition, which they preſumed would be aſſayled by the enemie at the breake of day: and ſeeing they could not conquer by armes, they rayſed their rampiers with ſtones, gathered out of the neere val-lies. Hereupon they did ſee themſelues abandoned by their allies: wherefore they thought it beſt to be gone, holding flight more ſafe for them than any force. The beginning of the Spaniards reuolt was by Atanes Lord of the Turditanes, who paſſed vnto the Romans campe with great troupes of his ſubjects: and ſoone after two forts of importance were yeelded vnto the Romanes by ſuch as had them in gard. Aſdrubal fearing this miſchiefe would grow greater, truſſed vp his baggage and diſlodged. Scipio being aduertiſed in the morning, that M the enemie was gone, ſent his horſemen after them, and then marched after with the Legions and the reſt of the armie with all ſpeed: who if they had followed them the right way, they had ſoone ouertaken them: but they truſted to their guides, who aſſured them of another way, which conducted them to the riuer of Betis, where they might cut off their paſſage.
Aſdrubal hearing that way was ſtopped, was once in mind to haue retired towards the Ocean:

Trecherie of the Spaniards to the Carthaginians, their allies.

A but his ſouldiours (obſeruing no kind of diſcipline) marched like men that fled, ſo as they got ſome ground of the Romane Legions: yet the horſemen and ſouldiors which were lightly armed, purſued them ſtill, and did not abandon them; but charging them ſometimes in the rere, and ſometimes in the flanke, did ſtay them and force them to fight, vntill the Legions arriued: then was there no more any combat, but a ſlaughter, as of ſheepe, vntill that their Generall (the author of their flight) ſaued himſelfe with about ſeuen thouſand men, moſt without armes; the reſt were in a manner all ſlaine or taken. The Carthaginians which eſcaped with their captaine, entrenched themſelues ſuddainely vpon a mount, and there defended themſelues eaſily againſt the Romanes, who did ſtriue to get vp; yet being in a naked and deſart
B place, and vnfit to endure a ſiege of few dayes, many disbanded and went to the Romanes campe: the which Aſdrubal perceiuing, he abandoned his ſouldiors, embarked himſelfe, and paſſed into the Ile of Calis. Scipio aduertiſed of his flight, left Syllanus with tenne thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe to beſiege their campe, and he with the reſt of the armie returned in 70 daies to Tarracone, where he ſhould diſpoſe of the affaires of the princes and noblemen of Spaine, and giue rewards according to euery ones merit.

An abſolute defeat of the Carthaginians.

After his departure, Syllanus had ſecret conference with Maſſiniſſa, who hauing new deſignes in his head, paſſed into Africke with a ſmall traine, that he might draw his people to his owne humor. The cauſe of his ſuddaine change did not then appeare, the which he did afterwards juſtifie by a long and conſtant loyaltie, wherein hee did perſiſt vntill his death.

Maſſiniſſa praeſtiſed by Syllanus.

C Mago did alſo paſſe into the Iſland of Gades, Aſdrubal hauing ſent backe the veſſels: ſo as the armie (being abandoned by the Commaunders) was diſperſed, ſome ſauing themſelues by flight in the neighbour townes, and ſome yeelding to the Romanes. In this manner were the Carthaginians chaſed out of Spaine, about the twelfth yeare of the ſecond Punick warre, by the conduct and happineſſe of Publius Scipio, fiue yeares after that he had had the charge of the armies and gouernment of Spaine. Within few daies after Syllanus came to Scipio, being at Tarracone, bringing him newes, that the warre was ended. L. Scipio was ſent from thence to Rome, with many priſoners of marke to carrie newes of the abſolute victorie obtained of the Carthaginians in Spaine. But Scipio not content to haue effected ſo great matters in that countrey, had a greater deſigne, ſo great was his mind, and ſo deſirous of glorie.

The Carthaginians chaſed out of Spaine.

D Wherefore knowing, that there was not any one man to make head againſt him in Spaine, he embraced all Africke, whither he paſſed to make factions, and to trouble the Carthaginians Eſtate: the which ſucceeded happily, but it may be with greater hazard than was fit for his ranke.

Great dangers accompany great enterpriſes.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio being returned out of Africke, where he had withdrawne from the alliance of the Carthaginians king Siphax their neighbour, and although hee did now ſee Spaine quiet in reſpect of the Africanes; yet he knew, that ſome townes did containe themſelues more for feare than for any loue, as thoſe which had greatly incenſed the Romanes during the precedent warres: the firſt and chiefe, either in greatneſſe or offence, were Caſtulo and Illiturgis: Thoſe of Caſtulo had ſhewed themſelues friends during the proſperi-
E tie of the Romanes; but after the defeat and death of the two Scipioes, they had reuolted to the Carthaginians. The Illiturgians had done worſe: for beſides their reuolt, they had deliuered ſuch as had ſaued themſelues there after theſe defeats, to the ſlaughter. Theſe crimes were wiſely diſſembled by Scipio, when hee came firſt into the Prouince, and that matters were yet doubtfull: for if he ſhould then haue puniſhed them, he ſhould haue reſpected juſtice more than profit. All things being now aſſured and quiet, hee thought it a fit time to puniſh them. Wherefore hauing called Lu. Martius to Tarracone, he ſent him to beſiege Caſtulo, with the third part of his forces; and hee himſelfe departing from Carthagena, led the reſt of his armie before Illiturgis, whither he came in fiue dayes march. The inhabitants doubting, that they would not leaue their trecheries vnpuniſhed, had fortified their F towne, and furniſhed themſelues with all things neceſſarie to endure a ſiege. Scipio let his ſouldiors vnderſtand, That theſe Spaniards did rightly feare that which they had merited, exhorting them to goe againſt them with greater furie than againſt the Carthaginians themſelues. For (ſayd he) the quarrell which wee haue had againſt them of Carthage, was onely for glorie and deſire of rule, but wee take armes againſt theſe men, to puniſh them for their wickedneſſe and cruell treaſon. The time is now come, when wee ſhall reuenge the murthers done

vnto our companions, and the trecherie which they had prepared for you, if you had fallen into G their hands after the defeats: and therefore let vs deale ſo, as neuer any Nation ſhall hereafter dare to wrong the ſouldiors or citizens of Rome in any diſgrace whatſoeuer. Hauing animated his ſouldiors with theſe words, hee commaunded ladders ſhould be brought, and diſtribu-ted to the moſt aſſured companies: then diuiding his armie into two, he commaunded, That Lelius his Lieutenant ſhould aſſayle the towne on the one ſide, and he would lead the reſt into diuers places; the which was executed with great courage and reſolution. The towneſmen had no need of any captaine to encourage them in their defence: for euery one know-onely ſuch as were able to carrie armes, but old men, women, and children, which made reſiſtance aboue their forces; they brought ſtones, and gaue armes to thoſe that did fight. It was not onely a queſtion of libertie which giueth courage to valiant men, but they did apprehend the horror of puniſhments, and the vild and ignominious death which they ſhould ſuffer: euery one tooke courage, ſeeing his companions valour: Wherefore if it was well I aſſayled, it was better defended: ſo as this Romane armie, which had ſubdued all Spaine, being often repulſed by the inhabitants, did ſhamefully wauer. Which Scipio perceiuing, he feared leaſt his men ſhould faint after ſo many vaine attempts, and the enemies ſhould grow more hardie, wherefore hee thought it needfull to hazard his owne perſon, and to bee partaker of the danger: whereupon he commanded them to make ready their ladders againe, Scipio obſtinate to vanquiſh or die. and reproching the ſouldiors of cowardiſe, he aduanced to mount himſelfe (if he had found them ſlacke) and came neere vnto the wals, not without great danger: but the ſouldiors being very carefull of their Generall, began all to crie out, and carried ladders to all parts. Le- lius did alſo preſſe them on his ſide: ſo as then the valour of the defendants was forced to giue place, and they abandoned the rampiers. It happened, that during this tumult, the K fort which was held impregnable was ſurpriſed: for certaine ſouldiors of Africke reuolted, which were in the Romane armie, ſeeing that they of the towne were buſied to withſtand an aſſault in the moſt dangerous places, and the Romanes as buſie to get an entrie into the towne, they obſerued the higheſt part of the towne, couered with a ſteepe rocke, which had neither rampier, gard, nor defence. Theſe men being actiue and nimble, began to creepe vp this rocke, with the helpe of certaine pykes of yron, which they did ſtrike into Illiturgis taken, and the execution cruell. the ſtones, and made ſteps of them, the firſt helping vp their companions which followed; ſo as in the end they got vp to the top of the rocke, from whence they began to run with horrible cries towards the towne, which was alreadie woon by the Romanes. Then ſhewed they the fruits of their choler and hatred: none were ſpared, but all put to the ſword, L men, and women, of all ages and ſexes; yea, and poore infants: no man cared for ſpoyle, And quite ruined. the fire deuoured what might be conſumed, and the reſt was ruined, for that the Romanes would not leaue the markes of a towne, nor the memorie of any habitation of ſuch enemies.

From thence Scipio led his armie to Caſtulo. This towne was not onely kept by Spaniards, which were come thither from diuers places, but alſo by the remainder of the Carthaginians, which were brought thither to garriſon after the retreat of their armie. But before that Scipio arriued, they had newes of the taking of Illiturgis, which ſtrucke a great rerror among them, and made them almoſt to deſpaire: and as euery mans guilt was not alike, ſo euery one ſought to prouide for his owne ſafetie. Wherefore they began to diſtruſt one another, M and in the end fell to an open diuiſion, the Spaniards ſeperating themſelues from the Carthginians: Cordubelus commaunded the Spaniards, who ſpake openly, That they muſt yeeld vn-Cordubelus yeeldeth vp Caſtulo, and the Carthaginian garriſon. to the Romans: Himilco was chiefe of the Carthaginians, whom Cordubelus deliuered vp with the towne vnto the Romans. By this voluntarie reddition, being alſo not ſo culpable as they of Illiturgis, the victorie was vſed with leſſe rigor.

22 From thence Martius was ſent againſt them of that nation, which plaid the rebels, to ſubject them to the Romane yoke: and Scipio returned to new Carthage, to performe the vowes which he had made vnto his gods, and to repreſent the games of fencing which he had prepared in honour of his deceaſed father and vncle. Theſe fencers which were brought forth, were none of his ſlaues, nor ſuch as had beene made free, which the maſter fencers were wont to preſent vnto the people, which ſell their bloud, and are hired for money: but all thoſe that did fight, came willingly without any fee: for ſome were ſent by the noblemen of the country, to ſhew the valour and dexteritie of the nation; others preſented themſelues vnto the combat, for the loue they bare vnto their Generall; others thruſt forth with glorie, defied, or being challenged, accepted the combat willingly. Some there were, which not able to end their ſuits by pleading, reſolued trie it by the ſword, who were of no baſe condition, but gentlemen of noble houſes. Among others Corbis and Orſua, two couſin germines, who contended for the principalitie of the towne of Ibis, would end their controuerſie by armes. Corbis was the elder. The father of Orſua had lately ruled in that towne, hauing ſucceeded to that ſeigniorie by the death of his brother. Scipio would haue reconciled them by juſtice, and knowledge of the cauſe; but they both anſwered, That it was not the cuſtome among kinsfolkes, and that they would not haue any gods nor men to be their judges, but Mars. Corbis was the ſtronger, and Orſua the more couragious, by reaſon of his youth, both reſolute to die, rather than to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his aduerſe partie. With this reſolution they ſhewed themſelues to the whole armie. The eldeſt alſo had more experience in his weapon, and was more cunning, ſo as he did eaſily vanquiſh the fooliſh preſumption of the younger. To theſe ſights of fencers were added funerall plaies, according to the manner of the Pagans, with preparation fit for the countrey, and as at the warre.

Combats vpon furious ambition.

A ſuit decided by armes.

23 During theſe ſhewes, the Romanes loſt no time, Scipioes lieutenants being ſeriouſly imployed about their affaires. Martius hauing paſt the riuer Betis (called Circe by them of the countrey) tooke two good and rich townes, without ſtriking ſtroke. There was another towne called Aſtapa, the which had alwayes held the Carthaginians partie, and made profeſſion to hate the Romanes deadly, yea when there was not any neceſſitie of warre: and yet their towne was neither ſtrong by nature, nor art, whereby they ſhould grow proud: but the nature of theſe men (who had no delight but in theeuing) had cauſed them to ſpoile the countries of the Romane allies, and to ſtrip their victualers, ſouldiors, or merchants, if they found them ſcattered; yea they had layd an ambuſh for a great troupe of men paſſing through their countrey, and hauing ſurpriſed them in a ſtrait, had ſlaine them. When as the armie came before the towne, the inhabitants prickt with the feeling of their faults, expected no mercie of their enemies, and ſeeing no meanes to hold againſt a ſiege, they tooke a cruell and deteſtable reſolution: for they brought into the middeſt of their market place all that was good and precious within the towne, and laied it on a heape, vpon the which they ſet their wiues and children; then they planted great ſtore of fagots and other wood round about it: this being done, they appointed fiftie yong men well armed, for the gard thereof, enjoyning them, that whileſt the euent of the fight betwixt them and the Romanes was doubtfull, they ſhould remaine there, and be faithfull gardians of their goods, and of thoſe perſons whom they held deereſt: but if they ſaw it ſucceeded ill, and that the towne was in daunger to bee loſt, they might then be aſſured, that all they which had ſallied out vpon the enemies were ſlaine in the fight: wherefore they did conjure them by all the celeſtiall and infernall gods, to remember their liberties, which that day ſhould end by an honeſt death, or by an infamous ſeruitude: and therefore they ſhould not leaue any thing that belonged vnto them, wherewith the enemie in his furie might glut his crueltie: to which end they had both fire and ſwords in their hands; and that therefore ſuch things as were to periſh, ſhould be deſtroyed by the hands of their faithfull friends, rather than be expoſed to the ſcorne and inſolencie of the enemie. This ſpoken, they added an execrable curſe vpon thoſe that ſhould ſuffer themſelues to be mooued with any pitie or tenderneſſe of heart, and forbeare to execute that which they had decreed; then hauing opened the gate, they marched directly to the Romane trenches, with more than a brutiſh furie. The Romanes had no conceit they ſhould ſally thus forth vpon them, wherefore they found the paſſages vnto the campe but ill garded. Some troupes of horſe and foot light-lightly armed, were ſuddenly ſent out againſt them, where they came to fight with more furie than good order: Wherefore the horſemen which came firſt to charge the enemie (being repulſed) amazed the footmen, ſo as the Aſtapians had come vnto the Romanes campe, if the legions (hauing ſome little leaſure) had not put themſelues into battell. There the enemies like madde men, ran deſperatly vpon their weapons: but the old ſouldiours keeping their ground, and ouerthrowing the formoſt, ſtayed them that followed: then ſeeking to beat them backe, finding them obſtinatly reſolued to dye where they ſtood, they opened their battailon, compaſſing them in with the multitude, and ſlew them all. This was done like ſouldiours, againſt incenſed enemies, that were armed: but within the towne there was a barbarous ſlaughter, where as the citizens themſelues murthered the weake vnarmed multitude of their wiues and little children, caſting their bodies yet breathing into the fire, whoſe bloud did in a manner quench the flames. In the end being tyred with this pitifull ſlaughter of their owne, they leapt armed as they were into the middeſt of the fire. Thereupon the victorious Romanes entred, who beholding this cruell ſpectacle, ſtood amazed for a ſeaſon: then ſeeing the gold and ſiluer ſhine through the fire (thruſt on with greedineſſe) they went in to gather it vp; but many of them were roaſted in the fire, being kept in by the preaſe that followed them.

Thus ended the ſiege of Aſtapa, being conſumed by fire, with all her treaſure, whereas the Romans got no ſpoile. After this exploit Martius tooke in many other places of the country, which yeelded to his mercie, and then returned with his victorious armie to new Carthage.

The Gaditanes offer to deliuer their town vnto the Romans.

About this time there came certaine deputies ſecretly out of the iſland of Gades, who promiſed to yeeld vp the towne with the Gouernour, into the Romans hands, and all the Carthaginians which were there in garriſon. Mago was retired thither, after the diſſolution of the campe, when as he was forced to flie, who hauing gathered together certaine ſhips, aſſembled ſome troups out of Spaine and Africke, neere vnto the ſtrait. Theſe citizens being heard, and hauing plighted their faith one vnto another, to obſerue what had beene promiſed, they were ſent backe. Scipio ſent Martius thither by land with his ableſt troupes (and Lelius by ſea) with ſeuen gallies and a galleaſſe, to the end, that with a mutual conſent they ſhould mannage this enterpriſe both by ſea and land.

Scipio falls verie ſicke.

24 Whileſt they are buſie to ſurpriſe Gades, Scipio fell verie ſick, but it was made greater, according to the common cuſtome of men: the which did much trouble the whole countrie, and euen thoſe that were fartheſt off: and it ſeemed by the diſcord which grew of this falſe brute, that if it had beene true, it would haue bred a great alteration of the affaires in Spaine; for neither the allies, nor the Romane armie, could containe themſelues in their duties. Mandonius and Indibilis being ſorie that the effect was not anſwerable to their conceptions, which was, to make themſelues kings, as ſoone as the Carthaginians were expelled, mooued the Lacetanes of their countrey to armes, with many Celtiberians, forraging and ſpoyling the fields of the Sueſſetanes and Sedetanes, who were allied to the Romanes. Beſides, there grew a mutinie in the Romane campe, neere vnto the riuer of Sucro, or Xucar, where as there lay eight thouſand men in garriſon, to keepe the people in awe on this ſide the riuer of Ebro. Theſe troupes had begun to grow diſordered, before the vncertaine brute of Scipioes death: which grew through idleneſſe, the which doth commonly fall out, when as ſouldiours want imployment. Then they grew licentious, and diſcontented, for that being accuſtomed to take ſpoiles, and to riot at their enemies charges, during the warres, they now ſaw themſelues reſtrained, and gouerned according to the orders of the time, when as the warre ceaſed. And theſe were their reaſons. If they make warre (ſaid they) in any part of Spaine, why doe they keepe vs here, where there is no imployment? If the warre be ended, why do they not lead vs backe into Italie? Then they demaunded their pay after an inſolent manner, not like vnto ſouldiours well diſciplined. When the captaines and officers of companies went the round in the night, thoſe that were in the corps de gard vſed many opprobrious ſpeeches againſt them. Some ſtealing forth in the night, ſpoyled the countrey of their friends and neighbours: yea they grew ſo inſolent, as euen in the day time they would goe out of the campe, and abandon their enſignes without leaue. Finally, all was done after the appetite of ſouldiors which were without order or diſcipline, and without any commaund of their heads

A heads and Tribunes; onely they were content there ſhould be ſome forme of a Roman campe maintained, and did ſuffer the captaines to ſit in their accuſtomed places to doe juſtice: they tooke the word from them, went to the gard in their turnes, and ſet their ſentinels. And although they had in a manner ſuppreſt the authoritie of their commaunders, yet they made a ſhew to obey them, whom in truth they commaunded. This they did, thinking that in the end their captaines, being infected with their frenzie, would joyne with them. But when they ſaw that they reprehended them ſharpely, and that they ſought to ſuppreſſe their furies, and openly refuſed to be companions vnto them in their inſolencies, they chaſed them firſt from their ſeats, and in the end forced them to forſake the campe. Which done, they began to
B chuſe the moſt ſeditious among them for their leaders and captaines, creating with a generall conſent C. Albius Calenus, and C. Atrius Vmber, ſimple ſouldiours, to be their Tribunes: who not contented to take the markes of Tribunes, preſumed to vſurpe the authoritie of the Soueraigne head, cauſing rods and axes to be carried before them, not remembring that thoſe rods and axes wherewith they thought to terrifie other men, ſhould fall vpon their owne ſhoulders: for the conceit they had of Scipioes death, did blind their vnderſtandings, imagining they would preſently take armes throughout all Spaine, and that in theſe tumults they ſhould haue meanes to ſpoyle the champian countrey, and to ranſacke townes; and that any exceſſe in ſuch a tumultuous time, would be held light. As they did expect from time to time freſh newes not onely of Scipioes death, but alſo of his funerall, when as they ſaw that not a-
C ny one did come, and that this bruit did vaniſh by little and little, they began to find their owne errours, demaunding in a rage, Where they were that had abuſed them with that vntruth; ſeeking to perſuade themſelues, that they had not maliciouſly inuented it, but rather beleeued it inconſideratly. Wherefore theſe new captaines were abandoned, and they began now to abhorre the falſe markes and titles, and the commaund which they had vſurped, apprehending the force of juſtice, whereunto they were ſubject. This ſedition being ſomewhat pacified, and certaine newes come of Scipioes recouerie, there came ſeuen Colonels, ſent by him vnto the campe: at whoſe arriuall the ſouldiours began againe to fall into their frenzie, but they were pacified by them with good words, addreſſing themſelues to ſuch as were of their acquaintance: then going about the lodgings and tents, euen vnto the Gene-
D rals ſeat and lodging, if they found any aſſembled together, they ſpake mildly vnto them, demaunding the reaſon of their alteration, and blaming in ſome ſort their actions. Their generall excuſe was, That they were not payed, and that they had beene carefull to puniſh them of Illiturgis for their wickedneſſe committed after the defeat of two armies, and of two great captaines, but not rewarded their deſers, which after theſe misfortunes had maintained the honour of Rome, and preſerued the countrey by their vertue and valour. The Tribunes or Colonels ſeemed to allow of their reaſons; ſaying, That they would make report thereof vnto Scipio, and that they were exceeding glad there was no harme, but that might be eaſily cured: that (thankes be to God) Scipio and the commonweale of Rome, had meanes both to content and reward them.

In a confuſion of the ſtate all exceſſe ſeemes light

The diſcretion of the Colonels to pacifie the mutinie.

E Scipio was better acquainted with warre than with ciuile ſeditions, ſo as he was ſomewhat troubled how he ſhould carrie himſelfe in this action, fearing that as the ſouldiours had done in their exceſſe, ſo he in puniſhing them might exceed meaſure: he therefore reſolued to proceed with mildneſſe. There were collectors ſent preſently to the tributarie townes, to leuie money, giuing the ſouldiours hope by that meanes, that within few dayes they ſhould be muſtered and paied: and then he made a proclamation, That all the ſouldiours ſhould come to new Carthage, to receiue their pay, either all together, or by companies apart. In the meane time the Spaniards which were rebelled, retired home to their houſes, the which did wholly pacifie the ſedition in the Romanes campe. Mandonius and Indibilis being aduertiſed, that Scipio was liuing, gaue ouer their enterpriſe, and were abandoned by all thoſe that had fol-
F lowed them, finding not any one, neither Romane nor ſtranger, that would bee a companion of their follies.

There grew a queſtion among the ſeditious, Whether they ſhould go to Carthage or not, euerie one caſting what was moſt ſafe and expedient for them: if they muſt needs goe, whether they ſhould goe all together, or in companies one after another: in the end they reſolued, ued, that their beſt courſe was to ſubmit themſelues vnto Scipioes mercie; ſaying, That he had G pardoned enemies, and that their offence was none of the greateſt, for there had not beene any man ſlaine nor wounded: And for the ſafeſt, they ſhould goe all together. Whileſt they conſulted what they ſhould doe, they alſo reſolued at Carthage, how they ſhould intreat them: Some were of opinion to puniſh them all in generall; ſaying, That it was a meere rebellion, and no ſedition: others aduiſed to puniſh the authors onely, which might bee ſome fiue and thirtie in all. This aduice was followed, that the puniſhment ſhould end whereas the offence began. And to the end they ſhould not thinke this counſell was held to puniſh the ſeditious, as ſoone as euer they came forth, a proclamation was made, That euerie one ſhould haue his horſe and armes readie to march againſt Mandonius and Indibilis, and that H they ſhould giue order to haue victuals readie for certaine dayes, and to make other preparations for the armie, which ſhould march.

The ſeuen Tribunes which had beene ſent to the mutined ſouldiours, and who had pacified them with good words, were ſent againe to meet them; to either of which was giuen a note, in the which were written fiue names of the authors of this diſorder, with commaundement, That being among them, either of them ſhould ſeeke to draw them that were in his roll into his lodging, and there make them good cheere, and to drinke of the beſt vntill they were drunke, and then to put them into ſafe keeping, without any brute. Theſe troupes approached to new Carthage, and vnderſtood by all thoſe they met, that the next day they ſhould march againſt the Lucetanes, vnder the conduct of Syllanus and Lelius: the which did great- I ly rejoyce them, not onely freeing their hearts from feare, but alſo perſuading themſelues, that by that meanes their Generall ſhould rather be in their power, than they in his. About Sunne ſet they entred into the towne, finding the other ſouldiours preparing themſelues to march. They were entertained with words fit for the buſineſſe which was in hand; That their comming was pleaſing vnto the Generall, the other armie being readie to march, with ſuch like words. They lodged and refreſhed themſelues, and the heads of the mutines were drawne by a deuice into certaine houſes, where they were taken and bound. A little before day the baggage of the armie which they made ſhew ſhould diſlodge, began to march, and at the breake of day the companies followed: but they ſtayed at the gates, whereas they ſet good gards, that no ſouldiour might goe out of the towne. Then they called theſe ſouldiors K newly come, to the aſſemblie, who came before the Generals Tribunall with great arrogan-cie, as if they would haue terrified him. Then the Generall went vp to his ſeat of juſtice, and at the ſame time the companies which were in armes at the gates, were called backe, who compaſſed them in behind, they being vnarmed: then their hearts began to faint, and that which did moſt amaze them (as they confeſſed afterward) was the vigorous countenance of Scipio, whom they expected to find leane and pale. Hauing continued there ſome ſpace without any word ſpeaking, vntill the chiefe offendours were brought vnto the place; they being come, he began to reprehend them ſharpely, for that contrarie to their dueties and the naturall bond they had vnto their countrey, and againſt the oath made vnto their commaun-ders, they had ſhewed themſelues rebels, diſobedient, perjured, and enemies both in word L and deed: hauing followed men that were not well borne, nor eſteemed for any vertue, but raſcals, to whom they had giuen full power and commaund ouer them, ſuch as Atrius Vm- ber, and Calenus Albius. I do not thinke that you haue all runne willingly into this furie, but that

B eight thouſand men (better without doubt than Albius and Atrius, to whom you haue ſubiected your ſelues) to be able to take the prouince of Spaine from the Romanes by force, I being dead or aliue, the reſt of the Romane forces being ſafe, with the which I haue in one day taken new Carthage by aſſault, defeated foure great captaines, and chaſed foure Carthaginian armies out of Spaine? Thinke you that the greatneſſe and ſtrength of the Romane commonweale conſiſts in the life or death of any captaine whatſoeuer? Would not theſe men haue maintained and defended the maieſtie of the Romane Empire? What compariſon can you make betwixt the armies, the commaunders, and the cauſes? And admit you had all aduantages, ſhould you therefore take armes againſt your countrey and fellow citizens, renounce the countrey which hath bred you, with your wiues and children, to adhere vnto the enemie, and to chuſe your abode at Succron? And what was the reaſon? for that your pay was a little protracted, by reaſon of your Generals ſickneſſe? O worthie cauſe to make you violate all diuine and humane lawes! O Romanes, you
D haue wonderfully erred, beleeue me, you haue loſt all reaſon and iudgement, and the infirmitie of your minds hath beene worſe than that which afflicted my bodie. My words ſeeme ſharpe vnto you, but your actions haue beene farre more ſharpe: which if you repent, I deſire there ſhould bee no more mention made of them, but remaine buried in forgetfulneſſe, holding the repentance of ſuch deteſtable acts, to bee a ſufficient chaſtiſement, for as much as concernes you all in generall. But as for Albius Calenus, Atrius Vmber, and others which haue beene the authors of this wicked ſedition, they ſhall expiate their follies with their bloud: the which ſhould not be diſpleaſing vnto you, but rather deſired and applauded, ſeeing they ſought to ruine you, and haue offended none more than you.

E In this manner Scipio ſpake vnto the ſeditious ſouldiours, and preſently execution was done of theſe fiue and thirtie men, with horrour and great feare to all the reſt of the offendors: For the armed ſouldiours which ſtood about the aſſembly, began to beat their targuets, the names of them that were condemned, were openly pronounced by the crier, they were drawne naked, tied to poſts, vnto the place, beaten and torne with rods, and then beheaded, all the aſſiſtants being ſo amazed with feare, as there was not a ſigh heard among them. The bodies being carried away, and the place cleanſed, after the accuſtomed manner, Scipio made the ſouldiours to take a new oathe, and they were paied what was due vnto them, calling them by name one after another. This was the end of the mutinie and ſedition made at Succron, vertuouſly and yet mildly chaſtiſed by Scipio, conſidering the qua-
F litie of the crime, which was of ſuch conſequence for great eſtates, as many haue not ſpared innocents themſelues, to terrifie others.

The puniſhment of the chiefe offendors.

Sedition is a miſchiefe which doth much import eſtates.

At the ſame time Hanno had bin ſent by Mago to the mouth of Betis (which is now Guadalquiber) with a ſmall number of Africanes, who gathered together ſome 4000 men vpon thoſe marches: but he was charged by L. Martius, and forced in his campe, and moſt of his ſouldiors ſlain, ſome at the aſſault of his rampars, and the reſt in the field, being purſued by the horſemen

as they fled, and he with a ſmall number ſaued himſelfe. Whileſt this was doing about that riuer, Lelius arriued with his ſea armie at Carteia, hauing paſt the ſtrait, at the entrie whereof this towne is ſituated in the Ocean. The Romanes thought they ſhould haue meanes to ſurpriſe the towne of Gadiz by intelligence, as they had contriued it with ſome of the inhabitants: but this buſines was diſcouered before the execution; the complices were taken, and deliuered by Mago vnto the Prætor Adherbal, to be led to Carthage the great; who put the conſpirators into a galeaſſe, and for that it was heauier and more ſlower than the gallies, he ſent it a little before, & himſelfe followed it with eight gallies. This galeaſſe was alreadie entred into the ſtrait; when as Lelius diſcouering it out of the port of Carteia, put forth alſo with a galeaſſe, being followed by his ſeuen gallies, and aſſuring himſelfe that the enemies galeaſſe carried by the current within that ſtrait (being hard to force) could not turne backe, he went to affront Adherbal and his gallies. The Carthaginian ſeeing himſelfe ſurpriſed, was doubtful whether he ſhould flie after his galeaſſe, or elſe make head. Whileſt he ſtands in ſuſpence, Lelius commeth vpon him, and it was not in his power to auoid the combat. They were in a ſtrait, whereas nothing could be done after the manner of ſea-fights, by the iudgement of captaines and mariners: for the ſea going high in that place, they could not turne their gallies at their pleaſures, the which were carried by the waues as well againſt their own as againſt the enemies, notwithſtanding all their endeuours; ſo that oftentimes they might haue ſeene a gallie flying turne her ſpurre ſuddenly againſt that which purſued her, by the turning of a waue, and that which chaſed her, to flie away. The gallies being in this ſtrife, it happened, that the Roman galeaſſe (whether by her weight, or the number of her oares) maſtring the waues better than the reſt, forced two Carthaginian gallies, ſtemming the one, and diſarming the other of all her oares of the one ſide, as ſhe paſſed by her, and would in like manner haue endamaged the reſt, if ſhe had incountred them: but Adherbal with the helpe of his ſailes and oares, recouered that coaſt of Affricke which was neereſt. Lelius being victor, returned to Carteia, and informed of all that which had paſſed at Gadiz, how that their practiſe was diſcouered, and that the conſpirators were ſent to Carthage, he aduertiſed Marius, that it was labour loſt to ſtay there, being more expedient to returne towards their Generall: which they did both within few daies after, and came to new Carthage. Mago hearing of their departure, and freed from feare, did not only reſume new courage, but was alſo in hope to recouer all Spain by the rebellion of the Ilergetes; wherefore he ſent preſently to Carthage, to acquaint the Senate with the ſedition which had lately happened in the Romanes campe, and the rebellion and reuolt of their allies, giuing them charge to make them greater than they were; perſuading them, that it was now a fit time to recouer the Seigniorie of all Spaine, which they had receiued from their anceſtors, and therefore they ſhould ſend forces to do it.

The practiſe of the Gaditans diſcouered and ſuppreſt.

Mago brother to Hannibal and Generall of the Carthaginians, hopes to recouer all Spaine.

As for Mandonius and Indibilis, who were gone to the field, vpon the brute of Scipios death, thinking to make vſe of the Roman ſoldiors which were mutined, when as they vnderſtood the truth of all things, they retired home to their houſes without any alteration, attending what ſhould be done vnto the ſeditious; preſuming, that if Scipio pardoned his own ſoldiors, he might alſo vſe the like clemencie towards them: but when as they vnderſtood with what rigor he had puniſhed them, they thought it was a preſage for them to attend the like, for that they were guiltie of the ſame crime: wherfore they gathered their forces together, and cauſed their confederats to arme, meeting in the territorie of Sedera, where they had camped in the beginning of their reuolt, being ſome 20000 foot and 2500 horſe. Scipio hauing eaſily pacified the diſcontentment of his ſoldiors, paying vnto euery man what was due vnto him, ſhewing them a good countenance, and vſing good words, to whom before his departure from Carthage, he made a ſpeech in ſome bitter tearmes againſt the rebellion of theſe two noble men.

Scipio prepares to goe againſt Mandonius and Indibilis.

Scipios ſpeech to his ſoldiors.

I goe not (ſaid he) againſt theſe men to puniſh their ingratitude and wickedneſſe with the like affection, as when I did chaſtiſe the offences of our fellow citizens, for what I did then was very ſparingly, as if I ſhould haue torne out part of mine owne bowels; wherefore I was content to correct the error or the offence of 8000, by the puniſhment of 35 men: but now that I march with you to ruine the Ilergetes, to whom we are not tied neyther by birth nor friendſhip, ſeeing that league which was betwixt vs had bin wickedly broken and violated by them, I know that all you of mine armie are eyther Romanes or Latins: beſides, there are few of you which haue not bin brought out of Italie hither by my vncle

Cn. Scipio,

A Cn. Scipio, who firſt brought a Romane armie into Spaine, or by Publius my father, or by me, and that you are all accuſtomed to the names and conduct of the Scipioes. Wherefore I deſire to carrie you backe, that you may be partakers of the triumph, which we haue well deſerued. As for this warre whither wee go, let vs not call it a war, if we will remember what we haue done in this country. I do more eſteem Mago, who hath ſaued himſelfe in an iſland (out of the world as a man may ſay) with a few ſhips, than of the Ilergetes. He is a Carthaginian captaine, and holds ſome forme of a garriſon where he is, but theſe are theeues, and captaines of theeues, which are of no moment in a well gouerned warre, but onely to ouerrun and ſpoyle their neighbours fields, carrie away their cattell, and ſet fire of their farmes: whoſe force and valour conſiſts in flying ſwiftly, and not in fighting well. If I goe firſt againſt them, doe not
B thinke it is for any danger, or difficultie, or for any feare I haue that the war wil be long by their means, but onely to the end ſo wicked a rebellion ſhould not remaine long vnpuniſhed, nor to leaue any enemie in armes, if it be poſsible, in a prouince conquered with ſo great happineſſe and valour as we haue done.

Then he exhorted them to follow him vnder the conduct of the gods, not to the wars, but to puniſh wicked men: injoyning them to be readie for the next day. Being parted, he made ten lodgings with his campe, before he came to the riuer of Ebro, which hauing paſſed the fourth day following, they preſented themſelues in ſight of the enemie. Betwixt both was a large vally, compaſſed in with mountaines: there Scipio made ſome troupes of cattell which had beene taken in the enemies countrey, to be put, to draw them forth to fight, cauſing them to be kept with ſome ſouldiours which were lightly armed. The Spaniards fall vpon this boo-
C tie, and the Romane ſouldiours goe to reſcue it. Hereupon Lelius arriues, being appointed to ſecond theſe footmen, with ſome bands of horſe, who arriued fitly, for the combat was doubtfull. The Spaniards were repulſt by theſe ſuccours with great ſlaughter, yet they fainted not for all this, but preſented themſelues the next day in order of battel, vpon the ſame place: and for that the vallie was not able to containe all their forces, they brought forth ſome two third parts of their foot, and all their horſe. The Romans held the ſtraitneſſe of the place to bee an aduantage for them, for that their ſouldiours did fight better cloſe than in an open field, who kept their rankes, and did not run vp and downe like vnto the Spaniards: beſides, they ſaw that they ſhould haue to deale but with two third parts of the enemies armie. And Scipio reſolued of a ſtratagem: for ſeeing that he could not flanke his footmen with his horſe, by reaſon of the D ſtraitneſſe of the place, and that by the ſame reaſon, the enemies horſe were alſo vnprofitable, he commaunded Lelius to lead all his horſemen about the hills, and to ſeeke ſome paſſage to charge the Spaniſh horſemen vpon the backe, and to draw them from their foot. And to the end the enemie ſhould not diſcouer what Lelius intended, he preſently went againſt the enemie with his footmen, placing foure companies onely in front, for that he could not do otherwiſe: ſo the battell began in two ſeuerall places, betwixt two battailons of foot, and two of horſe, whereas one could not ſuccour another, till in the end the Spaniſh foot being put to rout, their horſemen being preſt before by the legions, and behind by the Roman horſe, were all preſently ſlaine, ſo as of all the horſe and foot which fought in the vallie, there eſcaped not any one. The other third part of the Spaniſh army, which came not to fight, but had only been
E ſpectators in a ſafe place, on the top of the hils, had all means to flie away; among whom there eſcaped Mandonius & Indibilis. The campe and all their baggage was taken, with 3000 priſoners: and of the Romans there were ſlaine about 1200, & about 3000 hurt. There is no doubt, but they had gotten this victorie with leſſe bloud, if the field had beene larger, and that the Spaniards might haue fled more eaſily. After this rout, Indibilis reſolued to lay aſide armes, and as the ſafeſt way, to ſubmit himſelfe to Scipioes faith and clemencie, the which hee had tried: and therefore he ſent Mandonius his brother vnto him, who did proſtrate himſelfe at his feet, confeſſing their fault, which ſeemed (ſaid he) to be as a fatall diſeaſe in that ſeaſon: hauing not onely run among the Ilergetes and Lacetanes, but alſo infected the campe and Romane armie: finally, that both he and his brother were come thither, being readie either to yeeld vp F their liues to Scipio (from whom they had receiued them) if it were his pleaſure, or in taking them againe from him, to be for euer bound vnto him. It was an auntient cuſtome with the Romanes, not to capitulate, nor to haue any peace with them with whom they had no allyance nor friendſhip, before they did yeeld into their hands whatſoeuer they held, were it holy or prophane, giuen hoſtages, deliuered vp their armes, and receiued garriſons into their townes. Scipio was content to receiue Mandonius preſent, and Indibilis being abſent at that time,with ſome bitter ſpeeches giuing them to vnderſtand, that they had deſerued death: but they receiued their liues by the grace of the people of Rome. Moreouer, that hee would not diſarme them, which was the aſſurance they did vſually take of rebels,but would they ſhould hold them freely, and to be void from feare: but if they reuolted againe, they ſhould know he would not be reuenged of innocent hoſtages, but vpon ſuch as had offended, and that he would puniſh thoſe that ſhould preſent themſelues in armes, and not the diſarmed: Wherefore they ſhould chuſe,whether they would haue the Romanes fauourable vnto them, or incenſed againſt them. Thus was Mandonius ſent away, without any other puniſhment than money,which they commaunded him to furniſh to pay the armie. Scipio hauing ſent L. Martius before,to paſſe the riuer of Ebro,and Syllanus to Tarracone,he ſtaied ſome time,vntil the Ilergetes had paid their money, and then he followed after Martius(who approached neere vnto the Ocean)with ſome few men,and no baggage.

25 The treatie begun with Maſſiniſſa had beene delaied for diuers reaſons: for this Numidian would treat with Scipio himſelfe,and make his promiſes to him.This made Scipio to vndertake a long voiage.Maſſiniſſa was in the iſland of Gades,where hauing intelligence by Marius,that Scipio approached,he told the Gouernour Mago, That the horſes and horſmen were ſpoiled in the iſland,where they cauſed a dearth of all things, to the hurt of others; deſiring him to giue them leaue to paſſe into the firme land, to make ſome courſes into the enemies countrey. Being paſt, he preſently ſent three of the chiefe among the Numidians to Scipio, two of the which ſhould remaine for hoſtages, and the third returne to bring him notice of the day and place where the enteruiew ſhould be; where they met with a ſmall companie. Maſſiniſſa firſt of all thanked Scipio, That he had ſent him his nephew,his brothers ſonne:then he ſaid vnto him, That he had long deſired to ſee that day, and that hee deſired much to doe ſomething that might be acceptable vnto him, and profitable to the Romans: wherein hee would imploy himſelfe more willingly than any ſtranger whatſoeuer, the effects whereof he could not yet ſhew in Spain(a country vnknowne vnto him)but in place where he was borne and bred,hoping to ſucceed his father in the kingdome: and that if the Romanes did ſend Scipio into Africke,he did hope to worke ſo,as the eſtate of Carthage ſhould not ſtand long. Maſſiniſſa was welcome vnto Scipio,who heard his words with great content, knowing that whatſoeuer had beene valiantly performed in Spaine by the horſemen, was done vnder the onely leading of Maſſiniſſa,who ſhewed by his carriage and countenance,that he was a yong prince of great hope. So hauing plighted their faith one vnto another, they parted, Scipio towards Tarracone, and Maſſiniſſa to Gades: and to the end hee would not ſeeme to haue paſſed into the firme land in vaine, he ſpoyled ſome of the neighbour countrey,neere the ſhore, with Scipioes conſent.

A parley betwixt Maſſiniſſa and Scipio,to the preiudice of the Romans.

26 Mago being made fruſtrat of his conceiued hope,to repaire the Carthaginians affairs in Spaine,by the Spaniards rebellion, vnder Mandonius and Indibilis, and the ſedition of the Romane ſouldiours,reſolued to goe into Africke,when as being readie to depart,he receiued order from the Senat of Carthage, by the which he was commaunded to paſſe with all the ſhipping he had at Calis, into Italie, and to leuie all the ſouldiours he could in Gaule,and along the ſea coaſt,and to joyne with his brother Hannibal, to the end the warre which had bin begun with ſuch animoſitie, might be continued with the like reſolution. For the effecting whereof they brought money from Carthage, and he for his part got all hee could from the Gaditanes, hauing not onely exhauſted their common treaſure, but vnfurniſhed their temples of their jewels and other riches, and forced euerie priuat man to bring him all the gold and ſiluer he had. As he paſſed along the coaſt of Spaine,comming neere vnto new Carthage he landed ſome ſouldiours, which forraged the countrey neere vnto the ſea, and gaue an alarme vnto the whole prouince. Then he approached neere vnto the towne, and hauing kept his ſouldiours aboord the gallies in the day time,at night he put them on ſhore, towards that part of the wall whereas the Romanes had entred; ſuppoſing that Carthage had not been verie well manned with ſouldiours, and that haply ſome of the inhabitants might reuolt: but the flight of the countrey-men,and the centinels (which had diſcouered the armie at ſea the day before) had alreadie giuen aduertiſement to the town,who imagined that it was not without ſome deſigne,that the gallies had caſt anker ſo neere vnto them. Wherefore the garriſon kept themſelues in armes,and ſtood readie at the port next vnto the poole, and towards the Mago,Hannibals brother, commaunded to paſſe into Italy.

Mago ſpoils the Gadstanes.

A the ſea. The enemies came in troupes mixt of ſouldiours and mariners, vnto the foot of the wall, with more brute than effect: and then the port was ſet open, whereas the Romans made a furious ſallie vpon them, with great cries, wherewith they were ſo amazed, as at the firſt charge, they turned their backes in diſorder towards the ſea, whither they were purſued with great ſlaughter: and if their gallies had not beene verie neere to receiue them, there had not any one eſcaped. Hauing gotten aboord, they were not yet aſſured, but feared that ſome of the enemies gallies would come out of the port againſt them: wherefore they drew vp their ladders and bridges ſpeedily, and for that they would looſe no time in weighing their ankers, they cut their cables. And it happened, that many thinking to ſaue themſelues by ſwimming, Mago makes a vaine attempt vpon new Carthage.

B not able to diſcerne their gallies, by reaſon of the darkeneſſe of the night, went out of their way, and were drowned. This armie returned ſpeedily towards the Ocean, from whence they had parted. Day being come, the Romanes found aboue 800 men ſlaine, betwixt the towne and the ſhore, and aboue two thouſand cuiraſſes. To Mago (who thought to returne vnto Gades) the entrie was refuſed: wherefore he returned vnto a place neere vnto it, called Cimbis, from whence he ſent certaine gentlemen vnto Gades, to know the reaſon why they ſhut the gates againſt him, who was their friend and allie. To whom they anſwered, That it had beene done by the multitude, who had beene diſcontented at the ſpoiles and inſolencies which the ſouldiours committed, when they imbarqued. Then he ſought to draw their Suffetes out of the towne (which were thoſe that held the ſoueraign magiſtracie in that Phenici-

Suffetes, Magiſtrats of the Gaditanes.

C an nation) to parley with them, and with their chiefe treaſurer. When he had them, hee cauſed them to be ſcourged with rods, and then to be hung vpon a gibet. Which done, he ſayled towards the Pytiuſes (being iſlands ſome hundred miles from the firme land, and inhabited at that time by Carthaginians) where both he and his whole armie were well entertained, the which was not onely refreſhed with victuals, but furniſhed with ſouldiors and armes by thoſe iſlanders. Mago relying vpon theſe things, came vnto the Baleares, ſome fiftie miles from thence, thinking to winter in the greater of them, the which was rich, and full of men, with a large and ſafe port; for now Autumne drew neere: But he found himſelfe deceiued: for the inhabitants of Majorca went in hoſtile manner againſt him, no leſſe than the Romanes would haue done, and with their ſlings kept them from landing; ſo as the Carthaginians were forced Magoes tyrannous rie our againſt the Gaditanes.

D to put out to ſea, & went to Minorca, which is the other iſland of the Baleares, as fertile as the other, but not ſo ſtrong of men. There they landed, and without any great reſiſtance became maſters of the towne and iſland: where they inrolled two thouſand men of that nation, the which they ſent to Carthage to winter. When as Mago had left the Ocean, to enter into the ſtrait, the Gaditanes yeelded vnto the Romans.

The Gaditanes yeel'd vnto the Romans.

Theſe were the affaires which paſſed in Spain, vnder the gouernment of P. Corn. Scipio, who hauing reſigned the prouince and the armies vnto L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, returned to Rome with ten gallies: where being arriued, he made known vnto the Senat the great exploits of warre which he had done, the battels woon, the townes taken, and the people and countries ſubdued vnder the obedience of the Romans; finally, that in Spaine he had left no

E enemie. Theſe things were deliuered by him with great ſtate, rather to ſee if they would grant him a triumphant entrie into the citie, than to demaund a triumph: For in truth, vnto that day there had not any captaine entred in triumph into the citie of Rome, how great ſoeuer his exploits had beene, if it were not with the title of a Roman magiſtrat. Being entred into Rome, he brought into the publique treaſurie, of the remainders of the ſpoyle of Spaine, 14352 pounds of ſiluer in maſſe, and great ſtore of coined money.

The

A 1 THe 14 yere of the ſecond Punick war, which, according vnto the moſt certaine writers, was in the yeare 548 of the foundation of Rome, P. Corn. Scipio and P. Licinius Craſſus were choſen Conſuls. During their magiſtracie there grew a great war in Spaine; and from that time the Roman affaires were nothing more quiet, notwithſtanding they had chaſed away the Carthaginians: For the Spaniards, who are naturally enemies to reſt, and deſirous of libertie, and yet contemning the onely meanes to maintaine it, which is, concord and good correſpondencie, did mutine vpon euerie light occaſion. Concord the ground of liberty

B If they had beene as wiſe in that point, as they were valiant and hardie in combats, the Romanes had laboured in vaine to ſubdue this countrey, where they imployed much time, much policie, and the bloud of their beſt men. Vntill Scipioes departure, & ſome time after, the Romanes had not tried the nations dwelling in the mountaines, which runne through the middeſt of Spaine, nor thoſe which were towards the North: they had not yet extended their conqueſts farre from the Mediterranean ſea, nor gone much beyond the riuer of Betis. But afterwards they knew what difference there was among the Spaniards themſelues, when as they were mercinaries, and carried armes for anothers quarell, and when they fought for their owne liberties, houſes, and families. And as they paſt farther into the country, they found the difference betwixt thoſe who by their frequentation with ſtrangers, had accuſtomed themſelues to gaine, and to hunt after honours and delights: and the others, who be-

C ing eſtranged from all commerce, had no other ambition, but not to be ſubject to any other but to their own lawes; nor other couetouſneſſe, but of a prey conquered by arms, in the day time, and in fight, thruſt on by neceſſitie, without any other reſpect. Theſe laſt for the moſt part were of the race of the auntient Gaules and Celtes, which had crept into Spaine, and did hold all that which we call at this day Nauarre, Biſcaye, Alaua, the Aſturians, Gallicia, Caſtillia the old, and a great part of Portugall. All theſe did not know the Romanes, but as men which laboured to take away other mens goods, to chaſe them out of their countries, or to ſubject them as ſlaues, and to make their profit of them. They were long before they made any alliances with them, louing them better farre off than neere. In the meane time all theſe people of Spaine (who generally were couragious and hardie) wanted ciuilitie, and the

D knowledge of juſtice, neither knew they how to practiſe and entertaine the lawes of friendſhip among themſelues: the which at length reduced them all into ſeruitude, they of whom wee haue ſpoken, being the firſt which yeelded vnto the yoke, who had ſeene the Carthaginians and Romanes among them, and had conuerſed with them for ſome yeares. For beſides that they were before a mixt people, by the acceſſe of Grecians, Phenicians, Africanes, Celtes, and other nations, whoſe vices they had mingled with theirs, they were in the end wholly corrupted, by the promiſes and perſuaſions of either of theſe mightie commonweales, either of them ſeeking to draw aid and commoditie from them againſt the other, during the warres; whereof they were glorious, proud, and ambitious, and if they were not held in ſuch eſtimation, as they thought they had deſerued, they were diſcontented. Whereas ſtrangers abord, there vice and corruption abounds.

E They were falſe and treacherous to ſtrangers, enuious among themſelues, and alwayes apt to rebell, and to breed quarels: of which vices the Romanes (ſeeing themſelues freed from the Carthaginian warre) could wiſely make vſe to ſubject them, who let them know, that notwithſtanding all their ſeeking of the Spaniards, and the fauours and gifts wherewith they had honoured ſome of that nation, yet their meaning was alwayes to hold them in the ranke of ſubjects, and not of companions: the which their fooliſh Spaniſh preſumption could not diſcerne, vntill they were taught it to their coſt: as it happened to Mandonius and Indibilis, princes of the Ilergetes, people of Cattelonia, where as Lerida and Hueſca are at this day. The Spaniards were glorious, ambitious, enuious and treacherous.

F Theſe people being puſt vp with pride, and full of ingratitude (as ſoone as they did ſee Scipio out of Spaine, thinking there was not his like among the Romanes) in contempt of them which remained, they brake the peace, the which they had entertained onely through feare, and admiration of his vertue: and knowing that the Romans were much troubled in Italy againſt Hannibal, they preſumed they would ſend him no more backe into Spaine, and that he had carried away the beſt men with him, leauing onely new ſouldiors in Spaine, and thoſe that were of leaſt vſe for the warres. Wherefore thinking there could not be a better oppor- The laſt rebellion of Mandonius and Indibilis.

tunitie offered to effect their deſires, and to make themſelues kings of the other people of Spaine, which vnto that time had beene ſubject, ſometimes to the Carthaginians, and ſometimes to the Romans, and oftentimes to both; they acquainted their ſubjects, and the Auſetanes their neighbours, with their deſigne: vaunting, That if they maintained themſelues in vnitie, they might eaſily expell the Romans out of Spaine, as well as they had chaſed away the Carthaginians: With whom they preuailed ſo by their perſuaſions, as in few dayes they had gathered together in the fields of Sedete 30000 foot, and 4000 horſe, and there made the bodie of their army. The leaders of the Roman army, were L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, who being aduertiſed of this reuolt, meaning to preuent this miſchiefe in time, went ſpeedily to field, and paſſing quietly through the Auſetanes countrey, as friends, they came whereas the enemies were, and encamped within a league of them. There they tried firſt by meſſages and embaſſages, to diuert them from their fooliſh enterpriſe, perſuading them to lay aſide armes: but it was in vaine. Some forragers of the Romanes being charged by the Spaniſh horſe, they were forced to ſend ſome troups of horſe to ſuccour them, where there was an encounter that day, but to no effect. The day following, at the Sunne riſing, the Spaniſh armie aduanced in battel, within a mile of the Romane campe. The Auſetanes held the middeſt, hauing the Ilergetes on the right hand, and on the left ſome other Spaniards of ſmall fame. They had left betwixt the battailon in the middeſt and the two wings, a good large ſpace, to giue paſſage to their horſemen, when it ſhould be time to come to the charge. The Romanes ordered their armie after their accuſtomed manner, yet imitating the enemies therein, they left a ſpace alſo to bring in their horſemen. This done, L. Lentulus bethought himſelfe, that they ſhould make beſt vſe of thoſe horſemen which ſhould enter with them firſt into theſe ſpaces which were betwixt the ſquadrons of the enemies foot: Wherefore he commaunded Ser. Cornelius, who had charge of the Romane horſemen, to enter into thoſe ſpaces of the Spaniſh armie. In the meane time he hauing the twelft legion, being preſt in the beginning of the battell by the Ilergetes, on the left hand, made it good vntill they were ſeconded by the thirteenth legion, the which he cauſed to aduance, to ſuccour them in the front of the battell: and hauing thus aſſured that part, he ran towards L. Manlius, who did his duetie, encouraging the ſouldiours, and ſending ſupplies where he ſaw any need; aduertiſing him, that the footmen on the left wing behaued themſelues well, and that hee had ſent Ser. Cornelius with the horſemen, to charge furiouſly into the enemies troups: the effect whereof did preſently appeare: for Ser. Cornelius being entred with his horſe into the middeſt of the enemies, he made all their battel of foot to wauer, and withall ſtopt the paſſage to the enemies horſe, ſo as they could not come to fight: which made the Spaniſh horſemen to leaue their horſes. The Romane captaines ſeeing the Spaniards in ſome diſorder, they cried out, incouraged, and intreated the ſoldiours to proceed valiantly, and to keepe them from joyning together againe. The enemies began now to forſake the fight, if Indibilis leauing his horſe, had not come and preſented himſelfe in the head of the footmen. There was a long and bloudie fight, the which they maintained, vntill that Indibilis and thoſe that fought about him, were ouerthrowne and ſlaine one vpon another: then they began to flie of all hands, and the Romans to purſue them, of whom they made a great ſlaughter, and withall tooke their campe, and all their baggage. There were 13000 ſlaine vpon the place, and about 800 priſoners. Of the Romans there died two hundred, or not many more, eſpecially on the left wing. The Spaniards being thus defeated, the reſt which eſcaped retired home into their countrey.

A great army of Spaniards againſt the Romanes.

A battell betwixt the Romans and Spaniards.

The Spaniſh armie defeated.

The Spaniards being afterwards called to counſell by Mandonius, they complained much of their loſſes, and blaming the authors of this warre, they ſaid, That they were of opinion to ſend embaſſadors vnto the Romans, to beſeech them to take them to mercie, and that they would deliuer them their armes: the which they did, and excuſed themſelues, laying the fault vpon Indibilis, Mandonius, and others, which had ſolicited them. To whom the Romanes anſwered, That they would take them to mercie, vpon condition they ſhould deliuer vnto them the authors of this rebellion aliue, elſe they would intreat the Auſetanes, Ilergetes, and other their confederats, as enemies.

The Spaniards ſue to the Romans for mercie.

This anſwer being returned by their embaſſadours, Mandonius and the other authors were taken, and ſent to the Romanes to receiue the reward of their miſdeeds. By this meanes the troubles in Spaine were pacified, whereas they impoſed a double tribute for that yeare, and a con-

A contribution of corne for ſix moneths, with caſſockes and cloakes for the ſouldiors: beſides, the Romanes forced about thirtie ſeuerall prouinces to giue hoſtages.

Theſe things were done in Spaine, whileſt that P. Scipio prepared to goe into Africke, to diuert the warre which was betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians in Italie, whither he had ſent C. Lelius, Mago on the other ſide being arriued at Genes in Italie, and vpon the coaſt of the Liguſticke ſea.

3 The Saguntines (for whoſe ſake this ſecond Punicke warre betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians had beene vndertaken) had ſent embaſſadours to Rome with Scipio, to thanke the Senate for the care they had of their faithfull allies, to proteſt of the loue and affection
B the Commonweale of Sagunt had to the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to Iupiter Capitolinus his Temple; who were honourably entertained, and rewarded by the Senat: who hauing a deſire to ſee Italie, were by a publicke decree conducted and accompanied with a good gard whereſoeuer they would goe. The Saguntines ſend embaſſadors to Rome.

Some moneths after, Hannibal being out of Italie, the ſame Saguntines ſurpriſed in Spaine certaine Commiſſaries and Carthaginian captaines, with a good ſumme of money, wherewith they would haue leuied ſouldiors in that countrey, whom they ſent to Rome with their money, and preſented them to the Senate. The Commiſſaries and captaines were detained priſoners, but the mony was reſtored to the Saguntines, with thanks by the Senat: the ſumme was 250 pounds of gold, and 800 of ſiluer.

C The Spaniards were ſo entreated vnder the gouernment of L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, as of the goods and reuenues of Spaine both Rome and Italie were often relieued, with corne, apparrell, armes, and all other prouiſions which they drew from thence. In the end, the Romanes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio had giuen vnto Hannibal in Africke, and neere vnto Carthage, it was reſolued in the Senat at Rome, to call home the old ſouldiors which were in Spaine, to leaue onely a Legion of Romanes, with fifteene companies of Latines their allies, and to ſend a new Gouernour thither. Wherefore L. Corn. Lentulus returned to Rome: where hauing related what he had valiantly Ann. Rome 553 and profitably performed, he demaunded leaue to enter the citie in triumph; the which they refuſed him, being againſt the preſidents of their auncеſtors: for whoſoeuer had the conduct
D of an armie, being no Dictator, Conſul, nor Prætor, but onely holding the place of a Conſul or Prætor, did not enter in triumph into the citie: yet for that the exploits done by him were great and worthie, they were content he ſhould enter ſo in a ſort; which was not altogether ſo ſtately and pompeous as a triumph; the which in their language they called Ouatio. Hee brought into the Treaſurie 44000 pound weight of ſiluer, and 2450 pounds of gold, and of the bootie there was giuen to euery ſouldiour 120 Aſſes, which make about a crowne and a fifth part, beſides their ordinarie pay. This was during the Conſulſhip of Ser. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta: but the yeare following L. Corn. Lentulus was created Conſull, with P. Iulius Apulus, or P. Villius Tapulus; and in his place C. Corn. Cethegus was ſent into Spaine, who gaue a great defeat vnto the Spaniards in the fields of Sedeta, where there were aboue 15000 A great defeat of Spaniards.
E of the enemies ſlaine, and 78 enſignes taken. Cethegus and Manlius being afterwards called backe to Rome, the people ſent in their place Cn. Corn. Lentulus and L. Stertinius. The Senat graunted to the Gaditanes (beſides the conuentions which they had made with L. Martius Septimius) That they ſhould haue no Gouernour. L. Manlius Acidinus being returned out of Spaine, demaunded of the Senate (for that he had well and vertuouſly gouerned the affaires) That he might enter into the Senate with the ſolemnitie called Ouatio: but hee was hindered by M. Portius Lecca, Tribune of the people, who oppoſed himſelfe, for that he had not beene in that gouernment in qualitie of a Magiſtrate, but as a Vice-gerent, being leſſe fauoured therein than Lentulus his companion: wherefore he made no entrie: yet he brought in 1200 pounds of ſiluer, and ſome 30 of gold. Soone after C. Corn. Lentulus returned from
F Spaine, bringing alſo vnto the publicke treaſure 1515 pounds of gold, 20000 of ſiluer, and 3455 deniers of ſiluer coyned. L. Stertinius being alſo returned, brought 50000 pounds of ſiluer out of the farther Spaine, and of the ſpoyles he cauſed two arches to be made in the Oxe market before the Temples of Fortune and of the goddeſſe Matuta; and one in the great Liſts, vpon the which he ſet Images gilt. Cornelius* with the horſemen, to charge furiouſly into the enemies troups: the effect whereof did preſently appeare: for Ser. Cornelius being entred with his horſe into the middeſt of the enemies, he made all their battel of foot to wauer, and withall ſtopt the paſſage to the enemies horſe, ſo as they could not come to fight: which made the Spaniſh horſemen to leaue their horſes. The Romane captaines ſeeing the Spaniards in ſome diſorder, they cried out, incouraged, and intreated the ſoldiours to proceed valiantly, and to keepe them from joyning together againe. The enemies began now to forſake the fight, if Indibilis leauing his horſe, had not come and preſented himſelfe in the head of the footmen. There was a long and bloudie fight, the which they maintained, vntill that Indibilis and thoſe that fought about him, were ouerthrowne and ſlaine one vpon another: then they began to flie of all hands, and the Romans to purſue them, of whom they made a great ſlaughter, and withall tooke their campe, and all their baggage. There were 13000 ſlaine vpon the place, and about 800 priſoners. Of the Romans there died two hundred, or not many more, eſpecially on the left wing. The Spaniards being thus defeated, the reſt which eſcaped retired home into their countrey.

A great army of Spaniards againſt the Romanes.

The Spaniſh armie defeated.

The Spaniards being afterwards called to counſell by Mandonius, they complained much of their loſſes, and blaming the authors of this warre, they ſaid, That they were of opinion to ſend embaſſadors vnto the Romans, to beſeech them to take them to mercie, and that they would deliuer them their armes: the which they did, and excuſed themſelues, laying the fault vpon Indibilis, Mandonius, and others, which had ſolicited them. To whom the Romanes anſwered, That they would take them to mercie, vpon condition they ſhould deliuer vnto them the authors of this rebellion aliue, elſe they would intreat the Auſetanes, Ilergetes, and other their confederats, as enemies.

The Spaniards ſue to the Romans for mercie.

This anſwer being returned by their embaſſadours, Mandonius and the other authors were taken, and ſent to the Romanes to receiue the reward of their miſdeeds. By this meanes the troubles in Spaine were pacified, whereas they impoſed a double tribute for that yeare, and a con-

A contribution of corne for ſix moneths, with caſſockes and cloakes for the ſouldiors: beſides, the Romanes forced about thirtie ſeuerall prouinces to giue hoſtages.

Theſe things were done in Spaine, whileſt that P. Scipio prepared to goe into Africke, to diuert the warre which was betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians in Italie, whither he had ſent C. Lelius, Mago on the other ſide being arriued at Genes in Italie, and vpon the coaſt of the Liguſticke ſea.

3 The Saguntines (for whoſe ſake this ſecond Punicke warre betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians had beene vndertaken) had ſent embaſſadours to Rome with Scipio, to thanke the Senate for the care they had of their faithfull allies, to proteſt of the loue and affection
B the Commonweale of Sagunt had to the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to Iupiter Capitolinus his Temple; who were honourably entertained, and rewarded by the Senat: who hauing a deſire to ſee Italie, were by a publicke decree conducted and accompanied with a good gard whereſoeuer they would goe. The Saguntines ſend embaſſadors to Rome.

Some moneths after, Hannibal being out of Italie, the ſame Saguntines ſurpriſed in Spaine certaine Commiſſaries and Carthaginian captaines, with a good ſumme of money, wherewith they would haue leuied ſouldiors in that countrey, whom they ſent to Rome with their money, and preſented them to the Senate. The Commiſſaries and captaines were detained priſoners, but the mony was reſtored to the Saguntines, with thanks by the Senat: the ſumme was 250 pounds of gold, and 800 of ſiluer.

C The Spaniards were ſo entreated vnder the gouernment of L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, as of the goods and reuenues of Spaine both Rome and Italie were often relieued, with corne, apparrell, armes, and all other prouiſions which they drew from thence. In the end, the Romanes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio had giuen vnto Hannibal in Africke, and neere vnto Carthage, it was reſolued in the Senat at Rome, to call home the old ſouldiors which were in Spaine, to leaue onely a Legion of Romanes, with fifteene companies of Latines their allies, and to ſend a new Gouernour thither. Wherefore L. Corn. Lentulus returned to Rome: where hauing related what he had valiantly Ann. Rome 553 and profitably performed, he demaunded leaue to enter the citie in triumph; the which they refuſed him, being againſt the preſidents of their auncеſtors: for whoſoeuer had the conduct
D of an armie, being no Dictator, Conſul, nor Prætor, but onely holding the place of a Conſul or Prætor, did not enter in triumph into the citie: yet for that the exploits done by him were great and worthie, they were content he ſhould enter ſo in a ſort; which was not altogether ſo ſtately and pompeous as a triumph; the which in their language they called Ouatio. Hee brought into the Treaſurie 44000 pound weight of ſiluer, and 2450 pounds of gold, and of the bootie there was giuen to euery ſouldiour 120 Aſſes, which make about a crowne and a fifth part, beſides their ordinarie pay. This was during the Conſulſhip of Ser. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta: but the yeare following L. Corn. Lentulus was created Conſull, with P. Iulius Apulus, or P. Villius Tapulus; and in his place C. Corn. Cethegus was ſent into Spaine, who gaue a great defeat vnto the Spaniards in the fields of Sedeta, where there were aboue 15000
E of the enemies ſlaine, and 78 enſignes taken. Cethegus and Manlius being afterwards called backe to Rome, the people ſent in their place Cn. Corn. Lentulus and L. Stertinius. The Senat graunted to the Gaditanes (beſides the conuentions which they had made with L. Martius Septimius) That they ſhould haue no Gouernour. L. Manlius Acidinus being returned out of Spaine, demaunded of the Senate (for that he had well and vertuouſly gouerned the affaires) That he might enter into the Senate with the ſolemnitie called Ouatio: but hee was hindered by M. Portius Lecca, Tribune of the people, who oppoſed himſelfe, for that he had not beene in that gouernment in qualitie of a Magiſtrate, but as a Vice-gerent, being leſſe fauoured therein than Lentulus his companion: wherefore he made no entrie: yet he brought in 1200 pounds of ſiluer, and ſome 30 of gold. Soone after C. Corn. Lentulus returned from
F Spaine, bringing alſo vnto the publicke treaſure 1515 pounds of gold, 20000 of ſiluer, and 3455 deniers of ſiluer coyned. L. Stertinius being alſo returned, brought 50000 pounds of ſiluer out of the farther Spaine, and of the ſpoyles he cauſed two arches to be made in the Oxe market before the Temples of Fortune and of the goddeſſe Matuta; and one in the great Liſts, vpon the which he ſet Images gilt. The gouernment of Spaine giuen to two Pretors.

C. Corn. Cethegus and Quin. Minutius Rufus being Conſuls at Rome, Spaine hauing vntill that time beene but one Conſularie Prouince, gouerned by two Pro-conſuls, was diuided into two gouernments, and two Pretors ſent thither, who had charge to make a diuiſion of their juriſdictions, whereof the one ſhould be called the hither Spaine, and the other the farther: but not as before, when as the riuer of Ebro made the limit, for the hither Spaine paſſed much beyond it. C. Sempronius Tuditanus was ſent into the hither Spaine, and Marc. Heluius into the other, for Pretors. Both of them were intangled with great and doubtfull warres: for a-gainſt Heluius there did riſe Colca and Lucinius, great noblemen of Spaine, who conſpired with H many good townes, as Cardona, Bardona, and many others vpon the ſea coaſt, which had not yet reuolted. As for C. Sempronius Tuditanus, hee was defeated in his gouernment, and ſo wounded, as he died ſoone after.

Wherefore L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claud. Marcellus being created Conſuls, Qu. Fabius Buteo and Q. Minutius Thermus were ſent Pretors into Spaine, either of them with a legion of Romane ſouldiors, and foure thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, Latines, of their allies. Thus the warre reuiued in Spaine the fifth yeare, after the end of the ſecond Punicke warre; and from that time the Romanes had to deale with the Spaniards alone, without any ſupport of the Carthaginians. The danger of this warre was ſo apprehended by the Senate, that one of the two Conſuls, with a Conſular armie of two legions, fiue thouſand I foot and fiue hundred horſe of their allies, Latines, ſhould goe in perſon with twentie gallies, and ſuch a number of other veſſels, as ſhould bee fit to tranſport his armie. L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Portius Cato were created Conſuls: Spaine was allotted vnto Cato, to whom Anno 558. M. Portius Cato Conſul ſent into Spaine.

P. Manlius was appointed as Pretor in the hither part of Spaine neere vnto Gaule, and Appius Claudius Nero in the further Spaine. To theſe Pretors were appointed (beſides the legion which either of the Gouernours in Spaine then had) two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, newly leuied.

Whileſt theſe things were preparing, Q. Minutius Thermus came to battaile with Budares and Beſaſides, two commanders of the Spaniards, neere vnto Turbe, where he defeated them, and ſlew about twelue thouſand of their men, tooke Budares priſoner, and put the reſt in rout. K

The Spaniards defeated by Q. Minutius Thermus.

Theſe newes did ſomewhat reuiue the people of Rome, who were mightily perplexed for theſe warres of Spaine. M. Portius Cato being Conſull, paſſed into Spaine the ſixt yeare after the peace made betwixt the Romans and the Carthaginians, to reduce that Prouince wholly vnto the obedience of the people of Rome: wherein his ſeuere carriage did much auaile: for mildneſſe is not alwaies fit for all nations, nor for all diſeaſes. He embarked his armie in the riuer of Genes, whither he had drawne fiue and twentie ſhips of warre, whereof there were twentie of the ſtate of Rome, and fiue of their allies, with a great number of others. They arriued ſafely at Roſas, then called Rhoda, at the foot of the Pyrenees, where they chaſed away a garriſon of Spaniards which held the caſtle. From thence he paſſed to Empurias, and there he landed his ſouldiors. At that time Empurias was a double towne, diuided with wals, the L one inhabited by Grecians iſſued from Phocea (from whence alſo the Marſilians came) the other by Spaniards. The Greeke towne was in a manner all in the ſea, and was not much aboue foure hundred paces in circuit: the Spaniards habitation was much more, containing about three thouſand paces; alwaies liuing in jealouſie one of another, aſſured onely by their diligent gard, and continuall diſcipline of warre, as if the enemie had beene at their gates. The Grecians entertained no Spaniard within their wals, neither did they goe out raſhly towards the land: the ſea was free for all men. Amid theſe jealouſies they receiued great commodities one from another: for the Spaniards (who were very ignorant of nauigation) had many ſtrange commodities from the Grecians, and did furniſh them in exchange with the fruits of their countrey. This traffique was the cauſe that the Spaniards towne was open vnto the M Grecians, who for their better ſafeties were allied vnto the Romanes, and maintained themſelues with as great loyaltie in their friendſhip, as the Marſilians themſelues could doe, although they were not ſo mightie. The Conſull Cato arriuing there, they receiued him with all the honour and bountie they could. He ſtayed there ſome time to diſcouer what forces

A the enemies might haue, and where they were; and for that hee would not ſpend the time in idleneſſe, he cauſed his ſouldiors to be trained. Catoes arriuall was in harueſt: wherefore he did forbid the purueyors and Commiſſaries to make any prouiſion of corne, but ſent them backe to Rome, ſaying, That the warre could maintaine it ſelfe. Departing from Empurias, he put the enemies countrey to ſacke by fire and ſword, and filled all with terror.

Souldiors ſhould be alwaies in action.

A ſharpe beginning of the warre.

At the ſame time M. Heluius meaning to retire out of baſe Spaine, which he had gouerned, being accompanied with 6000 men, which the Pretor Appius Claudius had giuen him for conuoy, he was encountred by the way with 20000 Celtiberians, neere vnto the towne of Illiturge (either that which Scipio had deſtroyed, being repaired, or another of that name) whom
B he did fight withall, and vanquiſh, and ſlew 12000 men: then he tooke Illiturge, where he put all the inhabitants aboue the age of 14 yeres to the ſword: and from thence he came vnto Catoes campe: from whence hee afterwards paſſed to Rome; into the which he made a ſolemne entrie, with ouation, for that hee had gouerned his prouince happily. Hee brought 14732 pounds of ſiluer in maſſe, 17000 Bigats (which is a piece of coyne, ſtampt with a chariot drawn with two horſes) and of the ſiluer of Oſca 120438. Preſently after Heluius, Q. Minutius Thermus returned to Rome, who had the honour of a triumph; which was the firſt that was graunted, by reaſon of his victories in the wars of Spaine: he brought alſo into the Treaſurie 34800 pounds of ſiluer, 78000 Bigats, and 278000 of Oſca.

A notable victorie gotten by the Pretor Heluius.

Qu. Minutius Thermus triumphed firſt at Rome for his victories in Spain.

In the meane time the Conſul Cato was not farre encamped from Empurias, whereas three
C embaſſadours came vnto him from Biliſtages, Lord of the Ilergetes; among the which was one of his ſons, complaining, That their caſtles were beſieged by the other Spaniards, whom they could not reſiſt, but with aid from the Romanes. That if it pleaſed him to ſend them fiue thouſand men, it would be ſufficient to force the enemie to retyre. The Conſull anſwered, That he was moued with the danger wherein they were: but he had not at that time ſuch forces, as he might with ſafetie ſend away ſo great a number, eſpecially being not farre from the enemie, with whom he expected to fight euery day. The embaſſadours hearing theſe words, caſt themſelues at his feet, and embracing his knees, beſought him, not to abandon them in their great neceſſitie, ſeeing the Romanes were the onely refuge they had in this world: they let him vnderſtand, That if they would haue falſified their faith, and conſpired with others
D that were reuolted, they might eaſily haue auoided that danger; but they would not doe it, although they had beene ſollicited with threats and terrifyings, hoping, that the ſupport of the Romanes ſhould be their warrant: but if that ſhould faile them, and that the Conſull ſhould refuſe to aid and defend them, they did proteſt before God and men, That they ſhould be forced to leaue the Romane partie, leaſt they ſhould fall into the miſeries and calamities of them of Sagunt. That day Cato made them no other anſwer, yet he did not leaue to meditate thereon all night, to find ſome meanes to free the Ilergetes from this danger, and not to diminiſh his forces: for that would haue ſtayed him from fighting with the enemie, as he deſired; or elſe in fighting he might be too weake and in danger. In the end he conſidered, that hypocriſie and diſſembling in warre haue oftentimes auailed much, and that thoſe which attend ſuccors, E being perſuaded to haue them ſpeedily, haue often vpon this hope taken courage, and grown ſo reſolute, as they haue preſerued themſelues: Wherefore the next day he told the embaſſadours, That he was content for their ſakes to incommodate himſelfe, and that notwithſtanding that he had great occaſion to employ his ſouldiours, yet he would ſend them ſuccours. Hereupon he commaunded they ſhould take the third part of all the companies, and that they ſhould prepare victuals and ſhips to embarke them the third day. Whereupon he ſent away two of theſe embaſſadours, to carrie newes to Biliſtages and the Ilergetes, retaining the third, who was ſonne to Biliſtages, making him good cheare, and honouring him with preſents. The embaſſadours before their departure ſaw the troupes embarked, and being very well ſatisfied, went away, making great bruit of theſe ſuccours. The Conſull thinking that he had F made ſhew ynough, cauſed the ſouldiors to land againe, and to returne to the campe. And for that the ſeaſon began to grow vnfit to make warre, he cauſed Winter lodgings to be made for the armie, within a myle of Empurias, from whence he ſent the ſouldiors on euery ſide to ſpoyle the enemies countrey. Leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the campe, he made them goe forth in the night, that they might goe the farther without diſcouerie, and more eaſily ſurpriſe the Spaniards. In this manner he did exerciſe his new ſouldiours, and ſurpriſed many of the enemies, who durſt no more goe out of their forts. Cato hauing by this meanes ſufficiently tried the hearts both of his owne men and of the Spaniards, he called the Captaines, Knights, and Centeniers together, and ſaid vnto them: That it was now time to ſet their hands to the worke which they had ſo much deſired, to ſhew their vertue by a battaile, and not by rauinging and ſpoyling, as they had hitherto done, and that they muſt no more buſie themſelues with the prey of the champian countrey, but prepare themſelues to enioy the riches of townes. The eſtate of the affaires in Spaine (ſaid he) is reduced to that point, that whereas in the time of our predeceſſors, when as there was neither captaine nor armie for the Romanes in this region, they did capitulate, That their power and command ſhould extend vnto the riuer of Ebro: and now when there is a Conſull, two Pretors, and three Armies, and that the Carthaginians haue beene wholly excluded for theſe tenne yeares, wee haue not in a manner any thing on this ſide that riuer. We muſt then recouer it by our armes and valour, and reduce this nation (which hath beene accuſtomed to begin warre with more raſhneſſe, than to maintaine it vertuouſly) vnto the yoake, which they would ſhake of: wherefore goe and refreſh your ſelues, and be readie to depart this night. About midnight he diſlodged, that he might encampe at his pleaſure, before the enemie ſhould haue any intelligence. So as taking a long circuit, he marched beyond the Spaniards armie; and when as day began to breake, he put his men in battaile, and ſent three companies of foot vnto the rampier of their campe.

Catos ſpeech to the captaines.

Cato ſeekes to make his ſouldiors hardie by conſtraint, taking all places of retreat from them.

The Spaniards being amazed to ſee their enemies behind them, ran to armes: then the Conſull ſaid vnto his ſouldiors: There is now no more hope but in our valour, the which I haue done of purpoſe; for the enemie lyes midway betwixt vs and our lodging: all that is behind vs is the enemies; wherefore there is no better ſafetie than to truſt to our owne vertues. He then cauſed his companies which were gone to skirmiſh, to retyre, as if they would haue fled, that he might draw forth the enemie, as hee did: for the Spaniards (thinking that the Romanes had retyred for feare) left their campe, and came out armed, filling the place betwixt their trenches and the Romanes armie, and there put themſelues confuſedly and haſtily into battaile: but the Conſull gaue them no leiſure, but cauſed certaine troupes of horſemen to aduance, who came and charged theſe Barbarians thus diſordered: but the Romanes on the right hand were preſently repulſed, and, retyring in haſt, had almoſt put the footmen in rout. The Conſull perceiuing this, he preſently ſent two bands of foot, who paſſing along the enemies right flanke, preſented themſelues behind, before the battaillons of foot came to joyne: the which did ſo amaze the enemies, as the partie which before was doubtfull for the Romans, by reaſon of the diſorder of their horſe, was now almoſt equall: yet both the horſe and foot on the right wing were ſo troubled, as the Conſull could hardly make them ſtand firme: yea, he was forced to take ſome by the hands, to turne them againſt the enemie. Whileſt they did fight with their darts a farre off, the encounter was doubtfull: yea, the Romanes wauering on the right wing, could hardly be kept in order. On the left wing and in front the Spaniards were ſorely preſt, and beſides, they feared thoſe companies which came in the rere to charge them: but when they were approched, and ſo joyned, as no blow fell in vaine, and that there remained no hope but in their reſolutions and valours, being come to the ſword, and that Cato had refreſhed his tyred men with new troupes, which charged the enemie like lightening, then were they forced and put to rout, ſo as they did what they could to ſaue themſelues in their campe. Then Cato galloping to the ſecond Legion, which he had reſerued for ſuccours, he cauſed them to aduaunce ſpeedily towards the enemies campe, to force it, but with ſuch order, as if any one aduaunced too faſt, or went out of his ranke, he beat him into his order with a jaueline which he carried, commaunding the colonels and captaines to doe the like. Now did the Roman armie giue an aſſault vnto the enemies rampiers & paliſadoes, who defended themſelues valiantly, repulſing their enemies with ſtones, ſtaues, and other arms: where a new Legion arriuing, the combat was more furious, both parties growing more couragious; the one through hope, the other through deſpaire. The Conſull riding about the campe, obſerued what part was worſt manned, or weakleſt defended: and finding that the gate on the left hand was but ill furniſhed with men, he ſent ſome of the formoſt rankes of the ſecond Legion thither, and ſuch as carried long ſtaues, who forced the gard which was at this gate, and entred into the campe. The Spaniards ſeeing the enemies within their trenches, leaue their armes and enſignes, flye out of their ports, and caſt themſelues ouer their rampiers, euery man ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe, and one hindering another with haſt, ſo as there was a great ſlaughter of them

A them that fled, and their baggage was all taken. Some hold, that there died in this battaile fortie thouſand Spaniards. There are three commendable things noted in Cato in this action: Firſt, to take all hope of ſafetie from his ſouldiors, but by their armes and vertue, he had led them far from their campe and ſhips, betwixt the enemies campe and his countrey: Secondly, that he did ſend two companies behind the enemies armie, whileſt that he charged them in front: and for the third, that he had reſerued the ſecond Legion behind the reſt, and led them in good order to aſſayle the enemies campe, whileſt that all the other troupes were disbanded and buſie in fight. A great ſlaughter of Spaniards.

After this great victorie, he gaue his ſouldiors no great reſt: for being a little refreſhed in
B their campe, he led them to ſpoyle the enemies countrey; the which they did ouerrun at their pleaſures, for that they were all fled. This was the cauſe which made the Spaniards of Empuria to yeeld, and many other people thereabouts. There were many inhabitants of other Cities and Communalties fled to Empuria, whom Cato cauſed to come before him, and courteouſly entreated them, commaunding to giue them meat and drinke, and then he ſent them home to their houſes. Soone after he marched with his armie towards Tarracone, and in all places where he paſſed, he met with the embaſſadours of townes, which yeelded vnto him; ſo as all Spaine on this ſide Ebro was reduced vnder the obedience of the people of Rome before he came to Tarracone: and from all places there were preſented vnto him and freely giuen an infinite number of priſoners, Romanes, Latines, and other allies, which
C had beene taken by diuers accidents. The bruite was, That hee would lead his armie into Turditane, which is the furtheſt part of Spaine, towards the ſtrait, and ſome ſayd, That he would paſſe vnto the mountaines and places vnknowne. Vpon this falſe bruit, there were ſeuen ſtrong places in the countrey of the Bargiſtanes which rebelled, whom hee ſubdued without any great toyle, or memorable combate: but ſoone after the Conſull being returned to Tarracone, they rebelled againe; ſo as hee leading his armie thither againe, ſubdued them: but they eſcaped not ſo good cheape as at the firſt; for he cauſed them all to be ſold for ſlaues by the drumme, to the end they ſhould trouble the peace no more. The Spaniards alwaies apt to rebell. Catos ſeueritie in the Spaniards relapſe.

In the meane time the Pretor P. Manlius hauing receiued the armie from his predeceſ-
D ſour Qu. Minutius, and being joyned with that which Appius Claudius Nero had in the farther Spaine, all old bands, he marched into the countrey of Turditania (the which is Andalouſia) and the countrey adjoyning. The Turditanians were eſteemed the worſt warriours among all the people of Spaine; yet truſting in their multitudes, they came to encounter the Romans: when the Romane horſemen diſordered them at the firſt charge; then the Legions arriuing, they put them wholly to rout. But the war was not thus ended: for the Turditanians did entertaine in pay ten thouſand Celtiberians, and continued to make warre with theſe mercinaries.

The Conſull being incenſed at the double rebellion of the Bargiſtanes, vſed his natu-
E rall rigor and ſeueritie againſt all the Spaniards which dwelt on this ſide the riuer of Ebro: for he diſarmed them all, thinking, that if they were armed, they would vpon any occaſion fall into rebellion. This was taken ſo diſdainefully by theſe people, as many grew furiouſly mad, and ſlew themſelues: A nation in truth fierce and warlike, who eſteemed not that life which paſſed without armes: Whereof the Conſull being aduertiſed, he cauſed the Senatours of all the townes of that countrey to come vnto him, to whom he ſayd: That what hee had done, was more for their profites, than any intereſt of the Romanes: For when they were to make warre, you know (ſaid he) it was decided with more misfortune and loſſe for the Spaniards, than trouble or paine for the Romanes: Wherefore to preſerue you hereafter from ruine, I thought there was but one onely meanes; which is, to keepe you from rebelling: Let vs then bethinke our ſelues of the mildeſt courſe, and giue me your aduice; beleeue me I will not willingly entertaine any, but what you ſhall giue. Theſe Senatours demaunded time to aduiſe thereon: and being called againe, they anſwered not any thing. Whereupon the Conſull cauſed all their townes to be demanteled in one day: and from thence marched with his armie againſt their neighbours, which were yet in armes, whom he brought to obedience, namely, Segeſtica, a towne of great importance, and rich, the which he tooke by ſappe. It was a greater difficultie for Cato to ſubdue theſe people of Spaine, than it had beene for the firſt captaines which The Spaniards eſteemed not the life which paſſed without armes. Cato demanteles the townes in Spaine.

which came thither for the Romanes, when the Carthaginians did rule there: for at that time if the Spaniards were wearie of the Carthaginians commaund, they had recourſe vnto the Romanes: but Cato making warre againſt them, they had no other refuge, but from an vſurped libertie they muſt fall into ſlauerie. Finally, he found all this Prouince altered, ſome hauing taken armes, ſome being beſieged by their neighbours, to force them to take armes; who (if they had not beene preuented in time) would haue alſo rebelled with the reſt. This Conſull had ſuch an actiue ſpirit, as all things both great and ſmall muſt paſſe through his hands, neither did he thinke it ſufficient to reſolue, diſcourſe, and commaund that which he held fit to be done, but he himſelfe did execute many things; neither was he more ſtrict and ſeuere to any one in his commaundements, than to his owne perſon. There was not any one to be found in his armie, that did watch, faſt, and toyle more than himſelfe. Finally, he had no aduantage among thoſe that he commaunded, but the honour to commaund.

The Turditane warre grew more difficult to P. Manlius, by reaſon of the mercinarie Celtiberians: wherefore the Conſull being called thither by letters from the Pretor, he marched with his armie. At his arriuall he found, that the Turditanes had their campe diuided from the Celtiberians: being encamped, the Romans had continuall skirmiſhes and light encounters with the Turditanes, who had alwaies the worſt. As for the Celtiberians, he cauſed them to be ſolicited by the colonels and captaines of his armie, propounding vnto them the choice of three conditions: If they would turne vnto the Romanes, they ſhould haue double the pay which the Turditanes had promiſed them: or if they would retyre to their houſes without taking any partie, they promiſed them abolition of all which they had done: and for the third, if they deſired warre, they ſhould come to field, and preſent themſelues in battaile. The Celtiberians demaunded reſpite to make anſwere, and then did communicate theſe propoſitions in open Councell to the Turditanes; where there was great contention, but no concluſion: ſo as many daies paſſed without any aſſurance of peace or warre: during the which, the Romanes ouerrun the enemies countrey, and ſpoyled their townes, as if it had beene in open warre: oftentimes making priuat treaties and accords, they entred, went and came into their forts. The Conſull Cato ſeeing that hee could not draw the enemie to battaile, hee firſt ſent ſome troupes with their enſignes, to ſpoyle that part of the countrey where they had not yet beene: then hearing, that the Celtiberians had all their baggage in the towne of Seguntia, he went thither to take it; and yet could hee not draw them out of their campe. In the end hauing muſtered and payed his armie, he left all the forces with the Pretor, and returned with ſeuen bands (which made about 3500 men) towards the riuer of Ebro. With theſe few men he tooke townes, and forced obedience from the Sedetanes, Auſetanes, and Sueſſetanes. As for the Lacetanes, (a people dwelling in a ſauage countrey, and out of the way) beſides that their rough and barbarous diſpoſition kept them in armes, they had highly offended the Romanes, whileſt that the Conſull was buſie in warre vpon the marches of the Turdules, ouerrunning and ſpoyling the lands of their allies: Wherefore the Conſull led vnto the ſiege of their towne not onely the Romane bands, but alſo the youth of thoſe allies, whom they had wronged. This towne was long, but not very broad. Encamping within foure hundred paces of it; there he placed certaine choſen companies, commaunding them not to ſtirre, vntill he returned vnto them, and then he led the reſt of his forces vnto the other ſide of the towne. There were a great number of Sueſſetane ſoldiors among the ſtrangers allies, whom he cauſed to march againſt the towne, and to aſſayle the wall. Theſe being diſcouered by the Lacetanes, and knowne by their armes and enſignes to be ſouldiors of Sueſſe, whoſe territorie they had ſpoyled at their pleaſure, and many times defeated their troupes, they ſallied out vpon them: but the Sueſſetanes ſcarce ſeeing them approach, crying out and ſhaking their armes, fled, and the others purſued them. The Conſull, who expected no leſſe, gallopped along the wals vnto the companies which he had left on the other ſide; and whileſt the townesmen purſued the Sueſſetanes, he ſeized vpon their towne being vnmanned, and tooke it, before the townesmen were returned from the chaſe, forcing them to yeeld vnto his mercie. Preſently after this exploit, he went againſt a ſtrong towne, called Vergium, which was the receptacle of all the theeues in the countrey, who robbed and ſpoyled all men which dwelt thereabouts, or paſſed that way. The Lord of the place came foorth preſently to meet with the Conſull, excuſing himſelfe, That neither he nor his ſubjects did wrong any man, but that certain theeues being

This towne it may be is that which they now call Iacca.

A being receiued into the towne, they had made themſelues maſters thereof. The Conſull ſaid vnto him, That if it were ſo, he ſhould returne into the towne, and find ſome meanes (when he ſhould giue an aſſault) to ſeize vpon the citadell or fort, with them of his faction, whileſt the theeues were buſie to defend the walls. This was cunningly put in practiſe, and the theeues which held the towne were ſurpriſed in diuers places, being encountred on the one ſide by the Romane armie, and on the other ſide by them of the fort. Thus Cato woon this place, and hauing pardoned them which held the fort, with their kinsfolkes and friends, graunting them their liues and goods, he commaunded the Treaſurer to ſell all the reſt of the Vergeſtanes for ſlaues, to them that would giue moſt: and as for the theeues and robbers, he
B cauſed them all to be hanged.

By theſe actions the Conſull Cato had reduced the Prouince to more quietneſſe, and then he began to diſpoſe of the publicke reuenues for the Romanes in theſe countries, renting out the mynes of yron and ſiluer, which made it rich. The yeare of his Conſulſhip being ended, he returned to Rome, whereas P. Corn. Scipio the ſecond time, and Titus Semp. Longus had beene created Conſuls. There he entred in triumph, and brought into the Treaſurie 25000 pounds of ſiluer in maſſe, 123000 Bigats, and 540 of Oſca, with 1400 pounds of gold. Beſides, there was payed vnto euery footman 370 Aſſes, and thrice as much to euery horſeman, Cato ſaying, That euery one muſt taſt of their ſpoyles.

8 There were ſent into Spaine for Pretors P. Cor. Scipio, ſonne to Cn. couſin to the other,
C for the further Spaine, and Sex. Digitius (it may be it was he which was honoured with a murall crowne at the taking of new Carthage) into the hither part. As for the armies, that of the Pretors was entertained, and the Conſuls caſt. One of theſe Gouernours was more fortunate than the other: for P. Scipio did not onely defend all that which belonged vnto his prouince, but put the Luſitanians (who came to aſſayle him) to rout. Sex. Digitius had many great troubles in his gouernment, and many vnfortunate encounters, ſo as he deliuered not halfe the men which he had receiued at his comming, to his ſucceſſor: and without doubt all Spaine had riſen, if the other Pretor had done no better. P. Corn. ſonne to Cn. by his iudgement and dexteritie did ſo terrifie the enemies in the fartheſt parts of Spaine, as aboue fiftie Townes and Communalties yeelded vnto him. After the expiration of his gouernment, D attending his ſucceſſour, he ſet vpon certaine Luſitanian theeues, who returned with a great bootie, which they had taken from the ſubjects and allies of the Romanes: and although he were in great perplexitie and danger in this charge, deſpairing almoſt of the victorie, for the which (if he did obtaine it) he did vow games to Iupiter Olympicus: yet he woon it, and (being much inferior in number of ſouldiors) defeated the Luſitanians; where hee ſlew twelue thouſand vpon the place, tooke fiue hundred and fortie priſoners, all horſemen, and carried away an hundred thirtie foure Enſignes, hauing loſt very few of his men. This encounter was neere vnto the towne of Ilipa, whither the Pretor went with his armie, and brought foorth all the bootie that was recouered, ſuffering euery one to carrie away the goods and cattell which had beene taken from him by the enemie, and cauſing the reſt to E be ſold, with the which the ſouldiors were recompenced. Scipio obtained this victorie in qualitie of Vice-Pretor.

9 L. Corn. Merula and Q. Minutius Thermus being created Conſuls at Rome, C. Flaminius was choſen Pretor for the hither part of Spaine, and M. Fuluius Nobilior for the further: C. Flaminius ſhould ſucceed Sex. Digitius, to repaire the bad ſucceſſe which had happened during his gouernment. He demaunded of the Senat, That he might take one of the Legions appointed for the citie, and that mingling with them ſuch ſouldiors as he ſhould leuie, he might chuſe out of the whole number 6500 foot & 300 horſe; and that with this Legion thus made, he might vndertake the affaires: for he did not much relye vpon thoſe forces which remained with Sext. Digitius, the which were in a manner ruined, ſaying, That the warre growing hote
F in Spaine, they might not goe vnfurniſhed; ſpeaking of the good and bad ſucceſſe of that Prouince, as well by himſelfe, as by his friends, much to his owne aduantage. The auncient Senatours were not of opinion, That the Senat ſhould make any decrees vpon the reports of priuat men in fauour of magiſtrats, and that they muſt not giue credit to that which was ſpoken touching matters of gouernment, if it were not aduertiſed by the Gouernors themſelues, or embaſſadours ſent to relate the ſucceſſe. Finally, the Senat reſolued, That if there were any troubles in Spaine, they ſhould leuie men there: yet they write, That C. Flaminius went into Sicile, where he enrolled certaine bands; and that paſſing from thence into Spaine, he was caſt vpon the coaſt of Africke, where he tooke an oath of ſome ſouldiours which he found there, being the remainders of the armie of P. Scipio Africanus: and that beſides all theſe, he leuied men in Spaine. But whatſoeuer he did, yet he found not the affaires of Spaine ſo difficult as they had giuen it out. Being in his gouernment (which extended vnto the Oretanes) he tooke the towne of Ilucia, and hauing lodged his ſouldiours to Winter, there were many light skirmiſhes betwixt him and the Spaniards, whereas he had not alwayes the better, but loſt many of his men. G

The other Pretor which gouerned the further Spaine did great exploits: for he fought a battaile with the Vacceans, Vectons, and Celtiberians all together, neere vnto Tolede, put them in rout, and defeated them, taking their king Hilerme aliue. The yeare following the gouernment was continued to theſe two Pretors. Flaminius tooke the towne of Litabrum by force, the which was ſtrong and very rich: he alſo tooke Corribilo, a nobleman of great fame, priſoner. Fulvius in the further Spaine did fight happily with two armies, tooke the townes of Veſcelia and Holo from the Spaniards, with many caſtles, ſome by force, and ſome by compoſition: and then paſſing by the Oretanes country, he ſeized vpon Nobilia & Cuſibis, and came vnto the riuer of Tayo, on the which Toledo ſtood, a ſmall town, but ſtrong of ſituation: whilſt he did batter it, an armie of the Vectons came to ſuccour it, but he defeated it: then continuing his ſiege and batterie, he tooke the towne. This done, he returned to Rome, L. Emilius Paulus being choſen to ſucceed him, when as P. Cor. Scipio, ſonne to Cn. and M. Attilius Glabrio were Conſuls. He entred into Rome with the ſolemnitie of Ouation, bringing into the common treaſurie 130000 Bigats of ſiluer, 12000 pounds of ſiluer in maſſe, and 127 pounds of gold. C. Flaminius was continued in his Pretorſhip in the hither Spaine. H

10 But whereas other Pretors had but ſix officers which caried rods and axes before them, L. Emilius had twelue, ſo as his Pretorſhip was equall with the honor & dignitie of a Conſul. To either of theſe Pretors (beſides the armies which were in the countrey) were appointed a ſupplie of 3000 foot and 300 horſe, newly leuied; two third parts of them of their allies, and the other third part of Romane citizens. Paulus did twice defeat the barbarous Spaniards in battaile, and ſlew 30000, hauing taken his aduantage vpon the paſſage of a riuer. He brought vnder the obedience of the Romanes 250 places, by their voluntarie yeelding, and yet with the honour of all theſe gallant exploits he returned to Rome, hauing not enriched himſelfe one dragma during his gouernment; the which is a rare thing in a man of commaund. His gouernment being then continued for another yeare, he did ſomewhat blemiſh the glorie of his victories, by a notable rout which he had in the Baſtitanes countrey, whereas he loſt 6000 men vpon the place, the reſt of his army recouered their campe with great difficultie, and then was forced with long marches to retyre himſelfe into places of more ſafetie: but afterwards attending the comming of L. Bebius, who ſhould ſucceed him, he was reuenged of the Luſitanians for his former loſſe, of whom, he ſlew 18000, tooke 330, and woon their campe, with their baggage.

L. Bebius had beene choſen at Rome to ſucceed him: but as he marched by the riuer of the Liguſticke ſea, he was ſet vpon by certaine Ligurians, who ſlew moſt part of his men, and himſelfe being wounded, hee was forced to ſaue himſelfe in Marſeilles, with a ſmall number, and without vſhers, whereas the third day after he died. Theſe newes being ſent to Rome by them of Marſeilles, the Senat appointed, That P. Brutus in the Pretors place ſhould take the gouernment of the further Spaine, and leauing the armie and prouince of Tuſcane to one of his lieutenants, he ſhould ſpeedily depart. In the other part of Spaine, neerer vnto Gaule, L. Plautius Hipſeus was appointed in C. Flaminius place, whoſe gouernment was reaſonably quiet.

A and ſlew 6000 vpon the place: but as he gaue an aſſault to the towne of Aſta (the which was taken without any great reſiſtance) he was wounded, and died ſoone after. L. Manlius the other Vice-Pretor had an encounter with the Celtiberians in his gouernment, yet no man knew who had the victorie; onely the Celtiberians diſlodged the night following, confeſſing thereby, that they were vanquiſhed. The Romans being maſters of the field, had leyſure to burie their dead, and to gather vp their ſpoyles. He that leaues the field, confeſſeth he is vanquiſhed.

Within few dayes after the Celtiberians hauing augmented their forces, they came and aſſayled the Romanes neere to Calaguris, which now is Calahorra, but they were beaten, and loſt 12000 men vpon the place, 2000 were taken priſoners, and they were chaſed out of their The Celtiberians defeated.

And ſuch was the heat of this victorie, that if they had not beene reſtrained by the comming of the new Pretors, the Celtiberians had beene wholly ſubdued. Quintius and Calphurnius, as ſoone as they were within their prouinces, lodged their armies to Winter. L. Manlius being returned to Rome, made his entrie with the ceremonie called Ouatio, whither he brought 52 crownes of gold, 132 pounds of gold, 16300 pounds of ſiluer, and declared in open Senate, That beſides all that, his Treaſurer Qu. Fabius brought 10000 pounds of ſiluer and 80 pounds of gold, to be put into the common Treaſurie.

11 The Spring time being come, the two Pretors went to field with their armies, and Beturia now called Eſtremadura.
joyned together in Beturia, marching towards the Carpetanians countrey, where the ene-
C mies were then in field. The beginning of their exploits was not very ſucceſſefull, but in the end they made reparation of their errors. The fight began betwixt the forragers on either ſide, neere vnto the townes of Hippo and Tolede; to whoſe ſuccours there came ſome from either army, and in the end all their forces came thither: ſo as the Spaniards ſeeing themſelues in a conuenient place for their manner of fighting, the two Romane armies were defeated in this vnexpected skirmiſh, and repulſed with great diſorder and amazement, within their The Romans defeated, but the Spaniards can not purſue the victorie.
palliſadoes and rampiers, and yet the enemies could not follow their good fortunes. The Pretors fearing to be aſſaulted, diſlodged in the night: and at the breake of day the Spaniards preſented themſelues before the trenches; but ſeeing no ſhew of any enemie, they entred into the campe, whereas they made bootie of that which the Romanes could not carrie away with D them. This done, they ſtayed there ſome dayes, without attempting any thing. The Romans loſt in this combat and in the flight about fiue thouſand men, of their citizens and allies, with whoſe ſpoyles the Spaniards armed themſelues, and marched towards the banks of Tayo. All the reſpite the Romane Pretors had, they employed it to fill vp their bands with Spaniſh ſouldiors of their friends and allies, and to aſſure the reſt which had bin beaten. Wherefore when as they did ſee their forces reaſonably well repaired, and their ſouldiours hearts reuiued (who demaunded nothing more than the enemie, to reuenge the diſgrace which they had receiued) they came and encamped within twelue miles of the riuer of Tayo: when as a good part of the night was ſpent, they tooke vp their enſignes, and came by the breake of day to the riuers ſide, whereas they put themſelues into a ſquare battaile. The enemies were on the other ſide, en-
E camped on the ſide of a hill, and the Romans hauing found a foord in two places paſſed ouer; Quintius on the right hand, and Calphurnius on the left, but the enemie moued not: who being The Spaniards know not how to embrace the occaſion.
amazed at their ſuddaine arriuall, ſpent time in conſultation what they ſhould do, when they might haue diſordered all the Roman armie, being troubled at the paſſage of this riuer. In the end all paſſed, both ſouldiors & baggage, the which they laid all together: for they neither had any conuenient place, nor any leiſure to make any trenches, nor to plant their campe, for that the enemie began to arme, ſo as they put themſelues in order to fight, placing the ſtrength of their armie (which conſiſted in two Legions) in the middeſt. The field betwixt both enemies lay open, which did aſſure them from ambuſhes and ſurpriſes. The Spaniards ſeeing theſe two Legions in two great ſquadrons, put themſelues in battaile on the riuers ſide where they
F were, thinking to diſorder them before they ſhould be able to joyne with the bodie of their armie; wherefore they went and gaue them a furious charge. The fight in the beginning was fierce, the Spaniard being puffed vp with pride for his former victorie, and the Romans mad with deſire to deface the ignominie to haue beene vanquiſhed, contrarie to their cuſtome. The two Legions in the middeſt fought valiantly, and could not be forced: wherefore the Spaniards reſoluing to pierce through them by ſome means, they ſent a great troupe in forme of a wedge, to breake this battaillon. The furie of the fight was great, and Calphurnius feared the Legions ſhould not be able to reſiſt: wherefore he ſent T. Quintius Varus and L. Iuuentius Thalua (two Lieutenants) vnto them to aduertiſe them, That there was no means to hold Spaine, nor to ſaue themſelues, neither euer to ſee their houſes, nor Italie; no, not to get vnto the other ſide of the riuer of Tayo, if they did not vanquiſh their enemies: and he at the ſame inſtant, with the horſemen of the two Legions, went and charged this pointed troupe in flanke, and Quintius came on the other ſide with a certaine number of horſemen, but with leſſe courage than Calphurnius, who fought in the middeſt of the preaſſe: ſo as by reaſon of the Pretors preſence, and the danger whereinto hee thruſt himſelfe, the legionarie ſouldiours and all the reſt were greatly encouraged to doe their duties; ſo as they firſt put their enemies to rout, and then to flight, towards their campe: whither they were purſued by the horſemen, who entred pell-mell with them that fled; where they were ſorely preſt by them that had beene left to gard the baggage, ſo as they were forced to leaue their horſes, and to make head againſt them, vntill the fifth Legion arriued, and the other bands, one after another, who freed them from this danger, and put all the Spaniſh armie to the ſword: ſo as of fiue and thirtie thouſand which were in the beginning of the battaile, there eſcaped but foure thouſand; whereof three thouſand recouered a neere mountaine, and a thouſand being naked and diſarmed, wandered vp and downe the fields. The Romans carried away an hundred thirtie three of the enemies enſignes: they themſelues loſt in this conflict little aboue ſix hundred men, and about an hundred and fiftie Spaniards of their confederats. Fiue Colonels and ſome Romane knights (which were ſlaine there) made the victorie ſeeme leſſe fortunat. The Romane armie was lodged in the enemies campe, for that they had no time to rampier their owne. The day following Calphurnius did highly extoll the ſouldiors valour, and gaue them gifts in teſtimonie of their vertue: to knights he gaue capariſons, ſhewing, that by their valour chiefely the battaile had beene woon: many captaines of the two Legions were alſo rewarded. Theſe two Gouernours returned to Rome, A. Terentius Varro and P. Sempronius being choſen in their places, during the Conſulſhip of P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Portius Licinius. They brought many crownes of gold, and readie money, with gold and ſiluer in maſſe, whereof the number is vncertaine; and they triumphed for the victories which they had gotten againſt the Luſitanians and Celtiberians.

Ann. Rome 568

A. Terentius had the hither part of Spaine, and Sempronius the further: they alſo had prolongation in their charge for the yeare following. Varro had ſome encounters in this ſecond yeare with the Auſetanes, a people inhabiting in the countrey of Cattelogne, not farre from the riuer of Ebro, and againſt the Celtiberians, whom he vanquiſhed, and tooke ſome ſtrong places and townes, which they made their retreat in thoſe marches. As for Sempronius gouernment, it was quiet: for the Luſitanians ſtood in awe of the Romans fortune, and the Pretor was continually afflicted with a troubleſome diſeaſe, which made him vnfit for all publicke gouernment, and in the end killed him in Spaine. P. Manlius did ſucceed him, who had once beene Pretor in the hither Spaine, when as Cato was Conſull, and Quintus Fuluius Flaccus ſucceeded Varro.

The hither Spaine was in armes, and had need of a captaine and ſouldiors to ſuppreſſe the enemie: but in the other prouince the Romanes had no worſe enemies than themſelues: for that by reaſon of Sempronius long infirmitie, the ſouldiors were idle, and in a manner without a head, all were corrupted, inſolent, and without any militarie diſcipline; the which they muſt chiefely remedie. The Senate therefore decreed, That there ſhould be foure thouſand foot and two hundred Roman horſe newly leuied, to be ſent into Spaine, with ſeuen thouſand foot and three hundred horſe of their allies.

Idleneſſe and eaſe an enemie to vertue, corrupt the Roman armie.

Terentius Varro yeelded vp the prouince and the armie to Qu. Fuluius Flaccus, who beſieged a towne called Vrbicua, whereas the Celtiberians came to aſſaile him, making diuers skirmiſhes to rayſe the ſiege, in the which many Romanes were ſlaine or hurt. But Fuluius continued firme, and by his perſeuerance woon the towne, the enemies (tyred with fighting) being forced to retyre. The towne being deſtitute of ſuccours, was within few dayes taken and ſacked. P. Manlius did no other thing in his gouernment, but gather together the diſperſed ſouldiours, ſo as both he and Fuluius after the taking of Vrbicua lodged the armies to Winter. Terentius being returned to Rome, entred in pompe, and brought into the trea-

A treaſure 9320 pounds of ſiluer, 80 pounds of gold, and two crownes of gold of 67 pounds weight.

The yeare following theſe two Pretors were continued in their gouernment, and the warre grew hoter in Fuluius prouince than euer: for the Celtiberians went to field with thirtie fiue thouſand fighting men: againſt whom, Fuluius fortified himſelfe with all the Spaniards he could leuie among the Romane confederates: but hee did not equall the enemies in number: yet hee marched into the Carpetanians countrey, and encamped neere vnto Ebura, into the which he put a garriſon. The Celtiberians approched ſoone after, and planted their campe within halfe a league of the Romanes, at the foot of a hill; whereas the Pretor ſent to
B diſcouer them by two companies of their confederats horſes, being led by his brother M. Fuluius, commaunding him to approch neere vnto the enemies trenches, and to obſerue of what compaſſe they were, and if they came forth to charge them, they ſhould retyre without fighting: the which he executed accordingly. Some daies were ſpent without any action of importance. In the end the Celtiberians reſolued to goe foorth with all their forces, who preſented themſelues in battaile, in the plaine which was betwixt the two armies, and there attended the Romanes: yet Fuluius ſtirred not, but kept his men foure dayes together within his campe; during the which, the Spaniards ſhewed alwaies the ſame countenance: then ſeeing that the Romans lay ſtill, and that there was no means to fight with them, they kept themſelues alſo quiet for a time; onely the horſemen went forth, keeping themſelues readie, if the C enemie ſhould make ſhew to aſſayle them. The forragers on both ſides went foorth behind their armies without any let. This hauing continued ſome dayes, the Romane Pretor (thinking that he had made the enemie ſecure) commaunded L. Acilius to march with ſix thouſand Spaniſh foot of their allies, and ſome of the horſemen of the left wing, about the hill vpon the enemies backe, and there he ſhould attend vntill he heard the crie of the Legionaries and the reſt of the armie, and that then he ſhould come and aſſayle the enemies campe. Acilius parted in the night, becauſe he would not be diſcouered. Fuluius at the breake of day cauſed C. Stribonius Colonel of the Latines, to march towards the Celtiberians trenches, accompanied with the extraordinarie horſemen of the left wing. The enemie ſeeing him better accompanied than the day before, ſallied preſently foorth with all his horſe, being followed by their D footmen. Stribonius ſeeing them come, turned head, as he had beene commaunded, and retyred towards the Romanes campe. The Celtiberians purſued them ſpeedily both with horſe and foot, perſuading themſelues, the day ſhould not paſſe, before they were maſters of the Romanes campe, being now within fiue hundred paces. Then Fuluius ſeeing that hee had drawne them farre ynough from their fort, he made way for his armie, being readie in their trenches, cauſing them to ſally foorth by three ſeuerall ports at one inſtant, commaunding them to make great ſhouts and cries, not ſo much to giue courage to the ſouldiors, as it was their cuſtome, as to aduertiſe them that were in ambuſh behind the hill, attending a ſigne to aſſayle the enemies campe. When as they heard the crie, they ran vnto their rampiers according vnto their directions: The Celtiberians had onely left fiue hundred men to gard it,
E who made no great reſiſtance, being amazed both at their own ſmall number, and at the multitude of thoſe that came ſuddainely to aſſayle them. Acilius hauing woon their campe, hee preſently ſet fire on ſuch places as lay open to the enemie. The flame appearing, did much daunt the Celtiberians, and gaue courage vnto the Romans, being aſſured thereby, that their campe was taken. Notwithſtanding, the Celtiberians ſeeing themſelues deſtitute of a retreat, fought like deſperat men, and did much annoy the Romanes: but in the end being oppreſſed both with the firſt troupes and with freſh ſupplies, and by Acilius, who returned from the taking of the campe, and by the garriſon of Ebura, who ſallied forth in the heat of the battell, they were vanquiſhed, and great numbers ſlaine vpon the place, and afterwards wholly defeated, the horſemen purſuing them that fled. They write, That in this battaile there died
F 23000 Spaniards, and 4800 priſoners taken: the Romanes tooke aboue 500 horſe, and 88 enſignes. Doubtleſſe the victorie was great, yet not without bloud: for there were ſlaine about 200 legionarie Romanes, 830 Latines, allies, and 2400 ſtrangers. Which done, the Pretor brought backe his victorious armie into his campe. Acilius was ſent vnto the campe which hee had taken, and the next day they gathered vp the enemies ſpoyles, and the ſouldiors being publickely aſſembled, euery one was rewarded according to his merits: then hauing left the wounded men at Ebura, the Legions were led to Contrebia, by the territorie of the Carpetanians. This towne being beſieged, they ſent to demaund ſuccours of the Celtiberians, but the towne was yeelded before they came. There had fallen ſuch aboundance of raine at this ſeaſon, as Fuluius was forced to lodge his armie within the towne. The Celtiberians, who could not come by reaſon of the high waters and the bad way, knew nothing of the yeelding of this towne, vntill they were charged by the Romanes which were within it: for ſeeing no ſignes of a campe about it, they imagined the enemie had beene gone; ſo as they approached the towne without order, fearing no danger: from whence the Romanes ſallied forth vpon them with great furie, and put them to flight: and although the field was ſpacious, and the commoditie great to ſaue themſelues, yet there died twelue thouſand men, fiue thouſand were taken priſoners, foure hundred horſes of ſeruice, and ſixtie two enſignes gotten. Theſe Celtiberians being diſperſed, they aduertiſed their companions which came vnto them, of their defeat: whereupon they returned, and all this preparation went to ſmoake. In the further or Weſt part of Spaine, the Pretor Manlius did alſo fight happily againſt the Luſitanians. After theſe exploits Q. Fuluius ſent L. Minutius his Lieutenant to Rome, with two Colonels T. Meuius and L. Terentius Maſſaliota, to carrie newes, That the Celtiberians had beene wholly vanquiſhed in two great battailes, and that the Senate ſhould not need to make prouiſion of money or any other thing for the entertainment of their ſouldiors that yeare, for that (ſayd they) the warre was ended. They demaunded alſo, That the Pretor might haue leaue to bring backe the armie, which he and others before him had ſo happily managed and employed: the which (they ſayd) was not onely reaſonable, but very neceſſarie, for that euerie one demaunded leaue, ſpeaking openly, That if it were not graunted them, they would take it.

13 At the firſt generall aſſembly A. Poſth. Albinus Luſcus and C. Calphurnius Piſo being made Conſuls, they alſo created new Pretors to ſend into Spaine: the hither part by Ebro fell to T. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Poſthumius had the Weſt part. T. Sempronius was not much pleaſed with the requeſt made on Fuluius behalfe, to whom he ſhould ſucceed: whereupon he proteſted, That if they ſent him thither with an armie newly leuied, hee would keepe himſelfe within his garriſons, and not expoſe vnexperienced ſouldiours againſt an enemie ſo long trained vp in warre. Thereupon the Senate did decree, That they ſhould rayſe a Legion of fiue thouſand two hundred foot, and three hundred Romane horſe, and beſides it a thouſand Romane foot and fiftie horſe; and the Latines their allies ſhould be enjoyned to furniſh ſeuen thouſand foot and foure hundred horſe: and that with this armie Sempronius ſhould goe into Spaine: giuing leaue vnto Qu. Fuluius to bring backe the ſouldiors which had beene ſent thither before that Sp. Poſthumius and Qu. Martius were Conſuls; which was ſix yeares before: and moreouer, when the new leuie were come into the countrey, it ſhould be alſo lawfull for him to bring all backe that were aboue two complete Legions, of tenne thouſand foure hundred foot and ſix hundred horſe, Romanes, and twelue thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe of their allies, Latins, of thoſe ſouldiors with the which Fuluius had gotten two victories againſt the Celtiberians.

Whileſt theſe new Pretors were expected in Spaine, Qu. Fuluius in qualitie of Vice-Pretor vndertooke to goe and aſſayle the Celtiberians lying a farre off, for that they had not yet reconciled themſelues vnto him. This did rather incenſe the Barbarians than amaze them: wherefore going to armes, they ſeized vpon the ſtrait or paſſage called Manlian, by the which they knew the Romane armie muſt returne. Gracchus had giuen charge to L. Poſthumius Albinus, going to his gouernment in the further Spaine, to aduertiſe Qu. Fuluius, That hee ſhould come and meet him with the armie at Tarracone, where hee would diſcharge the old bands, diſtribute the ſupplyes which he had brought, and diſpoſe of the whole armie; appointing a ſhort time vnto Fuluius for the effecting thereof. Vpon which newes he was forced to depart ſuddainely out of the Celtiberians countrey: which made the people ſurmiſe, that he had ſome intelligence, that they did ſecretly arme, and that he retyred for feare: Wherefore they began to gard the paſſage more ſtraitly and proudly than before. The Romane armie being entered into this paſſage at the breake of day, they were aſſayled in two ſeuerall places at one inſtant, Qu. Fuluius giuing order for all things,

The Romanes charged by the Celtiberians in a ſtrait.

A things,according to the time and place, and making a briefe exhortation to his ſouldiors,he aſſured them. The fight began to grow hot,but not with like aduantage: for the legions and the Latines vpon the wings did fight valiantly, but their Spaniſh ſouldiours could not reſiſt their countrey-men,who were better ſouldiours than they. The Celtiberians ſeeing they could not vanquiſh the Romanes,fighting hand to hand with them in a ſet battell, they had recourſe vnto their accuſtomed faſhion,which was, to ſhape their troup like a wedge. Being thus ordered,they are more firme and violent, and can hardly be withſtood: by this meanes they had almoſt diſordered the legions. The which the Generall perceiuing,hee ran preſently to the legionary horſemen,asking them,What they did there,and what ſuccour might be ex- The Romans diſtreſſed.

To whom they anſwered,That they were readie to obey whatſoeuer hee ſhould command.Ioyne then (ſaid he) all the horſes together of the two legions,and with a full carriere breake through that wedge of men which doth force our ſquadron; yea take the bridles from your horſes,as our aunceſtors haue often done with good ſucceſſe, that you may ouerthrow them with more violence. Whereunto the horſemen ſpeedily obeied, and ſetting ſpurres to their vnbridled horſes,they paſſed and repaſſed through this troupe of the enemies, breaking their ſtaues, and making great ſlaughter of them. When this wedge was broken and diſperſed, in the which the Spaniards did wholly relye, they had no other thought but vpon flight. The Latin horſemen moued with the valour of the Romanes,without any further commaundement,fell vpon the enemies already broken,ſo as there was a great ſlaughter made in the flight through- *Another great defeat of the Celtiberians by Q. C out all the ſtrait. For this victorie the vice Pretor did vow a temple vnto Fortune, and games vnto Iupiter. There died in this encounter ſeuenteene thouſand Celtiberians, aboue three thouſand priſoners, and two hundred threeſcore and ſeuenteene enſignes taken, and about one thouſand and one hundred horſes gotten. The victorious armie did neither intrench nor rampar for that day:But this victorie was not without loſſe to the Romans,for there were foure hundred threeſcore and ten citizens ſlaine,a thouſand and nineteen Latines,and of Spaniards and other ſtrangers,their allies,three thouſand. Thus this armie hauing redoubled her fame by this victorie, it arriued at Tarracone, whereas Sempronius the Pretor (who arriued there but two dayes before) went forth to meet him, and did congratulate with Fuluius and the ſouldiours, their happie exploits for the commonweale.Then did they louingly and with The number of the dead of either ſide.

D great concord, diſcharge and retaine what they thought fit among the ſouldiours, according to the decree of the Senat: And for that yeare there was little done in Spaine by the new gouernours,for that they arriued late by reaſon of the death of one of the Conſuls, and the ſubrogation of another, which ſtaied their expedition. The yeare following they were continued in their gouernments.

Q. Fuluius Flaccus being returned to Rome, when as he ſtayed without the towne, to haue Anno Roma 574 order for his triumph according to the cuſtome, he was choſen Conſull with L. Manlius Acidinus,and then he entred in triumph,with the ſouldiours which he had brought out of Spaine. He brought into the publique treaſurie one hundred and twentie foure crownes of gold, 31 pounds of gold,and 173200 deniers of coined money of Oſca, beſides he gaue fiftie deniers,

E being about fiue crownes, to euerie footman, twice as much to the centeniers,and thrice as much to the horſemen,as much to the allies and Latines,and to all in generall double pay.

This yeare the Gouernors in Spaine diuided the warre betwixt them, ſo as Albinus ſhould goe and aſſayle the Vaccens by the country of the Luſitanians,and from thence ſhould come into the marches of the Celtiberians. Gracchus ſhould enter into the heart of their countrey, for that the warre was hotteſt there. There he firſt tooke the towne of Munda by force, hauing ſet vpon it ſuddenly in the night,and hauing taken hoſtages,and put in a garriſon, he battered ſome caſtles,and did forrage and burne the countrey vntill he came vnto another ſtrong towne called Certima:whereas hauing begun to plant his engines to batter it, deputies came vnto him from the inhabitants,who vſed a ſimple kind of ſpeech vnto him, after the auntient

F manner,without any diſſembling,telling him freely,That they would make warre if they had meanes, deſiring that they might haue leaue to goe vnto the Celtiberians campe, to demand ſuccours: the which if they could not obtaine, they would then take counſell of their affaires diſtinctly from the other nations. Gracchus yeelded to their demaund: and within a few daies after they returned,bringing with them ten other deputies. It was about noone. his people to bring them drinke: which done, they demaunded more, making all the aſſiſtants G to laugh at their groſneſſe, and want of ciuilitie. Then the eldeſt among them began to ſpeake, ſaying, That they had beene ſent vnto him by them of their nation, to know, vpon what ground he was come to make warre againſt them. Gracchus anſwered, That it was vpon the aſſurance of a goodly armie, which he had, and if they would ſee it, to make a more certaine report vnto their men, he would ſuffer them, commaunding ſome captaines to cauſe them all to arme, and to make them march and skirmiſh together. Theſe deputies reported vnto their people what they had ſeene; which diuerted them from ſending any ſuccours to the towne as pawnes of their promiſes and accords. From thence Gracchus led his armie to Alce, a town whereas the Celtiberians (who had ſent the ten deputies vnto him) were camped, againſt whom for ſome dayes he ſent his light horſmen, to tire them with light ſkirmiſhes, euen within their gards, ſending more men daily, to the end he might draw them out of their trenches to battell. The which ſucceeding according to his deſire, hee commaunded the Generall of the allies, to begin the fight, and that preſently turning their backes, and making ſhew to bee oppreſſed with multitudes, they ſhould returne with all ſpeed towards the campe. He in the meane time put his armie in battell within the rampars, neere vnto euerie gate, and ſuddenly ſhewed himſelfe faithfull and valiant in their ſeruice, and did greatly aduance the Romane affaires in Spaine.

Ergauica a mightie and famous towne, being amazed with the miſeries and ruines of her neighbours, opened the gates to the Roman armie. Some write, that theſe yeeldings were not done faithfully, and that as ſoone as the legions were gone, they entred into rebellion, ſo as the Caunus, mount Pretor had two encounters with the Celtiberians, the one neere vnto mount Caunus, where Caio at this day. the fight continued ſix houres, with great ſlaughter on either ſide, neither partie confeſſing an aſſured victorie; where there were 22000 of the enemies ſlaine vpon the place, and 300 pri-ſoners, and as many horſes, and 72 enſignes taken. By which defeat the war was ended in that M countrey, and the Celtiberians demaunded peace, the which they did faithfully entertain for a time, without rebelling. They write, that L. Poſthumius had at the ſame time woon two bat-tels of the Vaccens, others ſay, of the Brecaires, which are betwixt Minio and Duero, and had ſlaine 35000 of the enemies, and tooke their campe.

Ann. Rome 575 At Rome M. Iunius Brutus, & A. Manlius Volſo being choſen conſuls, M. Titinius & T. Fonteius Capito were created Pretors & gouernors of Spain: Titinius had that part which was neereſt

A vnto Gaule, and Capito the Weſterne part: and then Sempronius Gracchus and L. Poſthumius came to Rome, who had the honour of a triumph granted them, for that they had gouerned the affaires of the commonweale wiſely and valiantly. Gracchus entred firſt in triumph for the Celtiberians, bringing into the treaſurie fortie thouſand pounds weight in ſiluer. His companion entred ſome dayes after, triumphing for the Luſitanians, and other neighbour people, who alſo brought twentie thouſand pounds. To euerie one of the ſouldiours was giuen fiue and twentie deniers, which is worth two crownes and a halfe: to the centeniers double, and to the horſemen treble as much, and to the ſouldiours of their allies as much as to them of Rome.

B Spaine tyred with warre, was quiet during the gouernment of the new Pretors, who continued there two yeares.

The third yeare Cn.Corn.Scipio Hiſpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurrinus being Conſuls, M. Corn. Scipio Maluginenſis, and P. Licinius Craſſus, were choſen Pretors in Spaine: Craſſus had the hither Spaine, and Scipio the further; but either of them pretended excuſes not to go, and therefore Titinius and Fonteius were continued in the gouernment as vice-Pretors, to whom there was appointed to fill vp their armies, three thouſand foot, citizens of Rome, and two hundred horſe, and fiue thouſand Latins of their allies, with three hundred horſe: yet there is no mention of any tumult in Spaine, during their abode, nor after they were changed, vntill the Conſulſhip of Sp. Poſthumius and Q. Mutius, which was two yeres after, in the which the gouern- Anno Rome 579

We read that whileſt theſe Pretors prepared themſelues to go into their prouinces, the Celtiberians being in armes, App. Claudius Cento (who was vice-Pretor there) gaue them a great defeat, ſo as they were forced to ſubmit themſelues vnto the yoke. They began their rebellion by a ſudden aſſault which they came to giue vnto the Romanes campe at the breake of day: Being diſcouered by the centinels, they cried to armes, ſo as the ſouldiors were preſently armed, and readie to ſallie forth, as they did by the ports: but the Celtiberians were ſo neere, as they kept them long from comming forth, ſo as the combat was in a manner equall. But the formoſt ranks being thruſt on by their companions, in the end they got out of their paliſadoes into the plaine, where they had meanes to draw out their front, and the wings of their battell, equal to
D that of the enemies, with the which they were in a manner compaſſed in: but they behaued themſelues ſo well, as they repulſt them, and in leſſe than two houres put them to flight, with the loſſe of aboue fifteene thouſand of their men; ſo as the warre was ended: for ſuch as eſcaped, ſubmitted themſelues ſoone after to the Romanes yoke, ſo as the new Gouernours had not any warre.

Anno 577. The new Pretors refuſe their charge in Spaine

The Celtiberians defeated.

The next yeare L. Poſth. Albinus, and M. Pompilius Lenas, being Conſuls, Cn. Fabius Buteo, and M. Matienus were choſen to gouerne Spaine: and then arriued App. Claudius, who entred the citie with the pompe of ouation, bringing ten thouſand pounds of ſiluer, and fiue thouſand of gold. Fabius Buteo, who had the hither Spaine, going vnto his gouernment, fell ſicke at Marſeilles, where he died, ſo as P. Furius Philo was continued in his gouernment, and E Matienus came into the further prouince. As it is a thing too well knowne, that gouernments are not affected but to get authoritie and wealth: ſo it falls out often, when as Gouernours find not matter to maintaine their greatneſſe among the enemies by the warre, they can hardly doe juſtice to their fellow citizens and allies in time of peace: then they begin to moleſt the richeſt families, by falſe accuſations, to faine neceſſities, to exact vpon the publique, and to vſe other ſuch practiſes, to fill their cofers, and enrich their miniſters with the ruine and deſolation of the commons. Thus did the Pretors and lieutenants of the people of Rome in Spaine.

Publique charges affected for priuat profit.

Theſe two Gouernours Furius and Matienus, either in his juriſdiction, hauing (by reaſon of the peace) no other prey but thoſe that were giuen them in gard, they polled them in ſuch 14
F ſort, as not able any longer to endure their extortions and fraud, the poore Spaniards were conſtrained to ſend embaſſadours to Rome, after that the Pretorſhip was ended: who hauing audience, caſting themſelues vpon their knees, they made a pitiful complaint of the pride and couetouſneſſe of their Gouernours, beſeeching the Senat not to ſuffer their friends and allies to be oppreſſed and ſpoyled by them with greater violence than if they were enemies. Many crimes were objected by them, but concuſſion was beſt verified. The Senat decreed, That

The Spaniards complaine of their gouernours couetouſneſſe.

Lu. Ca-

Spaine made one gouernment, and L. Canuleius Pretor alone.

Lu. Canuleius (to whom the gouernment of Spaine was fallen) ſhould chuſe iudges from among the Senators, to examine the fact; and that the parties ſhould chuſe aduocates of the ſame order. Titinius, who had beene Pretor, during the Conſulſhip of A. Manlius and M. Iunius in the higher Spaine, was drawne in queſtion: but when as they had pleaded two ſeuerall dayes, he was abſolued: but P. Furius Philo (who had beene Gouernour in the ſame prouince) and M. Matienus in the further Spaine, being accuſed of diuers crimes, and their cauſes often pleaded, when as it was againe to be heard, they were excuſed, being abſent, for that being loath to attend the ſentence, they had voluntarily retired themſelues, the one to Preneſte, the other to Tybur: and ſo the matter was left vndecided. G

Canuleius deſiring to ſuppreſſe this purſute, to the end that many ſhould not bee moleſted by the Spaniards, began to giue order for the affaires of his gouernment, and to inroll ſouldiours, to lead them into the prouince which was appointed for them, and ſo he parted. The Senat letting paſſe what had beene formerly done, prouided for the future, that the Romane magiſtrats ſhould ſet no taxe vpon corne, and that they ſhould not force the Spaniards to ſell the twentieth part at their pleaſures, which was a certaine tribute: and that they ſhould ſend no more Commiſſaries into their townes to leuie money. H

At the ſame time there came another kind of embaſſage to Rome, from them that had bin borne of Romane ſouldiours and Spaniſh women, and not maried. Theſe were about foure thouſand men. The Senat commaunded they ſhould giue in their names, and be inrolled by L. Canuleius the Pretor: and that ſuch as he ſhould make free, ſhould be conducted vnto Carteia, vpon the Ocean ſea, to dwell there. That the inhabitants of Carteia that would remaine there, ſhould be receiued, and portions of land aſſigned them: and this colonie ſhould be held for Latines, and be called the Libertines. I

A colonie of Libertines.

Spaine diuided againe into two gouernments.

It ſeemes that the Romanes hauing no warres at that time in Spaine, were reſolued to reduce it to one gouernment, and to ſend but one Pretor. After Canuleius mention is made of Claudius Marcellus, and then of P. Fonteius: of whoſe deeds there is no mention in auntient writers; ſo as it is to be preſumed, this prouince continued quiet. But in the yeare 586 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Ælius and M. Iunius being Conſuls, they did againe create two Pretors, which were Cn. Fulutius on the hither part, & about the riuer of Ebro; and C. Licinius Nerua in the further. After which the Romanes contenting themſelues for many yeares, with their conqueſts in Spaine, they ſought as it ſeemed to make them whom they had ſubiected, or drawne vnto them, ciuile, and to faſhion them by little and little to the manners and inclinations of the Romanes: without ſeeking the other people which were more barbarous, who alſo for their parts were glad to be left in peace, being terrified with the Romanes power, whom they would not incenſe, neither had they any care to ſeek their friendſhip, becauſe they hated them, as violaters of the lawes of nature, and oppreſſors of mans libertie. K

Ann. Rome 600

15 In the yere 600 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Fuluius and T. Annius being Conſuls, the Celtiberians (who had beene vanquiſhed and ſubdued by T. Gracchus fiue and twentie yeares before) began againe to ſtirre, the inhabitants of Sediga, a towne of the Areuaces, hauing (againſt their capitulations, and the commaundement of Gracchus) repaired the walls of their towne, and refuſed to pay tribute vnto the Romanes: by reaſon whereof other people being alſo rebelled in Spain, the Senat reſolued to ſend an armie, and a Conſul to be the General, ſo as Q. Fulutius was ſent, who was not verie fortunat in the beginning. This yeare by a new cuſtome the Conſuls entred into charge the firſt of Ianuarie, whereas before they did not begin their magiſtracie vntill the fifteenth of March: whereunto they were induced by the rebellion of the Spaniards: the which was afterwards continued. Of this beginning followed the warre of Numancia, which laſted twentie yeares. The Senat of Rome hauing firſt forbidden them of Segida to raiſe their walls, and then commaunded them to goe to the war with their Conſuls and Pretors, according to the pacification made by Gracchus, they anſwered, That they had capitulated, not to make any new forts, but not to repaire their old. And as for going to the warre, they were exempt from that charge, by the treatie of Gracchus: the which was true. But the Senat added a gloſe to theſe conditions, that is, As long as it ſhall pleaſe vs: the which the Spaniards would not heare of. Wherefore ſeeing that Quintus Fuluius Nobilior came againſt them with an armie of thirtie thouſand men, they left their towne, which was not yet in defence, ſent their wiues and children to their neighbours, and vnder the conduct L M

A of one Carus, they aſſembled to the number of 20000 foot, and 5000 horſe, and came and camped in a place couered with wood, verie fit to ſurpriſe their enemies, whom he met withall in the woods, and both gaue and took many wounds. Afterwards in a great encounter Carus had the victorie, hauing ſlaine 6000 Romans, wherewith being growne inſolent and careleſſe, the Conſull had means to haue his reuenge, ſending his horſemen to charge the Spaniards which were ſcattered and out of order: who put 6000 to the ſword, and more had bin ſlaine, if night had not ſeperated them. This made the Celtiberians more circumſpect. The ſame night the people of the countrey aſſembled at Numance, and being reſolued to reſiſt the Romanes, they made choice of Ambo and Leuco for their captaines. The Conſull Fuluius hauing receiued
B 300 horſe, with ſome Elephants, from king Maſſiniſſa, a Moore (an auntient friend to the people of Rome) marching forward, he came and offered battell to the enemies vnder Numance. He had placed his Elephants behind the firſt rankes, that they might not be ſeene, thinking to terrifie them ſuddenly, and to defeat them by that meanes; but it fell out otherwiſe: for being come to joyne, and the ranks opened, when as the Elephants ſhewed themſelues, they did ſomewhat terrifie the Spaniards and their horſes, which were not accuſtomed to ſee ſuch beaſts; ſo as turning their backes they went towards the towne: But one of theſe Elephants comming neere the walls, being hit on the forehead with a ſtone, he entred into ſuch a rage, as turning againſt the Romanes themſelues, he trode them vnder his feet; after whoſe example the reſt began to run through the Romane troupes, and diſordered them: For it is the nature
C of theſe beaſts, when they are terrified, they know neither friend nor foe: wherefore many call them common enemies. The Spaniards which were within Numance, ſeeing this confuſion, ſallied out vpon the Romanes, and ſlew foure thouſand men, and tooke three Elephants, and many enſignes; yet they loſt two thouſand of their men.

The Conſull hauing refreſhed himſelfe ſomewhat after this rout, he was repulſed againe at the fort of Axenium, the which he aſſailed, to haue the victuals which the enemie had in it, and in this misfortune the Romans receiued a third rout, whereas Biaſius a leader of ſome horſe of their allies, was ſlaine, with many good ſouldiours. So as vanquiſhed

16 The yeare following M. Claudius Marcellus ſucceeded Fuluius, and brought 8000 foot and 500 horſe into Spaine. This man was more politique than his predeceſſor, to keepe himſelfe from the ſurpriſes of his enemies, leading his armie ſafely to Ocilis, the which hee tooke in few dayes, and pardoned their offence, paying a fine of thirtie talents, and ſome hoſtages, which he demaunded of them. This clemencie of his made the Nertobriges, another nation, to ſend embaſſadors vnto him, to demaund peace and pardon: to whom he made a pleaſing
E anſwer, demaunding an hundred horſemen of them; the which they promiſed. But during this treatie, they ſent certaine troupes, which fell vpon the Romanes baggage, and ſpoyled ſome of it. Hereupon the hundred horſemen, which the Conſull had demaunded, arriued, whom he committed to priſon, and ſold their horſes, by reaſon of their treacherie. Then he led his armie againſt their towne.

There were ſome people allyed vnto the Romanes, which hauing beene wronged by them, oppoſed themſelues to this demaund: wherefore Marcellus ſent them all to the Senat of Rome. The Senat made no other anſwer, hauing heard their debate, but that Marcellus ſhould tell them what they were to do.

Ann. Rome 602

17 In the meane time, in the yeare 602, Spaine fell by lot to the Conſul L. Lucullus, and then they began firſt to inroll ſouldiours by lot. Lucullus led with him P. Scipio Æmilianus (he that made himſelfe famous by the euerſion of Carthage the great, and of Numantia.) Marcellus hauing aduertiſed the Celtiberians of the comming of this Conſull, and of the warre which was prepared, he aduiſed them, before they attended any greater extremitie, to yeeld to his diſcretion, promiſing them all good vſage, and reaſonable conditions; for he deſired to end this war before the comming of Lucullus: the which they did. This Marcellus (as Strabo writes) did build the citie of Corduba, and impoſed a tribute of ſix hundred talents vpon Spaine, continuing his gouernment a good while after that Lucullus was choſen Conſull, gouerning as Proconſull.

Corduba built by Marcellus.

Lucullus being couetous ſeekes occaſion of war.

Lucullus finding nothing to doe at his arriuall, he laid the foundation of a new warre, being as deſirous to make ſome ſpoyle (for he was but poore) as to get honour. He entred therefore as an enemie into the Vaccens countrey, who had in no ſort offended the Romanes: and hauing paſſed the riuer of Tayo, he went to beſiege Cauca. The inhabitants demaunded what he would of them, and why he beſieged them. He anſwered, That they had wronged the Celtiberians, allies to the Romanes, and that he came to reuenge it. Whereupon they retired into their towne, and put themſelues in defence. Soone after they ſallied forth ſuddenly vpon them that went to forrage, and ſlue a great number. But the Romane ſouldiours going forth to ſuccor them, they repulſed the Spaniards, beating them euen vnto their town gates, whereas they ſmothered one another with the multitude, ſo as there were aboue three thouſand ſlaine. Thoſe which remained being amazed with this loſſe, they ſent the next day the moſt antient among them, with girlands of oliue branches, deſiring Lucullus to receiue them as friends, and to ſet downe the conditions; who impoſed an hundred talents of ſiluer, and hoſtages, commaunding them to ſend their horſemen to the warre with him: which hauing granted, Lucullus ſaid, That he would haue them receiue a garriſon into their towne: wherevnto they were alſo willing to obey, ſo as preſently there were two thouſand of the beſt ſouldiours in the armie ſent, with commaundement to ſeiſe vpon the ports, towers, and ſtrongeſt places of the towne: which they did. Then Lucullus drew in all the reſt of the ſouldiors, and by the ſound of the trumpet, did moſt cruelly put all the inhabitants to the ſword, ſparing neither age nor ſexe: yet ſome ſlipping ouer the walls, and creeping through the preaſe, eſcaped, who proclaimed the Romanes treacherie, couetouſneſſe, and crueltie, throughout all Spaine: whereupon all thoſe that dwelt in the champian countrey, and in places of eaſie acceſſe, retired vnto the mountaines, or into fortified townes; carrying with them what was good and precious: and what they could not carrie they burnt, being loath to leaue any ſpoyles to ſo cruell an enemie.

Orieuous burthens laid vpon them of Cauca by Lucullus.

Lucullus treacherous crueltie againſt the inhabitants of Cauca.

Cauca being thus ruined, Lucullus led his armie through a great part of the countrey which was barren and deſart, vntil he came to the towne of Intercatia, where there were ſome twentie thouſand foot and two thouſand Spaniſh horſe, gathered together: of whom Lucullus demaunded indiſcreetly, If they would not come to compoſition with him. But they asked, If he would receiue them with the like faith as he had done them of Cauca? reproaching vnto him with opprobrious words, this treacherous and inhumane fact. Wherewith Lucullus being incenſed (as commonly all thoſe are which find themſelues touched) he ſpoiled all their countrey, and then beſieged them. They knowing there was no reaſon to come to battel with the Romane armie, maintained themſelues with skirmiſhes and ſudden ſallies. During this ſiege a Spaniſh caualier richly armed, and brauely mounted, ſhewed himſelfe often betwixt the armie and the towne, challenging ſome Romane to the combat, and ſeeing that no man durſt come forth, he ſcorned them. But Scipio Æmilianus being then verie young, grieued to ſee the Romane knights thus diſhonoured, and hauing leaue from the Conſull, he went to encounter him, and vanquiſhed him: the which bred admiration in both parties, conſidering the inequalitie of the ſtature of the combatants; for Scipio was little, and the Spaniard wonderful great and ſtrong. The Romanes conceiued good hope of this victorie: but in the night they were troubled with the cries of certaine horſemen of the towne, which were gone forth before that Lucullus did inueſt it, who being the ſame night returned, about the paliſadoes of the Romane armie, made great cries and ſhouts, to whom the beſieged made anſwer: ſo as the Romanes were forced to keepe themſelues in armes, not knowing what part to gard: beſides,

Truth breeds hatred and furie in the wicked when they are touched.

Scipio Æmilianus combats with a Spaniard and conquers him valiantly.

A ſides, they were tyred and growne weake, for that they wanted both bread, wine, oyle, ſalt and vinegre, liuing only vpon veniſon, hares, or pouldred fleſh, the which bred fluxes, wherof many dyed. Continuing their batterie, they made a great breach, but comming to the aſſault, (whereas Scipio was one of the formoſt) and being in a manner maſters of the towne, they were ſharpely repulſed: and in their retreat many through ignorance of the place fell into certaine priuies, where they were ſwallowed vp. The beſieged hauing repaired their breach, ſeemed reſolute; but hunger preſſing either partie, they could not long diſſemble their neceſſities: ſo as Lucullus perſuaded the Spaniards to yeeld, with the beſt words hee could, promiſing he would not deceiue them, ſo as in the end they gaue him credit, and yeelded, vpon condition Intercatia taken by compoſition.

B to ſend ſix thouſand archers to the warre with him, giuing a certaine number of cattell, and ſome hoſtages. Gold nor ſiluer (the deſire whereof had drawne Lucullus into Spaine) there Couetouſneſſe, and no deſire of honour, brought Lucullus into Spaine. was not any: for the people of that countrie had neuer eſteemed it. Matters being thus compounded, the Romane armie was led againſt Palantia, a ſtrong and well fortified towne, whither many of the champian countrey, and leſſer townes were retired. Moſt of the colonels and captains were of opinion, That they ſhould not ſtriue in vaine againſt ſo mightie a town: but Lucullus, a couetous man, knowing it to be exceeding rich, would neuer leaue it vntill that hunger forced him, the horſemen of the towne (which were verie many) ſallying out daily vpon the Romans which went to forrage. Being thus preſſed, he put his armie into bat- Lucullus retires from Palentia with ſhame.

C tell, and retired, the Palantines following him in the taile, and purſuing him vnto the riuer of Duero, where they left their purſute, and returned. Lucullus paſſing on, led his armie to winter in the countrey of the Turditanes. Thus ended the warre againſt the Vacceans, for the which (although that Lucullus vndertooke it without authoritie or commandement from the Senat and people of Rome) he was neuer called into queſtion. Lucullus making war without authoritie, is not puniſhed.

18 About that time the Luſitanians, and people of the further Spaine, liuing vnder their owne lawes, had made incurſions vpon the friends and allies of the people of Rome, hauing a certaine Africane for their captaine, and chaſed Manlius and Calphurnius, Romane captains, killing aboue ſix thouſand of their men, with Terentius Varro, their Queſtor or Treaſurer. Romans defeated by the Luſitanians. Wherewith this Africane growne proud, he went with a companie of Vectons, a neighbor people, to aſſaile the town of the Blaſtophenicians, a people who, they ſaid, were brought and

D left in Spaine by Hannibal. This captaine being ſlaine there with a ſtone, they did preſently make choice of one called Cæſarus to be head of their armie: who gaue battell vnto Mumius which had beene ſent from Rome with an armie; but he loſt it: yet ſeeing that Mumius purſued his victorie inconſideratly, he turned head, and repaired his loſſe, ſo as he ſlew nine thouſand of the Romane armie vpon the place, and not onely recouered his owne baggage, but Mumius defeats the Spaniards, and is beaten by the vanquiſhed through his own negligence. tooke the enemies, and carried away a great number of enſignes, which the Luſitanians dragged vp and downe in ſcorne of the Romanes. Mumius hauing gathered together fiue thouſand ſouldiours which remained, and reuiued them as well as he could, he found an opportunitie to charge the enemie going to forrage, and did ſo well, as he ſlew a great number, and Mumius reuangeth his loſſes. recouered his enſignes.

E The Luſitanians which dwelt beyond the riuer of Tayo, hauing in like maner proclaimed warre againſt the Romanes, and tooke the towne of Coniſtorgis by aſſault, a great and ſtrong towne, confederat to the Romanes, they being led by a captaine called Caucene: and not content to make a tumult in Spaine, ſome of them paſſed the ſtrait at Hercules pillars, and went to ſpoyle Africke: the reſt went to aſſaile Ocile. But Mumius arriuing with a thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe, ſlew about fifteene thouſand forragers, and made them to leaue the ſiege of Ocile. Then going againſt others, who thought to eſcape with the prey, hee left not one aliue to carrie newes of their defeat. Hee diſtributed the bootie which was portable among his ſouldiours, and the reſt (being conſecrated to thoſe gods who hee thought did preſide ouer the warres) he burnt. After all this, he returned to Rome, and triumphed.

F Attilius, or Acilius Balbus, ſucceeded Mumius, who at his firſt arriuall cut ſeuen hundred Luſitanians in peeces, and tooke Oxthraca, being the greateſt and richeſt towne they had, ſtriking terrour in all the neighbour people, which ſubmitted themſelues to his deuotion as far as the Vectons. But when as Acilius had lodged his armie for Winter, they rebelled, and began to annoy them that were friends and confederats to the Romanes: Againſt whom Ser. Galba ſent Pretor to ſucceed Acilius, meaning to ſuccour them, made a march of 15 leagues, and being come in ſight of the enemie, without giuing reſt to the ſouldiours, he led them G to fight, and vanquiſhed happily. But as the Romanes purſued the flying enemie in diſ-order, and made many ſtands being wearie, the Luſitanians turning head, ſlue ſeuen thouſand, and forced Galba to flie with his horſemen into Carmel, whither many that had eſcaped were retired: who hauing rallied them together, and leuied twentie thouſand men of their confederats, he wintered at Cunes. The Conſull Lucullus who wintered in Turditania, hearing that the Luſitanians were in armes, he ſent the beſt of his captaines againſt them, and ſlue foure thouſand of them, and afterwards hauing made a new head neere vnto Gades, hee cut fiue thouſand and fiue hundred in peeces. And as Galba on his ſide preſſed theſe people, they ſent embaſſadors vnto him, ſeeming deſirous to enjoy the accord made before with Attilius. H Galba made ſhew to pitie them, and to excuſe their exceſſe for that pouertie had made them to breake the treaties, and to ſteale: ſaying, That he knew well that the Barbarians of the countrey was the cauſe of theſe inconueniences: but if they had a true intent to be friends, he would diuide them into three troupes, and ſend them into fertile places to liue in. The Luſitanians being woon with theſe promiſes, put themſelues into three troupes, and ſuffered themſelues to be led to the places aſſigned by Galba, who ſpake vnto the firſt, as if they were in full peace, injoyning them to leaue their arms; which hauing done, he cauſed them all to be maſſacred: and with the like fraud and crueltie he defeated the other two troupes, before they could haue any newes of the ſlaughter of their companions. Many ſlipping through the armed troupes, eſcaped; among the which was Viriatus, who reuenged the trecherie & crueltie I of the Romanes againſt his country-men. Galba ſhewing himſelfe as treacherous, and it may be more couetous than Lucullus, hauing filled his cofers with the ſpoyles of Luſitania, wher-of he did defraud both his friends and ſouldiours, returned to Rome, where he was called in queſtion for his abuſes: but being the richeſt man in the citie, he eſcaped by bribes.

Galba being vi-ctor is defeated by his raſh purſute.

The treacherous crueltie of Serg. Galba.

20 The Luſitanians which remained of Lucullus and Galbaes treacheries, aſſembled together to the number of ten thouſand, and did ouerrun the countrey of Turditania: againſt whom the Pretor C. Vetilius was ſent; who hauing joyned the armie which hee brought from Rome, with the forces he found in Spaine, he went againſt them which ſpoyled their friends countrey, and ſlew many of them, forcing the reſt to retire to the ſide of a hill, where he beſieged them, ſo as they muſt either end their dayes by hunger or by the ſword: wherefore they K reſolued to ſue for mercie, and to intreat him to appoint them a countrey to dwell in; the which he willingly graunted. But Viriatus being in this beſieged companie, who had eſcaped from Galbaes ſlaughter, began to ſpeake in this manner. How wretched are we, that hauing ſo often tried the treacherie of theſe Romanes, we will againe offer our throats vnto them, and bee murthered by them, vnder the ſweetneſſe of their falſe promiſes? Do we not know that they with whom we haue now to deale, are the ſame who by their notable treacherie haue ſlaine our brethren and companions? Were it not better to keepe our armes, and ſelling our liues at a deere rate, let them feele that wee are men, than ſuffering our ſelues to be diſarmed by a fooliſh credulitie, to bee afterwards ſlaine like beaſts at the ſlaughter? No, my companions, let vs not commit ſo groſſe an error, as to deſpaire in that ſort: let vs rather trie to force vs a paſſage, and you ſhall find the difficultie is not ſo great as you imagine, if you do what I ſhall aduiſe you. This ſouldiour ſpeaking with a great courage, reuiued their L ſpirits, who with one voice cried out vnto him, That in a good houre he ſhould be their captaine, and that he ſhould lead them whither he ſhould thinke good. Then he put them all in battell, except ſome thouſand of the beſt appointed, which he kept with himſelfe, and then he commaunded euerie one to flie, appointing their Rendezuous at Tribola. Vetilius was in doubt to purſue them that fled, thinking it the ſafeſt courſe to aſſaile Viriatus, & his thouſand ſouldiours which were in battell on the ſide of the hill. But they hauing ſpent that day and a part of the next, in making a ſhew that they would fight with the Romanes, eaſily freed themſelues, being well mounted, and knowing the countrey; and then came to Tribola: and ſo this Spaniſh armie was preſerued by the judgement and reſolution of Viriatus, who of a ſhepheard M became a huntſman, then afterwards a theefe, laſtly he was head of an armie, and was in poſſibilitie to make himſelfe king of Spaine. This action did win him much credit and reputation among the neighbour nations. Vetilius meaning to purſue him, fell into ambuſhes which he had laied in a certaine paſſage couered with wood: ſo as being charged in front by Viriatus his horſemen, and on either ſide by his footmen, the Roman armie was wholly defeated, and the

The Pretor Ve-tilius defeated and taken pri-ſoner by Viriatus.

Pre-

A Pretor Vetilius found among the priſoners, who being ſcorned as a man of no value by him that had taken him, for that he was old and fat, he was inſtantly ſlaine. The Romanes which eſcaped at this rout, gathered head at Tarteſſe, being ſome 6000 men, whom Vetilius, Queſtor or Treaſurer, cauſed to reſt for a time: and hauing made a new leuie of 5000 of their allyes, he ſent them all to encounter Viriatus, but there returned not one, being all cut in peeces: whereupon the Queſtor kept himſelfe within the wals, attending to be releued by ſome other Roman armie. In the meane time Viriatus ſpoyled the fertile fields of the Carpetanians. Another deſeat of the Romans.

21 Then came C. Plautius for Pretor, bringing ten thouſand foot, and thirteene hundred horſe from Rome: Whereof Viriatus being aduertiſed, hee made ſhew to flie, after whom B Plautius ſent 4000 of his beſt men, who were ſuddenly charged by them that fled before them, and were in a manner all ſlaine. Viriatus paſſing beyond the riuer of Tayo, went and campt in a certaine mountaine full of oliues, called Venus mount: whereas Plautius burning with deſire of reuenge for their former loſſes, was vanquiſhed again with great loſſe, and forced to retire before his time, and winter in his forts, not daring to ſhew himſelfe in field: ſo as Viriatus did run ouer all the countrey at his pleaſure, and ranſomed the townes which would ſaue their corne, and other fruits which was readie to gather; elſe he ſet fire of it. C. Plautius defeated by Viriatus.

22 Claudius Vnimanus, an other Pretor, being ſent againſt this captain, was alſo defeated, increaſing the diſgrace receiued by his predeceſſors: where he loſt all the forces which he had brought. The rods and axes, the coats of armes of Captaines, and other ſpoyles taken from C the Romans, were hung vp by Viriatus in the mountaines, in ſigne of his victories. And ſoone after 300 Luſitanians hauing encountred 1000 Romanes in a certaine ſtrait, the Romanes loſt 320 of their men, and the others but 70: beſides, as the Romane horſemen purſued ſome Luſitanians on foot which retired, one of the troupe turning head, thruſt a Romanes horſe through with a pike, and preſently ſtrucke off the mans head with his ſword; whereat the reſt being amazed, they ſtaied, and purſued not this Luſitanian, who retired ſoftly mocking them. Cl. Vnimanus defeated by Viriatus.

23 After C. Vnimanus mention is made of C. Nigidius, who was ſent Pretor into the further Spaine, and was as vnfortunate as the reſt.

24 Q. Fabius Maximus, and L. Hoſtilius being Conſuls, C. Lelius was ſent Pretor into Spaine, An. Rom. 608.
D againſt Viriatus, who mannaged the warre with great wiſdome; but as the daunger increaſed, and manie people of Spaine moued with the valour and fortune of Viriatus rebelled, the Senat of Rome decreed that one of the Conſuls ſhould goe in perſon to that warre, with a Conſular armie: ſo as Q. Fab. Maximus Æmilianus, ſonne to Paulus Æmilius (who ſubdued Perſeus king of Macedonie) was ſent thither; a Captaine inſtructed in the ſeuere diſcipline of his father: who hauing leuied two legions of new ſouldiors, with ſome bands of their allyes, he led ſome 15000 foot, and 2000 horſe into Spaine. Being arriued at Orſone, a towne in Spaine, he would not expoſe his new ſouldiors, which had not been tryed in any incounters, but kept them within their forts, and by little and little trayned them with light skirmiſhes: but Viriatus carried awaie both ſpoyle and honor for the firſt yeare. But Fabius charge being E prolonged, and he remaining Proconſull in Spaine, ſuppoſing that his armie was now ſufficiently trayned, he went to field, and vanquiſhed Viriatus in a ſet battaile, tooke two townes from him, and purſued him to a place called Becor. After this exploit hee led his armie to winter at Cordoue. Qu. Fab. Max. Conſull ſent againſt Viriatus. 25 Qu. Fab. Max. defeats Viriatus.

26 Viriatus finding himſelf neither ſo ſafe nor ſo ſtrong as he was wont, he ſolicited the Areuaces, Belles, and Titthes, a warlike people, and drew them from the Romanes alliance. Theſe did raiſe a long and dangerous warre, which was called the Numantine, by reaſon of Numance one of their townes. Viriatus had Quintius, a Romane captaine, againſt him in an other quarter, by whom he was put to rout, & forced to retire into his fort on mount Venus: yet making roads from thence hee ſlue 1000 of Quintius ſouldiours at one time, tooke F ſome enſignes, and in the end made the enemies armie retire: beſides, he chaſed away the garriſon which was in Ituca, and ſpoyled the Baſitans country: during which diſorders Quintius kept himſelfe within Cordoue, either for cowardiſe, or want of judgement, ſending a captaine of the towne of Italique in Spaine againſt the enemie. Q. Metellus the Conſull, was ſent into Celtiberia, who ſubdued the Vacceans with great expedition, and continued his gouernment aboue a yeare.

27 Q. Fab. Maximus Seruilianus, being Conſul, ſucceeded Quintius, and went into Spaine G with an armie according to his dignitie, making about 16000 foot and 1600 horſe: he alſo ſent to Micipſa king of the Numidians for elephants. As this Conſull conducted a part of his armie to Ituca, Viriatus came and charged him with 6000 men, making horrible cries, and wearing long locks, after the accuſtomed manner of theſe barbarians in their warres, whom the Romanes withſtood with great difficultie: but when as the reſt of their armie was ioyned with them; and that ten elephants were arriued out of Lybia with 300 horſes, the Conſul Seruilianus went and prouoked the enemie to fight, vanquiſhed him, and put him to flight: yet he could not ſo well conteyne his men, but they purſued in diſorder and confuſion, as it fals out often: ſo as Viriatus watchfull vpon all occaſions, turned head vpon them that purſued, H ſlue a great number, and purſued the reſt vnto their campe: the which he attempted to force, and without the vertue of Fannius, father in law to C. Lelius, he had entred, to the totall ruine of the Romane armie. Night approching, made the enemie retire, leauing the Romanes much troubled and amazed. But afterwards Viriatus, a man without reſt, moleſted them day and night, ſometimes by his ſouldiours lightly armed, ſometimes by his horſemen, vntill that he forced the Conſull to diſlodge, and to retyre to Ituca. Then he tooke the waie of Luſitania, being in ſome extremitie for want of victuals, and his forces decreaſing. The Conſull following him, and not able to ouertake him, made warre againſt the Beturians, dwelling in the countrie which is now called Extrema Dura: and cauſed fiue townes to be ſackt, for that they had giuen ayde and fauour to Viriatus: then he retires to Cunes, from whence he mar- I ched ſoone after againſt Viriatus in Luſitania; and incountring Curius and Apuleius, two captaines of theeues vpon the waie, hauing with them 10000 fighting men, the Romane armie was ſomewhat troubled; yet Curius was ſlaine in the fight: after which the Romanes got the aduantage, ſo as Seruilianus took Eſcadie, Gemelle, & Oboliola, by force, with other places held by the garriſons of Viriatus, whereof ſome were abandoned to the ſpoyle, others were pardoned: he tooke tenne thouſand priſoners, whereof fiue hundred were beheaded, the reſt he cauſed to be ſould: and with this good fortune he retyred his armie the ſecond time to winter, and then returned to Rome.

28 Q. Cæcilius Metellus hauing prorogation of his charge in the hither Spaine or Celti- K beria, in qualitie of Proconſull, he beſieged Trebia, a rich towne of that countrey, the which he tooke by his politike ſtratagems. It happened during this ſiege, that fiue companies being ſet in gard in a certaine place, were diſlodged by the enemie: Metellus ſhewed himſelfe ſo ſeuere, as he would not receiue them, but commaunded them to returne to the place, vnleſſe they would be vſed as traitors, and as men that had abandoned the armie: the which he did to make them feele the paine of their cowardiſe, commaunding to cut them in pieces that ſhould flie towards the campe. Theſe ſouldiours forced by neceſſitie, ſhewed themſelues valiant, and recouered the place from whence they had bin chaſed. Beſieging Centobrica, the chiefe man within the towne, called Rhetogenes, retyred to the Romans campe, wherewith the inhabitants being much incenſed, they ſet this fugitiues children vpon the walles, whereas the Romanes engins did batter: the which did ſo moue Metellus to pitie, as he left L the ſiege, forbearing rather to take the towne, than to kill theſe poore innocent creatures, which act of humanity, did much daunt the Celtiberians, ſo as from that time they were more tractable. Being demaunded to what end hee made ſo manie turnings and windings with his armie, he anſwered, that if he thought his ſhirt knew his conceptions he would burne it. The glorie of his great exploits in Spaine, were blemiſhed by the enuie he bare to Q. Pompeius his enemie, who he vnderſtood ſhould ſucceed him in his charge: to the end hee ſhould find all things difficult, he gaue leaue to all ſouldiors that demanded it, without inquirie of the cauſe: he ſuffered them to ſpoyle the victuals and munition which remained; he commaunded the Candiot archers, to breake their bows and arrows, and did forbid to giue the elephants their ordinary allowance. Hauing thus ſatisfied his ſpleene, he did fruſtrat himſelfe of his triumph, M which hee had deſerued by ſo many glorious deeds, knowing better how to ſurmount his enemies, then his owne choler.

29 Q. Fab. Maximus Æmilianus, or Seruilianus according vnto ſome, Proconſull, made warre in the meane time againſt Viriatus: and hauing taken a commander among the theeues called Connoba, by his voluntarie yeelding, he pardoned him: but he cauſed all his ſouldiours hands

A hands to be cut off, and afterwards puniſhed as many of the reuolted as he could take, in the like manner. He beſieged the towne of Eriſane, into the which Viriatus found means to enter by night: from whence at the breake of day he ſallied with great furie, with a troupe of their beſt men, and not onely chaſed away ſuch as wrought in the ditches & trenches, but alſo ſome companies which were ſet there to gard them, with great ſlaughter: Yet Viriatus thinking now of the change of humane things, and of the miſeries which doe often follow proſperitie, vſing his good fortune with modeſtie, he began to giue eare to conditions of peace, the which he obtained verie fauourable, both from the Proconſull and Senat, whom they called a friend to the people of Rome, and decreed, That ſuch as had followed him, ſhould enjoy the lands B they then held: wherfore this dangerous war ſeemed to be ended, but ſoon after it was renued.

Fab. Max. doth cruelly execute the Spaniards.

Viriatus fauoured by the Senat of Rome, who gaue him peace.

30 Q. Cepio Conſul being come into the further Spaine, ſucceſſor to the Proconſul Q. Fabius, began to blame the capitulations made with Viriatus, as vnworthy of the honor & greatneſſe of Rome, and had now got leaue of the Senat, to moleſt Viriatus vnder hand, that hee might take ſome ſubject to rebell. Then by his importune letters and many meſſages, hee obtained a decree, to proclaime war againſt him: whereupon he went to beſiege Arſa, the which yeelded, Viriatus hauing abandoned it. Who marched into Carpetania, which is the juriſdiction of Toledo, ſpoyling and burning all he left behind him: yet hee was followed and ouertaken by the Conſull, but being a politique captaine, he would not hazard a battell, being but weake in regard of the Roman armie, but gaue leaue to moſt of his ſouldiors to ſlip away C by certaine vallies couered with woods; and he himſelfe in the meane time preſented himſelfe vnto the enemie in a ſtrong place, with ſome troups to keepe them occupied, vntil he thought his men were retired into a place of ſafetie. Then he ſuddenly vaniſhed by ſecret paſſages, beſt knowne to himſelfe, leauing the Romans amazed which way he ſhould fly. Cepio marching towards the Vectons, and the Callaiques, ſpoiled their fields. At the ſame time did riſe other troups of theeues in Luſitania, after the example of Viriatus, againſt whom (according vnto ſome) Brutus was ſent. Viriatus deſiring to come vnto the former accord, foreſeeing that in the end he ſhould not be able to reſiſt the Roman power, ſent Audax, Ditalcon, and Minure, three of his moſt familiar friends, vnto Cepio, to treat an accord with him: but Cepio corrupted them with great gifts and promiſes, perſuading them to murther their captaine; the which they did D execute in this manner. Viriatus was one that ſlept little, and for that hee would be readie for all accidents, he ſlept moſt commonly armed, giuing free acceſſe in the night to all his friends. Audax and his confederats imbracing this opportunitie, came into his tent, vnder colour of ſpeaking with him concerning ſome great affaires: and finding him aſleepe all armed but the throat, they ſtabd him in that place, and ſlew him. And then without any noiſe (being aſſured they had diſpatched him) they retired to the Conſul Cepio: who gaue them leaue to enjoy the poſſeſſions which they then held, but as for gifts and recompences which he had promiſed, he ſent them to the Senat. At the breake of day, Viriatus ſeruants and the whole armie, wondering that he ſlept ſo long, contrarie to his cuſtome, ſome going in, found him wallowing in his owne bloud; which filled the whole campe with griefe & teares, who beſides their heauineſſe E for the vnworthy death of ſo valiant a man, they were in care of their own preſeruations, and for the dangers which did inuiron them. Beſides, they were the more diſcontented, that the traitors were eſcaped. Wherefore taking his bodie, and wrapping it in a rich cloth, they laid it vpon a high pile, and hauing ſacrificed many beaſts, they did celebrate his funerals, after their manner, the ſouldiors both horſe and foot running about the fire, and filling the aire with the name of Viriatus, vntill the fire had conſumed all: after which in memorie of his name, they had ſword plaiers which did fight for their liues. Thus Viriatus ended his dayes, being deſired and lamented of all his ſouldiors, for that in war he was the firſt in danger, but when it came to diuide the ſpoyles, he was but equall, & it may be inferiour to all the reſt: and he had that happineſſe aboue moſt captaines, that hauing an armie of diuers nations, he led them to the wars F for the ſpace of eight yeares, without any mutinie or ſedition among his ſouldiors; who in Viriatus place choſe Tantalus for their captaine, verie contrarie to him in manners and vertue. This fact did purchaſe no leſſe infamie to Cepio, than to the traitours which did execute it. Tantalus was ſo preſt by him, as he left both armes and armie, vpon compoſition, to whom there were certaine lands appointed; ſo as for a time the Luſitanians contained themſelues in peace.

Quintus

A 1 QVintus Pompeius Aulus Conſull, in the yeare 612 comming very late in his Prouince, and hauing receiued an armie but in bad equipage from the hands of Q. Metellus, he went to beſeech the Numantines; for of all the townes againſt whom Metellus had made warre, only Numantia and Thermancia continued in armes: Thermancia was ſtrong by nature, ſituated among the woods and betwixt two riuers, and therefore of hard acceſſe: wherefore hee went firſt to Numantia, in the which there were eight thouſand of the beſt and moſt reſolute ſouldiours that were in all Spaine, as the Romanes found by experience. The Romane armie was in all about thirtie B thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. Being at this ſiege, the Romane forragers were charged by a ſuddaine ſally of the beſieged, ſo as many of them were ſlaine vpon the place. Pompey was then abſent; who being aduertiſed of this rout, haſted to the campe: but the Numantines notwithſtanding his diligence retired without loſſe, and continued daily to skirmiſh with the ſouldiours, and to haue the aduantage: wherewith Pompey being diſcontented, he left it, and would attempt Thermancia, to ſee if he could repaire his honour, and get ſome profit: but he loſt ſeuen hundred of his beſt men at the firſt encounter, and they chaſed a Colonel, which conducted victuals to the campe. Soone after hee had a third rout, with the loſſe of many horſe and foot, and with ſuch an amazement of all the reſt of the armie, as they ſtood all night in armes; and day being come, the Thermantines running vnto their trenches, and pro- C uoking the enemie, they fought with equall aduantage all day long, vntill night. Whereupon Pompey did alſo diſlodge from thence, and marched towards Malia, a little towne held by a garriſon of the Numantines; the which was yeelded by the treaſon of the inhabitants, hauing ſlaine the ſouldiors which were ſet there to gard it: where hauing left ſome companies, after that he had diſarmed the inhabitants, he marched towards Sedetane, to defend it from the ſpoyles of Tangin, captaine of the theeues, whom he defeated and tooke priſoner, with a great number of his ſouldiors, but he could neither draw ranſon nor ſeruice from them: for theſe Barbarian captiues entred into ſuch a rage, as in a manner they all ſlew themſelues, or murthered their maſters which had bought them; being vnable to endure ſeruitude: yea, ſome were ſo malicious, as paſſing the riuers, they made holes in boats, ſo as they ſunke with their D burthens. After all this, Pompey would needs returne to Numantia, where he ſought to diuert the courſe of the riuer of Duero, which paſſed along the towne, that hee might cut off their paſſage for victuals. The inhabitants and ſouldiors within the towne fighting againſt his deſignes, repulſed both them that were at worke, and thoſe that garded them, or that came to ſuccour them; and in many skirmiſhes and ſallies they ſlew many Romane horſemen, with Oppius, a Colonell of a thouſand foot: and in another place, at a trench which the Romanes had made, the Numantines ſallying forth ſuddainely, ſlew foure hundred men, with the ouerſeer of the worke.

During theſe exploits, there arriued certaine Romane Senatours at the campe, with ſome new bands, to ſupply the places of the old ſouldiors, which deſired to be diſmiſſed, hauing ſer- E ued ſix yeares in thoſe warres. Pompey being aſhamed of his bad ſucceſſe, did that which his predeceſſors had not yet done, continuing his ſiege before Numantia all the Winter: ſo as many which were not accuſtomed to the raine, ſnow, and cold of that Region, died of collicks and paine in their bellies. Beſides, he had another rout, ſeeking to ſuccour his ſouldiors which were gone to forrage, whereas he loſt many, as well of the Roman nobilitie, as of priuat ſouldiors: ſo as tyred and waſted with ſo many loſſes, he was forced to retyre and to lodge his armie, attending him that ſhould come to ſucceed him in the Spring. But fearing to be cenſured, for that hee had managed that warre ſo ill, hee reſolued to make a kind of compoſition with them of Numantia: who being much weakened with the miſeries which they had endured, and fearing they ſhould be diſtreſſed for victuals, liuing in a barren countrey, they conſen- F ted to ſend embaſſadours to Pompey, who in open ſhew demaunded, That they ſhould yeeld vnto the Romanes diſcretion; but vnder hand he graunted many of their demaunds, drawing from them ſome talents, certaine hoſtages, and them that were reuolted. There remained yet ſome part of the compoſition money to pay, for the which Pompey ſtayed, when as M. Popilius Lenas a Conſull arriued in Spaine to ſucceed him. Then Pompey being freed from the care of the warre, denied that he had accorded any thing vnto the Numantines, notwithſtanding ſtanding that many captaines and Romane Senatours did affirme the contrarie: Whereupon Popilius ſent this controuerſie to Rome vnto the Senat, whereas the embaſſadours of Numantia and Pompey did plead: but the Senate was of opinion not to confirme any thing that Pompey had done, and that the warre ſhould continue againſt the Numantines. Popilius then continuing warre againſt them, did nothing that was memorable, although his charge were prolonged, but loſt his honour, and many good ſouldiors. Ann. Rome 615 3 During his time, the Luſitanians hauing rebelled againe, D. Iunius Brutus was ſent into the further Spaine. Others ſay, That he did execute that which followes, vnder the Conſull Q. Cepio, and that he was ſent by him as his Lieutenant, by reaſon of the diſtance of places betwixt the riuers of Betis, Anas, Tagus, Durius, and Lethes, by the which the theeues eſcaped, and made ſuddaine incurſions, not onely moleſting them that purſued them, but alſo putting them out of hope to take them, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the places. Brutus therfore tooke this courſe, he would not trouble himſelfe in running after theſe nimble fellowes, who knew all the meanes to eſcape; but went directly to their owne countrey, that he might in one expedition both puniſh them, and enrich his ſouldiors with their ſpoyles; aſſuring himſelfe, they would come to defend their holes: wherein he was nothing deceiued: for both men and women came running to repulſe the Romane armie, fighting with a deſperat furie: ſo as being halfe dead, diſmembred, or couered with wounds, they were neuer heard grone: yet many leſſe couragious, taking vp as much as they could carrie, fled to the mountaines, whom Brutus afterwards (vpon their ſuite) pardoned. Hauing paſſed the riuer of Duero, he ſubdued many people, and tooke hoſtages, and was the firſt of all the Romans which led an armie beyond the riuer of Lethes, called Limia, where he aſſayled the Brecaires, a people of Galicia, who had ſpoiled the victuallers comming to his campe. This nation was accuſtomed to lead their wiues to the warre, and both men and women did fight ſo obſtinately, as they were neuer ſeene to turne their backs, nor caſt out any cries vnworthie of ſouldiors for any wounds which they receiued. The women that were taken priſoners, ſlew themſelues and their children, rather than to be ſlaues. Many of their towns and retreats yeelded vnto Brutus, but he was conſtrained to ſubdue them againe; for finding him ſomewhat retyred, they rebelled againe. The inhabitants of Talabrica in another part of the prouince made triall of the magnanimitie and clemencie of the auncient Romanes: for being often reuolted, and hauing abuſed the pardon which he had giuen them, Brutus hauing forced them to yeeld to his diſcretion, demaunded firſt the fugitiues, and then the priſoners taken in warre. Then he diſarmed them, and tooke the chiefe among them for hoſtages: which done, hee made them all goe out of the towne, with their wiues and children, and hauing cauſed them to be enuironed by the armed bands, hee ſpake vnto them, reproching them with their many rebellions and ingratitudes; for the which they attended no leſſe than the ſentence of death: but he ended his ſpeech with reproches and bitter words, and then beyond all hope ſent them home to their houſes, depriuing them onely of their armes, horſes, and other equipage for warre, and of their common treaſure. They write, That he did aſſigne lands for them that had ſerued Viriatus in the warre, and that he gaue them the towne of Valence in Luſitania to dwell in. This yeare C. Maticnus being accuſed at Rome, That he had abandoned the army, whereof he had charge in Spaine, was beaten with rods, and ſold for a Seſterce (which in our Engliſh money is a penny) by a decree of the people. As for Popilius, who made warre againſt the Numantines, or rather they made warre againſt him, he returned to Rome, at the comming of the Conſull C. Hoſtilius Mancinus, who was altogether vnfortunat in his enterpriſes; the which was ſignified vnto him by preſages, before he came out of Italie: for as he tooke ſhipping at Port Hercules, there was a ſtrange voice heard, ſaying, Mancinus ſtay; and as hee tooke port at Genes, there was a great Snake found in his ſhip, the which eſcaped. He was beaten euery where by the Numantines, hauing thirtie thouſand men in his armie. Being terrified with a bruit, That the Cantabrians and Vacceans came to ſuccour Numantia, he fled in the night into deſart places, whereas Nobilior had encamped in former time, and there without any munition or rampier, he was the next morning found and beſieged by the enemie, and conſtrained to capitulate a peace with them vpon like conditions, ingaging his faith to make them be ratified by the Senate. *Tib. A of this peace: who was ſo fauoured by the Numantines, as they hauing ſpoiled the Romanes campe, and among other things carried away the accompts, quittances, and other papers of Gracchus, they reſtored them to him againe very willingly. Although this compoſition were ignominious, yet did it ſaue the liues of twentie thouſand Romane citizens: Which being knowne at Rome, M. Æmilius Lepidus the other Conſull was preſently ſent into Spaine, and Mancinus called home to Rome, to giue an account of his action, the Numantine warre remaining for a time ſuſpended. By reaſon whereof, M. Æmilius being impatient to remaine in the Prouince idle (for captaines neuer goe to the warre, but to get honour and profit) whileſt that Mancinus proceſſe was in hand, and that hee had receiued newes, hee began to Brutus* his father in law to aſſiſt him at this worke, who had his charge proroged in qualitie of Proconſull of the further Spaine. The Senate aduertiſed hereof, ſent Cinna and Cæcilius embaſſadours into Spaine, to let him vnderſtand, That the Romanes did not hold it conuenient (after ſo many loſſes) to attempt a new warre, and preſented vnto him the Senates decree, by the which he was forbidden to make warre againſt the Vacceans. Æmilius (who had alreadie begun the ſiege) anſwered, That the Senate was not well informed how matters paſſed in Spaine, nor how that he had joyned his forces with thoſe of Brutus: and that he was well aſſured, that the Vacceans had relieued the Numantines with victuals, men, and money: that if he ſhould

With theſe reaſons (the which the Conſull did alſo write vnto the Senat) Cinna returned. Then did the Conſull Æmilius Lepidus and Brutus the Proconſull buſie themſelues to plant many engines to batter the towne, and to furniſh their armie with victuals. Flaccus (who was Commiſſarie generall of the campe) cauſing great ſtore of corne to be brought, was ſurpriſed by the enemie, and ſo encloſed, as it was impoſſible to eſcape: but he by a ſingular policie cauſed it to bee bruited among his troupes, That the Conſull had taken Palantia, the which did ſo amaze the enemies, as with a fooliſh credulitie they quit their prey, and retyred. The ſiege of Palantia growing tedious, the Romane armie began to ſuffer ſo much, as both men and beaſts peri-

Æmilius Lepidus* being called to Rome by reaſon of theſe errours, was degraded and condemned in a great fine. Brutus continuing in his charge of Proconſull in the further Spaine, ſpent much time to order things in his Prouince, and afterwards triumphed at Rome: he was afterwards called Callaique or Gallique,

As for the queſtion betwixt Mancinus and the embaſſadours of Numantia, it was judged, That the accord made without the authoritie of the Senat ſhould bee void, and they decreed, That Mancinus, who was bound vnto the Numantines, ſhould be deliuered vnto them, to diſpoſe of him at their pleaſure, after the example of the auncient Romanes, who had for the like offence deliuered twentie captaines vnto the Samnites. According vnto which decree, Mancinus was brought into Spaine by P. Furius Philus or Philo, Conſull in the yeare 617, and was deliuered by him naked and bound vnto the Numantines, who refuſed him. This Furius in a brauerie made Q. Metellus and *Q. Scipio Æmilianus ſent into Spaine.

6 The people of Rome being wearie of this Numantine warre, which grew daily more G difficult, in the yeare 619 they did chuſe P. Corn. Scipio Æmilianus, called Africanus, Conſull, for that ſome few yeares before hee had ruined the mightie citie of Carthage; vnto whom Spaine was giuen without lot: whither he went with ſome voluntaries, and a ſmall number of his friends, being ſome foure thouſand men; for Spaine had too many ſouldiors, and wanted onely good captaines. He gaue this troupe in charge to Buteon his nephew, and he himſelfe went ſpeedily before. Being arriued in Spaine, he found what he had heard before; That the armie was very ill diſciplined: Wherefore holding it a part of great wiſedome firſt of all to reforme the corrupt manners of the ſouldiors, as ſoone as he arriued, he chaſed out of the campe all merchants, ſtrumpets, tellers of fortune, and the new ſuperſtitious ſacrificers; to which things the ſouldiors were too much giuen: he cut off their carts and baggage, forbidding them to bring any thing into the campe that was not neceſſarie. He did forbid beds, and he himſelfe gaue example vnto others, lying vpon couerings ſpred vpon girts. Finally, he ſet ſuch an order among the ſouldiours (ſubmitting himſelfe vnto the rigour of his owne ordinances, as in a ſhort time they became modeſt, temperat, and obedient. Then hee began to traine them in warlike exerciſes, remoouing his campe often, whereas he cauſed the ſouldiours to digge and make rampiers, himſelfe being alwaies preſent, from the day breake to the Sunne ſet; and commonly he made them to march in

He had no will to ſuffer any one to goe foorth to skirmiſh, vntill he was well informed how to make warre with that people, of the opportunities he muſt ſeeke, and of their manner of proceeding, their counſels and K reſolutions; keeping the enemie by that meanes from ſtraying abroad, and maintaining the countrey, which was behind his armie, aſſured for his forragers: ſaying alwayes, That light skirmiſhes affected vpon brauerie, without neceſſitie, ſhould bee rejected by a wiſe and expert captaine, who ſhould reſpect nothing but neceſſitie, profit, and occaſion, and then he ſhould ſhew himſelfe courageous and hardie. When as he ſaw a conuenient time, hee marched with his armie, and taking a great circuit, he came and encamped in the territorie of the Vacceans, from whence the Numantines had their victuals. to free them from danger. In this long and drie paſſage he digged Wells for to eaſe his ſouldiors, being oppreſſed with the violent heat, but they found the waters bitter. In the end he came into a more fertile countrey, with the loſſe onely of ſome horſes and beaſts of carriage.

Paſſing by the territorie of Cauca, whereas Lucullus had made that great ſlaughter, hee made

A made proclamations, That the Caucians which were abſent might returne freely to their lands, and from thence he led his armie to winter in the territorie of the Numantines, whereas Iugurthe, grand child to Maſſiniſſa, came vnto him, bringing certaine companies of archers and caſters with ſlings, with twelue Elephants. In this place ſome Romanes forraging and ſpoyling the neighbour countrey, were ſurpriſed in a Bourg, behind the which the enemies lay hidden in a valley; who were repulſed by Scipioes ſpeedie comming to aſſiſt them, but he had no will to purſue them. Approching ſoone after to Numantia, he beſieged it with two campes; one of the which was commaunded by Q. Fab. Maximus his brother. There the beſieged made many ſallies, prouoking the Romanes to skirmiſh: but the Conſull laughed at
B them, ſaying, it had beene a great indiſcretion in him to fight with deſperat and mad men, whom he was aſſured to take in a ſhort time by famine. He vndertooke to caſt a ditch and a rampier of a league and a halfe compaſſe about the towne: for the defence of which worke, hauing ſet gards in conuenient places, he commaunded euery man to be carefull in his quarter, and that when as the enemie ſhould offer to charge in one place, that ſuddainely they ſhould in the day time hang vp a red cloth on a pike, and in the night make a fire, that he and his brother might come to ſuccour them. This worke being finiſhed, without it he drew another ditch, making a wall with piles, of eight foot broad and ten high, the which he flanked with towers a hundred and twentie foot one from another: and for that there was a mariſh ground on the one ſide, he cauſed a cauſey to bee rayſed of the height of this wall, which
C joyned vnto it. The riuer of Duero running through theſe rampiers, brought great commoditie to the beſieged; for that way men went both in and out, and boats entred by fauour of the wind and ſwiftneſſe of the ſtreame: to take away the vſe whereof, Scipio built two forts vpon the bankes, from the which he caſt pieces of timber into the water, from one banke vnto the other, in the which were faſtened great pikes of yron, which went very deepe into the water; and theſe beames were ſo tied together, as they did turne continually with the force of the ſtreame, ſo as not any one could paſſe, either by boat or ſwimming: for Scipio held it a good courſe to amaze the enemie, to take from him all meanes to haue intelligence from abroad, and withall to cut off his victuals. For the gard of theſe fortifications hee appointed thirtie thouſand men, being the one halfe of his armie; to ſuccour the which, hee ordai-
D ned twentie thouſand more, reſeruing the other tenne thouſand for a third ſupplie: which vpon a ſigne giuen ſhould come vnto their quarters, without confuſion. The Numantines attempted often to force theſe rampiers, but they found too great reſiſtance, the Conſull himſelfe going the round day and night, and viſiting the whole circuit, being almoſt two leagues; making his account, that the enemie wanting victuals, armes, and ſuccours, could not long hold out. Matters being in this eſtate, Rhetogenes, ſurnamed Caraunius, one of the chiefe and moſt reſolute men within the towne, aduentured with fiue of his friends, and ſo many ſeruants, all well mounted, to come in a darke night vnto the enemies rampiers, where they mounted and ſlew the enemies ſentinels, and with certaine engines which they carried, paſſed ouer their horſes: hauing ſent their ſeruants backe, they diſperſed them-E ſelues in the countrey of the Areuaces, where they beſought thoſe people, That as friends, kinſmen, and allies to the Numantines, they would ſuccour them. Many fearing the Romanes, commaunded them to depart out of their countries, refuſing to heare them: but the young men of Lutia, a rich towne, ſome tenne leagues from Numantia, pitying theſe poore creatures beſieged, did ſolicite the people to relieue them: whereof Scipio being aduertiſed by the auncients of the towne, went thither with ſome troupes, and within eight houres ſpace ſhewed himſelfe about their walls, commaunding, That the chiefe of theſe ſeditious young men ſhould bee deliuered vnto him, threatening (if they fayled) to ſacke their towne: ſo as no excuſe preuailing, about foure hundred were brought vnto him, whoſe hands hee cauſed to bee cut off, and the next day returned to the campe. The F Numantines preſt with hunger and all other extremities, ſent fiue of their citizens vnto Scipio, to vnderſtand if hee would receiue them vpon any reaſonable conditions. Auarus, the chiefe of this embaſſage, comming before him, began to diſcourſe of the vertues and generous diſpoſition of the Numantines, with high wordes maintaining, That it ſhould not bee imputed vnto them for a crime, if they had ſo eagrely defended their liberties, their wiues and children, for the which they were now fallen into that calamitie.

Wherefore

Wherefore (ſaid he) it is reaſonable, ô Scipio, that (according to thy ſingular vertue) thou pardon our braue and valiant race, and that thou propound vnto vs ſuch honeſt conditions, as we may endure them: for it is in thy power to haue the towne by this meanes, or to vvrie what ſouldiours (who eſteeme their libertie more than their liues) can doe. To whom Scipio made no other anſwere, but that they muſt deliuer themſelues, their towne, their armes, and all they had, at his diſcretion, for he was ſufficiently aduertiſed by priſoners, in what eſtate they were. When this anſwere was brought vnto the beſieged (although they expected no better) they entred into ſuch a rage againſt theſe poore deputies, as they cut them in pieces, being jealous that they had made ſome agreement with the Romanes for their owne particular. Then reſoluing vpon all extremities, after that their victuals were conſumed, hauing deuoured raw hides, and ſuch like things, in the end they fed vpon dead mens fleſh: and they fell into ſuch miſerie, as the ſtronger oppreſſed the weaker, euery man regarding his own particular, being alſo conſumed with peſtilent diſeaſes, which grew through the extremities which they endured, and from the corruption and ſtinke of dead carkaſſes. Wherefore vanquiſhed with all theſe calamities, in the end they tooke counſell to yeeld, and came and preſented themſelues to Scipio like hideous ſuppliants, deformed, filthy, and torne; their haire and beards long, clotted and ſtaring, reſembling rather ſauage beaſts than reaſonable creatures: whom Scipio commaunded to deliuer vp their armes that day, and the next day they ſhould all yeeld themſelues in a certaine place appointed them. To this they demaunded a dayes reſpite, for that many were yet remaining within the towne, being reſolued to die rather by the ſword or famine, than to yeeld, but vpon honeſt conditions. So being returned, and hauing conſulted what was to be done, they reſolued, after they had once glutted themſelues with that ſmall ſtore which remained, they would ſallie out vpon the enemie, and die fighting vertuouſly for their countrey. But Scipio knowing, that he had to deale with mad men, reſtrained his ſouldiors all he could: the which did the more enflame the Numantines, who notwithſtanding all that he could doe, iſſued forth, and forced the Romanes to defend themſelues, hauing great need to bee commaunded by a wiſe and valiant captaine; for they were more than once forced to fight flying: yet in the end the Numantines were repulſed, hauing loſt their beſt men; notwithſtanding they retired without diſorder: their laſt remedie was to flye out of the towne with their armes: but that being ſtopt, they ſhut their gates, and ſlew one another, by ſword, poyſon, or fire, and by all other kinds of deaths: ſo as Scipio entring into the towne, he found all conſumed with fire, and not a man liuing. Others write, That Scipio burnt and raſed the towne without the conſent of the Senate, and not the Numantines, for the hatred which he did naturally beare to them, which he tooke by force: beſides that, by the deſtruction of ſuch famous townes he made his renowme greater, or elſe that he held it to be expedient & profitable for the Commonweale: they ſaid alſo, That but ſome of them ſlew themſelues, and the reſt were ſold for ſlaues, onely fiftie were reſerued, to lead them in triumph.

Thus the taking of Numantia is diuerſly written, the which did ſo long reſiſt the Romans, and gaue them ſo many routs, hauing in the beginning but eight thouſand men, the which in the end were reduced to leſſe than foure thouſand; which notwithſtanding did greatly importune their enemies. The territorie of Numantia was afterwards diuided among the neighbour people; and Scipio (being then Pro-conſull) hauing viſited the countrey, and done right to all men, puniſhing the inconſtant allies by words or threats, and ſome by pecuniarie fines, he returned to Rome, where in one yeare he triumphed of the Numantines, and D. Brutus of the Luſitanians and Gallicians. The Senat deputed ten Senators to go into Spaine, to diſpoſe of the affaires of that Prouince. Thus the troubles were pacified, without any alteration for ſome yeares.

Ann. Rome 621

7 In the yeare 630, Q. Cæcilius Metellus and T. Quintius Flaminius being Conſuls, the inhabitants of the Iſlands of the Baleares, which we call Maiorca and Minorca, liuing by pyracie and theeuing by ſea, miniſtred occaſion to the Romanes to ſend the Conſull Metellus, eldeſt ſonne to him that was called Macedonicus, who after a great ſlaughter of theſe theeues brought them to a more ciuile life; where hauing left ſome Colonies of Romans, he triumphed at Rome.

8 C. Marius (he that was afterwards ſeuen times Conſull) about the yeare 640 had the charge of the further Spaine as Pretor, where hee cleanſed the whole countrey of theeues:

A which trade thoſe people could not forget, holding it in old time to be very honourable. Q. Seruilius Cæpio was alſo ſent with the like charge, who fought with the Luſitanians, and did triumph. A while after there did ariſe new tumults among the Celtiberians: for the appeaſing whereof Calphurnius Piſo was ſent, and after him Sergius Galba, Pretors: but for that the Romanes were much troubled with the warres of Italie, as well againſt the Cimbrians (a nation comming from the borders of the Northerne Ocean) as againſt the ſlaues which were in armes againe, and forraged Sicile, they ſent certaine Commiſſioners to pacifie the troubles without armes, if it might be. Theſe Cimbrians being vanquiſhed a little before by the Conſull Carbo, had fallen vpon the Gaules and Spaine, from whence they had beene repulſed, and
B in the yeare 644 returned againe to inuade Italie, where they defeated the armie of M. Syllanus Conſull: but the Luſitanians in the yeare 648 (P. Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius being Conſuls) defeated a Romane armie: the Authors ſpeake not of his name that was the Generall, nor of his that was ſent to ſuppreſſe them, in the yeare 652, who ſubdued them. It may be it was D. Iunius Silanus. And they ſtayed not long to miniſter matter of triumph to the Romane captaines, hauing rebelled againe in the yeare 654, againſt whom L. Corn. Dolabella a Pretor was ſent, who vanquiſhed them and triumphed. The Conſull T. Didius, at the ſame time, after that the Cimbrians had beene driuen out of Italie, hauing had the gouernment of Spaine about Ebro, ſlew in battaile 20000 Areuaces and Vacceans, and tooke the towne of Thermiſe, which was great and ſtrong by ſituation, commaunding the inhabitants for a puniſh-
C ment of their ordinarie rebellion to dwell in the plaine, and not to inwall themſelues: after ſeuen moneths ſiege hee alſo tooke the towne of Colenda, and ſold the inhabitants. Other people of the Celtiberians continuing in their theeuing, were by him condemned to die, by the aduice of tenne Commiſſioners, which were then in Spaine for the people of Rome. Hauing then gathered them together, vnder colour that he would giue them land to manure, he cauſed them to be enuironed by his ſouldiors, and cut in pieces: for which deeds he triumphed at his returne to Rome. In the armie of this T. Didius was at that time Q. Sertorius, who had charge of 1000 men, a man of judgement and valour, whereof he made good proofe, when as vnder this Conſul Didius, the Caſtalonians attempted, with the help of them of Girize, to cut his regiment in pieces which wintred in their town, for that during the tumult he rallied them
D together which eſcaped the ſlaughter, with the which he reuenged the death of his ſouldiors, putting all the conſpirators which he found armed to the ſword: & hauing attired ſome of his men with their apparrell and armes, he marcht ſpeedily towards Girize, where being let in by reaſon of this diſguiſing, he made a great ſlaughter of the inhabitants, and ſold the reſt.

10 The Luſitanians and people of the further Spaine in the yeare 656 drew againſt them the Conſull P. Licinius Craſſus, who triumphed in like manner. And in the yeare 659 Fuluius Flaccus being ſent againſt the Celtiberians, who had rebelled, he ſlew 20000 in battell, and reſtrained the reſt by juſtice, euen thoſe which had burnt their owne Senators, oppoſing themſelues againſt the rebellion which they had intended; raſing and demanteling ſome townes. Spaine by means of theſe executions remained quiet, vntill the ciuile diſſentions betwixt Ma- E rius and Sylla, which miniſtred occaſion of new warre.

Fuluius Flaccus defeats the Celtiberians.

11 Whileſt this Marian ſedition continued, M. Craſſus hauing ſeene his father and brother ſlaine by Cinna and Marius, fled into Spaine, where he had been in time paſt at the warres with his father, and there had gotten ſome friends: but finding that euerie one ſtood in feare of Marius, he retired to a countrey houſe belonging to Vibius Paciacus, where he hid himſelfe in a caue, cauſing ſome to ſound Vibius mind, who hearing that Craſſus was eſcaped, he cauſed him to be ſecretly fed there eight moneths by a ſlaue of his, vnto the death of Cinna.

12 After the ciuile warre betwixt Marius and Sylla, the infection of this madneſſe paſt into Spaine, by the means of Q. Sertorius, who hauing held the partie of Cinna and Marius, after the defeats of Carbo, Scipio and Norbanus by Sylla, he retired into Spaine, where he had been vnder
F the Conſull Didius, and there he fortified himſelfe againſt the enterpriſes of the Dictator Sylla, cauſing Iulius Salinator to keepe the paſſages of the Pyrenee mountaines, with 6000 foot, but it was not long before that Sylla ſent C. Annius, who not able to force the enemie in a place of ſuch aduantage, obtained the paſſage by the death of Salinator, whom Calphurnius Lanarius (that did maligne him) ſlew in treaſon. This made Sertorius retyre, who had but three thouſand men remaining in new Carthage, from whence he paſſed into Affricke, and from thence the barbarians chaſed him: afterwards thinking to returne, he was repulſed from landing in Spaine: wherefore he ſeazed vpon one of the iſlands of Pytiuſes, in diſpight of C. Annius garriſon: but he was chaſed from thence alſo, ſo as being accompanied with ſome foiſts of Cicilian pirats, he was forced to put out to ſea for ſome daies. In the end he paſſed the ſtrait, and put to land aboue the mouth of the riuer of Betis, where hauing information by ſome mariners of the fortunat iſlands, he began to reſolue to liue there in reſt: whereupon theſe pirats diſliking his deſigne, abandoned him, and put themſelues in pay vnder a Moore, named Aſcalius, who contended with an other for the kingdome of the Maruſians, whoſe partie Sertorius maintained. Comming to fight Aſcalius was defeated, and after him one of Syllas captaines, called Paccianus, who came to ſuccour him: after which Aſcalius was beſieged in the towne of Tingis, and taken. By this good ſucceſſe Sertorius augmented his armie with the remainders of the vanquiſhed enemies ſouldiors, which came to ſerue vnder him. He did ſo win the harts of the Moores, vſing this victorie modeſtly, as they were afterwards al at his commandment: but as he was in great care what courſe to take, there came embaſſadors vnto him from the Luſitanians, intreating him to be their Generall; for that the Romans of Syllas partie made war againſt them, and therefore they had need of a man of judgment & experience, which honor they did according to his merits offer vnto him: vpon which ſummons he left Africke, leading with him about 2500 ſouldiors, which he called Romans, & yet they were for the moſt part Africans; with the which hauing ioyned 4000 Luſitanians and 700 horſes, he made head againſt foure great Romane captaines, vnder whom there were aboue 120000 foot and 6000 horſes, and had in a manner all the townes of Spaine at their deuotion.

Sertorius hauing endured manie croſſes, reſolues to goe and liue at the fortunat iſlands at Canaries.

What forces were againſt Sertorius in Spaine.

At the beginning of this war, he defeated Cotta in a ſea fight, neere vnto the towne of Mellaria, and put to rout Didius or Fidius, Pretor of Betica, neere vnto the riuer of Betis, where he ſlue 10000 of his men: and by the diligence of his Queſtor Hertuleius, he alſo defeated Thoranius, lieutenant to the Conſull Q. Metellus Pius, to whom that prouince was aſſigned in the yeare 673. Afterwards he had to deale with Metellus himſelfe, and did ſo annoy him being a great and an expert captaine, as Manlius the Proconſull of Gaule was forced to come to his ſuccours, with three legions and 1500 horſe: but Manlius being encountred by Hertuleius Sertorius Queſtor, was defeated, put to flight, and forced to ſaue himſelfe in a manner alone within Lerida. L. Domitius was more vnfortunat, who was ſlain vpon the place in an other incounter: all which exployts were done by ſurpriſes, and in flying or retiring, the Romane captains not being able to draw Sertorius to fight in a pitcht field: whereupon the Senat of Rome, conſidering that Metellus age (which was ſomewhat aduanced) made him more ſlow, and therefore not fit to incounter Sertorius, who was in the flower of his age, accompanied with ſouldiours as light as the wind, inured to labour, hunger, thirſt, and all the diſcommodities of war, were of opinion to ſend Cn. Pompeius vnto him, as an aſſiſtant & companion with like authoritie. In the mean time Metellus beſieged the towne of the Langobriges, thinking to take it without difficultie, for want of water, knowing there was but one onely well in the whole towne: but Sertorius prouided for this inconuenience; for hauing promiſed a reward to ſuch as would carrie goats skins filled with water, the Moores and other aduenturous people went in with a great quantitie: ſo as Metellus (who had victuals but for fiue daies) was forced to retyre, after that Aquinus one of his lieutenants, whom he had ſent to forage with 6000 men, had bin defeated by Sertorius, who lay continually in ambuſh.

Pompey ſent into Spaine to aſſiſt Metellus.

About that time M. Perpenna arriued in Spaine, with a great armie, the which he ioyned to that of Sertorius, not of his owne free will, meaning to make war apart, but by conſtraint, for that the ſouldiours hauing a better conceit of Sertorius than of him, would not follow him: which made Perpenna to enuie and hate Sertorius. With theſe forces in a manner al Spaine beyond Ebro, was conquered by him. When as Pompey was come to Metellus camp, many throgh his fame, which was great, began to doubt of Sertorius affaires, and manie townes which were allyed vnto him began to wauer; but that which hapned at Lauronne did confirme them: for Sertorius hauing beſieged Lauronne, & Pompey comming thither to raiſe the ſiege, when as the armies were neere, & that Pompey expected to giue him battel, he perceiued that at one inſtant Sertorius held both the towne & his armie beſieged; for he had lodged 6000 men behind Pompeys army, watching an oportunitie to compaſſe him in, ſo as he was forced to be more carefull how how to ſaue himſelfe, than to deliuer the Lauronitanes, whoſe towne he did ſee taken & burnt before his face: the which Sertorius did, not vpon any crueltie (for in the whole courſe of his life he was neuer noted of that exceſſe, if it were not by conſtraint) but to let them know (who made ſo great eſteeme of Pompey) that he knew more than he; whom he tearmed a yong man, and Syllaes diſciple; and in this act of Lauronna, he ſaid, That a wiſe captain doth alwaies looke more to that which is behind, than before. And to ſay the truth, Sertorius was one of the politickſt captaines of his time, as it appeared in this warre, whereas he maintained himſelfe and thoſe he led, alwaies inuincible, being neuer beaten but by his Lieutenants, through whoſe errors he receiued many prejudiciall loſſes: the which he repaired afterwards with great honor, as the defeat of Hirtuleius by Metellus, neere vnto the towne of Italica, where he loſt twentie thouſand men.

After the taking of Lauronne, the armies of either ſide hauing wintered (the one in Luſitania, the other neere vnto the Pyrenees) they began to ſeeke one another: and it happened, that Pompey hauing encountred Herennius and Perpenna neere vnto Valence, he defeated them, and in like ſort Hirtuleius, who was ſlaine at that time: wherewith growne proud, he marched towards Sertorius, and without attending Metellus and his forces, hee came to fight with him, neere vnto the riuer of Sucro or Xucar, whereas Pompey was put to flight, and hurt. Metellus arriuing, cauſed Sertorius to retyre; with whom he did afterwards fight in the territorie of Sagunt, whereas Memmius, Pompeyes Queſtor, was ſlaine, and Metellus wounded: but Sertorius ſeeing that he had the worſt, retyred himſelfe cunningly, ſuffering himſelfe to be beſieged in the towne of Calaorre, a ſtrong towne in a mountaine country, where he did more annoy the enemie, than they did him: in the meane time leuying men in the townes of his allies, hee made a furious ſally, and diſperſed his enemies; ſo as Metellus went to Winter in Gaule, and Pompey in the territorie of the Vacceans: where hauing beſieged Palantia, Sertorius made him to rayſe his ſiege. In this countrey Pompey found himſelfe much diſtreſſed, ſo as he was forced to demaund money, clothes, and corne for his armie, from the Senat, elſe hee ſhould be forced to bring it backe into Italie: Whereupon the Conſull Lucullus gaue order hee ſhould be furniſhed, fearing, that if he brought his armie backe into Italie, he would ſue vnto the people for a Commiſſion to make warre againſt Mithridates, which charge hee affected.

Battell betwixt Pompey and Sertorius, wherein Sertorius had the better.

During the Conſulſhip of L. Lucullus and M. Cotta, the Proconſuls Metellus and Pompey did all they could againſt the townes allied to Sertorius; who did ſo terrifie them, as Metellus deſpairing euer to vanquiſh him with all the force of the Romans during his life, made a proclamation by the ſound of the trumpet, to giue 100 talents to him that could kill him, amounting to 60000 crownes, and beſides, 20000 acres of land, if he were a Romane; if a baniſhed man, reſtitution to all his goods and honours. The baniſhed Senatours of Rome, which followed Sertorius army, did all malice their Generall, wherunto Perpenna (alwaies jealous of his glory) did ſtill incite them: wherefore they began to croſſe him vnder hand in many gallant deſigns, abuſing the authoritie which Sertorius had giuen them ouer the Spaniards, proudly, couetouſly and cruelly, vnder colour of juſtice, exacting extraordinarie tributes; ſo as many towns did mutine, and the loue which they did beare vnto Sertorius, was turned into hatred: wherefore Sertorius was forced (for the ſuppreſſing of many tumults which did ariſe) to ſhew himſelfe ſeuere, againſt his owne nature, and at the laſt became cruell: ſo as in the end he put to death many children of noble houſes, whom he held in the towne of Oſca, vnder colour to inſtruct them in learning, and to teach them the manners of the Romans; the which (to ſpeake truly) were ſo many hoſtages: and others he ſold, to puniſh the infidelitie of the Spaniards, which he diſcouered daily; the which did much blemiſh the luſtre of his vertues. Perpenna through his malice drew him to this exceſſe, and did procure him infinite enemies, as well Romanes as Spaniards, and hauing found many confederats, he conſpired with Auſidius Græcinus, Manlius, Antonius, and others, to murther him; the which he put in execution, hauing inuited him to ſupper in his lodging, with the whole troupe of conſpirators, where they ſtabbed him with their daggers. Such an end had this great captaine, by the treaſon of his owne followers; the which being publiſhed, all the people of Spaine ſent embaſſadours vnto Metellus and Pompey, and yeelded vnto him. The inhabitants of Ebora attribute the foundation of their towne to Sertorius, where there are certaine inſcriptions to bee ſeene, pey. A yeare after we find mention made of M. Puppius Piſo Pretor, who triumphed alſo for ſome victories gotten in Spaine.

13 In the yeare 688 L. Aurelius Cotta and Lucius Manlius Torquatus being Conſuls, Cn.
Cn. Piſo ſlaine in Spaine, Piſo a young man, audacious, poore, and ſeditious, ſuſpected to haue conſpired with Cateline, was ſent into Spain with charge (vnder pretext to do him honor, but the true cauſe was to get him out of Rome) where he was ſlaine, troubling the prouince with exactions, and other ex-14 ceſſe: & ſome ſay it was plotted by Pompey. Then mention is made of Q Calidius a Pretor in the K yere 692: and after him, of Tubero in the further Spaine, who gaue the Prouince to Caius Iul.
Cæſar his Queſtor, in qualitie of Pretor, Q. Metellus and L. Afranius being Conſuls at Rome, in the yeare 693 of the foundation thereof: whereas in few dayes he ſubjected vnder the Ro-C Iul. Cæſars exploits in Spaine being Pretor. mane yoake all that was to be ſubdued in Galicia, Brecaire, and Luſitania: among others, he deſtroyed Brigantium in Galicia (the which is Bragance, if it be not the Port of Corugna, or the Groine, called in old time Portus Brigantinus:) He diſperſed the Herminian mountai-ners, inhabiting betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, and forced them to retyre into the iſlands of Cincies, which are thoſe of Bayonne of Minio. And if hee ſhewed himſelfe actiue and valiant in matters of warre, hee woon no leſſe honour in adminiſtration of juſtice, and other actions of peace: aboue all things hee pacified many ſuites, commenced by L vſurers againſt their debtors; the which he ſo ordered, as the creditors ſhould haue two third parts of their debtors goods, and the reſt they ſhould haue for their maintenance, vntill the debt were payed: and he made many other good ordinances, for the which he was much honoured. After Cæſars returne, he being Conſull, there was a complot made betwixt him, Craſſus, and Pompey, who diuided the Romane Prouinces betwixt them: whereof Spaine fell 15 to Pompey; the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: then P. Lentulus was ſent thither as Proconſull, and after him Q. Metellus Nepos: in whoſe time the Gaules of Aquitania made warre againſt Cæſar and the Romanes, employing the captaines and Spaniſh ſouldiors which had carried armes vnder Sertorius.

From that time Spaine was gouerned by Pompey, or men of his faction: ſo as vpon the be- M Pompey perpetuall Gouernour in Spaine. ginning of the ciuile warre betwixt him and Cæſar, L. Afranius, M. Petreius, and M. Varro did gouerne it for him: againſt whom Cæſar marched, after that he had chaſed Pompey out of Italy; knowing well, that Spaine was a ſeminarie for ſouldiors, and if he tooke it not from Pompey, his deſignes would proue but vaine: being well aduertiſed, that Pompey had ſent Vibullius Rufus thither, to keepe that great prouince at his deuotion, and to oppoſe him againſt Cæſar in thoſe parts.

A parts. The lieutenants vpon Vibullius comming put themſelues in order, euery one in his gouernment. Petreius made a leuie of horſemen in Luſitania: Afranius did the like among the Celtiberians, and that part of the Cantabrians, where he commaunded. They joyned their forces together on this ſide the riuer of Ebro, making their ſtore-houſe for the war at Ilerda, hauing in their armies fiue Romane legions, almoſt 80 companies of Spaniards, and about 5000 horſe. Cæſar being reſolued to fight with them, and to chaſe them out of Spain, had ſent C. Fabius with three legions to ſeize vpon the paſſages of the Pyrenee mountains: then he followed with about 6000 Italian foot, which had alwaies ſerued him in the wars of Gaule, and 3000 horſe, and the like number of other ſouldiors leuied in Aquitania, moſt of them of the B mountaines; of whom he had politickely borrowed all the money they had to pay his armie: where he found, that Fabius and the Pompeians were neere, and often skirmiſhed about the riuer of Sicoris or Sigro, whereas Fabius had made two bridges, by the which he ſent his ſouldiors to forrage, for all neere vnto him was conſumed, Petreius and Afranius lying beneath the enemie. It happened, that Fabius meaning to paſſe two legions ouer one of his bridges, to ſecond his forragers, when as the ſouldiors were paſt, & the baggage following them, the bridge was ſo ouercharged with weight, as it brake; ſo as Fabius armie was diuided, and theſe two legions ingaged, and cut off by the riuer from the reſt of their horſe and foot: which the enemies (who lay beneath them) perceiuing by the timber and other ſtuffe which came down with the ſtreame, Afranius did ſuddainly cauſe foure legions and all his horſe to paſſe, to charge Fabius C two legions, which were led by L. Plancus: who hauing put them into a long forme of battell, leaſt he ſhould be enuironed by theſe horſemen, he endured the ſhocke of theſe foure legions, vntill that C. Fabius came to ſuccour him, and to vngage him: for when he ſaw the bridge broken, he doubted what the enemies would doe, and therefore had cauſed all the reſt of his army to paſſe by the other bridge, which was a good league aboue it. Hereupon Cæſar arriued with his armie, and marched towards the enemies to draw them to battaile, but he could not: skirmiſhing for three daies together vnder the towne of Ilerda, with loſſe on either ſide, Cæſars armie (which lay then in a country about ſeuen leagues compaſſe, betwixt the two riuers of Sicoris and Cinga, which were not to be waded through) was much annoyed with raine and tempeſts that fell, wherewith (the riuers being much riſen) the bridges which Fabius had repai- D red were carried away; ſo as they could not bring any victuals from their confederat townes, nor out of Gaule nor Italie, neither yet goe to forrage: and if any did ſtray out farre to ſeeke victuals, they were compaſſed in by the waters, and could not returne to the campe. And on the other ſide, Afranius and Petreius armie liued in abundance: and to encreaſe Cæſars miſeries, great ſtore of victuals, ſtayed by the riuers which were ouerflowne, being conducted out of Gaule, with a good number of foot and horſe, were ſtopped and diſperſed by Afranius, who departed in the night with three legions and all his horſemen to deſeat them. But the Gaules defended themſelues ſo valiantly, as moſt of them eſcaped in the mountaines, the which Cæſar (hauing found meanes ſoone after to repaire his bridges) receiued, with their leaders. Many daies were ſpent in light skirmiſhes, and to cut off them that E went for forrage: in the meane time there were many ſecret practiſes; ſo as Cæſar drew vnto him fiue townes and nations; Oſca, Calagurri, Tarracone, the Lacetanes and Auſetanes: and in the end, the Spaniards which were in Afranius campe began to disband, and to flye to Cæſars campe, yea, whole bands of the Ilurgauonians: And after the example of theſe neere townes, thoſe that were fartheſt off ſued to Cæſar for his friendſhip; who making many ditches and trenches, drew the riuer of Sigro or Sicoris into ſo many ſtreames, as his horſemen might wade through it. Afranius and Petreius being amazed thereat, reſolued to diſlodge, and paſſe the riuer of Ebro, to retyre into the Celtiberians countrey, where they did thinke to get many horſemen, victuals, and other commodities. According to this reſolution, they diſlodged in the night from Ilerda, where they left a good garriſon, and marcht towards Ebro. F Cæſar hauing paſſed his horſe, followed them in the rere, and in the end he was ſo importuned by the legions, as he cauſed them to wade through the riuer whereas the horſmen had paſſed, and made ſuch ſpeed, as he ouertooke the enemies in the morning, ſo as the armies were again neere together, yet did they neither fight nor march, ſpending ſome time to diſcouer the countrey; yet Cæſar in the end found meanes to get (but not without a ſharpe encounter) certaine ſtraits, whereby he ſtopped Afranius and Petreius deſigne for their going to Ebro. 16

Great preparations to reſiſt Cæſar in Spaine.

Cæſar diſarmes Afranius and Petreius.

Whileſt they conſult what they had to doe, and how to preuent Cæſars ſurpriſes, their armie G wearie of them, and woon with Cæſars fame and reputation, was eaſily corrupted by the Cæſarian ſouldiors: the which Afranius and Petreius ſought to hinder; yea, Petreius vſing his abſolute authoritie, ſlew many of them that parled. Thinking afterwards to returne towards Ilerda, and to paſſe the riuer Sicoris, but being hindered by Cæſar, they put their armie in battaile readie to fight: but Cæſar holding them as it were beſieged, reduced them to that extremitie, as they demaunded their liues of him, reſigning their Legions vp vnto him, and all the Prouince.

Varro followes the time and occaſion.

17 M. Varro, who was in the further Spaine, hearing the ſucceſſe of the affaires in Italie, in the beginning, he did hold Pompeyes ruine to be moſt certain: wherefore he ſpake very ho- H nourably of Cæſar, and ſeemed to deſire to be a neuter in theſe quarrels: but when as he vnderſtood, that Afranius and Petreius were gone to field with ſo great an armie, and in what difficulties Cæſar was vnder Ilerda for want of victuals, he then changed his mind, and followed Pompeyes partie; and filling vp two legions which he had, to the which he joyned about thirtie bands of allies, he began to make prouiſion of great ſtore of corne to ſend to Afranius, and in like manner to the Marſilians, whom Cæſar cauſed to be beſieged: and aſſuring himſelfe of the citie of Gades, he cauſed all the gold, ſiluer, and jewels which were in Hercules Temple, to be tranſported thither, making Caius Gallonius, a Roman knight, Gouernor thereof, with ſix companies of Spaniards, carrying all the citizens armes into his lodging. Then he began to change his ſpeech of Cæſar, and of his exploits, contrarie to that which he had of late vſed: wherefore I the citizens of Rome being diſperſed ouer the Prouince, being amazed, did eaſily ſuffer themſelues to be taxed in a great ſumme of money, for the ſeruice of the Commonweale, not ſparing (as it is to be conjectured) the townes which he thought to be affected vnto Cæſar. And if there were any one which durſt ſpeake againſt them that followed Pompey, he did confiſcate their goods, forcing euery one to take an oath to him and to Pompey, and ſo he prepared himſelfe to the warre, making his account to lodge with his two legions in Gades, vpon all euents, and to bring all the corne thither, and to gather together all the ſhipping of that prouince, the which he knew to be too well affected vnto Cæſar. Finally, he perſuaded himſelfe, That hee might prolong the warre in this iſland as much as he pleaſed. Cæſars affaires preſt him to returne into Italie, yet holding it neceſſarie to diſarme all thoſe that held Pompeyes part in Spain, K he ſent two legions towards Betica, vnder the commaund of Q. Caſſius, Tribune of the people; after the which he went with ſome troupes of horſe, hauing in the meane time order for the calling of a generall aſſembly at Cordoua: whither deputies came from all the townes, and in a manner all the Romanes that were in thoſe marches, being much enclined to do what Cæſar ſhould commaund them. M. Varro was excluded by the aſſembly of Cordoua, who ſet gards in their ports and towers, and they of Carmone chaſed away the garriſon which Varro had placed there, which made him haſt the more to bring his two legions to Gades, leaſt he ſhould be preuented: but he was not farre aduanced, before he receiued letters, by the which he was aduertiſed, That the Gaditanes hauing agreed with the captaines of the garriſon which was within their town, had forced Gallonius to depart, proteſting, That they would keepe the town L for Cæſar: whereupon one of Varroes legions reſolued to leaue him, taking the way towards Varro diſarmed by Cæſar.

Seuille. Wherewith Varro being amazed, and ſeeing himſelfe coopt vp in that countrey, ſo as he had no meanes to paſſe into Italie, he reſolued to yeeld vnto Cæſar, deliuering vp his legion which remained, with all the money and victuals that was in his power. Cæſar held an aſſembly at Cordoua, and thanked the deputies of townes, the citizens of Rome, and all the captains and others which had ſhewed themſelues fauourable to his cauſe: hee reſtored euery man to his goods that had been ſpoyled, and filled all men with hope by his promiſes. From Cordoua he paſſed to Gades, and reſtored to Hercules Temple the gold and jewels which had bin taken away: and hauing left Q. Caſſius with foure legions to gouerne the Prouince, he paſſed by ſea to Tarracone, where the deputies of all that part of Spaine attended him: with whom hauing M conferred, and diſpoſed of the affaires, he went by land towards Narbone, and from thence to Marſeilles, which his lieutenants did beſiege. This was in the yeare 704.

Ann. Rome 704 Caſſius crueltie and couetouſnes thruſts Cæſar into a new war.

18 At Marſeilles Cæſar had news, That he was created Dictator at Rome by M. Lepidus the Pretor: after which time Spain was gouerned in his name by M. Lepidus and Q. Caſſius his lieutenants: But they of Corduba oppreſſed with the crueltie & couetouſneſſe of Caſſius, forſooke (with

A (with two legions) Cæſars party; whereby the war was reuiued in Spain by Pompeyes children, after the defeat and death of their father, in the yeare 708. This Caſſius being couetous, and a great exactor, did incenſe the ſouldiours againſt him; who hurt him, and had like to haue ſtabd him with their daggers: The authors of this exceſſe were L. Rucilio, Annius Scapula, and Minutius Silo: yet he was cured; and as he thought to paſſe into Africke by Cæſars commandement, almoſt all his ſouldiours abandoned him, and did chuſe one Thorus, of the towne of Italica, for their leader. To this Thorus (who made a ſhew to beſiege Cordoua) Marcellus did joyne, but they did inueſt Mia (which is likely to be Monte-Major at this day:) thereupon M. Lepidus came from Rome, where he had proclaimed Cæſar Dictator, who kept them from forB cing and taking Caſſius. Marcellus referred their quarels to Lepidus: but Caſſius being loath to truſt him, was content to leaue the prouince, and to giue place to Caius Trebonius. Being imbarqued at Malaca, with all that he had gotten in Spaine, to paſſe into Italie, his ſhip was caſt by a tempeſt vpon the coaſt, where it periſhed, not farre from the mouth of Ebro.

Theſe two legions were ſomewhat pacified by C. Trebonius, who ſucceeded Caſſius Longinus, yet they feared to be puniſhed for their rebellion: wherefore they ſolicited Scipio, who held Africke for the Pompeyan faction, to ſend Cn. Pompeius, ſonne to the great Pompey, into Spaine; who went thitherward: but he ſtaied long at the iſlands of the Baleares, as well to ſubdue them, as by reaſon of ſickeneſſe. The legions hearing afterwards of Scipioes defeat in Italie, and that Cæſar ſent Didius with an armie againſt them, fearing to bee oppreſſed before C Pompeyes comming, they did chuſe T. Quintius Scapula, and Q. Apponius, for their commaunders, chaſing C. Trebonius out of the Betique prouince. Hereupon Pompey arriued, whom they acknowledged for their Generall; ſo as in a ſhort time he reduced the further Spaine vnder his deuotion: with whom there came Actius Varus, and Labienus. Cæſar aduertiſed of theſe things, being in Italie, he ſent Q. Pedius and Q. Fabius Maximus into Spaine: but they were not able to reſiſt Pompeyes forces; ſo as Cæſar being ſolicited by the townes that were allied vnto him (eſpecially by them of Corduba) he went in perſon into Spaine. Then did Sextus Pompeius, the younger of the brethren, hold Cordoua, the chiefe towne of the gouernment, with a good garriſon, and Cn. the elder brother beſieged Vlloa, into the which Cæſar found oportunitie to put ſome ſuccours, by the meanes of a great wind and raine, and by the dexteriD tie of L. Iunius Paciecus, a Spaniard, to whom he had giuen the charge: which put Cn. Pompeius out of hope to take it: whereupon he diſlodged, and led his armie towards Cordoua, whither Sextus his brother, fearing to be forced by Cæſar, did ſolicite him to approach. Hauing incountred Cæſar vpon the bankes of Betis, there were many bloudie skirmiſhes, with variable ſucceſſe. Cæſar diſlodged in the night, and went to beſiege Ategua, whither Pompey went, and camped betwixt Ategua and Vcubis, hauing thirteene legions in his armie; yet he made no account but of three, for all the reſt were compoſed of fugitiues, and men of no value. Cæſar was much ſtronger in horſe, and Pompey had no will to fight, but was willing to prolong the warre all he could: yet being deſirous to force a certaine garriſon which Cæſar had ſet to keepe a peece of ground which was commodious for either of them, there was a great skirE miſh, Cæſar comming himſelfe to ſecond his men with three legions; ſo as the Pompeyans had the worſt, and were repulſed. Wherewith Pompey being amazed, there being new ſupplies of horſe come to Cæſars campe, hee diſlodged, and retired towards Cordoua, being followed by Cæſars horſe, whereof he ſlew many, being ingaged in one of his legions. Some paſt from his campe vnto Cæſar, among the which were Q. Martius and C. Fundanius. Ategua being ſorely battered, and well defended for many dayes, in the end yeelded. The which Pompey vnderſtanding, he marched towards Vcubis, where he cauſed a ſearch to be made for all the inhabitants which fauoured Cæſar, cutting off the heads of ſeuentie foure, and caſting many women and children ouer the walls; which made many to flie to Cæſars campe, yea captaines, and heads of bands, and the ſouldiours of ſome legions, with ſome townes. Wherefore PomF pey fearing that by his delaies he ſhould looſe both his allies, & his armie it ſelfe, hauing ſpent ſome dayes in turning vp and downe, in the end he reſolued to giue Cæſar battell neere vnto Munda. In both armies, beſides Romanes and Italian allies and Spaniards, there were many Moores: for Boechus a Mooriſh king, had ſent two of his ſonnes to ſuccour Pompey; and Bogud another king of the ſame nation, was in perſon in Cæſars armie: yet the battell was fought in a manner by the Romanes alone. On Cæſars ſide the ſouldiours were encouraged by their Gene-

Generals preſence, and did wonderfull deeds of armes. In Pompeyes armie, whereas the fu- G gitiue legionaries were, deſpaire to get their pardon made them to fight reſolutely. Being come to joyne, the allyes of either part turned their backes preſently, ſo as the Romanes muſt trie it who ſhould haue the better, the which was done with great obſtinacie on either ſide; ſo as there could no grones nor lamentations be heard, of any one that was dying or wounded, but onely ſtriking and killing, one encouraging another, and ſhewing themſelues more prompt with their hands than tongues. The battell was long doubtfull, neither could Cæſar or Pompey judge which had the better, who after they had long beheld it in great perplexitie, they came among them to encourage their ſouldiours, whereof there was no great need. King Bogud was the cauſe of Cæſars victorie, who ſtanding without the battell with H his Moores, went vnto the trenches of Pompeyes campe, to ſpoyle it: the which Labienus per-ceiuing, he went out of his ranke to make head againſt him: but the reſt of Pompeyes ſouldiours taking it to be a flight, with the apprehenſion thereof they were all put to rout; and although they did ſoone after find their owne errours, yet could they not rally themſelues together againe, but ſome fled to their campe, and ſome towards the towne of Munde. The ſlaughter was great on either ſide, euen at the taking of the campe, whereas Cæſars men could neuer enter, before they had ſlaine all thoſe that defended it, with like loſſe of their own men.
Cæſar hauing gotten the victorie with great difficultie and danger, he ſaid vnto his ſouldiours, That he had often fought for honour, but now he had fought for his life. There dyed of Pom- peyes ſouldiours 30000. I

Battell betwixt Cæſar and Pompey.

A miſtaking is the cauſe of Pompeyes ruine.

Great ſlaughter on both ſides.

After this rout Cordoua being abandoned by Sex. Pompeius, yeelded, in the which Scapula (who had beene author of the ſouldiours ſedition) cauſed a ſlaue of his to kill him, and to burne his bodie, with all the treaſure he had. Seuill, Munde, and other places, were ſome taken by force, with great ſlaughter of the inhabitants, and ſome by compoſition. Many towns in Spaine (flattering Cæſar) after theſe victories, called themſelues after his name: Vcubis was called Claritas Iulia, Ebora, Libertas Iulia. At this time Cæſar did not ſpare the treaſure of Hercules temple in Gades, being greatly diſtreſſed for money: He took away many of their lands, & laid new taxes vpō thoſe towns which had rebelled, that he might reward his friends.

Pompey hauing eſcaped by flight, he came to Carteia, where he thought to make vſe of the armie at ſea, which he had kept readie thereabouts: but he was purſued, and the ſhips after a K great fight falling into the power of Didius, were ſome of them carried away by him, and the reſt burnt; ſo as Pompey ſore wounded in the ſhoulder and leg, ſeeking to flie by land, was purſued, ouertaken, and ſlaine, with many of his men, by the horſemen and ſome companies of foot which were ſent after him. For theſe victories gotten in Spaine, not againſt ſtrangers, but againſt citizens of Rome, Cæſar, Q. Fabius, and Q. Pedius, did triumph at Rome, to the great griefe of the people. After that theſe things had been exploited by Cæſar, and all ciuile diſſentions quenched, as he thought to enjoy his Dictatorſhip, ſuffering kingly honours to be done vnto him, he was ſlaine by Caſſius, Brutus, and other conſpirators. Then was the eſtate of Rome in greater confuſion than euer, by the diuiſion betwixt Octauius Cæſar and M. Anthonie, and afterwards by the cruell proſcriptions of Octauius, M. Anthonie, and Lepidus: which Lepidus had L 19 triumphed for Spaine in the yere 707, I know not for what victories. It is certaine that he go-uerned the hither part of Spain by Cæſars gift, but it was by his lieutenants, hauing neuer done any exploit of warre. Dio ſaith, That he perſuaded Sex. Pompeius to leaue Spaine, promiſing him reſtitution of his fathers goods. Domitius Caluinus, C. Norbanus, Flaccus, and Aſinius Pollio, were afterwards Gouernours of Spaine, of whoſe exploits there is no memorable mention. In the yeare 713 Cornel. Balbus, borne at Calis, was Conſull at Rome: and in the yeare 714, the ſecond diuiſion of the empire being made betwixt Octauius Cæſar, M. Anthonie, and M. Lepi- dus, after the reconciliation betwixt Octauius and M. Anthonie, and the Peruſine warre, among other prouinces, Spaine fell to Octauius: and from that yere the Spaniards began to account M their yeares by the Arke or rule of Cæſar, the which was 38 years before the comming of our Sauiour, the which they did continue vntill the yeare 1383 of our ſaluation, when as this cuſtome was left, as ſhall be ſaid.

20 In the yeare 726 of the foundation of Rome, Auguſtus being ſole Emperour, he vndertooke to ſubdue the Cantabrians, Aſturians, and Gallicians, who had alwayes held their libertie, lawes, and auntient cuſtomes, to rob and ſpoyle their neighbours, and would wholly

Auguſtus in Spaine.

A wholly ſubject them vnder his empire: wherefore he reſolued to goe in perſon into Spaine, where he found thoſe nations aſſured in their countenances, and full of contempt, relying in the ſtrength of their mountaines, from whence they made many ſudden enterpriſes, verie prejudiciall to the emperours armie, the which camped at Sigiſama (the which ſome thinke was that which at this preſent they call Veiſama, in Guipuſcoa or Biſcaye, and not Sigiſama Iulia) where he made three troupes of his forces. Hauing ſpent many dayes there, and nothing aduanced his affaires, Auguſtus fell ſicke with care and trauell: wherfore hauing left the charge of the warre to C. Antiſtius, he cauſed himſelfe to be carried to Tarracona. The Cantabrians aſſailed both by land and ſea towards Gaule Aquitaine, came to fight with Antiſtius and Firmius, by whom they were defeated in many encounters, and their townes taken. A great number of Gallicians hauing fortified themſelues on a mountaine, then called Meduillius, neere vnto the riuer of Minio, they were beſieged, and ſo preſſed as they muſt of neceſſitie either fight or yeeld: but hauing not the courage to defend themſelues, and being loath to fall into ſeruitude, they all ſlew themſelues. The Aſturians being campedneere vnto the riuer which giues the name vnto their countrey, thought to ſurpriſe the Romane armie, and without doubt had defeated them, if their enterpriſe had not beene diſcouered. They were afterwards put to rout by P. Cariſius, but not without great ſlaughter of his men. Hee alſo tooke Lancia, the chiefe towne of Aſturia, being abandoned. So the warre ended, and at the ſame inſtant Auguſtus hauing diſmiſſed the old ſouldiours, hee gaue them leaue to build the C towne of Emerita in Luſitania, at this day it is Merida in Portugall. Then alſo the towne of Salduba was firſt called Cęſar Auguſta, in honor of Octauius Auguſtus, it is now Saragoſſe, the which he did much enlarge with buildings. Fiue and twentie yeares before the birth of our Sauiour, the way was paued from Cordoua to Aſtigi vpon the Ocean. It appeares by this inſcription which is at Cordoua, on a pillar of greene ſtone, whereon Auguſtus name is grauen, and the number of twelue miles, which is the diſtance from Cordoua to the ſea.

This Temple of Ianus was by all conjectures built by Auguſtus at Cordoua, in ſigne of a perpetuall peace. After Cæſars returne Sextus Apuleius Proconſull, ſhewed ſome proofes of his valour in Spaine, for the which he triumphed: and afterwards L. Æmilius ſuppreſſed the Cantabrians, and Aſturians, who rebelled againe: After which time Spaine was gouerned by Pretors and Proconſuls, the which are ſometimes called in Latine Præſides, vnto the time of Diocleſian and Maximin. Strabo ſaith, That in his time, which was during the empires of Auguſtus and Tiberius, the prouince of Betica was giuen vnto the people of Rome, who appointed a Gouernour or Pretor, hauing a Lieutenant and a Treaſurer; the reſt of Spaine remaining at the emperours diſpoſition: who ſent two lieutenants, the one in qualitie of Vice-Pretor, the other as Vice-Conſull. The Vice-Pretor, with the helpe of a lieutenant or legat, did juſtice, and had juriſdiction ouer all Luſitania, from the riuer of Betis vnto Duero: the other part, being Taracconeſe, did obey the Vice-Conſull, who had a great armie entertained with three lieutenants; the one commaunded the Cantabrians, Aſturians, and the country of Gallicia; the other gouerned along the Mediterranean ſea; and the third had charge of the inner countries. The Generals place of reſidence was at Carthagene, or Tarracone. The emperours which came after, made firſt two, and then one Gouernour of Spaine, and not alwayes of one ſort. About the time of Maximinian and Diocleſian, the Gouernours were called Earles, and their lieutenants Vicars: and when as the Gothes began to erect a kingdome, that ſmall portion which held for the Romanes, along the ſhore of the prouince of Carthagene, and the mountains of the Cantabrians and Aſturians, were gouerned by Dukes, whom they called Præfecti.

The night when as the Lord of peace came vpon the earth, was (as some write) as bright and cleere in Spaine, as the noone day. The computation of times shall hereafter be taken from the birth of our Sauiour; in the 16 yeare of whose life Augustus died. Then Sextilius Hena, a Poet of Cordoua, flourished in Spaine, being now brought wholly to the manners of the Romans. G

21 The Spaniards being much affected to Augustus, did obtaine of C. Tiberius Nero, his successour, leaue to build a goodly temple in honour of him, in the towne of Tarracone. This emperour kept the Gallicians, Asturians, and Cantabrians vnder, with strong garrisons, hauing beene formerly subdued by Augustus. In his time they of Lisbone gaue it out, That they had seene and heard Triton in certaine hollow rockes, singing and playing vpon a cornet, as they painted him: And Plinie reports, that vpon the sea shore a Nereide had beene seene couered with scales, yea whereas she caried a humane shape: and that they had heard the grones and complaints she made dying. Vnder Tiberius, Vibius Serenus Proconsull of the further Spaine, accused by his owne sonne, and conuicted, was condemned as a tyrant, and banished into the island Amorgos, one of the Cyclades. Iunius Gallio, brother to Seneca the Senator, was also banished, for that he had propounded in Senat, to honour the old souldiours which had beene dismist, with higher seats in the Theatre, and at publique shewes; hauing not first spoken thereof vnto the emperour Tiberius. The Spanish flatterers, doing idolatrie vnto princes, would also haue made a temple vnto Tiberius and to his mother, the which was prohibited; Tiberius saying, That he was a man and no god, demaunding no other thing of them, but that they would retaine a good and commendable memorie of him after his death. The six and twentieth yeare of our saluation, L. Piso, a great oppressor of the people, was slaine in the hither Spaine, where he was Pretor, by a peasant of Termes, who being taken and tortured, would neuer confesse who had made him to commit this murther. This man slipping out of the officers hands which led him to the racke againe, beat his own head so violently against a stone, as instantly he lost both sence and life. In those times one of the richest men of Spaine, called Sextus Marius, was accused, to haue accompanied with his owne daughter carnally: for the which he was cast downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeien: but his great wealth was the cause of his death, more than his crime.

Anno 34.

Tiberius had raigned seuenteene yeares, when as our Sauiour Iesus Christ suffered death for the redemption of mankind, hauing finished the three and thirtieth yeare of his life.

The Gospel preached in Spain in Tiberius time.

22 The healthfull doctrine of our redemption by him, was during the empire of Tiberius knowne in Spaine, as some hold: but it is doubtfull who was the Apostle. We read in the Epistles of Saint Paul, that he had a desire to go thither, but it is not certaine that he performed that voiage, although that Epiphanius and others do beleeue it. The Spaniards affirme, That Saint Iames the sonne of Zebedee, came thither to preach the Gospell in the seuen and thirtieth yere, and that he onely conuerted nine persons: Others, as Pope Calixtus, write, That he had many Disciples, but that he had twelue speciall ones, nine whereof hee conuerted in Gallicia. Others affirme, That when he preached at Saragosse, hee dedicated to the virgine Marie, the temple which is at this day called Nuestra Segnora del pillar: and that hauing left two of his Disciples in Spaine, he returned into Iudea. Wee comprehend by the holy writ, that this holy Apostle liued almost all his life in Ierusalem, and thereabouts: and wee know, that Herodes caused his head to be cut off, in the third yeare of the empire of Claudius. L

Anno 39. Herodes & Herodias died in Spaine, as the Spaniards affirme.

The nine and thirtieth yeare of our saluation, as some authors write, Herodes and Herodias (she which incited her incestuous husband, to cut off Saint Iohn Baptists head) retired themselues into Spaine: who (being spoyled of all their goods and dignities, by C. Caligula) dyed there for sorrow. Caligula was slaine by Cherea and other conspirators: But before them Æmilius Regula of Cordoua, hauing attempted his death, was preuented and executed. This yeare M. Anneus Lucanus the Poet, was borne at Cordoua, whose father was Luc. Anneus Mela, brother to Seneca the Philosopher: his mother was called C. Acilia, daughter to Acilius Lucanus the Orator. This child being but eight moneths old, was carried to Rome. M

23 We haue said, That Saint Iames the sonne of Zebedeus was beheaded in Ierusalem by Herods commaundement, in the third yeare of the emperour Claudius. The Spaniards and other authors write, That his Disciples gathering vp his bodie and head, imbarqued it at Ioppa,

A pa, and carried it into Spaine, for feare of the Iewes; and that they landed at a place called Iria Flauia, now Padron, where they buried it in a ſecret place, where ſince it was diſcouered, and carried to Compoſtella. In Claudius time liued Pomponius Mela, borne at Mellaria, and Turanius Graccula. Anneus Seneca of Cordoua, baniſhed by Claudius, was in fauour of Agrippina (whom the Emperour had newly married) called home againe, made Pretor at Rome, and appointed ſchoolemaſter and gouernor to Nero. This Seneca was a famous Orator and Philoſopher, as it appeares by his workes, highly honoured for his great memorie, and auditor to Socion the Philoſopher: L. Anneus Seneca the tragicall Poet was his ſonne. Then did alſo flouriſh Portius Latro, a Spaniard, an excellent Orator. Vnder the Emperour Claudius

B there gouerned Spaine, on this ſide Ebro, Druſillanus Rotundus his Libertine, with the title of Diſpenſer, and Vmbonius Silio ruled Betica.

The Spaniards opinion of S. Iames bodie.

In thoſe times, as Buter ſayes, S. Saturnin was ſent into Spaine, he who was afterwards Biſhop of Tolouſe, and preached at Pampelone, where in ſeuen daies he conuerted fortie thouſand perſons; a great number for that place: among the which was S. Fremin, a citizen of Pampelone.

Anno 61. Otho a modeſt Gouernour in Spaine.

In the yeare 61 of the natiuitie of Chriſt, Otho (who was Emperour after Galba) was ſent by Nero into Luſitania: which prouince hee gouerned tenne yeares modeſtly, and without oppreſſion of the people; the which was ſtrange, conſidering the diſpoſition of the man.

C In the yeare 64 Lucan the Poet, a confederat of Piſos conſpiracie, cauſed his veines to be opened, and died in the 28 yeare of his age. His father Mela preſſing Nero with great importunitie, for the reſtitution of his ſonnes goods, was accuſed as guiltie of the ſame treaſon, and forced to haue his veines opened, and ſo die. Seneca was brought to the ſame death by his diſciple Nero, againſt the promiſes which he had ſo often made and ſworne, not to giue eare to his accuſers, nor to hurt him in any ſort: Seeing the bloud come ſlowly out of his veines, he haſtened his owne death, with poyſon taken in a hot bath, the 114 yeare of his age, or according vnto ſome, the 120. Paulina his chaſt wife, and a rare preſident of loue to her husband, cauſed her veines to bee opened, to follow him: but whether through womaniſh weakeneſſe, or that Nero hindered it, ſhe ſuffered them to be bound vp. *L. Anno 70.

In the yeare 70, which was the laſt of the life of Nero, Silius Italicus was Conſull at Rome, being borne in Italica, a towne in the prouince of Betica, not farre from Seuille: and at that time Cluuius Rufus was in Spaine with ſome commaund. The abhominable diſpoſition of Nero made the Spaniards and many other nations to rebell againſt the Romane Empire, a little before his death; for the ſuppreſſing of whom, he ſent Sergius Galba: but this old man (who had before time gouerned the prouince of Tarraconeſe eight yeares) hauing diſcouered, that Nero had giuen a ſecret Commiſſion to kill him, he declared himſelfe Emperour, and in ſtead of a judge, became head and captaine of the rebellion; whereunto both the Pro-

Galba ſent to ſuppreſſe rebels in Spaine.

E uince and the Romane armie did conſent: but his Empire laſted not long, nor of his two ſucceſſors, Otho and Vitellius: for in leſſe than two yeares they loſt both their liues and the the Empire; one defeating another, to make place for Veſpaſian, who came vnto the imperiall ſeat in the 72 yeare of the Natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt, and graunted vnto the Spaniards the priuiledges of the Latines, which were, That they might demaund offices, and enjoy ſome immunities, but not ſo amply as the citizens of Rome, yet ſomewhat more than the liberties of other cities of Italie. Otho was the firſt which joyned Mauritania Tingitania vnto Betica in Spaine, making it of the juriſdiction of Gades. At that time liued Bellila, a Spaniſh Chriſtian woman. Fabius Quintilian had beene brought vnto the citie of Rome verie young by Sergius Galba: about the 90 yeare he erected a ſchoole at Rome,

Anno 81. Domitian the ſecond perſecutor of the church.

After Veſpaſian, his children raigned at Rome. Titus in the yeare 81, and two yeares after Domitian, the ſecond ſcourge of the Church of God, in whoſe time liued Eugenius, the firſt biſhop of Toledo, Diſciple, as they ſay, to Denis Areopagita. This Eugenius was ſlaine at Paris, whither he was come to viſit his maſter. Of the Flauian familie, from whence theſe emperours were iſſued, there remained ſome markes and remembrances in Spaine, by the denomination of many townes, as Flauio Brigo, Flauium Brigantium, Iria Flauia, Flauium Axatitanum, Aquæ Flauiæ in Gallicia, &c.

A diuiſion of the gouernment of Spaine.

Domitian did prohibit by a new edict, That they ſhould not plant any more vines in Spain, fearing leaſt corne ſhould faile them. Vnder theſe Flauian emperours they number eight Romane Colonies, planted in the prouince of Betica: and foure places for juſtice, which they termed Colonels, at Gades, Seuille, Aſtigis, and Cordoua.

Luſitania had fiue Romane Colonies, one priuiledged citie called Oliſippo, and now Lisbone, and three ſeats of iuſtice at Emerita, Pax Auguſta, and Scalabis. In the reſt of Spain which was the quieteſt gouernment, there were fourteene Romane Colonies, thirteene priuiledged townes, and ſeuen courts for juſtice. At new Carthage, Tarracona, Sarragoſſa, Clunia, Aſturica, Lugo, and Bracara.

Anno 97. 26 Traian a Spaniard the third perſecutor of the church.

Cocceius Nerua came vnto the Empire in the yeare 97. a prince who ſeemed to be called by God, to repaire the confuſion which Domitian had cauſed in the world, vnder whom the Chriſtians had ſome reſt. The Spaniards will haue him to be of their nation, but it appeares not plainly. But he adopted Vlpius Traian a Spaniard without all doubt, borne in the towne of Italica, who through errour cauſed the third perſecution of the Church, whereof being admoniſhed by Plinius Secundus, he moderated his edicts. Mancius a citizen of Rome in this tempeſt ſuffered death for the confeſſion of the Chriſtian faith at Ebora in Luſitania, vnder the gouernment of Validius. By the liberalitie and bountie of Traian, Spaine was inriched with many goodly buildings, among the which is the bridge of Alcantara, vpon the riuer of Tayo, where at this day are to be ſeene theſe inſcriptions following.

The aqueduct of Segobia, is alſo held to be Traians worke, where they may eaſily obſerue the ſtately manner of building of the Romanes. This emperour ſent two legions (of fourteene, which were appointed to keepe the prouinces of the empire in awe) into Spaine, to put his edicts in execution, and to raſe all the townes and caſtles which were ſituated vpon the mountaines or places of ſtrength: with commaundement to the people, to build in the open country, where the acceſſe was eaſie. Adrian, who was emperour after Traian, in the yeare of our Sauiour 118, was alſo borne in the towne of Italica, in the prouince of Betica, as Eutropius, Oroſius, and Ser. Sulpitius doe witneſſe. Domitia Paulina his mother, was of Gades. He had ſome inſtruction, or good opinion of the Chriſtian religion. Being at Tarracone (where he had called a generall aſſemblie of all the people of Spaine) he cauſed (at his owne charge) Auguſtus temple, which went to ruine, to be repaired. In which towne he was in danger to haue beene ſlaine by a ſlaue that was madde, who ſet vpon him with his ſword drawne, as he walked without any feare in a garden. This ſlaue being taken, when as the emperour vnderſtood that he was madde, he layd nothing, but that they muſt put him into the Phyſitians hands. Hauing ſubdued the Iewes which were rebelled in Paleſtina, he ſent a great number in exile into Spaine, ſo as from that time this ſect was ſetled there, & had their Synagogues, vntil the raigne of Dom Fernando and D. Iſabella, in the time of our forefathers. Spaine was then diuided into ſix gouernments, two ruled by vice-Conſuls appointed by the Senat, which were Betica and Luſitania; and foure by the emperors lieutenants, which were the prouinces of Carthagene, Tarracone, Gallicia, and Mauritania Tingitana, where the ſtrait is.

28 After the deceaſe of Adrian, there ſucceeded in the empire, in the yeare 139, T. Aurelius Fuluius Antonius Pius, whom the Spaniards hold to be of their nation. As for his ſucceſſor M. Ælius Aurelius, comming to the empire in the yeare 162, he was without doubt of a Spaniſh race; for his predeceſſors were of the towne of Succubite in Betica. Hee was the firſt which had a companion in the empire, imparting his authoritie with Lucius Commodus Verus, who was the fourth perſecutor in the Chriſtian Church. In the time of M. Aurelius, the Moores inuaded Spaine, and did infinit harme: whom notwithſtanding hee repulſed by his lieutenants, namely by Seuerus, who afterwards was emperour. This prince was wiſe, vertuous, and courteous: but as he was indowed with all good qualities, ſo his ſonne Commodus, who raigned after him in the yeare 181, was deteſtable and vicious. He was the firſt of the Romane princes, which through couetouſneſſe ſold offices for money. Veſpaſian had done it before him, but through neceſſitie, finding the commonweale charged with debts, and the treaſure exhauſted. Vnder Commodus were ſlaine in Gallicia, Facundus and Primitius, holy Chriſtian ſouldiours, vpon the bankes of the riuer Cea, by Atticus the gouernor. After him, about the yeare 194. Rome loſt two emperours in leſſe than a yeare, Pertinax and Didius Iulian, ſo as in the yeare 195, L. Septimius Seuerus, a great perſonage, borne in Africke, he who had gouerned Spaine in the time of M. Aurelius, tooke the gouernment of the empire. Vnder him was the fift perſecution of the Church, eſpecially in Spaine, whereas Cornelius was gouernor, who put Felix a prieſt, Fortunatus, and Archilochus to death at Valence, for that they had preached the Goſpell.

But Maximin being come to the empire, the ſixt perſecution began of the Chriſtians, in the which Maximus and many other faithfull were ſlaine, neere vnto Tarracone. After Maximin H vnto Decius, the empire of Rome was in great combuſtion, by reaſon of the ordinary murthers of ſuch as did affect the ſoueraignetie, for the ſpace of fifteen yeres; in the which there periſhed by a violent death, Maximin Balbinus, Puienus, Gordian, and Philip: during which time we find Anno 241. not any thing of Spaine worth the writing, but that about the yeare 241, Antherus biſhop of Rome did write vnto the biſhops of the prouinces of Betica and Toledo, admoniſhing them among other things to be graue and conſtant, and not to fleet from church to church, if neceſſitie and the publique good did not preſſe them: whereby it wil appeare by this hiſtory, that their ſucceſſors had ſmall regard vnto this aduertiſement, but haue rather ſought their priuat commoditie. Many other epiſtles of holy men are found written to the biſhops of Spaine, and to their churches, & among others an epiſtle decretall of S. Ciprian and other bi- I Whileſt that Decius gouerned the empire (vnder whom began the 7 perſecution of the Church) the firſt Councel of Spaine was held at Toledo, whereas Xyſte a Grecian was preſent, who ſoone after was biſhop of Rome: yet there is no mention made of this Councell but by Spaniards. The Spaniſh hiſtories write nothing of his time, nor of Gallus, Voluſianus, nor Æmilianus, which ſucceeded him.

Vnder him and Decius, S. Laurence borne at Oſca in Catelognia, was martyred, whom Xyſte, who (as we haue ſaid) was come to the Coun- K cell of Toledo, had led with him to Rome, paſſing by Sarragoſſa, whereas this holy man ſpent his time in ſtudie. Vnder the ſame Valerian, by the commandement of Emylian, the gouernor, there were alſo put to death for the faith of Chriſt, Fructuoſus biſhop of Tarracone, with Augurius and Eulogia, two deacons, of whom Prudentius, a Chriſtian Poet, did write hymnes. Parmenius was alſo put to death at Cordoua. Valerian author of theſe wicked perſecutions, did ſoone after receiue a worthy reward for his impietie: for he was taken by Sapor king of Perſia, and kept all his life time ignominiouſly in chains, the which it ſeemes did moue Galien his ſon and companion, to leaue the Churches in quiet, although he were the moſt corrupted prince vpon the earth; whoſe baſeneſſe cauſed many tyrants to vſurpe the title of Soueraigne, in di- L

To the former martyres we will adde Narciſſus, who came to Girone to preach the Goſpell.

30 After Galien, Claudius was emperor, vpon whom Tetricus vſurped Spaine and Gaule,
The ninth perſecution vnder Aurelian. being the chiefe ſtrength and ſinewes of the empire. During the raigne of Aurelian (vnder whom was the ninth perſecution of the Church) and of Tacitus and Florian, which were from the yeare 273, vnto 280, there is no mention made of Spaine. But Probus gaue leaue to the Spaniards and Gaules, to plant vines: for good husbands held it not profitable for the com-
31 monweale, that the land ſhould be too much imploied to this kind of plant: but Probus was M much affected to it, and therefore he cauſed the mountaines of Almus and Aureus in Hungarie and Myſia, to be planted at his owne charge. In his time the Spaniards did mutine, but Saturninus did pacifie them. One called Bonoſius, borne and bred in Spaine, whoſe father was a Britan, and his mother a Gauloiſe, a great drinker, cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed emperour in Germanie, and with one Proculus would haue ſeized vpon Spaine, Gaule, and other prouin-

A prouinces: but they were defeated by Probus. The ſhort empire of Carus Numerianus and Carinus, make no mention of any thing that belongs to Spaine. Diocleſianus Iouius, who ſucceeded them in the yere 288, & Maximianus Herculeius, made companion of the ſame dignity the yere after, haue left (by their great crueltie againſt the faithful) an infamous memory of them, in Spain, & throughout all the world. They made an edict in the yere 306, That all the Chriſtians temples ſhould be beaten downe, and all thoſe that confeſſed Ieſus Chriſt, tormented and maſſacred. This was the 10 & the cruelleſt perſecution of the Church of God: for during the ſpace of 10 yeres, there was nothing to be ſeene but burning of temples, running away of poore innocents, murthers, and executions of martyres, wherof Spaine (it may be) did furniſh

B as many as any nation in the world, to their great commendation. The names of theſe conſtant witneſſes of the truth of Chriſt, ſhould not be ſuppreſt. In Sarragoſſe there were 18 at one time, of whom the Chriſtian Poet Prudentius made a goodly hymne. Theſe were Optatus, Succeſſus, Vrbanus, Pubius, Felix, Euentius, Lupercus, Martialis, Iulius, Fronto, Cæcilianus, Primitiuus, Quintilianus, Apodemius, and foure Saturnines. Encratia a noble virgine, daughter to a great nobleman of Luſitania, betrothed to a duke or gouernour of Gaule Narbonoiſe, did there alſo end this fugitiue life. Dacian was then Gouernour of Spaine, and a diligent miniſter of theſe impieties; who reſiding at Sarragoſſe, and ſeeing the conſtancie of the Chriſtians to ſurpaſſe his inhumanitie, he cauſed a proclamation to be made by the ſound of the trumpet, that all thoſe that were Chriſtians ſhould depart the towne, and haue leaue to retire where they

C pleaſed. The faithfull being joyfull hereof, went forth in great troups, thanking God for this libertie, thinking they would ſuffer them to depart: but they were not gone farre from the gates, before they were compaſſed in by armed ſouldiours, and cut in peeces. The multitude of thoſe that were thus villanouſly murthered, was verie great, and therefore in thoſe dayes the Chriſtians by a certaine humane affection, more than for any religion, made account of the aſhes, bones, and all things which did belong vnto thoſe holy martyres, and did reuerence the places where they had frequented, or were buried: not for any ſuperſtition, but to incite the liuing to imitate their pietie. This cruell Gouernour hauing committed this horrible maſſacre, ſought alſo to depriue the faithful ſeruants (if any remained in the countrey) of all comfort: Wherefore hauing gathered all their bodies together, and murthered vpon

D them all the offendors, which were committed for any crimes, he burnt them all together, that the aſhes (being thus mingled) ſhould not be gathered vp by the Chriſtians: whereupon the bruit was, That God (meaning to giue a teſtimonie of the innocencie of his people) made the aſhes of the faithful to appeare verie white among the reſt, the which, with a ſmall ſhewer which fell, were gathered together in white heapes: whereof thoſe which haue come after, being moued with another zeale than the Chriſtians of thoſe times, haue made their profit. Lambert ſeruing a countrey man, was alſo beheaded, for that he would not renounce Ieſus Chriſt. The bruit was, That hauing taken his head in his hands, he went two good leagues, vntil he came vnto the place where the bodies of the martyres aboue mentioned lay, and that there he began to ſing, Exultabunt ſancti in gloria, and that they anſwered, Et letabuntur in cubi-

E libus ſuis; and then he fell vpon them: the which I will not call into queſtion, conſidering the end of myracles. There were many others put to death in Spaine, for the profeſſion of the Goſpell, during the gouernment of Dacian, whoſe names for breuities ſake I omit, being not much pertinent to a hiſtorie. Dacian, a bloudie inſtrument of theſe cruelties, was during theſe executions ſlaine with fire from heauen. The like perſecutions were in the other prouinces of the empire.

At this time liued Prudentius, borne in the prouince of Cantabria, of the countrey which is now called Alaba: he was biſhop of Tarracone, and not the Poet aboue mentioned. There is a decretall epiſtle extant of Melchiades biſhop of Rome, who liued in thoſe times, vnto the biſhops of Spaine, touching the Primacie of the Romane Sea: but it ſauours not of F the Latine ſtile of that age, no more than thoſe of Marcelin, Marcellus, Euſebius, Syluеſter, Marc, Iulius, Liberius, Damaſus, and Syricius: which muſt bee read with judgement. As for the politique Artes of Diocleſian and Maximian, although they were great, and worthie of memorie, yet the hiſtories of Spaine make no mention of them. They receiued into their companie to gouerne the empire, Maximus Galerius, and Conſtantius Chlorus: the laſt in a good time tooke vpon him the gouernment of Spaine and Gaule, who dying in England, left the dignitie of Cæſar to Conſtantine his ſonne, who learned the firſt principles of religion, of a certaine Spaniard, as ſome write. Galerius adopted Seuerus, and Maximian the young. At the ſame time Diocleſian and Maximian reſigned the imperiall dignitie at Milan: but Maximian repenting himſelfe, as he did ſtriue to reſume his authoritie at Rome, being reiected by his ſonne Maxence and the Pretorian ſouldiors, he fled towards his ſon in law Conſtantine, againſt whom he practiſed treaſon, and was ſlaine at Marſeilles. Diocleſian a ſtrange monſter, who cauſed himſelfe to be called, Brother to the Sunne and Moone, and to bee worſhipped, liued long a priuat life: but God ſhewed a teſtimonie of his wrath vpon him in the end of his dayes; for he died madde, eaten with vermine, and ſo infected and ſtinking, as none could endure to come neere him, howling (as Nicephorus writes) like a dog. Galerius ſlew himſelfe, as cruell as a butcher; for ſo he had beene from his youth. Seuerus was ſlaine by the faction of Maxence, whom the Pretorians had created Cæſar. Maximian the younger died eaten with wormes, hauing beene vanquiſhed neere vnto Tharſe, by Licinius, whom Conſtantine had ſent againſt him. Maxence, a cruel tyrant, and therefore hated of the Romans, as he thought to make head againſt Conſtantine, was defeated in battel neere vnto Rome, and drowned himſelf in the riuer of Tiber: all cruell and bloudie princes, enemies to the Church of God, remarkable for ſuch as perſecute it. After theſe, Licinius and Conſtantine held the empire, the one in the Eaſt, the other in the Weſt. But Licinius who had maried Conſtantines ſiſter, a cruell and barbarous man, an enemie to Chriſtians and all learning, tearming them a plague to the commonweale, hauing no good thing in him, but that he perſecuted the courtiſans, whom he tearmed mice, ſought to breake the order made betwixt him and Conſtantine: wherefore after that he had beene ſuppreſt aboue once, and reconciled to his brother in law, by the meanes of his wife Conſtance, he was ſlaine by his commaundement at Theſſalonica; ſo as Conſtantine called the Great, remained ſole emperor, who gaue peace vnto the Churches, much deſired, and (if they could haue vſed it to the aduancement thereof) moſt happie. This prince did great honour vnto the Chriſtians, imbraced the true religion, endowed the churches with rents and riches, cauſed the Gentiles temples to be beaten downe in many places, aſſembled by his imperiall authoritie the Councell of Nice in Bithinia, in the yeare 326, or 328, where there met 318 biſhops of diuers countries; among the which was Oſius biſhop of Cordoua, who was alſo at the Councell of Gangre, celebrated the ſame yeare. That of Nice is held the firſt generall Councell, where the impietie of the Arrians was condemned, the which notwithſtanding did afterwards infect many nations. That Conſtantine made a donation of the citie of Rome, of Italie, and of all the Weſterne empire, vnto Silueſter then biſhop of Rome, or that he had declared him head and primat ouer other biſhops, and granted vnto him and his ſucceſſors, other things conteined in that which is called Conſtantines donation, beſides, that Pope Pius the ſecond doth jeaſt at it, there is no receiuable teſtimonie therof, nor any probable conjecture: beſides, the hiſtories of following emperors, do argue the contrarie, euen they of the Weſt. In the time of this emperor the Northerne nations inuaded Spaine, and ſpoiled that part of the countrey which lies neere the Ocean, from Gallicia vnto the ſtrait: whither he led a great army, chaſed away the enemies, & reſtored the Spaniards (which were fled into mountaines) vnto their houſes, and ſetled an order in the prouince, as well for that wich concerned the temporaltie, as the churches. There was a prouinciall Councell held by his commaundement at Illiberis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, ſome call it Eliberis, a towne in the marches of Grenado: whither came Helena the mother of Conſtantine, with Conſtantine his eldeſt ſonne, to whom he had aſſigned the Gauls and Spaine, for his portion. In this Councell Spaine was diuided into fiue prouinces; that is, that of Tarracone, Carthagene, Betica, Luſitania, and Gallicia, in either of the which there was a Metropolitan appointed at Tarracone, new Carthage (to whom Toledo hath ſince ſucceeded) at Seuille, at Merida, and at Bracara. Some hold, that this Councell was more antient than that of Nice, among which Beuter affirmes, That Conſcius biſhop of Cordoua, Oſius predeceſſor, was there preſent: others ſay, that it was Oſius himſelfe, & Quintian biſhop of Ebora. Some beleeue that the emperor Conſtantine was not baptized vntil he drew neer his death, being deceiued by the error of ſome, which beleeued that the circumſtance of places gaue more authority to baptiſme: for he had a great deſire to be baptized in Iordan. Many thought, that in the end of his daies he fel into the hereſie of the Arrians, for that he had baniſht Athanaſius by the perſuaſion of the Arrians, & that his ſiſter Conſtance

A liuing with him was an Arrian: but it is moſt certaine, that before his death he commaunded that Athanaſius ſhould be called home againe, and that he did not beleeue the confeſſion of faith, nor the expoſition made by Arrius, after that he had called him from baniſhment, but ſent it to the Councell of Ieruſalem, there to be examined. Of Conſtantines deeds in Spaine there are many medailles found in that countrey, and elſewhere, in our time, that beare witneſſe. After him there raigned in the Weſt Conſtantine and Conſtans, his ſonnes, the Eaſt remaining to Conſtantius their brother. To Conſtantine was aſſigned Spaine, Gaule, and the iſlands of Britaine, or that which the Romanes held there. But Conſtantine being a proud and turbulent prince, he would make warre againſt his brother Conſtans, and take Italie from

The repeale of Arrius, granted by Conſtantine the great, had cauſed greater troubles in the Church than before: for being returned into Alexandria, he had confirmed his doctrine, and drawne many biſhops vnto him; yea the emperour Conſtantius, who held the empire in the Eaſt, was infected with this errour, and did perſecute the faithfull beleeuers: ſo as Athanaſius being baniſhed againe by him, and Paul of Conſtantinople, who retired to Conſtans his brother, they wrought ſo, as by the conſent of the two brethren princes, a generall Coun-

There the confeſſion of the faith, or Symbole of the Councell of Nice, was confirmed: But at the ſame time by reaſon of the bad agreement which was betwixt the two brethren Conſtans and Conſtantius, there was another aſſemblie of the Eaſterne biſhops at Philipopolis in Thracia, who agreed not with any that held with Athanaſius and Paul. And after that there was another held at Syrmium im Hungarie (whither Conſtantius went in perſon) and others elſewhere. The Councell of Sardica being ended, Conſtans entreated his brother Conſtantius, to reſtore Athanaſius: the which he did, partly for

The Councell of Syrmium, contrarie to that of Nice, was held in the yeare three hundred and threeſcore, or three hundred fiftie and ſix, according vnto ſome, whereas many wicked decrees were made and maintained, eſpecially by Photinus, biſhop of that place, who reuiued the blaſphemies of Samoſatenus, denying the two natures in Ieſus Chriſt, borne of the virgine Marie.

By this diſguiſing, vnder which the poyſon lay hidden, the good old man Oſius the Spaniard, hauing conſtantly maintained the truth all his life time, ſuffered himſelfe to be deceiued and woon: whether that his great age had dulled his vnderſtanding, or that he did it for feare of the emperour, who examined him vpon that point, and threatned him in the towne of Rimini, where hee had againe aſſembled many biſhops, cauſing him to commit this errour; ſaying, That both the one and the other ſaid well. But the Orthodoxes did ſoone after reject that word of ὁμοιούσιος, as captious and deceitfull. Oſius, as Iſidore writes, dyed ſoone

Anno 369. In the yeare of our redemption 369, there came vnto the biſhopricke of Rome, which was not yet ſoueraigne, Damaſus a Spaniard, borne at Vimaranes, a place in Portugall, betwixt Minio and Duero, three leagues from Braga: he ſucceeded Felix, who was an Arrian, and therefore not numbred in the catalogue of the Biſhops of Rome; for that they would make this ſea without all blemiſh. This nation did erect a kingdome in Spaine, whoſe race, according to the common opinion, hath continued vnto this day. The emperour Valens was addicted to the Arrian hereſie, to Negromancie, and other impieties. B Weſt, by the death of Valentinian the ſecond, and of Eugenius the tyrant: theſe two princes were borne in Spaine, as the Poet Claudian writes. In their time the Gothes began to diſperſe themſelues ouer the Weſt, where they committed infinit ſpoyles, vntill in the end they ſetled themſelues in Gaule, Spaine, and laſtly in Italie, blemiſhing the name and majeſtie of the Emperours in theſe rich Prouinces.

BEing to treat of the Gothes kingdome in Spaine, it is fit to know from what region they are come, and by what accidents they firſt ſeated themſelues in Spaine, Honorius ſonne to Theodoſius the Great then reigning in the Weſt.

The Gothes come out of Aſia into Europe.

1 The Gothes are iſſued from the Getes, and their firſt beginning was in Aſia: they paſſed into Europe long before, and did firſt ſeize vpon K
the higher countrey of Thrace and Myſia, which is at this day Bulgaria, Boſna, Raſcia, Seruia, and, it may be, a part of Hungarie; and in the end they came to either banke of the riuer of Danube: and then by degrees peopling all that lyes betwixt that riuer and the Northerne ſhore of the Baltike ſea, they did in the end hold all that continent, which extends it ſelfe in manner of an iſland in the boſome thereof, with all the neighbour iſlands.

Gothes, Getes, & Gepides, all one nation.

They were famous for a long time in Dacia, in thoſe regions which wee now call Valachia, Tranſyluania, and Moldauia, where they were called Getes and Gepides. In the times of Alexander the Great there were certaine encounters betwixt the Grecians and the Gothes, not farre from the iſland of Peuce, aboue Conſtantinople, at the mouths of Danube, or Iſter, as they called it in that place. Syrmius reigned ouer that nation at that time. We read alſo, L
That Lyſimachus, one of Alexanders ſucceſſors, was vanquiſhed in battaile, and taken by a king of the Gothes, whom hee afterwards ſet freely at libertie, and married his daughter. After which, in tract of time other nations being mingled with them, thoſe which did inhabite the great Peninſule, which the auncients called Scandia and Scandinauia (yet little knowne to them) retained the name of Gothes and the language; the which, as ſome affirme, was like vnto that of the Celtes: others hold, That it was the Teuton or Dutch tongue: which languages being corrupted, differ much at this day from thoſe times, when they were in their greateſt puritie. From theſe Northerne regions, which containe at this day the realmes of Suethland and Denmarke, often and vpon diuers occaſions there came great troupes of people, who tooke poſſeſſion againe of the countries joyning to the Venedique or Baltike ſea, M and of the iſlands thereof, chaſing away the inhabitants; and aduauncing into the maine land, they did repoſſeſſe Dacia and Myſia, and ouerrun the higher Thrace, vnder Filymer, ſonne to Gandaric, who was the fift king after this returne. In theſe countries they planted their bounds vpon the Danube, and there reigned ſome ages: they did encreaſe their fame with great victories, and did giue their name to many nations whom they ſubjected. They inuaded the Ro-

A mane Empire in the time of Decius, vnder the conduct of their king Gtua, and did vanquiſh the Romanes in a great battaile, whereas Decius and his ſonne were ſlaine: after which, by many victories they made themſelues fearefull to the Romans, ſo as the Emperous were often glad to haue them for friends and companions in arms; and by the vertue and valor of their troups, which they entertained, did often execute great matters.

About the time of Valentinian and Valens, Hermanaric reigned ouer the Gothes, who vanquiſhed many nations: who notwithſtanding yeelded to the force of the Hunnes, fathers to the Hungarians, who came at that time out of Aſia into Europe, in great numbers, through the fennes of Meotides. Hermanaric being dead, and Vithimir his ſucceſſor ſlaine in battaile, The Huns chaſe the Gothes out of their conqueſts.

B the Gothes eſtate was ouerthrowne, and troden vnder foot by the Hunnes: wherefore ſuch as would not liue vnder the Conquerors ſubjection, retyred themſelues into diuers other countries. Athanaric, who had ſhewed himſelfe an enemie to Valens, in ſupporting Procopius his rebell, would not truſt him, and therefore he tooke his courſe towards the North, and did inhabite with his troupes in the forreſts of Sarmatia. But Fritigerne and Alauin being followed with a great number of Gothes, came vnto the bankes of Danube, vpon the confines of the Empire, where deſiring to be admitted to dwell with the other ſubjects, Valens conſented, ſuppoſing that they ſhould ſerue as a rampier againſt forraine nations, that would inuade the empire on that ſide.

Then there arriued vpon the ſame marches Vitheric, ſonne to Vithimir, with his tutors Alathee and Safrax, and alſo Farnabe, conductors of other great troupes. Then did the Romans be- Diſtinction of the Eaſt and Weſt Gothes.

C gin to diſtinguiſh theſe people, into Oſtrogoths or Eaſt Goths, and Viſigoths or Weſt Goths: calling thoſe which did remaine vnder the domination of the Hunnes, Oſtrogoths; and thoſe Viſigots which had paſſed the Danube, and dwelt in Hungarie, Myſia, and Thracia: the which diſtinction was ancient among them, according to their countries and abodes, and was againe practiſed in Italie, Gaule, and Spaine, when as this nation had erected kingdomes there; whereof the princes were diuided into two families or factions: that is, the Hymels or Amales, and the Baltes.

2 The name of Ieſus Chriſt had beene many yeares preached among this nation, before Chriſtian religion among the Gothes.

D the Emperour Valens time: for we read, That at the Councell of Nice, which was vnder Conſtantine the Great, among others, there came Theophilus a Biſhop of the Gothes: wherefore they were alreadie Chriſtians and Orthodoxes, although there were ſome idolatrous princes among them, and by conſequence, part of the people: ſo as when they came vpon the territories of the Empire, Valens reigning in the Eaſt, they had Biſhops, whereof the moſt famous was Vulphilas.

The manner how they became Arrians, is reported by Theodorite, in the fourth booke of the Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie, ſaying, That after the Gothes had paſſed the riuer of Iſter or Danube, and that they had made their peace with Valens, Eudoxus who was an Arrian, perſuaded Valens, who was alſo infected with this hereſie, to draw the Gothes to his opinions, for that conformitie in religion would make the peace more firme. Wherewith Valens hauing acquainted the Gothes made Arrians by the Romanes.

E princes & heads of the Gothike nation, they made anſwer, That they could not chãge the doctrine of their anceſtors. Then Eudoxus addreſſing himſelfe to Vulphilas, whom he knew to be couetous and ambitious, he preuailed ſo with faire words & money, as he got him to perſuade the Gothes to receiue the Emperors confeſſion of faith: the which he did, ſaying, That they were but childiſh contentions, and debates for words, and not for doctrine: for this Vulphilas Docilitie of the Gothike nation.

was in great credit with the Goths, and they ſay, that he inuented the Gothike letters, and tranſlated the Bible into that tongue. Thus were theſe people gouerned by their Biſhops and Prelates: they were a free people and couragious, and withall, tractable and apt to learning and Philoſophie, the which they learned, frequenting with more ciuile nations: hardie and valiant, and yet familiar and liberall; apt to arms, tall and of a goodly ſtature, ſtrong and patient to en-

F dure all the diſcommodities of warre.

This new nation being ſeated in the territories of the Empire, the Emperor was aduiſed to make his profit of them, and to draw money and other commodities from them for their dwellings, and for the vſe of the land, water, and ayre which he graunted them; the which he could well put in practiſe, eſpecially his gouernors & lieutenants, ſo as this nation found themſelues in a ſhort time oppreſſed with a harder ſeruitude vnder the Romane Empire, than their coun- The cruelties, auarice, and infidelitie of Valens and his lieutenants againſt the Gothes.

treymen were vnder the Hunnes: For the Gothes being diſtreſſed for victuals, Lupicin and G Maximus Gouernours of Thrace, inuented all the wicked deuices they could to make them poore, and to ſtrip them of that they had, making them to eat dogs and other beaſts, for euery one of which they were forced to giue a man to be a ſlaue. Beſides Lupicin hauing cauſed Fritigerne and Alauin, captains of the Gothes, to come to Martianopolis, to conferre with them vpon the complaints which were made of theſe inhumanities, hee incenſed them with proud and injurious words: ſo as hauing cunningly eſcaped out of his hands, they afterwards declared themſelues enemies to the Romane Empire, ſo as there grew a great and cruell warre betwixt the Gothes and the Romanes; by the which the Emperour and his lieutenants were puniſhed for their couetouſneſſe and impieties: Lupicin ſeeking to ſuppreſſe the ſpoyles which H the Goths made, was defeated, and in the end after many vnfortunat encounters betwixt both parties, the Emperour Valens hauing loſt a battaile, where the beſt of his men died, he alſo loſt his life, being burnt by the Gothes in a country houſe, into the which he was retired wounded, after the loſſe of the battaile: and without the valour and wiſdome of Theodoſius (whom God raiſed vp to ſucceed Valens in the Eaſt) the Gothes had rooted out the name of the Romanes in that countrey. But Theodoſius a Spaniard, a wiſe and vertuous prince, did ſuppreſſe them, and afterwards made a peace with them: ſo as after the death of Fritigerne, his ſucceſſor Athanaric, a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire, died in Theodoſius court: after which, the Gothes remained 14 yeares quietly vnder the Romane Emperours, without any king of their nation, vntill that Alaric, one of their captaines, who had ſerued Theodoſius in his warres I againſt Eugenius the tyrant, rebelled, and put the Gothes in armes, Arcadius and Honorius, ſonnes to Theodoſius, ſitting in the imperiall ſeat.

3 The Gothes diſdaining to be any more ſubject to the Romanes, and meaning to chuſe a king of their owne, there grew a ſedition and warre among themſelues; ſome deſiring Alaric, others Radagaſe: but Alaric had the ſoueraignetie. Wherfore Radagaſe with aboue two hundred thouſand of that nation went into Italie, whileſt that Alaric oppreſt Hungarie; againſt whom Stilico, who gouerned the Weſterne Empire vnder Honorius, oppoſed himſelfe: and finding this armie of Gothes ſhut vp in the Appenine hils, bordering vpon Tuſcane, it was conſumed with hunger and pouertie: their leader Radagaſe was taken and ſtrangled, and thoſe which remained, were ſold in great troupes, for ſlaues, at a ſmall rate. This Radagaſe was an idolatrer, K and would haue planted idolatrie againe in Italie. It was at ſuch a ſeaſon, when as the Romane Empire was in greateſt combuſtion, eſpecially in the Weſt: for beſides the inuaſion of the Gothes in Italie, the Frenchmen, a people of Germanie, bordering vpon Gaule, ſought to make a breach there, and entred in great troupes vpon the countrey adjoyning vpon the riuer of Rhene: againſt whom, Stilico (who was a Henete or Sclauonian borne) meaning to fortifie himſelfe with barbarous nations) called into Gaule the Bourguignons, Sueues, Alanes, and Vandales, nations which were chaſed out of their countries, on the one ſide by the Hunnes, and on the other by the Gothes: who afterwards raunged and ſpoyled Gaule themſelues, and would haue ſeized thereon; for the which they had many encounters with the Emperours Lieutenants, with variable ſucceſſe. Great was the ver- L
tue and valour then of Conſtantius Patricius, who gouerned Gaule Narbonoiſe, the which wee now call by the name of Prouence and Languedoc, by whom the Vandales were repulſed, and forced to paſſe into Spaine; where for a time they did ouerrun the countrey, and being afterwards followed by the Alanes and Sueues, they ſought to ſettle themſelues there. Gunderic reigned ouer the Vandales, Hermeric ouer the Sueues, and the Alanes were commaunded by Reſplandian or Atace, according vnto ſome. Theſe diuided Spaine betwixt them: ſo as the Alanes ſhould make warre in the countrey of Carthagene, and in part of Portugall or Luſitania, as it was then called: part of the Vandales, called Silinges, ſhould conquer Betica, called ſince Andaluſia: and the other Vandales, with the Sueues, ſhould ſettle in Gallicia. Alaric paſſeth into Italie.

4 After the defeat of Radagaſe, Alaric marched into Italie with a great armie, and demaunded to diuide the Empire with Honorius; to whom by the counſell of Stilico, Honorius graunted the poſſeſſion of Gaule and Spaine, who were alſo in prey to the French and other nations. Alaric and the Gothes marching towards the Alpes, doubting no ſurprize, were charged by an armie which Stilico had ſent after them, to keepe them from ſpoyling Italie,

A Italie, vnder the commaund of a Iew called Saule, who had a ſecret commaundement to ſet vpon the Gothes armie, when they ſhould be moſt buſied in the ſtraits of the mountaines; the which hee could not put in execution: for the Gothes ſeeing themſelues betrayed, gathered their forces together, and put themſelues in battaile as well as they could, defending themſelues ſo valiantly, as the imperiall armie was defeated: wherefore Alaric being victor, and full of a furious deſire of reuenge, leauing the way to Gaule, he turned backe, and did miſerably ſpoyle the countries, which were ſince called Lumbardie, Tuſcane, and Romania, putting all to fire and ſword, euen to the gates of Rome; the which he tooke after a long ſiege, and ſacked it, pardoning the holy places, and thoſe that were fled into them. From thence hee B did ouerrun Italie, euen vnto the furtheſt bounds: then returning towards Rome, he died ſuddainely neere vnto Coſence, and was buried in the riuer of Barſente, turned out of her courſe for that cauſe, and afterwards drawne againe into her old bed by the Gothes: who after his death made choice of Ataulphe, his couſin, for their king, being a very wiſe man. Hauing brought backe the armie to Rome, he ſpoyled all that remained of the firſt ſacke: yet he was ſomewhat pacified by the loue of Placidia Galla, ſiſter to the Emperour Honorius, being priſoner; whom by reaſon of her nobilitie and beautie, he married at Forly in Romania. From that time hauing ſome reſpect to Honorius, as his allie, he reſolued to leaue Italie, and take his way into Gaule, according to the firſt agreement betwixt Honorius and Alaric; where hee erected the kingdome of the Viſigothes, reſtrained the French within certaine limits, and helped to C chaſe away the reſt of the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, beyond the Pyrenees, where he afterwards purſued them.

A little before theſe accidents, one Conſtantine, of a ſimple ſouldior being growne captaine of the Legions which were in great Britaine, hauing ſlaine a tyrant who had ſeized vpon that iſland vnder the Roman Empire, called Gratian, had paſſed into Gaule, to vſurpe the imperiall title there, and from thence had ſent Gouernours into Spaine. But two noblemen Spaniards, Didimus and Seuerianus, or Verianus, or Verinianus (for this diuerſitie is found in authors) rich and mightie men, oppoſed themſelues: and ſeeking to preſerue the prouince for the lawfull Emperour, they gathered ſome troupes together, of friends and ſubjects, and ſeized vpon the paſſages of the mountaines, to keepe theſe gouernours and their companies from D paſſing. Againſt theſe Spaniards, the tyrant ſent a ſonne of his called Conſtant, whom hee had drawne out of a Monaſterie, and proclaimed him Cæſar: who being followed by an armie of Barbarians, which he called Honoriaques, he defeated and ſlew the two brethren. Theſe Honoriaques being maſters of the ſtraits and paſſages of the Pyrenees by this victorie, and hauing afterwards rebelled with their captaine Gerontius, they (as ſome hold) deliuered Spaine to the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, after the death of the tyrant Conſtantine, and of his ſonne Conſtant, whereof the one was taken at Arles, and the other diſpatched at Vienna: Theſe nations joyning together to rob and ſpoyle, Palantia, ſince called Palenza, was the firſt towne of Spaine, which fell in prey to theſe Barbarians, who beſieged Toledo in vaine, ranſomed Lisbone, and committed infinite ſpoyles, whileſt that E Maximus, another tyrant, being rebelled againſt the Emperour, ſought during theſe combuſtions to make himſelfe king of Spaine of another ſide: who being taken by them that did yet reuerence the majeſtie of the Romane Empire, he was depriued of his vſurped royaltie, yet his life was ſaued.

Conſtantine a tyrant.

Maximus a tyrant.

Spaine for the ſpace of two yeares was thus miſerably oppreſſed, as well by tyrants as by theſe cruell nations: ſo as there remained nothing but the mountaines of the Cantabrians, at this preſent Biſcaye and Nauarre, in the quiet poſſeſſion of the Romanes, maintained by Conſtantius Patricius, who was the Emperours Lieutenant on this ſide the Alpes: which was at ſuch time as the Vandales, Sueues, and Alanes made the diuiſion of Spaine. Then did Ataulphe paſſe into Spaine, to diſpoſſeſſe them, according to the right he had F by an accord made with Honorius his brother in law: but as he was at Barcelona, he was ſlaine, with ſix children which he had had by another wife than Placidia. The time and cauſe of his death are not reported alike. Iornandes ſayth, That he was ſlaine (hauing reigned three yeares in Spaine and Gaule) being thruſt into the flanke by Vernulphe, whom he was accuſtomed to jeſt at. Some affirme, That he had been chaſed, and forced to paſſe into Spaine by Conſtantius Patricius Gouernour of Gaule.

The

Anno.402. 6 The Chriſtian religion during theſe troubles and forraine inuaſions was not neglected among the Spaniards: for in the yeare 402 (although others write 420) was held at Toledo the firſt Councell by 29 Biſhops, where Patron Biſhop of Toledo did preſide againſt the hereſie of Priſcilian. He had beene Biſhop of Auila, and had publiſhed an hereſie mixt with the errors of the Gnoſtiques, Manicheans, and auncient Philoſophers: among other opinions, he maintained, That the ſoule of man was a portion of the Diuinitie: he was condemned firſt at a Councell held at Bourdeaux, and from thence he appealed to Maximus the tyrant, who cauſed him to be heard at Treues; then he commaunded his head to be cut off, with ſome of his followers. This Councell notwithſtanding gaue place to a ſingle life, and decreed, That prieſts ſhould liue continually vnmarried. This decree was contradicted by Vigilantius, who liued then at Barcelona, who did alſo write againſt the abuſe of reliques, againſt whom S. Ieroſme was very bitter. Many learned men liued at that time in Spaine, as Lucinius, Abigaus, Abundius, Auitus, Olympus, Audentius, Turbius, P. Oroſius, and others: yet the Church was declined much from her auncient puritie, and then grew in requeſt ceremonies, vowes, merits, reliques, and miracles; for the clergie was then much infected with couetouſneſſe and ambition. Then came the Vandales and Gothes, who were all infected with the hereſie of Arrian, who did in ſome ſort perſecute the good, as we ſhall heare.

The firſt Councell of Toledo.

Learned men in Spaine.

Ataulphe being dead, the Gothes did chuſe Sigeric for their king, who reigned but a yeare, and was ſlaine by his owne men, in diſdaine that he was too deſirous of peace. He left many children, Giſeric, Huneric, Guntemaud, Traſamund, and Hilderic: yet Vallia ſucceeded him, to the end he ſhould breake the peace with the Romanes: but God had otherwiſe decreed, for he confirmed it more. With him (according vnto ſome) begins the reigne of the Vice-Gothes in Spaine.

Vallia firſt King of the Gothes.

*Ann.*418. 7 IN the yeare of Chriſt 418 Vallia was choſen king of the Gothes, whereof next vnto Narbone, Tolouſe was the royall ſeat. In his time the French began to erect a kingdome in Gaule vnder Pharamond. Conſtantius Patricius, Gouernour for the Emperour in Gaule and Spaine, was admitted by Honorius to the dignitie of Cæſar, which in thoſe dayes was a degree to attaine vnto the Empire, as in our time the dignitie of king of Romanes, during the life of the Emperour of Germanie. This Vallia ſhewed himſelfe a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire. He reſtored to Honorius Placidia his ſiſter, widow to king Ataulphe, whom he had honoured, and kept in his houſe ſince the death of her husband. She was afterwards married to Conſtantius Cæſar aboue mentioned, by whom ſhe had Valentinian the third, who was the laſt Emperour in the Weſt vntill Charlemaigne. Vallia vndertooke by a contract made with Conſtantius, to chaſe the barbarous nations of Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, out of Spaine, to the benefit of the Romane Empire, and his owne: whereupon he entred into Spaine, being called by Conſtantius to begin this warre, in the yeare 420, and aſſailed the Alanes and Vandales, who held Betica and Luſitania, ſlew their king Atace, and reduced them to that extremitie, as thoſe few which remained went and joined with Gunderic, who reigned ouer the other Vandales in Gallicia: the battaile wherein they were wholly defeated, was giuen neere vnto Emerita, the which is Merida in Portugall. Theſe victories obtained, he meant to paſſe into Africke, but he was put backe by a ſtorme, and therefore returned into Gaule, where hee purchaſed vnto the Gothes all the countrey from Tolouſe to the Ocean, bounded in by the Pyrenee mountaines, and the riuer of Garonne.

Alanes and Vandales defeated by the Gothes.

8 Sometime after the Alanes, which were retyred to Gunderic in Gallicia, ſhooke of his yoake, being loth to ſubject themſelues vnto him, and returned into Luſitania, Betica, and the prouince of Carthagena, yet not chuſing any prince ouer them: there they obtained certaine lands, and liued tributaries to the Romanes, diſperſing themſelues as farre as the riuer of Ebro, and to the foot of the Pyrenee mountaines, where ſome maintaine, that of their name the countrey of Cattelogne was called Cattalania, for that they did inhabite there, being mingled with the Cattes, a nation of Germanie, which had paſſed with them into Spaine. In Gallicia (which contained at that time part of the realme of Portugall) there grew debate betwixt Gunderic king of the Vandales, and Hermeric king of the Sueues, ſo

as they fell to armes, and the Sueues were beſieged in the mountaines called Narbaſeens: but the Vandales left them there, deſpiſing that barren countrey, and came into the prouinces of Betica and Carthagena, the which they forraged: then paſſing into the iſlands of Maiorca and Minorca, they ſackt them: returning into Spaine, they tooke and ruined Carthagena, and brought backe their armie into Betica, the which was afterwards called Vandaluſia, of their name: there they ruined the towne of Seuille, and made the countrey deſolate. Gunderic died at the ſacke of Seuille, vpon the threſhold of S. Vincents temple, which he had commaunded ſhould be ſpoyled: he was ſonne to Godigiſque, after whoſe deceaſe Giſeric or Genſeric his baſtard brother was choſen king of the Vandales.

Betica takes the name of Vandaluſia of the Vandales.

Vallia entred againe into Spaine, to ſuppreſſe the ſpoyles and cruelties of theſe Vandales, whither there was alſo ſent by the Emperour a captaine called Caſtinus, who ſhould joyne with Boniface Gouernour of Africke, and joyntly make warre againſt the Barbarians. But as Caſtinus had nothing in him but vanitie and fooliſh preſumption, he diſdained Boniface, who was a valiant and wiſe nobleman; againſt whom hee did alſo bandie Ætius Gouernour of Gaules, either through emulation and enuie, or for ſome other cauſe of hatred: ſo as when Vallia came with his armie of Gothes to ſet vpon the Vandales, Boniface, who was retyred into his gouernment of Africke, being incenſed, ſent meſſengers vnto Genſeric, to ſollicite him to paſſe the ſtrait, promiſing to giue him means to lodge himſelfe in Africke with all his men, in deſpight of the Emperour; the which fell out happily for him, being oppreſſed with many enemies: wherefore he left Spaine, but not without bloud: for in a battaile which was giuen him by the people of Spaine, ſubjects to the Romanes, and by the Gothes, he ſlew twentie thouſand of his enemies vpon the place at his departure. The Vandales being then paſſed into Africke with all their families, there remained not any forraine power to make head in Spaine, but that of the Sueues, with their king Hermeric, who being fallen into a grieuous ſickneſſe, died about that time, after he had languiſhed long. In the meane time Vallia incenſed againſt the Vandales, prepared to purſue them into Africke, but he was preuented by death, hauing reigned 22 yeares.

2. Theodoric or Roderic.

9 THeodoric ſucceeded Vallia, Valentinian the third being Emperour in the Weſt, in the yeare 440. Hermeric about a little before his death had ſo pacified the people of Gallicia, as he reigned ouer them, and of two nations he made one, taking his ſonne Rechilan for companion, whom he made his heire and ſucceſſor in the kingdome, and ſent him into Betica or Vandaluſia againſt Andenot, a Romane captaine, whom he defeated neere vnto Singil, a riuer vpon that continent, where he was much enriched. Returning, he beſieged Merida, tooke it, and enlarged the kingdome of the Sueues, the which had a beginning about the yeare 437. Theodoric reigning ouer the Gothes, they brake the peace made by Vallia with the Emperour Honorius, & beſieged Narbonne, the which was relieued by Lictorius, Gouernor in thoſe parts for the Empire vnder the Generall Ætius: but Lictorius was defeated ſoone after by the ſame Gothes, the which was a great prejudice to the Romanes. By reaſon of this defeat, the peace was renued among theſe potentates.

Anno 440.

Romans aſſailed by the Sueues in Spaine, and by the Gothes in Gaule.

Rechilan being king of Gallicia after his fathers deceaſe, hee ſought alſo to enlarge his limits: wherefore he firſt aſſayled Vandaluſia, and the countrey about new Carthage, the which he made ſubject vnto his crowne, and did wholly ſuppreſſe the name of the Silinges Vandales in Betica. Hee made a certaine compoſition with the Romanes, to whom he yeelded the countrey of Toledo in Carpetania, and new Carthage, called now Carthagena.

Rechilan 2. king of Sueues in Gallicia.

Theodoric hauing alſo made a peace with the Romanes in Gaule, made a deſigne vpon Spaine; yet being called backe to joyne with the Romanes againſt the Hunnes, who were entred in infinit numbers into Gaule vnder Attila: hee was in that memorable battaile, whereas Attila was defeated, in the which there died aboue an hundred and eightie thouſand men vpon the field; and among others, Theodoric king of the Gothes, hauing reigned foureteene yeares, according vnto ſome. The cauſe of this warre, which Attila vndertooke, was his bad diſpoſition to ruine the whole world: whereunto he was incited by Genſeric, king of the Vandales, who was trecherous, cruell,and inhumane, hauing a deſire to ruine the G Viſigothes in Gaule and Spaine, both for that he had beene chaſed and purſued by them, as alſo fearing that Theodoric their king would ſeeke to reuenge the injurie done vnto his daughter,who being married vnto Humeric, the ſonne of Genſeric, had beene ſent backe by him vnto her father disfigured,without a noſe,vpon a ſuſpition which Genſeric had,that ſhe would haue poyſoned him. In this battaile there were fiue kings: Atila king of the Hunnes, Generall of the warre: Valamir, of the Oſtrogothes,who were tributaries to Atila: Theodoric, of the Viſigothes in Gaule and Spaine: Ardaric of the Gepides: and Meroue of the French. This was in the yere 453,and was fought in the fields of Maroche,a word corrupted of Maurice, otherwiſe called Cathalaunians: a battaile as remarkable as hath bin ſince the deluge, in regard of the H great number of men that were in arms,and the ſtrange deſignes of Atila, a common enemie of all mankind. Beſides thoſe that died in the battell,there was an encounter the night before betwixt the Gepides and the French,in the which there were aboue 90000 men ſlaine.

Fiue kings in the battell whereas Atila was defeated.

Rechilan died a little before in Merida, being an idolatrer, and after him his ſonne Recciaire reigned ouer the Sueues in Gallicia,who was baptized,and had receiued the Chriſtian religion. Hee had alſo married a daughter of Theodorics, king of Gothes,whereby he grew proud, aſpiring to great matters. He inuaded the Vaſcons country,which is now Nauarre,and ſpoiled it. From thence he went to ſee his father in law, and in his returne, with the helpe of the Gothes,he ſackt Sarragoſſe,and all the country which we now call Arragon,the which obeyed the Empire. He ſpoyled that of Carthagene, the which his father by a treatie made with I the Romanes had yeelded vnto them. This paſt before the defeat of the Hunnes.

3. Toriſmund.

*An.*453. 10 AFter that Theodoric had beene ſlaine in that great battaile,the which was woon by the fauor of God,and to the great good of all the countries of Europe,againſt that cruell tyrant Attila; his ſonne Toriſmund ſucceeded him ouer the Viſigothes, whoſe ſeat was at Toulouſe. He had many brethren,Theodoric,Frederic,Turic,Rothemer, and Huneric. Ætius lieutenant Generall for the Emperour Valentinian,made him jealous of them,leaſt they ſhould ſeize vpon the realme in his abſence,aduiſing him to goe ſpeedily to Toulouſe,and to cauſe himſelfe K to be crowned. This Ætius did, for that he diſtruſted the Gothes, whom he loued not neere him; yea,he was grieued to ſee this yong prince full of courage after this victory lately gotten againſt the Hunnes,hauing a deſire to purſue the remainder of this defeated army,and to root them out quite; the which Ætius held not profitable for the Romans: for knowing the nature of the Goths to be proud and actiue,he feared,that being puffed vp with many victories, they ſhould enter into the territories of the Romanes: wherefore he ſuffered the remainders of the defeated armie of the Hunnes to ſlip away, which gaue his enemies ſubject to diſgrace him with the Emperour Valentinian,who afterwards put him to death: whereby (as ſome ſaid) he cut off the right arme of his eſtate; for he was a wiſe and valiant captaine: yet ſome ſay, That betwixt Toriſmund and Atila there were ſome happie encounters for the Gothes. Toriſmund L hauing reigned three yeares,was ſlaine by his enemies,as he was let bloud,being ſicke. They write, That one ſtole away his armes, which he kept by his bed, yet hauing a penknife in his hand, he ſlew ſome of the murtherers which came to aſſault him. It is doubtfull whether they were his brethren,or others by their procurement. Some ſay, That the murtherers name was Aſcalerne,and that he reigned but a yeare.

Toriſmund ſlain by his brethrens procurement.

4. Theodoric the ſecond of that name.

11 THeodoric the 2. ſucceeded his brother Toriſmund,about the time that Valentinian the 3 was ſlain by the friends of Ætius. The Empire of Rome was thē held by one Maximus, M who maried Eudoxia by force,being widow to Valentinian that was ſlaine,thinking by this conjunction to be more reſpected in the imperial dignitie,which he vſurped: but this woman mad for the wrong ſhe thought was done vnto her, ſought to be reuēged of Maximus, to the prejudice of her ſelfe, of Rome, Italy,& of the whole Empire: for by the means of Boniface ſhe cauſed Genſeric to come out of Africke,who with an army of Vandales,Africanes,Moores,& others,

A entred Rome, and ſlew Maximus, ſacked and burnt the towne, ſpoyled all Italie, and led away Eudoxia and her daughters, with many thouſands others, priſoners into Africke: yet afterwards he ſet Eudoxia and her daughters free, except one, whom he kept to marrie to his ſonne. This was done by a treatie made with the Emperour Martian, who reigned in the Eaſt at Conſtantinople, who alſo ſuffered Theodoric, in recompence of the ſuccours which the Viſigothes had giuen the Romanes againſt Attila, to reigne in Spaine, and to get what hee could from the Sueues.

Sueues oppoſed himſelfe, reigning in Luſitania and Gallicia: there was a battaile fought
B neere vnto the riuer of Vrbic, twelue miles from Aſturica, betwixt Aſturica and Leon, in the which the chiefe of the nobilitie of the Sueues were ſlaine, and Recchiaire was conſtrained to ſaue himſelfe by flight: meaning to paſſe into Africke, to Genſeric king of the Vandales, hee Defeat of the Sueues, and the death of Recchiaire. was put backe by a tempeſt to Porto, and there taken and deliuered to Theodoric, who cauſed him to be ſlaine, although he were his brother in law. Gallicia being come into Theodorics power by this victorie, he left one of his captaines called Acliulf of Auuergne, Gouernour in his name, whileſt that he purſued his conqueſts: but when as Acliulf ſaw that Theodoric had turned his back, he cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed king, and ſeized vpon the kingdome, for-getting his faith, and the dutie which he ought vnto his maſter, who had honoured him ſo Acliulf puniſhed for his treacherie. much: wherewith Theodoric being much moued, he returned, and finding him readie to reſiſt
C him, he fought with him, and ſlew him vpon the place.

The Sueues deſirous to be reconciled to Theodoric, cauſed their Biſhops to ſue for their pardon; the which they not onely obtained, but he alſo gaue them leaue to chuſe a king of their owne nation. So the Sueues in the furtheſt parts of Gallicia made choice of Maſ- Humanitie of the Gothes to the Sueues vanquiſhed. dra, the ſonne of Maſsila, for their king; but being of ſundrie opinions, another faction proclaimed Frauta. Theodoric after all this paſſed into Luſitania, meaning to ſacke Emerita or Merida, but either for the reſpect he bare to S. Eulalie, or for feare (as they ſay) he did abſtaine. From that time hauing diuided his armie into three, he ſent one part into Vandaluſia, vnder the commaund of a captaine named Cherula or Ceurila: another into Gallicia, led by Sigeric and Nepotian; theſe did much annoy the diſagreeing Sueues: and he himſelfe
D with the other third part returned into Gaule Gothique, which was Languedoc, where in few dayes he tooke Narbonne, by the treaſon of Count Agrippin or Rauennius, who was Gouernour thereof: or, according vnto ſome, hee receiued it of Gilon, who then reigned in Fraunce, during the time that Childeric was in exile, meaning by this bountie to fortifie himſelfe with the Viſigothes againſt the French, who began to be diſcontented with his exactions and tyrannies. The majeſtie of the Romane Empire in the Weſt was then troden vnderfoot, after the death of Valentinian: for in euery prouince the gouernours and captaines Gouernours ambitious and diſloyall. of armies cauſed themſelues to be proclaimed Emperours, and ſupported one another: ſo as Spaine was wholly abandoned to the Viſigothes, and the Gaules to them and the French, and to pettie tyrants.

E The Sueues being diuided in Gallicia, had choſen (as is ſaid) two kings; one faction would haue Maſdra, the other obeyed Frauta, but he died within few daies; after whom, the ſame faction did chuſe Rechimund, who hauing made an accord with Maſdra, they entred iointly with a great armie into Luſitania, and ſpoyled it. Maſdra was ſlaine by his owne people; after Foure kings of the Sueues in Spaine. whom, that partie created Frumar king, but Rechimund oppoſed himſelfe: ſo as theſe two pettie kings impatient one of another, fell to ſpoyle Gallicia, one on the one ſide, and the other on the other ſide. Frumar being dead, Remiſmund or Ariſmund, the ſonne of Maſdra, Ariſmund 8. K. of the Sueues. brought all the Sueues vnder his obedience, and was peaceable king of Gallicia. The Sueues ſince Recchiaire had receiued the Chriſtian religion, reaſonably pure concerning the principall points, and had continued in the ſame, vntill the time of this king Ariſmund, who receiF ued a certaine Gaule called Atax an Arrian, thinking ill of the myſterie of the holy Trinitie, into Gallicia, who infected the whole countrey with his hereſie, the which was maintained many yeares by many kings, whoſe names and deeds haue beene buried by writers in hatred of their impieties.

In the meane time there had bin ten Emperors in Italie of ſmall fame, and of leſſe exploits, who made no great oppoſition againſt the Viſigothes and French: ſo as the one ſeized vpon Spaine,and the other vpon Gaule, leauing but very obſcure markes of the imperiall au- G thoritie: it may be for the good of theſe two rich regions, who were better gouerned vnder thoſe generous and free nations,than they ſhould haue beene vnder the Romanes, who were corrupted with all vices,and but a medley of all other nations. In theſe times the Biſhops of Spaine would in their life time chuſe ſucceſſors to their Biſhoprickes; the which was reprooued in a Councell held at Rome,vnder Pope Hilarie. Remiſmund or Ariſmund ſought friendſhip and peace with Theodoric, the which he did courteouſly graunt: and moreouer, Theodoric made an alliance with him, by the marriage of a daughter of his, the which hee ſent him vnder the conduct of Sallan, Maior of the palace, with rich preſents. Remiſmund growne proud with theſe honours, he ſeized againe vpon Luſitania, where he tooke Conimbrica, H and ſpoyled it: Lisbone was deliuered vnto him by Luſides, who commaunded there: during which things, Theodoric was ſlaine at Tolouſe by his brother Euric or Henry, hauing reigned foureteene yeares: vnder him liued Sydonius Apollinaris, who of an Earle became a Biſhop.

Emperour of Rome, ſitting at Conſtantinople. As ſoone as Henry was ſeated in the royall throne of the Viſigothes,he entred into Spaine with a great army,and ſeized vpon the whole countrey on this ſide Ebro; for he tooke Pampelone,Sarragoſſe, and other places of the prouince of Tarracona: then running into Luſitania, and ſeeing the combuſtions which were in the Romane Empire,on this ſide the Pyrenees, he aſſayled Arles and Marſeilles, and joyned them vnto his kingdome,and defeated Riothime,king of the Britons,who came againſt him in fauour of the Romanes, with twelue thouſand men. Vindemir,brother to Theodomir,and vncle to Theodoric, an Oſtrogothe, being king of Italie, brought him forces out of Hungarie, and gaue him meanes to ſeize vpon part of Gaule. During the reigne of this Henry, Odoacer a Herule or Saxon entred into Italie,who hauing forced Auguſtule(who tearmed himſelfe Emperor) to leaue his purple robe,he made himſelf king of Italie, the which he held the ſpace of 15 or 16 yeares.

6. Alaric.

Puniſhment of a trecherous Gouernor.

13 A*Laric* ſucceeded his father Euric, being the ſecond of that name, who reigned ouer the Viſigothes at Tolouſe,when as Clouis the firſt Chriſtian king reigned ouer the French. In his reigne the Romanes had yet ſome lands in Spaine, and in Gaule, where they had gouernours; one of the which called Burdunel, ſeized vpon the countrey which he commaunded in Spaine, and became a tyrant, but he was taken by the Gothes, and burnt at Tolouſe in a bull of braſſe. Apollinaris was alſo at that time Earle, and gouernor of Auuergne, kinſman to Sydonius.

Before this time the Viſigothes and the French had been good friends: but Clouis with moſt of his people hauing embraced the Chriſtian religion,and left their idols,he thought himſelfe M

Warre for irreligion betwixt the French and the Viſigothes.

alſo bound to purſue thoſe that were not of the ſame opinion,and to force them thereunto by armes. He therefore fell in diſlike of Alaric and the Viſigothes,for that they were Arrians: beſides,he tooke an occaſion, for that his enemies and the baniſhed men of Fraunce had ſought refuge at Tolouſe and other places belonging vnto Alaric: and moreouer Clouis complained, That a day and place being appointed them to parle,he was aduertiſed,that Alaric had layd an am-

A ambuſh to kill him: wherefore there grew a great quarrell betwixt theſe two princes, the which they would decide by ſingle combat betwixt themſelues: but king Theodoric (who had newly diſpoſſeſſed Odoacer of Italie, and there erected the kingdome of the Oſtrogothes, a wiſe and valiant prince) reconciled them for that time, and the Viſigothes turned the warre into Spaine, where they tooke Tortoſe, and ſlew one Peter who had played the tyrant there, whoſe head was carried to Sarragoſſe.

The hatred betwixt the French and the Gothes encreaſed daily, ſo as they muſt come to blows, and there was a battel fought neere vnto Poictiers, in the plaine of Voglad, 10 leagues from the towne, whereas Alaric was ſlaine, and with him Apollinaris Earle of Auuergne. There B was alſo another battell neere vnto Bourdeaux, where there were an infinit number of Gothes Arrians ſlaine, ſo as the place is to this day called the field of Arri. Among the ſpoyles of the Viſigothes, there were certaine veſſels found, conſecrated in old time to the temple of Ieruſalem. This king Clouis is by ſome called Lodoni. By meanes of theſe victories the French ſeized vpon Aquitain, & on Tolouſe, the chiefe towne of the Viſigothes, they beſieged Carcaſſone, and meant to purſue their victorie, but Theodoric comming out of Italie, made them to rayſe their ſiege.

Battell of Voglad in Poictou and the death of Alaric.

At that time Toledo was the royall towne in Spaine. Many Chriſtian Biſhops chaſed out of Africke by the Vandales Arrians, were retyred into Italie; from whence ſome were ſent into Spaine. At that time liued Fulgentius, Biſhop of Ruſpence, a learned & an eloquent man, C who was chaſed away and perſecuted by the Arrian Gothes. Alaric (as the Spaniards write) had married Amalaſunta, daughter to Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogothes and of Italie, and had a ſonne by her called Amalaric, who was yet a child, when his father died: wherefore Geſſelaric (who was baſtard brother to Alaric) tooke the gouernment of the kingdome, his brother hauing reigned 22 yeares.

Toledo the chief towne of the Goths kingdome in Spaine.

7. Genſolaric or Geſſelaric.

14 Genſolaric was ſonne to Euric, by a concubine, hee vſurped the crowne at Narbone, his nephew Amalaric being yet but fiue yeares old. He was baſe and a coward: for being D aſſayled by Gundebault king of the Bourguignons (who had alſo erected another kingdome in Gaule, to the prejudice of the Romanes) after that he had receiued a great rout neere vnto Narbone, he fled ignominiouſly into Spain, and ſhut himſelfe vp in Barcelone, vntill that Ilba (ſent by Theodoric king of Oſtrogothes, grandfather as they ſaid by the mothers ſide vnto yong Amalaric) came out of Italy to chaſe him from thence. Some make this Geſſelaric baſtard ſonne to Alaric, and brother to young Amalaric.

Ann. 508.

This K. Theodoric ſent 80000 men out of Italie into Gaule againſt the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric. Ilba (who was Generall) joyned his forces with the Viſigoths, and defeated the French, where there were aboue 20000 of them ſlaine. Prouence remained then vnto the Oſtrogothes, and was a member of the realme of Italie, and Languedoc and Gaſconie re- E turned vnto the Viſigothes, as before. Ilba then paſt into Spaine, to ſettle the eſtate of young Amalaric, and chaſed K. Geſſelaric out of Barcelone, the third yeare of his reigne, who fled into Africke to the Vandales, hoping to recouer his dignitie by their means, but he labored in vain: wherefore being returned into Gaule, he was ſlaine neere vnto Durance.

French defeated by the Oſtrogothes.

Amalaric eight King of the Gothes.

15 THe Spaniards write, That K. Theodoric came out of Italie (where he had reigned 18 yeares) expreſſely into Spain, to ſettle his grandchild Amalaric in his kingdome, where (as they ſay) he continued 15 yeares, and that Clouis the French king being dead, and his king- F dome diuided betwixt his foure ſonnes, they made a peace with yong Amalaric, & aſſured him their ſiſter Clotilde, reſtoring to him Tolouſe, or at the leaſt the vſufruit of it. This treatie was made with Theodoric his grandfather and tutor.

Ann. 511.

16 Vnder theſe Arrian princes the Chriſtian religion was ſomewhat maintained by the Biſhops, touching the fundamentall points, although intermixed with ſuperſtitions, the which encreaſed daily. There aſſembled tenne Biſhops at Tarracone, who decreed, That the feaſt of Councels at Tarracone, Sarragoſſe, and other places.

Sunday ſhould begin on Saterday. From whence it came that in Spain and many other places they hold it a profane thing to work on the Saterday; no not the women to ſpin. This Councell makes mention of the firſt Monks in Spaine. At Girone was another prouinciall aſſembly of 7 Biſhops: at Sarragoſſe of 12: in Ilerda at the foot of the Pyrenees of 8: at Valence of 6 Biſhops, wheras alwaies the Biſhop of that place did preſide. Theſe Coũcels were not very free nor aſſured in the Arrians iuriſdiction: but in thoſe places which the Romans did yet hold in Spaine, the pure Chriſtian religion was fauoured. The counſell of Sarragoſſe did ordayne, that no Nun ſhould were a vayle nor be profeſſed before the age of 40 yeares. Theodoric king of the Oſtrogoths, regent in Spaine, tooke to wife, as the Spaniſh authors write, a noble woman of that countrie, at whoſe intreatie he ſet at libertie all thoſe of her nation that were in priſon, and had by her a ſonne, called Seuerin, Duke of Carthagena, father to Leandre and Iſidore, who were ſaints. The 15 yeare of his gouernment, he reſigned the kingdome of the Viſigoths to his graundchild Amalaric, being now of age to commaund, and returned to his realme of Italie. This was in the yeare 526, when as Iuſtinian being emperour, the warre began in Africke by Belliſarius againſt the Vandales, and Gilimer their king, whereof followed the taking of the king, and the end of the Vandales royaltie, the which had continued in theſe countries 113 years. Vnder the raign of Amalaric was celebrated the ſecond Councel of Toledo by eight Chriſtian Biſhops, although the king were an Arrian. He hauing (as we haue ſaid) maried Clotilde, daughter to Clouis king of France, intreated her verie ill, by reaſon of the diuerſitie of religion (for ſhe was well inſtructed) ſo as going through the ſtreets, the people caſt ſtones and durt at her in contempt: being retired ſhe wip't off the bloud and durt with a handkerchiefe, the which ſhe ſent vnto her brethren, letting them vnderſtand the diſgraces and wrongs which ſhe ſuffred: wherewith being incenſed, they proclaimed warre againſt Amalaric: the armies incountred neere vnto Narbone, whereas Amlaaric was vanquiſhed, who thinking to ſaue himſelfe in Barcellone, was ſlaine, being forſaken by his men. The annales of France ſay, that Childebert king of Paris did this execution, and that he tooke Toledo, the royall ſeat, ſpoiled the temples, and carried backe into France, 60 chalices, fifteene plates, and twentie little cofers, where they kept the books of the Goſpell, al of pure gold, and much other treaſure, and that he did diſtribute theſe ornaments among the Churches of France. Amalaric raigned fiue yeares and eight months after the gouernment of Theodoric. After his death, the kingdom of the Viſigoths remained vnto Amalaſunta his mother, ſay the Spaniards, I know not by what title. I cannot concurre with them in this opinion, that this Amalaſunta was daughter to Theodoric king of Italie, the which we read was maried to a prince of the bloud royall of the Viſigoths, and of the familie of Hamels, called Euthaire, and had Athalaric by him, to whom Theodoric his graundfather dying, left the kingdome of the Oſtrogoths in Italie. Procopius ſayes, that the wife of Alaric, and mother to this Amalaric, was called Theudetuſe, the which by the report of Iourdain, who names her Theudicode, Theodoric had by a concubine when he was yet in Miſia: others ſay, that this Theudicode was maryed to Gundebault king of Bourgogne, and that the wife of Alaric, mother to Amalaric was called Oſtrogotte, baſtard alſo to this king Theodoric. Howſoeuer it be, it is not credible that Theodoric king of Italie, ſhould ſo much affect the affaires of Spaine, as hee ſhould abandon Italie for fifteene yeares, to remaine in Spaine. And there is leſſe likelyhood, ſeeing that Athalaric ſonne of Euthaire and of Amalaſunta ſucceeded him in the realme of the Oſtrogothes, the which hee had of a lawfull marriage, whatſoeuer the Spaniards write, duke Seuerian of Carthage, father to Iſidore and Leandre biſhops of Seuille, and others, the which Seuerian ſhould rather haue ſucceeded him in the realme of the Oſtrogothes, than his graundchild, the ſonne of his daughter. That which others write, that he ſent Ilba with an armie againſt the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric his kinſman, and that he had reteyned for his paines and the charges of war, Prouence (for theſe princes notwithſtanding all their charitie, did not labour for nothing) and that for the loue of conſanguinitie, beeing all of the familie of Hamels, he had ſent one of his captaines called Theude into Spaine, to be tutor and regent of the yong king Amalaric and of the realm of the Viſigots, with his mother Theudetuſe or Amalaſunta, as ſhe was called: that I ſay comes neere vnto the truth, as we may ſee by Procopius. All the raigne of Amalaric, as well vnder his tutors, as alone, is counted by all probabilitie 15. yeares.

Theude

Theude the ninth King.

19 SO it is, that Theude or Theodat, as others name him, raigned after the death of Amalaric, if we ſhal beleeue Procopius, hauing maried a great lady of the countrie of Spaine, who, the Spaniards ſay, was mother to the deceaſed king. The reſemblance of names hath deceiued them in al their diſcourſes: for at the ſame time, or therabouts, Amalaſunta mother to Athalaric, heire of the realme of Italie, maried an other Theude or Theodat (ſeeing that ſhe was not feared nor reſpected by the Oſtrogoths, for that ſhe was a woman) and made him tutor to her ſonne, and regent of the realme, to her owne preiudice, but this hath nothing common with Spaine. At the comming of Theude the Viſigoth, the French entred into Spaine, and ſpoyled the countrie of Arragon, and other places thereabouts: but they were defeated by the Viſigothes, led by Theodiſcle their captaine, who ſeaſed vpon all the paſſages and ſtraits of the Pyrenees. They ſay, that ſeeing themſelues incloſed, they entreated them to giue them a day and a night to paſſe away, the which the Gothes graunted, and all that remayned behind, after that time, were put to the ſword: a remarkable victorie, but it was afterwards blemiſhed by the defeat of the Gothes in Africke, as we will ſhew. The French notwithſtanding returned, and tooke Sarragoſſe, with other townes in Spaine: and forced the inhabitants to abiure the Arrian ſect, thinking they ſhould doe much for the Chriſtian religion, if they forced their bodies by armes, being ignorant that religion is a profeſſion of the ſpirit, the which may well be perſuaded by reaſons and doctrine, but no waies forced. It was the cauſe of all the French wars in thoſe daies, ioyned with ambition and the inſatiable deſire of reigne, which vice they thought to obſcure, fighting (ſaid they) for the Chriſtian religion, and inriching the Clergie men of their countrie, with ſpoiles and other gifts. In the meane time moſt of the Monks that were then in credit, ſong in the Churches, and the biſhops became like dumbe dogs, following the courts of princes, and armies; a miſchiefe which hath not beene ſince repaired. In Spaine, whereas the Clergie was not in ſo good eſtate, their gouernment was ſomewhat better: for many of their biſhops were learned, according vnto thoſe times, as ſome writings, which yet remaine, doe witneſſe, namely Aprugius biſhop of Paccence, Iuſtinian of Valence, Iuſte of Vrgell his brother, Leandre of Seuille, and according to ſome of Toledo, and others, who did often aſſemble for the affaires of the Church, and held Prouinciall councels: yet they were not without blemiſhes, buſying themſelues more than was fit, about ſeruices, ceremonies and exterior ornaments: from whence ſprung many ſuperſtitions. Childebert brought from Sarragoſſe, as ſome ſay, Saint Vincents ſhirt, the which was put at Saint Germains by Paris, where he built a temple to that Saint: and the authors ſay, that they of Sarragoſſe redeemed their towne from ſpoiles by this iewell, the which is credible, conſidering the deuotion of that nation. After the retreat of the French, the Viſigoths would paſſe the ſtrait into Africke, to chaſe away the Romanes, who had ſurpriſed the towne of Septe from them: but as this nation poſſeſſed with a ſuperfluous feare, would not vſe their armes vpon a Sunday, for the reuerence of the day, the Romanes who had no ſuch ſcruple, fell vpon them, and finding them careleſſe and diſarmed, they made a pitifull ſlaughter; ſo as there eſcaped not any one to carrie newes. It hapened at the ſame time that King Theude (the newes of this rout beeing publiſhed abroad) was ſlaine in his chamber, by one that made himſelfe a ieſter, to haue the better acceſſe, who ſtabbed him in the bellie with a dagger. The king feeling himſelfe wounded to the death, coniured the noble-men that were about him, not to doe any harme to him that had hurt him, ſaying, that God had ſent him a worthy reward for his merits, for that he had alſo beene the murtherer of his captaine. He raigned 17. yeares and fiue moneths.

11. Agila.

Anno 546. 21 THe Gothes did chuſe Agila for their king, who aſſailed the towne and territorie of Corduba, or Cordoua, & did all the diſgraces he could vnto the Chriſtians, treading the bones of Aſciſcles and Victor, who were martyres, vnder his horſes feet, whereof among that nation the ſuperſtition was great. Comming afterwards to fight againſt the Gothes, which were of a contrarie faction, he was vanquiſhed, his armie defeated, his ſonne ſlaine, and all his baggage, which was verie rich, loſt: he himſelfe flying into Merida, was ſlaine by the faction of Athanagilde, who ſucceeded him, hauing raigned fiue yeares. 12. Athanagilde.

Anno 551. 22 DVring the life of Agila, Athanagilde had attempted to ſeize vpon the kingdome of the Viſigothes by force, the which after his death he obtained without any difficultie: about the ſame time the kingdome of the Oſtrogothes in Italie was extinguiſhed by Iuſtinian, or Belliſarius, Generall of his armies, and his lieutenant in the Weſt. The Viſigothes were diuided; ſome followed Athanagilde, whom others loued better for a companion than a maſter. I There was an armie raiſed againſt him by Agila, who was head of the other partie: being come to battell neere vnto the towne of Seuille, Agila was defeated. Hereupon the Gothes conſidering, that by reaſon of their diſſentions, the Romanes, and Spaniards lying vnder their authoritie, might inuade them, to their great prejudice, they agreed in the end, and did acknowledge Athanagilde for their king, Agila hauing beene vanquiſhed and ſlaine at Merida. They hold, that this king did ſecretly deteſt the profeſſion of the Arrians, and fauoured the Chriſtians. He dyed at Toledo, of a naturall death, hauing raigned foureteene yeares: during the which he had many encounters with the Romanes and their partie, with variable ſucceſſe. In his time the Sueues of Gallicia left the Arrian ſect, and ſubmitted themſelues to the Chriſtians Church. Theodemir was the firſt king of Gallicia which imbraced the true religion, by the perſuaſion of a biſhop, or an Abbot of Dume, called Martin, who reformed the churches of Gallicia, by the Councels held at Bracar and at Lugo. Brunichilde, who was daughter to Athanagilde, was maried to Sigebert king of Mets, to be a plague to France. 13. Luiba, or Liuba.

Anno 565. 23 THe Gothes diſagreeing in the election of a king, the royall ſeat was vacant for ſome moneths: in the end they choſe Luiba at Narbone, who admitted Leouigilde his brother to be partner in the kingdome, giuing him the gouernment of the hither Spaine. This Leouigilde tooke to wife the widow of Athanagilde, called Goſuintha; but he had had another wife, which was Theodoſia daughter to Seuerian duke of Carthagene, by whom hee had Herminglide and Ricared. This Seuerian of whom we haue made mention, is held to be the ſonne of Theodoric king of the Oſtrogothes in Italie: and the Spaniſh authors ſay, that he had many ſonnes and daughters by Theodora his wife, iſſued from the bloud royal, all which were Saints and men of the Church, as S. Leandre and S. Iſidore biſhops of Seuille, Fulgentius biſhop of Aſtigi, and then of Carthagene; Florence an Abbeſſe, whom ſome call Iuſtina, and others. Luiba hauing raigned 3 yeres, died at Narbone, leauing no other memorie of him, for he was not warlike. 14. Leouigilde. M

Ann. 567. 24 LEouigilde remained ſole king of the Gothes, both on this ſide and beyond the Pyrenees, after the deceaſe of Luiba his brother: He did ouerrun the territories of the Baſtitanes, and of Malaca, which is the countrey of Grenado and Mutcia at this day. Hee tooke

A tooke Aſinode, or rather Aſſidon, a verie ſtrong towne, by a compoſition made with one Framedane, who commaunded there, and added it to the Gothes kingdome. This place had a garriſon of Romane ſouldiours, and had defended themſelues till then vnder the majeſtie of the Romane empire, Iuſtine the young ſitting then in the imperiall ſeat at Conſtantinople. Leouigilde did many other exploits of war againſt the Romanes and their partiſans in Spaine, and did much inlarge the Gothes dominions. Cordoua (which they had often attempted in vaine) was by this king ſurpriſed in the night, many towns & caſtles forced, with great ſlaughter of the people. Vpon the frontiers of Gaule hee made warre againſt them of Sauoy and Daulphine, if writers erre not. He diuided his kingdomes betwixt his ſonnes Hermengilde and B Ricared, the which he had by his firſt wife. Exploits of Leouigilde.

Miro king of the Sueues in Gallicia, made warre at that time againſt the Vaſcons, which are the Nauarrois and Biſcanes: but Leouigilde ſtayed him, and ſent his owne forces to the Cantabrians, towards the Ocean (that is Biſcaie) from whence he chaſed all ſuch as had vſurped any townes or ſeigniories, reducing in a manner all thoſe pettie potentates which were riſen in Spaine, to the prejudice of the Romane empire, vnder the crowne and ſcepter of the Viſigothes. Hee made a peace notwithſtanding for a time with Miro, by meanes of his embaſſadours: So hauing enlarged his dominions in Spaine, he gaue himſelfe to ciuile affaires.

He built a towne called Ripol, in the hither Spain, beautified it with buildings, and endow-
C ed it with priuiledges. He alſo built the towne of Victoria in Biſcaie, which is not Victoria at this day. He maried his eldeſt ſonne to Iugunde daughter to Sigebert king of the French: he cauſed a Councell to be called at Toledo, of the Arrian biſhops, where he heapt errour vpon errour, forcing the Chriſtians to be rebaptized, after the Arrian manner, which was, In the name of the Father, to the Sonne, by the holy Ghoſt: and not, In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt: meaning thereby to make three eſſences of that which is but one, diſtinct in three qualities. Herein he was aſſiſted by Vincent biſhop of Sarragoſſe, an Apoſtat, againſt whom Seuerus a Chriſtian biſhop of Malaca did write. The politique actions of Leouigilde. The Arrians baptiſme.

As Leouigilde buſied himſelfe about theſe matters, ſome good and profitable, others pro-
D phane and wicked, his peace was troubled by the rebellion of his owne ſonne; who either through deſire to raigne alone, or otherwiſe, and by the perſuaſion of Goſuinthe his mother in law, he ſeized vpon Seuille, and many other places; and leuied men to fortifie himſelfe againſt his father: who hauing put a great armie to field, marched to Seuille, to ſuppreſſe the raſhneſſe of his ill aduiſed ſonne, beſieged the towne on all ſides, and began to batter it with all ſorts of engines. Miro king of Gallicia came to this ſiege, with good troups, as a friend and allie to aid him. The auntient towne of Italica was not farre from Seuille: for we read, that Leouigilde made his ſtore-houſe for the warre there during the ſiege, hauing cauſed the walls, which were ruined, to be repaired, the which did much annoy them of Seuille; from the which he turned the riuer of Betis, and preſt the beſieged by continuall batteries, aſſaults, cutting off their victuals, and all other acts of hoſtilitie: ſo as in the end he tooke it, and ſoone after the E towne of Cordoua alſo, in the which his ſonne had fortified himſelfe, with all the other places which he had vſurped. Being thus ſpoiled of all, and depriued of his dignitie, Hermengilde was confined to Valence. This ciuile warre did afflict Spaine, more than all the former, as the Spaniards write. Conſpiracie of the mother in law and the ſon againſt the father.

25 During the ſiege of Seuille, Miro king of Gallicia died, to whom Eburic his ſonne ſucceeded: but Andeca ſeized vpon the realme of the Sueues, maried Siſeguta, left by king Miro, tooke Eburic, and ſhut him vp in a cloiſter of Monkes. To reuenge this injurie, and alſo to make his profit thereof, Leouigilde entred into Gallicia with an armie, tooke Andeca, cauſed him to be polled, and ſent him to Badaios, to liue for euer in a cloiſter. He reduced Gallicia to a prouince, and joyned it to the Gothes kingdome, the which had continued an hundred ſeuentie

Hermengilde being found at Tarracone, was there ſlaine by Sisbert: yet the Spaniards varie in this point, ſome ſaying, That he was ſhut vp in a tower at Seuille, where he loſt his head, holding him for a Saint, and that he was ſlaine on Eaſter day, by the commaundement of his father, who was an Arrian, for that he had imbraced the Chriſtian religion, for the which he had rebelled, and had cauſed great troubles in Spaine; the which Saint Gregorie and Beda doth Hermengilde a Chriſtian ſlaine by his fathers commandement, being an Arrian

doth witneſſe: and it is likely that this prince was drawne vnto the true doctrine by Leandre G biſhop of Seuille, and by his wife Iugunde a French woman, whom, they ſay, he, put in the beginning of the ciuile warres, into the hands of thoſe that gouerned the lands of the empire in Spaine, vnder Maurice the emperour, being newly brought in bed of a ſonne, fearing the threats and furie of his father: and that after her husbands death the Romanes cauſed her to paſſe into Africke with her little infant, where ſhe died; but the child was carried to War betwixt the the French and the Gothes, for the death of Hermengilde. Conſtantinople. Childebert king of France, to reuenge the wrong done vnto his brother in law, tooke armes againſt the Gothes, and hoping to recouer his ſiſter and his nephew, hee made a league with the emperour Maurice. Againſt the French which did forrage Languedoc, was ſent Ricaire the other ſonne of Leouigilde, who repulſt them with great loſſe of their H

Myracles. They ſpeake of many myracles during the raigne of this king, which God did in fauour and confirmation of the Chriſtian religion, againſt the Arrians and their ſect, the which hee had decreed ſhould haue an end with this king Leouigilde. The ciuile warre being (as we haue ſaid) hot in Spaine, the armie of Leouigilde purſuing his ſonne, and paſſing by the territories of Valencia and Murcia, the Monkes of the Abbey of Saint Martin in thoſe marches, being terrified, abandoned their Abbot, and fled all into an iſland of the ſea neere adjoyning. The ſouldiours being entred into the Abbey, and finding the Abbot all alone, being a verie deuout and religious man, and crooked with age, they did him many outrages: one of them hauing drawne out his ſword to cut off his head, he fell downe ſtarke dead; the which did ſo I terrifie the reſt, as they preſently fled. This being reported vnto king Leouigilde, he commanded, that all the goods which had beene taken in that monaſterie, ſhould be reſtored. An Arrian biſhop meaning to deceiue the king (who reproached him, that the Arrians did no myracles) ſuborned one of his ſect, who could counterfeit himſelfe blind, cauſing him to ſtand in the way whereas he knew the king ſhould paſſe: there this gallant began to crie out, and to entreat this biſhop which did accompanie the king, that he would make him recouer his ſight by his prayers. The biſhop approached, and laying his hands arrogantly vpon his eyes, the king being preſent, and attending to ſee this myracle, it happened, that hee which did counterfeit himſelfe blind, loſt his ſight in good earneſt; and withall was ſo full of paine in that traine, That the biſhop had induced him to act this tragedie, and had corrupted him with money. Many other ſignes are written to haue beene ſeene in thoſe times, the which we will not call into queſtion, for that the end and vſe of myracles, is to witneſſe, and to giue credit to the word of God, and his true doctrine, which was then diſgraced by the Arrian princes.

Spaine was furniſhed with many learned and holy men, whileſt that the Arrians did raigne in Africke, and did perſecute the Chriſtians. They make mention of one Donat an Abbot, who paſſed out of Africke into Spaine, with about 70 Monkes, and a goodly librarie, where he was the founder of the monaſterie Seruitane: and that they were entertained by a rich ladie called Minicea, who then built the firſt monaſterie at Setabis, which is Xatiua. This Donat did firſt L ſet downe certaine rules and orders for a monaſticall life among them; for vntill that time they were not tyed by any vowes, neither had they liued in cloiſters, but were diſperſed in woods and deſarts, leading a ſolitarie life, from whence he retired them. Leandre biſhop of Seuille, was then famous for his learning and holineſſe, a great friend to S. Gregorie, whom he had knowne at Conſtantinople: of which friendſhip, they ſay, that the image of the virgine Marie, which is in great, yea in ſuperſtitious veneration in theſe dayes at Guadalupe, is a witneſſe, and that S. Gregorie ſent it to Leandre.

As one kind of Antichriſt ſhould haue an end, ſo it was neceſſarie, that (to exerciſe the Church of God) others ſhould come. Wherefore during the raigne of Leouigilde, Mahu-

And as among thoſe which made profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion there were many abuſes which had beene receiued and embraced, or elſe diſſembled by the moſt learned and religious, the raſhneſſe of the one, and the negligence of the other, gaue place to impietie, the which hath ſince preuailed in the world, vſing force with the one of their Æra: yet others ſay, That it was in the yeare of Chriſt 591, that this ſcourge of Gods Church was borne in Arabia, of the race of Agar and Iſmael. His father was called Abdalla, or Abedela, his mother Emina. A little before the death of Leouigilde, Amalaric the tyrant would haue made himſelfe king of Gallicia, but he was taken by the kings lieutenants in thoſe marches.

Leouigilde hauing raigned eighteene yeares, dyed at Toledo: who by the report of Saint Gregorie, repented himſelfe of the rigour and crueltie he had vſed to his ſonne Hermengilde, being deſirous to reforme himſelfe to the pure religion; and dying, recommended his other ſonne Ricared to Leandre, intreating him to inſtruct him as he had done his other ſonne: and he commaunded Ricared to call home the Chriſtian biſhops which he had baniſhed. He was the firſt king of the Gothes raigning in Spaine, which vſed a robe of purple, or other royall ornaments: for vntill that time the kings of that nation were apparelled like vnto the other nobles. He firſt of all began to heape vp treaſure, and filled his cofers with ſpoils of temples, confiſcations, and other violences vſed to good men, whereof many were put to death by him. He corrected the lawes made by Euric his predeceſſor, and reduced them into better forme.

Repentance of Leouigilde.

15. Ricared.

Ricared being crowned by Leandre, as Luke Tudenſis writes, hee was inſtructed in the true Chriſtian religion, the firſt yere of his raigne, and preuailed ſo with mild words and ſtrong reaſons, as hee perſuaded many of the Arrian biſhops to leaue that hereſie, and to follow the better partie; and ſo conſequently the noblemen & common people. He ordained, That the goods which had been taken and confiſcated for that cauſe, ſhould be reſtored; and of a deſtroyer he became a builder of churches. He put Sisbert the murtherer of his brother Hermingilde ignominiouſly to death: he diſcouered & ſuppreſt the conſpiracy of biſhop Sunna, and of Sugga, Arrians, who would haue made themſelues tyrants. The biſhop was baniſhed, and Suggas hands cut off, and then confined into Gallicia. There was another conſpiracie auerred of biſhop Vldila, and of queene Goſuintha, againſt Ricared, and puniſhed: Vldila was baniſhed, and Goſuintha died ſoone after: ſhe had beene a perpetuall enemie to the Chriſtians. The French being come into Languedoc with a great armie of aboue threeſcore thouſand men, vnder a captaine called Deſiderius, and then vnder Boſon, being ſent by Guntran king of Orleans, Ricared ſent Claude duke of Luſitania againſt them, who obtained one of the greateſt and moſt memorable victories that euer was, neere vnto Carcaſſonne: For we read, that with 300 men or thereabouts, he defeated all this great power of the French, and tooke all their baggage.

An admirable victorie, and ſcarce credible.

The fourth yeare of his raigne he cauſed a Councell to be called at Toledo, which was the third; at the which there were aſſembled threeſcore and two biſhops of his realme, of either ſide of the Pyrenee mountaines, or threeſcore and ten, according vnto ſome. There he did renounce and abjure the Arrain hereſie, and Badda his wife, with all the noblemen Gothes, did the like, all confeſſing the equalitie of the three perſons in one diuinitie. The Metropolitanes at this Councell were: 1 Mauſona of Merida. 2 Leandre of Seuille, whom Luke Tudenſis cals Primat and the Popes Legat. 3 Euphemius of Toledo. 4 Pantard of Bracara. 5 Nigith of Narbona. 6 Stephen of Tarracone.

2 Councell of Toledo, where the Gothes abiured the Arrian hereſie.

Theſe were the Archbiſhops and Metropolitanes, by the which the Arrian hereſie was condemned, with the which the noblemen Gothes had beene abuſed two hundred and thirteene yeares. At this Councell did preſide Leandre biſhop of Seuille, and Eutropius Abbot of the monaſterie of Serui, afterwards biſhop of Valence. Among other decrees it was ordained, That no Iew ſhould be admitted to any publike charge. The acts of this Councell were not onely allowed by the king, but alſo confirmed vnder his hand. Since that time the cuſtome is in Spaine, that euerie one that preſents himſelfe vnto the Communion, is bound to rehearſe the articles of the Apoſtles Creed after the prieſt. This was in the yeare of our Sauiour fiue hundred eightie nine, and adding thereunto thirtie eight yeares, it makes the 627 of the Spaniards Æra. King Ricared being thus in peace, and imploying his time about matters of religion in Spain, he diſcouered domeſtike trecheries, which did much trouble him:

The Iewes did what they could to procure the king to aboliſh the decree of the Counceſl made againſt them: and as in a maner all that nation haue euer giuen themſelues to the trade of merchandiſe, and are therefore full of money, they offered a great ſumme to haue it effected: but the king continued conſtant, and they muſt haue patience. This holy reſolution of king Ricared and his nobilitie, was ill ſeconded by the Pope and the Prelats of thoſe times, being alreadie accuſtomed to make ſuperfluous ſhewes, and oftentimes merchandiſe of externall things, which were of ſmall vſe for pietie. The king ſent royall preſents to pope Gregorie the firſt, who was called Holy, and an Angell vpon earth: and he requited him with reliques, with a linke of the chaine wherewith Saint Peter had beene bound by the necke, when he ſuffered martyredome; of the wood of the verie croſſe, of Saint Iohn Baptiſts haire, and ſuch other ſingularities, with an Archbiſhops cloke for Leandre biſhop of Seuille. Theſe were the exerciſes of pietie, which were then too much vſed among Chriſtians. At that time there was another Counceil held at Seuille, of eight biſhops, whereas Leandre their paſtor did preſide. H

Pope Gregorie would not haue the name of Primat, yet in the meane time he did exerciſe a juriſdiction in Spaine: for Ianuarius being depoſed from his biſhopricke of Malaca, by the practiſes of ſome of his enemies, he ſent one called Iohn to take knowledge of the cauſe, who with Apoſtolike authoritie, reſtored him to his biſhopricke, and puniſhed his aduerſaries. Ricared hauing held the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine and in Gaule fifteene yeares, dyed at Toledo, much lamented of all men: for he had raigned verie mildly, ſo as they called him Father of the people. He reduced the Gothike lawes into order, enlarged his dominions, hauing beene alwayes in armes againſt the Romanes, and their partiſans which remained in Spaine: he was verie deuout and bountifull to the Clergie, ſo as hee was commended for a verie religious prince, eſpecially for that he had giuen vnto the church of S. Felix at Gironne, the crowne of gold which he ware vpon his head: but, that which is of more eſteeme, he purged Spaine of all hereſies. Anno 601.

27 TO Ricared ſucceeded his ſon Luiba, or Liuua, Maurice raigning then at Conſtantinople. Some Spaniards ſay, That he was a baſtard; others denie it, and giue him two brethren, Suinthila and Geila. Victeric ſeized vpon the Gothes kingdome, and taking this yong prince, who was but ſixteene yeares old, he cut off his right hand, and in the end ſlew him the ſecond yeare of his raigne. Then dyed Leandre, to whom ſucceeded Iſidore his brother at Seuille.

Crueltie of Victeric to yong Luiba.

28 Victeric was an vnfortunate king, for in many encounters which he had with the Romanes, and thoſe that held their partie in Spaine, he was ſtill beaten. Moreouer hee ſtriued to aduance the Arrian hereſie againe, and in theſe miſerable deſignes raigned ſeuen years. He maried his daughter Hermenberge to Theodoric king of Mets, who could neuer know her, wherefore he ſent her back to her father a virgine vncorrupted: and they ſay that Brunichilde, Theodorics grandmother, had bewitched him, and made him vnable to vſe his wife, whom ſhe hated, M

A hated, Theodoric being otherwiſe verie licentious, and had made good proofe with other women. We read, that during the raigne of Victeric, in the yeare ſix hundred and fiue, Mahumet came into Spaine, to preach his doctrine at Cordoua; and that being diſcouered as they went to ſeize on him, he fled away ſo ſecretly, as no man knew what became of him. But we know, that Mahumet proceeded to the publication of his doctrine after a more violent meanes, hauing by money and perſuaſions corrupted the Arabian theeues, whoſe armes he imployed to propagate his errours, among other nations, vnder the empire of Heraclius: yet it is not impoſſible, that Mahumet, being then about fiue and twentie yeares old, ſeruing a rich marchant of Arabia, whoſe widow he after maried, ſhould come into Spaine for his B maſters affaires, and to haue giuen ſome knowledge of the poyſon which lay in his breaſt. King Victeric (whom others call Deteric, and ſome Bertric) as he had put the innocent prince Liuba miſerably to death, was by a juſt reuenge miſerably ſlaine by his owne people, as he ſat at the table: a baſe king, who did nothing aduance the kingdome of the Gothes, but in taking the towne of Siguenſa from the Romans.

18. Gundamir.

29 THe Gothes after the death of Victeric, created Gundamir king, who came to the crowne about the ſixt yeare of the empire of Phocas, in the yeare 610: his wife was C called Hilduare. This king at his comming made the churches ſanctuaries, forbidding to take or force any criminall perſon that had fled thither: the which was done at the purſute of a Councell then held at Toledo, of foureteene biſhops, and other Clergie men, Auraſius being biſhop there: in the which the Archbiſhop of Toledo was declared Primat of Spaine. All writers make not mention of this Councell, but onely (as the Spaniards ſay) there are memorials found thereof at Toledo: and it is written, That the rights of this Metropolitane were debated there, where he had his Suffraganes aſſigned him in all the prouince of Carpetania, which did comprehend Carthagene: ſo as in this regard the Metropolitane of Toledo had then a greater juriſdiction than at this day. Iſidore of Seuille, Innocent of Merida, Euſebius of Tarracone, and Beniamin of Dumes, among others, aſſiſted at this Councell. Hee D had warre againſt the Vaſcons or Nauarrois, and againſt the Romanes or their partiſans with happie ſucceſſe. He raigned two yeares, and dyed at Toledo, of his naturall death.

19. Siſebuth.

30 Siſebuth ſucceeded Gundamir, a wiſe and valiant prince, learned and eloquent (as the Spaniards ſay.) He chaſed away the Iewes which would not bee baptized, wherewith France was ſoone filled: but they were againe forced to flie, Dagobert the French king hauing made an edict, by the which they were injoyned to conforme themſelues to the Chriſtian re- E ligion, vpon paine of death. Siſebuth imployed his time to conquer the townes, caſtles, forts, ſtraits and paſſages of the mountaines, which were yet held by the Romane garriſons, and did in a manner make himſelfe maſter of all Spaine, Cæſarius commaunding there for the Romanes.

Anno 612.

The zeale of religion was great in many at that time in Spaine, but moſt of them wanted the true knowledge. The Church of Toledo was gouerned by Heladius, who of a Courtier became a Monke, and from thence had beene taken and aduanced, in his age, to the Archiepiſcopall dignitie, the which was now growne full of ſtate, but not ſuch as it hath been ſince. Agapite, or Agapie, being alſo turned from a ſouldiour to a Monke, had beene made biſhop of Corduba, not for any learning hee had, but for meere zeale. The nouriſhment he gaue F to his dioceſans, and his religious exerciſes, were in the inuention and veneration of reliques of the bodies of martyres: whereunto the world was then more addicted, than to know the grounds of their Faith. Yet there was a Councell held at Seuille, of eight biſhops, againſt the heretikes which were called Acephali, or without a head, the which denied the truth of the two natures, diuine and humane, in Ieſus Chriſt, where as a certaine Syrian biſhop, a great defender of that hereſie, was vanquiſhed by the ſtrong arguments of Iſi-

dorus biſhop of that place,and Preſident of the Councel.In all the Eccleſiaſtical orders which were made in Spaine,during the raigne of king Siſebuth, he interpoſed his authoritie. He forced Cecilius biſhop of Menteſa, to giue a reaſon, for that abandoning his biſhopricke he had made himſelfe a Monke: and he depoſed Euſebius biſhop of Barcelona, for that he had ſuffered certaine Comedians to make playes of the falſe Pagan gods. At the ſaid Councell of Seuille, it was decreed, That Nunnes ſhould not talke to any man, except the Abbeſſe to the Abbot or Monke which had the charge of their monaſterie, and that before one or two witneſſes. Mahumets ſect began then to ſpread in Africke, which was in the yere ſix hundred and twentie of our Sauiour, and the ſix hundreth fiftie and eight of the Spaniards Æra; the which did run wonderfully throughout all Aſia, and part of Europe, in a ſhort time: whileſt that the Paſtors of the Church of Chriſt did buſie themſelues to adorne their exterior Hierarchie, and to conuert it into a mundane Principalitie; and that the ſumme of the doctrine of the Goſpell was reduced by them to build churches and chappels, and to heape vp rents and reuenewes, to ſeeke out and oftentimes to ſuppoſe the dead bodies of Saints, and that which had belonged vnto them in this corporall life, to reuerence them after an extraordinarie maner, with other ſuch like traditions; which approached neere to impietie, couering all with a cloake of well meaning. We read in the acts of Siſebuth, That he made a law, by the which he curſed all his ſucceſſours kings, which ſhould ſuffer any Chriſtian to be held as a ſlaue, or to ſerue a Iew. There is another law of his found, which ordaines, That thoſe which ſhould not go to the warre when the armie ſhould march, or ſhould flie from the enemie, ſhould bee for euer noted with infamie. This laſt hath beene ſince corrected, as too ſeuere. He was happie in warre, ſubdued them of Aſturia, who had rebelled, and triumphed twice for the victories he obtained againſt the Romanes: To conclude, he was ſo mild and courteous, euen vnto his enemies, as being priſoners he paid their ranſoms to his owne men, and ſent them home free; ſo as he exhauſted his treaſure in the redeeming of priſoners. Hee built the church of Saint Leocadia at Toledo, and hauing raigned eight yeares, he died, leauing Ricared his ſonne, ſucceſſour in the realme; but verie young, and of a ſhort life, whom they doe not put in the number of the kings of Spaine. Some write, that he liued but three moneths after him, others ſeuen.

20. Suintilla.

Anno 621. 31 THe Gothes did chuſe Suintilla for their king, being ſonne to the firſt Ricared. This was the firſt king of the Gothes, which obtained the abſolute monarchie of Spaine, and wholly diſpoſſeſſed the Romanes. By that which hath beene ſaid they conclude, That among the Gothes they did not raigne by right of ſucceſſion from father to ſonne; but thoſe were choſen kings among them, which were held worthie to gouerne: which election was made by the nobilitie and the people: and if any one did affect that dignitie by any other vnlawfull meanes, he was excommunicated, and rejected from the companie of Chriſtians, as it appeareth by the fift Councell of Toledo. The Vaſcons inhabiting the countrey which is now called Nauarre, were entred into Arragon, whom he ſuppreſt, and forced them to build at their owne charges, the towne called Olit, or Oligil, neere to Tafalla (which hath ſince beene the kings houſes in Nauarre) to keepe them in awe. We find that the towne of Fontarabie was the worke of this king Suintilla, called properly Ondarriuia, which ſignifies in the Baſques language, ſand of the riuer. He admitted his ſonne Ricamire to a part of the gouernment. In the beginning hee was a good prince, but in the end hee grew exceeding couetous and cruell: wherefore the Gothes made him to reſigne his kingdome, the which Siſenand his aduerſarie obtained, with the conſent of the people, and with the helpe of king Dagobert of France, who ſent Abondant and Venerand, two of his captaines, into Spaine, with forces which they had leuied of the nobilitie of Bourgogne. Suintilla was not onely depriued of the crowne, but alſo excommunicated by the biſhops (whoſe power at that time began to equall that of kings) at the fourth Councell of Toledo, where they did interdict him, Geilan his brother, with their wiues and children, the communion and fellowſhip of the Church, and the poſſeſſion of their goods, gotten by violent and tyranous meanes. Suintilla raigned ten yeares.

21. Siſenand.

32 Siſenand being ſeated in the royall throne, by the aid of the French, the fourth Councell of Toledo was celebrated, of ſixtie biſhops, or ſixtie ſeuen, according vnto ſome, and as others ſay, by ſeuentie: whither among the reſt came Iſidorus of Seuille, Iuſtus of Toledo, who did preſide, Iulian of Bracar, Stephen of Merida, Audax of Tarracone, Silua of Narbona, all Archbiſhops. In this Councell it was decreed, That from thenceforth the Iews ſhould not be forced to make themſelues Chriſtians: for the ſpirit by the which the doctrine is apprehended, is not to be forced, but perſuaded. The Iewes were in the meane time debarred of all publique charges, leaſt they ſhould thereby doe injurie vnto the Chriſtians. Clergie men were exempt from all politike care, that they might with more liberty attend that which did belong vnto their ſpirituall charge; and as Baleus writes, who hath taken it out of Iſidorus, lawfull mariage was reſtored vnto the Clergie, and the vſe of concubines forbidden: And it was decreed, That no prieſt ſhould be admitted, before he were thirtie yeares old. Yet were theſe good and wholeſome conſtitutions, mingled with externall ceremonies, which were in great credit in thoſe dayes. Some good men had then care of the Church, but there were others which were violent and ill inſtructed. They ſay, that Iuſtus Archbiſhop of Toledo was ſtrangled in his bed, by ſome of his owne Clergie: he was a man without modeſtie, and ſo violent in his actions, as before his death his ſences failed him. King Siſenand died nineteene dayes after the Archbiſhop Iuſtus, hauing raigned about ſix yeares. The Gothes lawes and ordinances in Spaine, were alſo reformed in this kings time, with the authoritie of the Councell aboue mentioned, in the which was receiued the razing of Clergie mens haire in manner of a crowne.

The ſame yeare Iſidorus Archbiſhop of Seuille died, of whom the Spaniards make great eſteeme, for his ſanctitie and learning, and for the number of bookes which he hath written. The yere following there was another Councell held at Toledo, whither came 44 biſhops, and ſix ſuffraganes, or vicars, being, in all as ſome write, 52; where Eugenius did alſo preſide. There was a perpetual law impoſed vpon the kings of Spaine, not to ſuffer any one to liue within their dominions, that was not a Catholike, the which their kings ſhould ſolemnely ſweare before they were crowned: and if any king ſhould goe againſt that law which he had thus ſworne, he ſhould be excommunicate and accurſed. Thus did thoſe reuerend Fathers labour to draw the ſick and languiſhing to their ſaluation, after the example of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles. Cinthilla dyed the fourth yeare of his raigne.

Chriſtendome, no leſſe from princes and kings, than from their fellow biſhops: wherefore G to ſettle the Primat in Spaine, they were forced to haue a Bull and permiſſion from Pope Theodore the firſt, or Martin the firſt, then raigning; by the which this primacie was referred to the election of the biſhops of that prouince. Vntill that time the Archbiſhop of Seuille had held this ranke, rather of honour than of power: but it falling out, that Theodiſque the Archbiſhop, a Grecian borne, a man more learned in the tongues, than religous, ſeeing himſelfe purſued by the other biſhops and prelats of Spaine, being accuſed to haue corrupted the workes of Iſidorus, who was held a Saint, and therefore depoſed from his Archbiſhopricke in open Councell, he was ſo tranſported, as hauing abandoned the Chriſtian religion, he retired himſelfe into Africke with the Mahumetiſts, the Primacie of Spaine was H then transferred from Seuille to Toledo, whereas the ſeuenth Synode was celebrated, by fortie biſhops, the fiſt yeare of the raigne of Cindaſiunthe, when as he receiued his ſonne for a companion and aſſiſtant in the gouernment of his eſtate, ſeeking thereby to make the kingdome of the Gothes hereditarie. This young prince was held verie deuout and ſtudious of diuinitie; but aboue all things he was curious to build and inrich churches. During their raigne there liued another Eugenius, ſucceſſour to the Archbiſhop of Toledo, aboue mentioned, famous for his ſanctitie of life and doctrine, aduanced by force by the king to the Archbiſhopricke.

ing the eight, it was decreed, That they ſhould abſtaine from eating fleſh in Lent, without K leaue, in caſes of ineuitable neceſſitie, vpon paine of excommunication, and not to eat any fleſh in a yeare after: ſo much they did regard theſe acceſſaries of religion, confirming and amplifying in the meane time their authoritie with the people.

Irene a chaſt virgine.

In Luſitania certaine lewd and cruell perſons ſought to rauiſh a virgine called Irene, againſt whom ſhe made ſuch reſiſtance, as being impatient in their damnable luſt, they ſlew her, and caſt her into the riuer of Nabanin. Her bodie was carried to the towne of Salabis, the which changed the name, and is called Saint Irene; an argument of great ſanctitie, ſeeing ſhe preferred her chaſtitie before her life. The chiefe of theſe luſtfull murtherers was called Britaud.

Decree of the Councell of Toledo.

Portamius Archbiſhop of Bracar, was not ſo vertuous: for the celibate of Clergie men L being then in requeſt, and the children begotten by them declared incapable to inherit their fathers goods, and were deliuered for ſlaues to churches, by the ninth Councell held at Toledo, in the ſeuenth yeare of Recceſiunthe, he fell to be looſe of life: yet hee did acknowledge it openly in the Councell following, held at Toledo, which was the tenth, and did willingly reſigne his Archbiſhopricke; to whom Fructuoſus ſucceeded, a man of a noble familie, being then biſhop of Dume, the founder of many monaſteries and chappels. The eight yeare of the raigne of Recceſiunthe Spaine was much terrified, for that there appeared ſtarres in the firmament at noone day, and the Sunne was ecclipſed.

Heretikes Heluidians.

There came two heretikes, called Theude and Pelagius, out of Gothike Gaule into Spaine, who denied the perpetuall virginitie of Marie the mother of our Sauiour; renewing the M hereſie of Heluidius: the which were confuted by Alphonſus, nephew and ſucceſſour to Eugenius in the Archbiſhopricke of Toledo, who wrot a booke vpon that argument. Whereupon the Spaniards ſay, that the virgine Marie appeared vnto him: and to this apparition they adde the gift of a cope, to weare when he ſhould ſay Maſſe, the which they affirme is kept at Toledo, or at Ouiedo; but they know not well at which of theſe two places it remaines maines: for being not lawfull for any one to vſe it after the death of Alphonſus, it hath remained inuiſible. To this Archbiſhop, they ſay, that Saint Leocadia did alſo appeare, who reuealed vnto him the place where his bodie was buried, and had lyen many yeares hidden. Such graue teſtimonies haue they of the holineſſe of this Archbiſhop Alphonſus, ſurnaming him Chryſoſtome, the Anchor of the Faith, attributing vnto him other like epithites, by reaſon of his learning and pietie. Apparitions and reuelations beleeued by the Spaniards.

There is no other thing found written of this king Receſiunthe, being credible, that hauing no warres, he did not much trouble himſelfe, leauing all the affaires of ſtate and Clergie to bee managed by the Prelats and frequent Councels: yet there are ſome lawes found made by him. Hauing raigned nineteene yeares and three moneths, he dyed at Toledo, leauing two brethren, Theofred, who was father to Roderic, the laſt king of the Gothes in Spaine and Iafila. He was interred in the towne which in old time was called Gertic, and now Bamba, in the territorie of Palenza.

26. Bamba.

37 THe ſame day that Receſiunthe dyed, Bamba before deſired by the noblemen Gothes, was choſen king. Some ſay, that he would neuer haue receiued this honour and charge but by conſtraint; and that refuſing it abſolutely, there was a nobleman among the Gothes, which drew his ſword, and threatened to kill him, if he did not yeeld to the Gothes intreaties: whereupon he condeſcended, more for feare, than for any deſire to raigne, and was crowned by Quirin, or Quirice, Archbiſhop of Toledo, in our Ladies church; where they report, that there was ſeene comming out of his head, from among his haire, a vapour like ſmoke, in forme of a pillar, going vpward. There he made a confeſſion of the Catholique Faith, confirmed the ciuile lawes and ordinances of the kings his predeceſſours, and receiued a ſolemne oath from the people. Theſe ceremonies were ſcarce ended, when as they had newes, That the earle of Niſmes, called Hilperic, or Hilderic, contemning the ordinances of the precedent kings of the Gothes, had brought the Iewes againe into the countrey, and made all Gothike Gaule in a manner to rebell againſt the king. And for that Arege biſhop of Niſmes had contradicted him in this exceſſe, he had chaſed him away, and againſt the canons had conſecrated another by two biſhops of his faction. Gumild biſhop of Maguelone did counſell and aſſiſt him in theſe actions. Wherefore Bamba to ſuppreſſe the inſolencie of this earle, ſent a captaine named Paul, allyed to the deceaſed king, but faithleſſe and treacherous to his prince; who turned the armie which had beene giuen him, againſt him, and made an agreement with the enemie, cauſing himſelfe to be crowned king at Narbone, where he ſet vpon his head the crowne which king Ricared had giuen to Saint Felix church at Girone. Hee drew vnto his partie Raſmonde duke of Tarracone, and Hildigiſe, who was Gardingue (which was an office of the Crowne) and vſed all the treacheries hee could deuiſe againſt king Bamba. He ſpoyled all the churches of Languedoc, and fortified himſelfe with men which hee had leuied in Fraunce and Gaſcoine. But as ſuch attempts doe ſeldome proſper, ſo this ſucceeded ill with him: for Bamba hauing raiſed great forces in Spaine, came againſt him, and in leſſe than ſix monethes did happily end a moſt difficult warre: He tooke Barcelone, Girone, and Narbone, the which he beſieged both by ſea and land; then Magdelone, Agde, Beziers, and in the end Niſmes, whereas the chiefe of this rebellion with the reſt of his faction fell into his hands, the ſame day twelue monethes that hee came vnto the Crowne. Hee repaired the ruines which had beene made at Niſmes, and throughout all Gothike Gaule, and cauſed reſtitution to be made of that which had beene taken out of the churches. At the intreatie of Argebaud Archbiſhop of Narbone, he gaue the offendors their liues, reſeruing to himſelfe all other puniſhment. He repulſed Loup a Commaunder of certaine French bands, neere vnto Beziers. Theſe things being happily performed by him, he returned to Toledo, triumphing, and carrying his rebels in pompe before him, hauing their beards and heads ſhauen, bare legged, attired in ſackcloth, and mounted vpon Cammels. Among others Paul the chiefe of the rebels, carrying a crowne of pitched

11 Councell of Toledo,

He cauſed the eleuenth Councell of Toledo to be held, vnder Quirice, or Quirin, Archbiſhop of that place, and Primat of Spaine; where there were ſixteene biſhops preſent, and many deputies for others that were abſent. They had beene many yeares without calling of any Councell, wherewith the Fathers had beene much troubled, this was in the yeare 675: there king Bamba hauing cauſed the acts of the kings his predeceſſours to be ſought out, according to that which they had decreed, and with the conſent of the Fathers, he aſſigned to euerie dioceſſe the bounds of his juriſdiction. The biſhopricks of Lugo and Leon were declared exempt, and not ſubject to any Metropolitane, as they had beene vntill that time. Another Councell was held at Bracar: theſe were prouinciall Councels, which were to be held euerie yeare; and at certaine times they were to call a generall Councell of all the biſhops of the Gothes kingdome, of either ſide of the Pyrenee mountaines, the which was done at Toledo the chiefe towne. Arabians firſt attempt vpon Spaine.

In this kings raigne the Arabians holding Africke, began to inuade Spaine: they had a fleet at ſea of two hundred threeſcore and ten veſſels, the which by the diligence and valour of Bamba were in a manner all burnt, and the Arabians put to the ſword. They did then ſpoile a great part of the countrey along the coaſt. There was in the Court a nobleman called Eruinge, iſſued from a daughter of king Cindauſinthe, and a gentleman of Greece, called Ardauaſte, who being chaſed from Conſtantinople, had fled into Spaine, where he had been well entertained, and honoured with this allyance. This Eruinge being ambitious of commaund, poiſoned king Bamba, ſo as he became madde; for the curing whereof there were many remedies applied, both naturall and ſuperſtitious, but to ſmall effect: ſo as Bamba (either willingly, finding himſelfe vnable, or otherwiſe) quit the crowne, and retyred himſelfe into a monaſterie, where he liued ſeuen yeares and one moneth, after that he had beene king nine yeares. The place where he paſſed the remainder of his life, is called Pampliga, neere Burgos. Thus Eruinge ſeized by force, as they ſay, of the kingdome of the Viſigothes in Spaine, the which the Archbiſhop of Toledo doth affirme: yet it doth not accord well with the acts of the twelfth Councell held at Toledo, vnder Eruinge, where the election of this king Eruinge is confirmed, and allowed as lawfull. But to reconcile theſe contrarieties, it is to bee preſumed, that Eruinge being king, and hauing power in his hands, gratifying the Fathers in ſome ſort, that he was alſo gratified by them, as one hand waſheth another, or, as they ſay in France, one Barber ſhaues another. To fortifie the beginning of his reigne againſt Theofrede the ſonne of Bamba (whom he feared much) he gaue Cixilone his daughter, whom he had by Luibigotte his wife, to an Earle who was rich, and of great authoritie among the Gothes called Egica, couſin to Bamba deceaſed. And ſoone after the twelfth Councell was held at Toledo, which was in the yeare 681, Iulian Archbiſhop of Seuille being Preſident, where there aſſiſted one and fortie Biſhops, fiue Abbots, and fifteene great Noblemen. By the acts of this Councell in the ſeuenth Article it appeares, That the kings of Spaine had power to giue Biſhoprickes, and that to that collation, the confirmation of the other Biſhops
B of Spaine was required, eſpecially of the Archbiſhop of Toledo; the which doth alſo appeare by the anſwere of an Epiſtle written by Braule Biſhop of Sarragoſſe, to S. Iſidorus, where he is admoniſhed to chuſe ſome good man in the place of Euſebius, Archbiſhop of Tarracone deceaſed: Iſidorus anſweres him, That he did not know the kings pleaſure therein. This Councell did aboliſh certaine Biſhops newly erected, and created by king Bamba, in ſome townes which were not very conuenient.

12 Councell of Toledo. An. 681.

Nomination of Biſhops belonged to the kings of Spaine.

Three yeares after, in the yeare 684, was another Councell held at Toledo, which was the thirteenth, of eight & fortie Biſhops, and three Archbiſhops, of Toledo, Bracar, and Merida; yet the Authors varie in the number of theſe Biſhops: one of the decrees of theſe fathers was, That neither the king nor any other ſhould marrie the widow of the deceaſed king, nor
C defile her by adulterie, vpon paine of excommunication, and to be damned to hell fire. And in the yeare 685 the foureteenth Councell was aſſembled at Toledo, of ſixteene Biſhops, and many Vicars of them that were abſent, to confirme the acts of the ſixt Councell of Conſtantinople, begun vnder Conſtantine the fourth, and ſome yeares after ended, againſt the errors of Apollinaris, renewed then, denying the two natures, diuine and humane in Ieſus Chriſt: which acts the Pope ſent into Spaine, that in a generall aſſembly of the Prelats they might be read, and by their authoritie allowed, and publiſhed throughout all the kingdome of the Gothes. The Archbiſhop of Toledo was then called Iulian Pomer, of the Iewes race, whoſe father and mother had made themſelues Chriſtians; a learned man, religious, and of a good life. Eruinge hauing reigned ſeuen yeares, died at Toledo of a naturall death, leauing his kingdome to Egi-
D ca his ſonne in law. In his time there was a great famine in Spaine.

28. Egica.

40 AS ſoone as Egica, or (as others call him) Egican was king, he put away his wife Cixilone, for the wickedneſſe which her father had committed againſt king Bamba; yet he did auow the infant Vitiſa which he had had by her, and cauſed it to be nouriſhed (in hope to make it his heire) in the towne of Tude or Tuy in Gallicia, as if he had giuen it the realme of Gallicia, and of the Sueues, for a portion, whileſt that he reigned ouer the Gothes. He cau-
E ſed himſelfe to be abſolued at a Councell held at Toledo, in the firſt yeare of his reigne, of the oath which he had taken againſt his dutie to that vnlawfull king. This Councell was called the fifteenth at Toledo, whereas Iulian the Archbiſhop of that place did preſide, where there were ſixtie one Biſhops, or ſixtie ſix, according vnto ſome. There Iulian did maintaine by reaſons and good authoritie, what he had written in a confeſſion of the Faith ſent to Rome, as well in his name, as of all the Biſhops of Spaine; which was, That in our Lord Ieſus Chriſt were the word, the bodie, and the ſoule; the which had beene rejected by Pope Benedict the ſecond, who (as it ſeemes) did not well vnderſtand theſe things: the Article was allowed by the Councell of Toledo, and afterwards being well conſidered, was receiued at Rome. The acts of this Councell were publiſhed in Gothique Gaule in the Cathedrall Churches, for F that the Biſhops of that Prouince could not come to Toledo by reaſon of the plague; being enjoyned to receiue them vpon paine of excommunication, and the loſſe of the tenth part of their goods that ſhould oppugne them. Six yeares after there was the ſixteenth Councell held at Toledo, Sigebert being Archbiſhop of that place, after the death of Iulian, and was depoſed by this Councell for his ill deſeruing, and in his place was ſet Felix Archbiſhop of Seuille. Fauſtin Archbiſhop of Bracar was aduanced to Seuille, and Felix Biſhop of Portogallo to Bracar: this alteration being made, they did proceed to the acts. The cauſe why they depoſed Sigebert, was, for that he had attempted to depriue king Egica of the realme, for the which hee was degraded, baniſhed, his goods confiſcated, and excommunicated; ſo as hee might not receiue the Sacraments but at the houre of his death: yea, a penaltie was inflicted vpon all clergie men, of what degree ſoeuer they were, that ſhould attempt againſt their prince. G

17 Councell of Toledo. An.694.

The yeare following, which was 694, the ſeuenteenth Councell was held at Toledo, whereas the king with great humilitie demaunded many things of the Fathers: among other, there was a decree made againſt the Iewes, who being accuſed not onely to haue reuolted from the Chriſtian religion (in the which they had beene once baptized) but alſo to haue conſpired againſt the King and the State of Spaine, it was ſaid, That their goods ſhould be confiſcated, their perſons, wiues and children, and their deſcendants held for ſlaues, and diſperſed throughout Spaine: That thoſe which had them in ſeruice, ſhould not ſuffer them to exerciſe their Iewiſh ceremonies: That their children being once ſeuen yeres old, ſhould be ſent away from their parents, and giuen to Chriſtians to bring vp, and then married to Chriſtians, and by all meanes drawne from the conuerſation and acquaintance of their parents, and men of their ſect: this is to be ſeene in the eight article. H

A decree againſt the Iewes.

What the Councels of theſe times were.

Theſe laſt Councels were generall aſſemblies of the nation, whereas the Clergie held the firſt place, the which in name and ſhew were made to determine of matters concerning religion, but in effect they treated of matters of State, whereas controuerſies betwixt great men and other politicke matters were there decided: and although there were men of all eſtates, yea and of the nobleſt houſes, and that there was an order, that regular men ſhould take knowledge of regular cauſes, and ſecular cauſes ſhould be decided by the ſecular men, yet it is eaſie to judge, that the ſoueraigne and laſt deciſion depended vpon the authoritie of the Fathers in all things: ſo as the ſpiritualtie in the confuſion of theſe two powers did often vaniſh among worldly affaires, and ciuile policie vſurped by clergie men, became tyrannie, as we ſhall ſoone ſee. I Fafila Gouernor of Biſcaye.

Egica growne old, had ſetled his ſonne Vitiza as Viceroy in Gallicia, holding his ſeat at Tuy, then Tude, whither a little before he had confined Fafila, duke or gouernour of Biſcaye, ſonne to king Cindaſiunthe, as ſome hold, for certaine attempts made againſt him, whoſe wife was corrupted by Vitiza, who afterwards by her inſtigation ſlew Fafila, that they might enjoy their loues more freely. This exceſſe happened in a towne which was then called Douzemains, and now Palatio, neere vnto the riuer Vrbicum. This Fafila was father to king Pelagius, who reſtored Spaine, being oppreſſed and ruined by the Moores. Egica hauing reigned about thirteene yeares, died at Toledo, being honoured for a wiſe and temperate king. 29. Vitiza. L

Ann.701.

41 THe diſhonour and infamie of the kings of the Gothes was in the perſon of this Vitiza, being full of all exceſſe in his luſt, without feare or reuerence of God in his actions, an hipocrite and diſſembler: for at his firſt comming he ſhewed himſelfe mild, liberall, and religious, but ſoone after he turned to his owne nature. He called a Councell of Biſhops and Noblemen at Toledo, to conſult touching the gouernment of his realme: he cauſed Theofreds eyes to be pulled out, who had beene confined to Cordoua, leaſt that hee who was beloued of the people, and brother to Recceſiunthe, ſhould aſpire vnto the Crowne. Hee intended to doe the like to Pelagius, the ſonne of Fafila, whom hee had ſlaine, but hee eſcaped, and fled into Biſcaye, being reſerued for greater matters. Hee committed manie villanies the firſt two yeares, yet ſecretly, but afterwards he exceeded in all vices, without any ſhame: he filled his palace with many wiues which he had married, and an infinite number of concubines, the which he would haue publickely allowed vnto all men, and did perſuade the Noblemen to follow his example. Hee did likewiſe diſannull the Popes Conſtitutions for a ſingle life, and by an Edict which he cauſed to be ſet foorth, ſuffered Clergie men to marrie, and to haue as many women married or vnmarried

A vnmarried as they pleaſed, vſing all the inticements he could to infect them with his licentiouſneſſe, leaſt they ſhould oppoſe themſelues againſt him, and by their cenſures draw the people from obeying of ſo filthie and vnchaſt a king. And to preuent all rebellions, this man blinded with his luſtfull pleaſures, cauſed (vnder the colour of peace, which Spaine did then enjoy) all the townes of his realme to be demanteled, except Leon, Toledo, and Aſturica. Beſides hee diſarmed the people, and depriued Sinderede Archbiſhop of Toledo (were it juſtly or vnjuſtly) of his dignitie, giuing it to his brother Opas, who was Archbiſhop of Seuille: hee diſannulled all the immunities and priuiledges of Churches, called backe the Iewes, and reſtored the baniſhed men to their goods and poſſeſſions, giuing them more B priuiledges than euer they had before. Finally, as a preſage of the future miſeries, he ſhewed (in all ſorts of exceſſe and violence contrarie to the lawes of God and men) what princes, ill inſtructed and ignorant of true pietie, could doe. In the meane time blind Theofred, confined to Cordoua, being newly married to Recilone, a ladie of the bloud royall of the Gothes, had begotten two ſonnes of her, Roderic and Coſta, to whom Vitiza would haue done as much as hee had done to the father; but they eſcaped, and implored the Romanes aid, as the Archbiſhop Rodrigo doth report, or elſe of the nobilitie of the Gothes, who in remembrance of Receſiunthe gaue them aid, to chaſe this infamous monſter out of the royall throne, which he did vnworthily hold. Being come to battaile, Vitiza was defeated and taken, and according to the preſident which he had giuen, his owne eyes were put C out, and he confined to Cordoua, without title or honour, where he ſpent the reſt of his life in miſerie, hauing reigned tenne yeares. Thus Roderic obtained the crowne by the fauour of the Romanes and the ſuffrages of the people.

30. Roderic laſt King of the Gothes.

42 THe time was now come when as the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine muſt haue an end, being come to the height of their iniquities: for in their Commonweale all things, both holy and prophane, were managed with fraud and violence, and their princes af- D fected confuſion, to ſatisfie their ambition and infamous luſts: wherefore it pleaſed God to confound them in their imaginations, to blind them that would be blind, to root out the incorrigible, and to take his graces from them that did obſtinately contemne him. Roderic hauing beene an inſtrument to puniſh a tyrant, made no vſe of this correction, nor acknowledged the fauour from whence it came, but preſently after his comming to the crowne he followed Vitizaes ſteps, yea, he exceeded him in all vices. He ſhewed himſelfe cruell and inhumane to Siſebut and Elba, the children of Vitiza, whom he purſued with all the indignities that might be, and forced them to flie into Africke, depriued of all their goods, where they were entertained by Recila, Earle and Gouernour of Tanger or Tingis. Hee addreſſed himſelfe to the daughter of Iulian, Earle or Gouernour of Ceuta, called Caba or Caua, the E which was bred vp in the Court, as other virgines of noble families, according to the cuſtome, and rauiſhed her, whileſt that her father was in embaſſage in Africke, for the affaires of the kingdome. The place where he committed this rape is called Pancoruo, betwixt Victoria and Burgos. This was the occaſion which made the Moores to inuade Spaine. Some authors write, That Caba or Caua was wife and not daughter to Count Iulian; yet wee find, that his wife was called Faldrina, and that ſhee was ſiſter to king Vitiza. The Earle did wickedly reuenge this priuat injurie by the ruine of the whole kingdome: for returning into Africke, whither he led Caua, cauſing her to embarke at Malaga, of whom the port of the ſaid towne is yet named, he went to Muſa Abenzair, Gouernour for the Emperour of the Arabians, whoſe name was Vlit, and promiſed to make him Lord of all Spaine, if hee would F giue him men and meanes to make warre there. Muſa hauing aduertiſed Vlit, he aduiſed him not to giue too much credit vnto the Earle, before he had tried him: Wherefore at that time they gaue him a hundred horſe and foure hundred foot, with promiſe of greater forces.

led all the coaſt along the Ocean, which now is Andaluſia and Portugall, and then led them backe into Africke, laden with ſpoyles for a teſtimonie of his actions. This firſt deſcent of the Moores was in the yeare 713. The Arabians hauing made this triall of Count Iulians affection, the Gouernour Muſa gaue him twelue thouſand Moores, vnder the conduct of Tarif Aben Zarca; which Tarif (according vnto ſome) had beene in the firſt paſſage of the Moores into Spaine. Paſſing the ſtrait, he landed his men at the foot of the mountaine Calpe: by reaſon whereof this place changed his name, and was in the Arabian tongue called Gebel Tarif, that is to ſay, the mount of Tarif. And the next towne taken by that captaine, which was either the auncient Carteia, or Mellaria, was called Tariffe. This armie being ſecretly fauoured by Siſibut and Eba, the ſonnes of Vitiza, aided and fortified by Ricila Gouernor of Tanger, and other noblemen Gothes, to whom the preſent eſtate was diſpleaſing, being friends and affected, and it may be alike intereſſed with Count Iulian, ouerran and ſpoyled all Andaluſia, and a part of Luſitania, entring into Seuille, and many other places which had beene demanteled, by the fooliſh aduice of king Vitiza. In theſe combuſtions, Roderic his ſucceſſour both in his vices and kingdome, was ſo vnprouided, as his enemies had meanes to doe what they would, without reſiſtance. In the end hauing aſſembled ſome troupes in haſt, he ſent them againſt the Moores, vnder the commaund of a kinſman of his, called by ſome Inigo, by others Sancho. But the Gothes hauing in a manner forgotten to manage armes, by reaſon of the long peace which they had enjoyed, could not withſtand the Moores force, hauing been for many yeares in continuall warre, ſo as they were defeated, which made Count Iulian to grow proud and inſolent, and his enterpriſes to bee more fauoured: ſo as vpon the newes of this victorie in Africke, an infinit number of Arabians, Moores or Saraſins, and other Africanes, paſſed into Spaine, as to the aſſured ſpoyle of one of the richeſt regions in the world.

Goths defeated. An Eſtate without armes is lame and defective.

Roderic ſeeing this fire to encreaſe daily, hauing called all the Nobilitie together, and rayſed an armie, he marched againſt his enemies, hauing not all his forces yet joyned (for they of Biſcaye and of the Aſturies, and in a manner all thoſe on this ſide the riuer of Ebro, were not yet arriued) finding the Arabians vpon the riuer of Guadalette, neere to Aſſidone, which either is Xeres or Medina Sidonia at this day; whereas the two armies ſtanding in view one of another, for the ſpace of eight dayes, they had many bloudie skirmiſhes, without any great aduantage: but in the end they came to a battaile betwixt Medina Sidonia and Xeres, vpon a Sunday in September, in the yeare 714, whereas king Roderic was a ſpectator of his ſouldiours deuoires, being mounted vpon a great horſe which they called Orelia, in a royall mantle, and a crowne vpon his head, with other rich ornaments, after the manner of the kings of the Gothes in thoſe times, which made his ſouldiors the more courageous, and was the cauſe of a great ſlaughter that day of Saraſins or Arabians: but the multitude of the enemies one ſupporting another, and the tyred being ſtill relieued with freſh ſupplies, in the end made the Gothes and Spaniards to quit the field: and it is written, That the ſonnes of Vitiza, called home by Roderic, and to whom indiſcreetly he had giuen the commaund of two points of his armie, reuolted during the fight; whereupon all his men were cut in pieces, and all Spaine was thereby loſt in few dayes, except the Aſturies, Biſcaye, and ſome part of the Pyrenees, whither the remainders of the Nobilitie and people fled, which refuſed to liue vnder the Arabians gouernment. King Roderic was neuer ſeene more; his horſe and ſpoyles were onely found in a bogge: yet in the towne of Viſeo in Portugall there is at this day this inſcription to be ſeene in Latine.

Anno 714.

The total defeat of the Gothes.

An Epitaph vpon K. Roderic.

Hic iacet Rodericus, vltimus Rex Gottorum: maledictus furor impius Iuliani, quia pertinax & indignatio, quia dura, Veſanus furia, animoſus furore, oblitus fidelitatis, Immemor religionis, contemptor Diuinitatis, crudelis in ſe, Homicida in Dominum, Hoſtis in Domeſticos, Vaſtator in Patriam, Reus in omnes: Memoria eius in omni ore amareſcet, & nomen eius in æternum putreſcet.

In this king ended the Gothes kingdome in Spaine, the which had continued (if wee account as the Spaniards doe, according vnto Iſidorus, from Athanaric, who reigned in the yeare 370 in Myſia and Thrace) 344 yeares: but for that hee had no entrance into Spaine,

The continuance of the Gothes reigne.

A Spaine, but onely Ataulphe, who reigned in the yeare 413, and was the firſt Gothiſh king which entred there about the yeare 417, the Gothes reigne in Spaine had continued but 297 yeares.

After this defeat there was no order nor gouernment among the Gothes, euery man followed what partie did beſt pleaſe him. Some retyred into the mountaines of Aſturia and Biſcaye, and into Nauarre; others went into Gaule: many paſſed into Italie, Germanie, and England, begging aid from thoſe princes (but in vaine) to reſtore the ruined eſtate of Spaine, and elſewhere as God directed them. Sindered Archbiſhop of Toledo (who had been depoſed by the violence of Vitiza) attended not the end of the warre, but leauing his flocke, fled
B into Italie. Oppa who had ſucceeded him, tooke part with the Moores, and negotiating for them, loſt himſelfe in Aſturia; in whoſe place the afflicted Chriſtians did chuſe one Vrbain, a religious man. The traitors which had drawne in the Moores to reuenge their priuat injuries, were all diſappointed of the promiſes which had beene made them, and did periſh miſerably in diuers ſeaſons, and after diuers manners: eſpecially Iulian, after that he had ſeene his wife ſtoned by the Moores (who allowed the treaſon, but hated the traitors) his ſonne caſt from the top of a tower in the towne of Ceuta, himſelfe miſerable, being deſpoyled of all his goods, died in a priſon in Arragon, in the territorie of Hueſca, as ſome write. The name of the Gothes from that time was in a manner rooted out from the face of the earth: for ſince there is no memorie of any Eſtate, Policie, or Gouernment of this nation vnder this
C name, the which in former times was ſo great and famous, as well in the Eaſt as Weſt, ſince the firſt remembrance of any people. The loſſe of one battaile did blemiſh all the beautie of their poſteritie, who had vanquiſhed and ſlaine that great Cyrus king of Perſia, and of all Aſia: who had made head againſt the armies of Alexander the Great, ſorraged the kingdomes conquered by him, and carried away the kings (his ſucceſſors) priſoners: troden vnder foot the maieſtie of the Romane Empire, triumphed ouer Emperours, and ouer ſo many great Captaines and armies: taking the beſt townes in Italie; yea Rome, the Queene of all other townes, ſackt by them: the which had ſeized vpon the moſt populous and richeſt Prouinces of the Weſt; where they had reigned happily for ſo many yeares, with ſo many remarkable examples of pietie, juſtice, and valour. This braue nation was in one day ouerthrowne, ſo
D weake is the ſupport of humane greatneſſe.

Traitors fruſtrate of their hopes.

The miſerable end of Count Iulian, his wife and children.

The weakneſſe and vanitie of humane greatneſſe.

THis ruine of the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine hauing cauſed ſo great a confuſion in all things, as not onely religion, the manners of the inhabitants, the language, and the lawes, but euen the face of the earth, and the ſeat and names of townes were peruerted and changed, it ſhall not be from the purpoſe, if wee make a catalogue of the auncient Biſhoprickes eſtabliſhed by the Chriſtians in that region, whereof mention is made by writers, and namely, in the treaties of Councels, the which haue beene gouerned by many holy Paſtors, as well in the time of the Romane Emperours, as of the kings of the Gothes, and were at the entrie of the Arabians ruined whereſoeuer they commaunded: wherein for the more eaſe of E the reader, we will obſerue the order of the Alphabet.

THe Arabians Mahumetiſts which conquered Spaine, were alſo called Moores, for that they croſſed Mauritania, a region of Africk, which is oppoſit vnto Spaine, from the which Tingitana is diuided by a ſmall ſtrait, the which when as Tarif paſſed, was ſubject vnto the Gothes, and gouerned by Recila, a friend and partiſan to Count Iulian. It is therfore expedient to ſpeak ſomething of this nation, whoſe power in a ſhort time did in a manner ſurpaſſe all the Monarchies which haue been in the world. 1 Arabians Weſterne Moores.

Arabia is a ſpacious region, diuided into many parts: The auncients made a partition into Arabia and the parts.
B three; the Happie, the Stonie, and the Deſart. Arabia the Happie was ſo called, in regard of the two other which are barren, little knowne to the auncients, and nothing at all annoyed by the Romane armies. Arabia Petrea or Stonie carried that name of the capitall citie Petra, which had their kings, ſometimes friends and allied, but moſt commonly enemies vnto their neighbours, and often tributaries to the auncient kings of Perſia and Ægypt (whereunto they joyne) and afterwards to the Romanes. The Deſart Arabia hath not at any time had any certaine policie, and very few townes, whoſe princes were but leaders of troupes of theeues, enemies to all quiet, ſeeking nothing but warre, mercinarie to kings and princes that would em- The manners of the Arabians.
ploy them, a people without humanitie, without faith, and without any religion. All this countrey extends from Eaſt to Weſt, almoſt from the floud Euphrates vnto Nyle, hauing Sy-
C ria on the North ſide, and the Ocean to the South. Whileſt that the Romane Emperours were in continuall warre againſt the kings of Parthia and Perſia, either partie employed this nation, who went for the moſt part to the warre on horſebacke, fit to ſpoyle a countrey, to ſeize ſuddainely vpon a paſſage, to diſcouer, ſurprize, or doe any other action of warre, which required expedition, eſpecially if there were more queſtion to forrage & ſpoyle than to fight. This race is deſcended from Iſmael, of whom it is ſaid, That his hand ſhould be againſt all, and all hands againſt him. Arabians Iſmaelites.

2 Among theſe people Mahumet was borne, in the yeare of our redemption 580 (ſome Mahumet his birth and countrey.
ſay, it was in the yeare 591, and others 593) to trouble Chriſtendome, and to puniſh their ingratitude, which tearmed themſelues Chriſtians, Maurice being then Emperour of Con-D ſtantinople. The place of his birth was called Itrarip, a little towne neere vnto Mecque; his father called Abedela, was a Pagan and an Idolatrer, and his mother Emina a Iew, a poore begging girle, the which was taken vp by Abedela for loue, for that ſhe ſeemed faire. At the age of two yeares he was left an orphan; whereupon he was taken by an vncle of his, called Salutalebi, and bred vp in his houſe by Halima his wife, vntill the age of ſixteene yeares, and then hee was carried away by a troupe of Arabian theeues, who met him alone, and ſold him to a rich marchant, who ſaid, That he was of the race of Iſmael, and was called Abdimonepli, who employed Mahumet ſome yeares in his trade of marchandiſe, whereby he had occaſion to ſee many countries, and to taſt many religions, eſpecially the Iewiſh and Pagan, to the which was added the Chriſtian religion, which was then much corrupted, and was Ambition the mother of hereſies.
E made much worſe to him by the conuerſation of an Arrian Monke called Sergius, who haunted the houſe of his maſter Abdimonepli. With this Monke and others he layed a plot to make himſelfe famous by a remarkable impietie, and framed a doctrine drawne from the Iewiſh and the Arrian, mingled with other their inuentions: the which he afterwards brought in, partly by perſuaſions, partly by money, and partly by force, being enriched with his maſters treaſure, after whoſe death he had married his widow called Adegiah; ſo as about the yeare 623 he was receiued and acknowledged by the Arabians for their captaine and great Mahumets doctrine publiſhed in Heraclius time.
Prophet. Then was Heraclius in the imperiall ſeat at Conſtantinople; and a little before there had riſen many ſeditions in Syria and Ægypt, during the which, Mahumet had plotted his deſigns, and had made himſelfe famous among the ſeditious. And moreouer, certain mer-
F cinarie bands of Arabian Scenits being caſt and ſent away with injuries by the Commiſſaries of Heraclius the Emperor, he drew them vnto him, and with theſe forces in a ſhort time ſeized vpon a great part of Arabia, namely, of the townes of Mecque and Itrarip, the place of his birth, the which was afterwards called Medinath-Al-Nabi, that is to ſay, the city of the great The Arabians begin the account of their yeares at 617.
Prophet; and from the day that place was taken, in the yeare 617, the Arabians and ſectaries of Mahumet account their yeares, as we do ours from the Natiuitie of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Others ſay, That Medina or Almedina was another rich towne inhabited by rich Iewes, G whereof Mahumet gaue the ſpoyle to his ſouldiors, abhorring it aboue all other ſects, for it ſeemed more oppoſit to his doctrine than any other; yet it is moſt certain, that he vſed Iewes to compound his doctrine. And vpon a defeat which the Perſians had by the Romanes in thoſe times, he tooke occaſion to inuade Syria, and ſeized vpon the countrey about Damas, and then tried to extend his limits all he could, employing in the end of his dayes his Lieutenants to make his conqueſts, whilſt that he reſted at Mecque, which was in the beginning the ſeat of his Empire. In his later daies he made foure captaines, the which he called the cutting ſwords of God, the common ſort tearmed them Amiraux; the which were Ebubezer, whom ſome call Vbequar, others Bubacus or Eubocara; then Homar, Ozmen, and Aly. This laſt was ſon H to Salutaleby, Mahumets vncle. Ebubezer was his father in law; for Mahumet had many wiues, and Ebubezers daughter was called Aixa or Aiſſa. This monſter hauing reigned about ten yeares, hee died at Medinath Al-Nabi, in the houſe of this Ebubezer, of poyſon, as ſome ſay: for hauing publiſhed among other articles, That he ſhould riſe againe within three dayes after his deceaſe, one of his diſciples impatient to attend, and curious to ſee the experience of his doctrine, poyſoned him ſecretly: and ſome ſay, That he kept him 12 daies, and in the end ſeeing that he was dead, and his bodie ſo corrupted and ſtinking, as no man could endure it, this diſciple being forced to retire by reaſon of the abominable ſmel of carrion, and returning ſoone after, he found the dogs had torne it in pieces: wherefore hee gathered the bones together, the which were put in a coffin of yron, and in time cauſed a chappell to be built, vaulted with adamant ſtone, ſo as the cofer being put into it, the vertue of the ſtone drew it vp into the ayre, where it did hang, which ſeemed miraculous vnto the ignorant: yet ſuch as haue trauelled into thoſe countries in our time, ſay there is no ſuch thing now to be ſeene. He had one ſon called Cacin, who died before him, and many daughters, wherof Fatima is famous among the Arabians, as the ſtemme of the royall race of Aben-Alabecy, & was wife to Aly, according to the moſt certaine. Zeineb alſo, another of Mahumets daughters, wife to Ozmen, or (as ſome ſay) to Muhauias (it may be to both ſucceſſiuely) is honoured by this nation, and Muhauias her husband (as the beginning of another royall familie) called Aben-Humeya. There is mention made of Imiculcin and of Nephiſſa, daughters or neere kinſwomen to this falſe Prophet: The ſepulchre of the laſt was found in Caire by Sultan Selym, Emperour of the Turkes in our fathers time, and K in it aboue the value of 500000 duckats in gold coyned, with much other treaſure, which was giuen and carried thither for almes.

Amiraux.

Death of Mahumet.

Cacin, Mahumets ſonne. Fatima and Zeineb his daughters.

Mahumet had decreed, That Aly his couſin german, and ſonne in law, one of the abouenamed Amiraux, ſhould ſucceed him in the realme eſtabliſhed by him: but Ebubezer his father in law, who was rich and mightie, and had Ozmen and Homar on his ſide, brake this ordinance: for he pretended, that Mahumet had gotten a great part of that which he enjoyed at his death, by his means, credit, & wealth, & ſeeing that he died in his houſe, it was reaſon he ſhould be his heire. Ozmen and Homar were nothing diſcontented: for hauing alſo a deſire to reigne, they were more willing the crowne ſhould come to Ebubezer (who they did confidently beleeue would ſoone die, by reaſon of his age) than vnto Aly, who was yong and in the prime of his age. Ebu- L bezer therfore reigned, & was created High Prieſt of the Arabians, otherwiſe called Saraſins, as in the time of the Chriſtian Emperors of the Eaſt, who did willingly entertaine this nation, they were commonly called. The name comes of the country Saracena, in Arabia fœlix, or the happie, in which region, according to the ſame author, was the towne of Saraca, but farre off from theſe other people. Howſoeuer it be, it ſeemeth this name comes from Sara, Abrahams wife, notwithſtanding they auow themſelues to be deſcended from Iſmael the ſon of Agar: but they take no pleaſure ſhe ſhould be termed a chambermaid. Hauing reigned 3 yeares, he died, not without ſuſpition of poyſon: after which time theſe princes entitled themſelues Caliphs, that is to ſay, Gouernors, Rectors, and ſoueraigne Princes, properly heires and ſucceſſors.

Ebubezer Caliph or High Prieſt of the Arabians in the 11 yeare.

Saraſins why ſo called.

Homar Caliph the 14 yeare of the Arabians.

After Ebubezer, Homar held the ſcepter ouer the Arabians, being ſometimes called Haumar, M ſometimes Humar, Hemer & Homer, by writers, to whom is attributed the taking of the towne of Bozra, the chiefe of Arabia, of Damas and of Ieruſalem, and in the end of all Phenicia, Syria, Meſopotamia, and Ægypt. And hauing vanquiſhed Oriſmada or Horſmida, King of Perſia, in battaile, he ſeized vpon that great and mightie kingdome, to whoſe ſuccour then came the Turks from the Caſpian ports and ſtraits, but in vaine: ſo as the name of the Perſians was then ex-

A extinguiſhed, and they were all called Saraſins. He was ſuſpected to be a Chriſtian; for his father Catah was a friend and benefactor to the Chriſtians, whom he drew to Ieruſalem, and for that cauſe built the temple which remaines vnto this day, with other ſhewes of ſuperſtition. Homer being in this eſteeme with his people, he was ſlaine by a ſeruant of his, a Perſian, called Amigira, making his prayers vnto God. This prince was hardie and warlike, and did effect great matters: he raigned ten yeares. He died in the yeare of Chriſt 641, and the 24 of the Arabians raigne.

Ozmen, or Hotman, Aſman and Autumar, for this diuerſitie of names are found in authors, ſonne in law to Mahumet (for they hold, that he was maried to two of his daughters, wherof B it may be Zeineb was one) was the fourth Caliph of the Arabians. There was already growne great contention among this nation, touching matters of religion, it being vaine and without ground, by reaſon of many abſurdities, which did contradict one another: which was no marueil; for Mahumet being ignorant of all learning, could not ſet downe his conceptions with any good method or order; but as they came into his braine he wrot them downe, and neuer peruſed them after: ſo as oftentimes forgetting what he had before ſet downe, preached, or otherwiſe publiſhed, he ordained diuers things which were repugnant and abſurd. Whereunto the people which then followed him, being all giuen to armes, poore, needie, groſſe and ignorant, tooke no good regard, their ſpirit being attentiue to the exterior countenance; and if there were any more ſubtile, force and danger ſtopt their mouthes. But after ſome yeares, C they had more libertie and leaſure to thinke thereof, and to examine Mahumets doctrine which was taught, ſo as they grew into many diſputes. To remedie the which, Ozmen cauſed the papers of the Prophet to be ſought out, whereof they found a great cofer full in the houſe of Aiſſa his widow, with the helpe whereof he cauſed their Alcoran, or Alfurcan, to be compiled, ſhewing himſelfe verie liberall to them that laboured therein. Yet ſome thinke, that this worke was begun by his predeceſſour Homar, and that he did reduce it into a better method, and into chapters.

Ozmen the 4 Caliph the 24 yeare of the Arabians.

Mahumet ignorant of all learning.

Alcoran of the Arabians.

Hucba one of his lieutenants inuaded Africke, and ruined Carthage, ſo as Tunis came then to be well peopled, and ſoone after Cairoan, an hundred miles vp in the countrey, and ſomewhat farre from the ſea, was built, which ſince was a royall ſeat of the Arabians. Muhauias alD ſo who gouerned Ægypt, went with an infinit number of veſſels into Cypres, which iſland he ſpoyled. This Muhauias was the founder of Caire, neere vnto the ruines of the auntient Memphis, the which from a little burrough came to the greatneſſe and ſtate wee haue ſeene it in our fathers time, and by his wiſedome and conduct the eſtate of the Arabians was much augmented. He aſſailed the Romanes armie vpon the confines of Lycia, and put it to rout, ſo as the emperour Conſtant then raigning, was forced to flie in a diſguiſed habit. Muhauias being puft vp with this victorie, he beſieged and tooke Rhodes, beat downe that great Colloſſe of the Sunne, being 70 cubits high, or 80, as ſome write, and ſold the mettall to a merchant Iew, who laded 900 cammels therewith, and carried moreouer out of that iſland, infinit other goodly and rich workes, for it was repleniſhed with ſuch things, as Plinie writes, who E witneſſeth, that there hath beene numbred in it 73000 figures, or ſtatues, and an hundred Coloſſes.

Cairoan built.

Caire built by Muhauias.

Rhodes taken by Muhauias.

After theſe exploits he ſent his armie at ſea to the iſland of Sicile, from whence they were repulſed by Olympius, Exarch or Gouernour of Italie. He himſelfe returned into Syria, and there raiſed a great armie by land, to inuade Capadocia, whither he marched. By theſe high exploits Muhauias was in great reputation among the Arabians, which made him aſpire to the ſoueraigne dignitie, whereunto the death of the Caliph Ozmen ſeemed to inuite him, wherefore he brought backe his armie.

Ozmen dyed in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, the 653 of our Sauiour, and the 36 of the Arabians, being ſet vpon in his palace by the Saraſins, which were of the faction of Ali his F brother in law, they forced him to kill himſelfe, for that hee would not fall aliue into their hands. Some write, that Ali himſelfe ſlew him, by the perſuaſion of Aiſſa Mahumets widow.

The miſerable death of Ozmen

There was great diſſention then among the Arabians, vpon the election of a new Caliph: the competitors were Ali, Muhauias, and Mahumet: Ali obtained it by armes againſt Mahumet, but he was to trie it with Muhauias, who finding himſelfe followed by a great armie of old old ſouldiors, Ægyptians and Syrians, and himſelfe being alſo and expert captaine, hee gaue G him many croſſes for the ſpace of a 11 moneths, ſo as by a common conſent their quarell was put to the arbitrement of Alaſcates and Alaſci, two old men of great reputation among them; who notwithſtanding could neuer agree, ſo as they returned againe to armes, till that Ali was ſlaine by the practiſes of Muhauias, neere vnto the towne of Cufa in Arabia, and there buried: wherefore the place is called vnto this day Maſſad Ali, that is to ſay, the houſe of Ali.

The inhabitants of Cufa and Aratha, did chuſe for Caliph in his place Alhacem, eldeſt ſonne to him and to Fatima, eldeſt daughter to Mahumet, who in his carriage and behauiour repreſented his grandfather by his mothers ſide. Being eſtabliſhed, hee marched with an armie a-ginſt Muhauias, but being one neere vnto another, when as euerie man attended a bloudie H battell, ſuddenly Alhacem, either moued by feare, or pietie, and his natural mildneſſe, came and caſt himſelfe at Muhauias feet, acknowledging him his ſuperiour: ſo as they entred into Cu-fa, the which they did ranſome for a great ſumme of money; and being come from thence to Ietrib, Muhauias ſet the royall diademe with his own hands vpon Alhacems head, and would haue him raigne, which he aſſured himſelfe would not be long, for hee dyed within ſix mo-neths after. Thus Muhauias being freed from all competitors, raigned alone: he was (accor-Muhauias Ca- ding vnto ſome) ſonne in law to Mahumet, hauing maried his daughter Zeineb, as it is likely, liph of the in her ſecond mariage, from which mariage the royall familie of Aben Humeia is deſcended.

ſted the prouinces of the empire, yea and Conſtantinople it ſelfe, but vnfortunatly for the Arabians: for after great loſſes both by ſea and land, Muhauias remained tributarie to Arabians tribu- the Romanes, to whom hee promiſed to pay yearely three thouſand pounds of gold, foure-

the Romanes and Arabians; during the which Muhauias began to trouble the Potentates of his owne ſect, reformed and ſubdued the Perſians, and gaue them Matur for their Go- K uernour.

Mahumets ſect was ſpread farre into the Eaſt, but with great inconſtancie, and mingled but there was nothing but contention and confuſion, without any reſolution: Wherefore there were fiue of the moſt learned men choſen, that is, Boar, Buora, Anoeci, Aterminde, and Dauid, who were enjoyned to gather out of all the volumes (the which as they write would haue laden two hundred cammels) what they thought came neereſt to their Prophets will, which they held the trueth. Theſe being ſhut into a houſe, after they had turned ouer, and L conferred theſe writings, they made ſix bookes of Mahumets doctrine, the which were preſented by them, vnto the king or Caliph Muhauias, who publiſhed them, and by his autho-ritie cauſed them to be receiued, vpon paine of death to any one that ſhould diſpute the con-

After theſe things Muhauias dyed at Damas, an excellent prince, and verie warlike, of an himſelfe king and Caliph, faining to be a Propher; and of his race the Sophies which raigne there at this day are deſcended. The people of Cufa in Arabia, ſeeing the vnworthineſſe of Hizit, choſe Hocem the ſonne of Ali Caliph againſt him; but he was ſlaine by Abdalla the ſon of Hizit, leauing twelue ſonnes, which were, Zemal Abadin, Zemal Muamed, Baguer Muamed, Taguin Muamed, Giafar Cadeneg, Giafar Muſa, Ali Mucerati, Alle Muamet, Taguin Muamet, Halmaguin Alle, Hacem Aſquerin, Hacem Muamed Mahadin, the which are buried in diuers places. The Perſians beleeue, that Hacem Muamed Mahadin alone of all the brethren, is not yet dead, and that he will come one day mounted vpon a braue horſe, to conuert all the world, and to preach the law to all men, beginning with the towne of Maſſad-Ali, where his grandfather was interred, where at this day they keepe a horſe readie for him, the which they lead vnto their Moſquee, when they doe their ſeruice, with torches and and lights in great pompe.

Hocem being ſlaine, and Hizit dead the third yeare of his raigne, Abdalla there raigned: but for that he was a tyrant, they aduanced Maruan to the dignitie of Caliph, betwixt which two the warre continued two yeares: at the end whereof the Arabians held an aſſembly, in manner of a parliament, at Cufa, a towne in Arabia the happie, where Abdalla being depoſed, Abdimelec was choſen in his place, who was verie young, of the race of Aly, and therefore much honoured by the Arabians: For, Ali (as we haue ſaid) was appointed heire and ſucceſſour of the kingdome, by the Prophet Mahumet, whereas Abdalla deſcended from Ebubezer, who had beene an vſurper. There was another nobleman of Arabia, called Dadac, which did bandie himſelfe againſt Abdimelec, and was vanquiſhed by him: but Abdalla did ſtill hold the citie of Damas, and purſued another Caliph which was riſen in Meſopotamia, which country is now called Diarbec. Againſt him Abdimelec ſent a great captaine, a kinſman of his, called Ciafas: who hauing encountred Abdalla vpon the riuer Euphrates, returning victorioully from Meſopotamia to Damas, fought with him, and defeated him, but with great effuſion of bloud. Abdalla being vanquiſhed, thinking to ſaue himſelfe in Damas, hee was kept out by the inhabitants, for his tyrannies: wherefore he fled to Caire, which at that time was not verie great, where they alſo refuſed him the entrie. Being therefore chaſed, and abandoned by all men, thinking to croſſe ouer into Greece, he was ſlaine in a little iſland, whither a torment had caſt him. With him ended the race of the Caliphes of Damas, called by the Arabians, Maraunians, deſcending from Muauia and Ebubezer. Ciafar purſuing his victorie, entred into Damas, and there vſed all the cruelties he could againſt the Maraunians, taking the bones of the Caliph Hizit out of his graue, the which he burnt publikely, and caſt the aſhes into the riuer. Yet one of Muauias deſcendants, called Abedramun, eſcaped, flying into the furtheſt parts of Libia, towards the Weſt Ocean, into Mauritania Tingitana, whither the Arabians were newly come: For all the length of Africk, from Nile vnto the Ocean (except ſome places vpon the ſea coaſt, which were yet ſubject vnto the Romane empire) had beene ouerrun and ſubdued by this nation. There this prince being acknowledged by the Saraſins to be of the race of the Caliphes of Damas, was well entertained and honoured by them: Wherefore taking courage, he erected an Eſtate, and built the towne of Maroc, which was afterwards the head of a great kingdome. He was the firſt which called himſelfe Miralmumin, that is to ſay, Prince of the beleeuers. Abdimelec nor Ciafas purſued him not, being verie farre off, and for that he had limited his deſignes and ambition in thoſe remote parts, not affecting to make himſelfe greater: beſides, the plague, famine, and many ſeditions, but aboue all the attempts of the Romanes, did much trouble Abdimelec, ſo as he was forced to renew a peace with the emperours of Conſtantinople, and make the Arabians againe tributarie to Iuſtinian the 2 then raigning, promiſing to pay him ten pounds of gold, a ſlaue, and a horſe euery day: by reaſon of which peace ſo deerely bought, he conuerted his forces againſt Perſia, whereas one Abdalla Zubir had newly ſeized vpon that region, after that he had vanquiſhed and ſlaine Mutar, who had vſurped it vpon the Caliph Hizit. Abdimelec ſent all his forces againſt this Abdalla, and hauing chaſed him out of Perſia, he recouered that prouince. Then he ſent one of his captaines, called Cagian, to purſue Abdalla, who was retired to Mecque, where hee was beſieged, the towne taken, and Abdalla ſlaine by Cagian, who then burnt the auntient idole, and the temple there.

A grieuous tribute paid by the Arabians to the Romanes.

After theſe things, the Caliph Abdimelec was againe ingaged in warre againſt the Chriſtians, by the treacherie of Iuſtinian, who ſmarted for it: for being defeated with moſt of the Grecians,

Grecians, he was forced to ſaue himſelfe by flight, and was afterwards chaſed out of the im- G

Whileſt hee was buſie in theſe warres, the fame of the ſanctitie and juſtice of Abedramen (who as wee haue ſaid had built Maroc) grew ſo great, as he was held by thoſe Weſterne Arabians for Caliph, and more than a Caliph: and the opinion of his vertues paſſing into Arabia, and throughout all H
the Eaſt, it happened, that dying and leauing his ſonne Vlit ſucceſſour of his goods and good fame, all the Arabians with one generall conſent choſe him for their Caliph in the place of Abdimelec, who dyed in the yeare ſeuen hundred and ſeuen. So the race of the Maraunians raigned againe, which was the poſteritie of Zeineb, daughter to Mahumet, ingendred (as ſome beleeue) on Aiſſa the daughter of Ebubezer.

Vlit Caliph of the Arabians, the 90 yeare of the Arabians, and the 707 of Chriſt. Vlit was the mightieſt of all the Arabian princes, his predeceſſors, raigning in a maner from the Weſtern Ocean, vnto the riuer Indus. He gaue the gouernment of Africk to Muſa, with the title of Admirall, and in a manner abſolute power, all which was ſubject to his empire, except a ſmall portion of the countrey which the Gothes held neere vnto the ſtrait, whereas the towne of Cepta ſtands, the which is now called Ceuta: all the reſt had bin conquered by his I predeceſſors, Caliphs. You muſt vnderſtand, that the Arabians entring into Africke, they brought in Mahumets law, their language and their maners: ſo as the great number of Chriſtians was much decreaſed, but not wholly extinguiſhed, and many goodly churches came to ruine: the African tongue was in a maner loſt, and the Arabian was made common. Yet there
The Arabian tongue common in Africke. is at this day a certaine people found, which haue preſerued the Africane tongue, as the Biſcanes haue done the antient Spaniſh, as ſome hold. They dwel in the mountaines of the kingdome of Sus, about Cap d' Aguer, towards the Weſterne Ocean, and call their language Thamazel, the which differs from the Arabian as much as the Biſcane from the Caſtillan: and the Moors of qualitie in that countrey, learne the Arabic tongue in ſchools, or in courts, that they may be able to conuerſe with them. It hath alſo appeared ſince, that many families haue K

Moreouer, it was ſeene in our daies, that after that the citie of Tunis had been taken by the emperor Charles the 5, from Haradin Barberouſſe, there were many habitations of Chriſtians in that citie, hauing retained, and as it were inherited from father to ſonne, for the ſpace of aboue 800 yeres, the articles of our Faith, not without great admiration of the diuine prouidence, who liued in a ſuburbes without the towne, at the South gate, men much eſteemed L of their kings, and valiant and hardie in the warres. They had a temple ſeperated from the Rabatines Chriſtians in Africk. Moores, who called them Rabatines, and of them the gards of the kings perſon did conſiſt. Theſe Rabatines were afterwards tranſported to Naples by the emperor, that they might be inſtructed in the Romiſh religion.

The wrath of God vpon ſtates for their vices. paſſed into Spaine, as we haue ſaid, againſt the kingdome of the Gothes, whereby there followed a lamentable deſolation: a nation without doubt fatall to Chriſtendome, which had ſhewed it ſelfe rebellious, and to contemne ſo many graces it had receiued: For in that age, ambition and tyrannie did tread all diuine and humane lawes vnder foot, and all good order was peruerted, as well in Eccleſiaſticall as ciuile gouernments. The biſhops did then con- M

A ing ill inſtructed, and corrupted with the ſuperſtitions and traditions of men, could doe no other ſeruice vnto God, but ſet vp Images and altars, ſeeke out the bones of dead Saints, and ſuch other things, little ſeruing to true pietie; thinking the paine they tooke in theſe exerciſes, a good ſatisfaction for all their offences. To conclude, there was then ſo great a confuſion (the which is not yet amended) as God being juſtly offended, gaue ſcope to the furie of the Arabian nation, the which inuaded the Potentates of Chriſtendome with ſuch furie, as in leſſe than an hundred yeares they ouerthrew all the power and riches of the Romane empire, of the Perſians, and of other Eſtates. This was not a paſſage, as that of the Gothes, Hunnes, Lombards, and other nations of Sithia: the which paſſed ſoone away, as an ouer-
B flowing deluge, or if they ſtayed among vs, they ſoone conformed themſelues to humanitie, pietie, and juſtice: but this plague was durable, and did ſtill increaſe; for the Turkes empire at this day is nothing but a remainder of the Arabians, mingled with the Hunnes, from whence the Turkes are come. There remaine few certaine families of that Turkiſh nation which came from the Caſpian ſtraits, in the time of Oriſmada the laſt king of Perſia, who was defeated by Haumar, Caliph or king of the Saraſins, and the which did afterwards vanquiſh them: and yet they grew ſo familiar with them, as after that time the Turkes and Saraſins were reputed but one nation.

Faults in the people.

Admirable effects of the forces of the Arabians.

We haue thought it expedient, for the more light of our hiſtorie, to make this digreſſion and to ſeeke out the beginning of this indomptible power of the Arabians, and to relate the
C ſucceſſion of that Eſtate, vntill their entrie into Spaine vnder the conduct of Tarif, or Tarir Aben Zarca, who defeated king Roderic, as we haue ſhewed in the former booke, where this king dyed, and in a manner all the flower of the nobilitie of the countrey, in the yeare of our ſaluation ſeuen hundred and foureteene, in Iuly, or according vnto ſome, in September.

Returning then to our hiſtorie, we ſay, That the Arabians, or Moores (as wee will tearme them indifferently hereafter) hauing obtained this great victorie, in a realme without forts, it was then eaſie for them to rauage and ſpoile the whole country at their pleaſure, ſeeing there was no force to withſtand them. They diuided their armie into many troups, & at one inſtant aſſailed all the places which they thought to be of any ſtrength. One of their armies went a-D gainſt Malaga, and tooke it: another marched to Cordoua, vnder the conduct of a Chriſtian Renigado, called Mageitard. Tarif with another troup tooke Iaen, then called Mentiſa, which defended it ſelfe to the laſt extremitie; the which he raſed: then he tooke Toledo and Guadalaiara. And paſſing on, hauing for his guide Mugnuza, or Numatius, a Goth, hee came vnto the Aſturies, where he ſeized vpon Gigion and Aſtorga. Returning towards Catalogne, vnder the conduct of Mugnoc, earle of Cerdagne, he made himſelfe maſter of that countrey, and left the earle there for Gouernour. Another armie conquered the countries of Murcia and Granado, but not without reſiſtance: for neere vnto Horiuela there was a cruell battell, the place carries the name vnto this day of the bloudy field, yet the Saraſins were victors. Valencia yeelded after that the inhabitants had beene beaten in field, yet vpon condition, to leaue a temple to E the Chriſtians, which is now that of S. Bartholemew, and was then a colledge of S. Baſil. Among other riches, mention is made of a table of Emeraud, which they carried away, the which was in a place ſince called Medina Talmeid, it is Siguenza, or Medina Zelin. It was rather a certaine kind of Indian Iaſpe, very like vnto an Emeraud, and very common in the Eaſt, whereof they hold, that Catin to be, which is ſo famous at Genua. The greedineſſe of ſpoyle was the reaſon they wanted not any ſouldiors, for all Africk poſted thither. The taking of Toledo was vpon a Palme Sunday, in the yeare 715, by the treacherie of the Iewes, whileſt the Chriſtians were at a Sermon at S. Leocades church in the ſuburbes.

A table of Emeraud.

Muſa Gouernor of Africk, iealous of the fortunat ſucceſſe of Tarif, came himſelfe in perſon into Spaine, and would haue the beſt part of the ſpoile. Afterwards they made war joyntly to-
F gether, notwithſtanding that they were deadly enemies, and took Sarragoſſe & other towns. The reliques of Saints which they had ſo much reuerenced, and worſhipped in ſtead of God, could neither defend the Spaniards, nor ſaue themſelues: for it is to be preſumed, that theſe Barbarians did not bear them any great reſpect, after they had ſeized vpon the ornaments and cheſts of gold or ſiluer, where they had bin kept: yet if you wil beleeue the monks and other their fauourers, they loſt not many, the greateſt part hauing bin preſerued by the care of the Clergie

Clergie, and other deuout men, who tranſported ſome into Fraunce, others into Germanie, England, and other places, where in the time of our predeceſſors they were yet worſhipped.

The Moors were ſeuen yeares in conquering Spaine.

Some authors write, That the Moores were eight moneths about the conqueſt of Spaine, others foureteene, many two yeares; but the moſt probable, fiue yeares: for it is not credible, that ſo great a country, where there were ſo many Chriſtians, and ſo many places of ſtrength, at the leaſt by nature, ſhould fall in ſo ſhort a time into the Infidels power, without any oppoſition: for they maintaine, That in diuers incounters, aſſaults, and ſieges of townes and caſtles, there died aboue ſeuen hundred thouſand Chriſtians. Tarracone among others defended it ſelfe vertuouſly, who ſhewed by their valour, that it was a true auntient Colonie of the Romanes. In the end God hauing decreed to puniſh this people for their ſinnes, and to admoniſh the other profaners of his glorie, it was forced to yeeld.

The leaſt care of conquerors is religion.

All the regions, cities, townes, and caſtles of Spaine, except ſome places in the mountaines of Aſturia, Biſcaie, and Nauarre, were made ſubject and tributaries to the Moores; who had no great care at that time to force men in their religion, but did allow them the exerciſe thereof: and to ſome townes they granted many priuiledges, for that they would not vnpeople the countrey, burthening them with great tributes, which was all they ſought.

The citie of Toledo among others had ſeuen churches granted them for the exerciſe of their religion, which were, S. Iuſte, S. Luke, S. Torquat, S. Marke, S. Eulalie, S. Sebaſtian, and S. Marie. Moreouer, it was granted, that they ſhould haue judges of their owne religion and nation, and be gouerned by the lawes of the kings of Gothes, with other priuiledges. By this meanes the Moores retained an infinit number of Chriſtian families, which liued and multiplied vnder them, elſe Spaine had beene left deſart, for the Arabians could not people it. The Chriſtians which liued among the Arabians, were called Muſarabes (as it is likely) of the name of the Gouernour Muſa, who would bee famous by this conqueſt. Theſe Muſarabes Chriſtians did celebrate their diuine ſeruice, as it had beene vſed in the time of the kings of Gothes, and according to the inſtitution of Iſidorus biſhop of Seuille, or of Leandre, as they had accuſtomed to ſerue God in thoſe times throughout all Spaine, and continued vntill the ſeruice, called Gregorian, or Romane, was brought in, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. This Muſarabic ſeruice, is entertained at this day for a marke of antiquitie, in the chappell of the companie of Chriſts bodie, in the great church of Toledo, and in other places of that citie. They hold it for certaine, that all the Moores and other Africanes which paſt into Spaine, were not of Mahumets ſect, but a good number of them were Chriſtians: For it is not credible, that the Africanes, who were made ſubject vnto the Arabians, a little before their paſſage into Spain, borne and bred in the Chriſtian religion, and vnder Chriſtian princes, ſhould ſo ſoone haue changed their religion: But it is probable, that being newly ſubjected to the Mahumetane kings, many followed their armies whereſoeuer they went, without any ſcruple of religion, although they were Chriſtians, hauing no other end but ſpoile, as moſt ſouldiours doe commonly.

The kings and Caliphes of the Arabians, did not care to force people newly conquered, to change their religion, but ſuffered them to liue with libertie, leaſt they ſhould vnpeople the countrey, and diminiſh the fruits of their victories. And that Africke had preſerued families of Chriſtians, it is verified by experience, as we haue formerly ſhewed. The like was in Spaine, the which notwithſtanding the gouernment of the Moores, did ſtill retaine a great number of Chriſtians, as well borne in the countrey, as others that came out of Africke to dwell there, holding the Moores partie, the which made the enterpriſes of the kings of Leon and Caſtille, and of other Chriſtian princes, more eaſie to be executed, when following the ſteps of Pelagius (who firſt tooke arms againſt the Moors) they began to recouer the country.

Pelagius firſt King of the Aſturians, the deliuerer of Spaine.

Ouiedo. Pelagius firſt Chriſtian king of the Aſturies.

4 PElagius (as we haue ſaid) was the ſoonne of Fafila, Gouernour of Biſcaie, whom Vitiza before he was king had ſlaine, that he might more freely enjoy his vnchaſt wife: After whoſe death Pelagius retired himſelfe into a place of ſafetie in the mountaines, and there was pre-

A preſerued through the fauour of his kinſmen and friends, by the prouidence of God, who had ſo decreed to giue a beginning to the deliuerie of Spaine. They ſay, that the Cantabrians were the laſt people of Spaine, which were made ſubiect to the Roman power; and the laſt alſo that were drawne away, to vndergoe the Gothes yoke: whom notwithſtanding they could neuer ſo ſubiect, as they would euer yeeld to any other lawes and manners, than thoſe that were fit for them. During the Moores conqueſt, it is alſo to be preſumed, that they maintained themſelues in ſome libertie; and in like manner all the other people of Spaine, where as the mountaines, and places of hard acceſſe, gaue them any meanes to defend themſelues. Yet we muſt confeſſe, that they could not altogether aſſure themſelues from that horrible
B inundation; but they eſcaped better then the reſt of the Spaniards which were found in the champian countrey of more eaſie acceſſe. The which is euident, by the report which the Spaniſh Authors make of this Pelagius; ſaying, That after the Moores had raigned fiue yeres in Spaine, he hauing reſolued in himſelfe to giue ſome ſuccours to the afflicted Chriſtians, left his ſecret retraits, and came into the Aſturies of Ouiedo, where there was one Numatius, otherwiſe called Magnuza, by corruption of the language; a Chriſtian by profeſſion, but ſeruing the Moores, and by them made Gouernour of the countrey of Gigion, into whoſe friendſhip and ſeruice he did inſinuate himſelfe. Whereby we may coniecture, that betwixt the Moores and Cantabrians there was ſome commerce, ſome league, and (it may be) ſubiection, yet vpon honeſt and tollerable conditions, by reaſon of the ſtrong ſituation
C of their countrey.

Magnuza a Chriſtian ſeruing the Moore.

As luſt had beene the cauſe of the ruine of the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine, ſo voluptuous deſire made the Moores power decreaſe there. For Pelagius hauing a faire and louely ſiſter in his houſe, this Magnuza grew in loue with her; and fearing he ſhould not obtaine her, ſhe being wiſe, and well bred, her brother being in the countrey, he reſolued to giue him a commiſsion, to goe to the great Admirall Muſa in embaſſade, to Cordoua, during which voyage he forced this Gentlewoman. Pelagius aduertiſed at his returne of what had paſt, notwithſtanding that all might be couered vnder colour of mariage, which Magnuza ſaid he had promiſed to his ſiſter, yet he held this rape and violence done to the contempt and diſhonour of his houſe: but he diſſembled it for the preſent, and when he found a conuenient opportu-
D nitie, he retired himſelfe with his ſiſter into the ſtrongeſt parts of the mountaines of Aſturia, watching meanes to reuenge himſelfe. Magnuza incenſed, for that he had taken her from him whom he loued, and who he ſaid was his wife, and finding his honour thereby intereſſed, he gaue the Gouernors and Commaunders of the Arabians in Spaine to vnderſtand, That Pelagius made attempts againſt their State: wherefore thinking it needfull to preuent it in time, they ſent great ſtore of ſouldiers to Magnuza, to ſuppreſſe him, who had almoſt ſurpriſed him: but it was the will of God that Pelagius ſhould haue intelligence of this ſtorme which was comming towards him: who hauing paſt the riuer of Pionia, he retired into the vallie of Cangas, where he found many wandring Chriſtians, liuing in thoſe places in great feare of the Moores. Whoſe wills he hauing ſounded, and exhorted them to be couragious, and to E fight valiantly for the common cauſe, and to relie vpon the aſsiſtance of God, he found them readie to imploy themſelues for the libertie of their countrey; and moreouer they were ſo affected vnto him, as they choſe him their captaine and leader in this worthie enterpriſe, giuing him then the title of King. And within few dayes the brute of this enterpriſe being diſperſed through the mountaines, the Chriſtians which lay hidden, came vnto him from all parts, ſo as in a ſhort time he found himſelfe ſtrong ynough to defend himſelfe againſt any that ſhould come to aſſaile him. The Moores armie hauing failed at this time, returned to Cordoua.

Magnuza forceth Pelagius ſiſter.

Pelagius purſued flies into the mountaines of Aſturia.

Pelagius choſen king of the Chriſtians diſperſed.

We may well coniecture, that Pelagius was of the Gothick race, yet the Spaniards denie it, hauing no forcible argument, but that the name of Pelagius was not vſuall among the Goths; and they maintaine, without any other prooſes, That he was deſcended of that countrey by F long ſucceſsion, wherof we can ſpeake nothing aſſured: But whatſoeuer he were, that honor is due vnto him, as a valiant Prince: for although it ſeemes that he was forced to take armes for the priuate iniurie done vnto his ſiſter, and himſelfe; yet he ſhewed great diſcretion, that he could wiſely ioyne the publick cauſe with his priuat intereſt, and purſue the reuenge of the one and the other, by all the iuſt meanes which opportunitie and the eſtate of their affairs did allow.

Garcia Ximines firſt King of Sobrarbre, deliuerer of Spaine.

Sobrarbre. 5 AT that time ſuch as had retired, and preſerued themſelues in the Pyrenees, Nauarre, and the high countrey of Arragon, began to ſtirre; who choſe Garcia Ximines for their head, being a noble houſe among the Gothes, although the name ſeemes to ſome to contradict that opinion: who in the beginning gathered together 600 reſolute men, with the which he did great exploits, as the Spaniſh Authors ſay; who report, That after he had recouered Ainſa from the Moors, & giuen them a great defeat, he tooke for the royall Armes of Sobrarbre, a red croſſe planted vpon an Oke in a field; or, for that ſuch a ſigne had appeared vnto him during the conflict before the which he caried only a field of gold. Theſe were the beginnings of the realmes of Ouiedo and Nauarre, or Sobrarbre, as it was then called, about the yeare Anno 716. 716, and according to the computation of the Spaniards Æra 754, or as ſome ſay, 718, and 756, the Moores being Lords and maſters of all the good townes in Spaine.

Moores. In all places held by the Moores, there were many Chriſtians, retained by their mildneſſe, and the loue of their naturall countrey, which contented themſelues to liue tributaries: to whom the Chriſtian religion was allowed, wherein they had beene bred, and to celebrate that forme of ſeruice which had beene inſtituted by Iſidore, or Leandre, Biſhops of Seuile. Theſe Chriſtians, as we haue ſaid, were called Muſarabes, and their ſeruice Muſarabic. The forme of their Maſſes and ceremonies is deſcribed by Vaſee and others, to whom we referre the curious reader. Whileſt that Vrbain, who had beene choſen Biſhop of Toledo, liued, he was carefull of his flocke: but aboue all he had a care to tranſport the reliques of his church to Ouiedo. Frodoaire Biſhop of Eccia, and Euatius Archdeacon of Toledo, were famous for their learning and integritie, with Iohn Biſhop of Seuile, who tranſlated the Bible into the Arabian tongue. The Arabians hauing ſetled their affaires in Spaine, and prouided for the ſafetie of their places and forts, Muſa and Tarif prepared to repaſſe the ſea, being called home by Vlit, great Miralmumin, or Miramamolin, to giue him an account of their conqueſts, and gouernment. Wherefore they left the gouernment of Spaine to Abdulazis, the ſonne of Muſa, who kept his court at Seuile, and there maried the widow of king Roderigo Egilone: and to Alcaman a captaine of the Moores, there were great forces giuen both of horſe and foot, to goe againſt Pelagius, who gathered ſouldiers together in the mountaines of Aſturia. This Alcaman led Oppa, or Olpa, ſometimes Archbiſhop of Toledo, in his companie.

Ouiedo. Pelagius in the meane time fortified himſelfe, and being aduertiſed of the Moores approaching, he marched towards them with his troupes, and came & lodged at mount Auſeba, and ſeiſed vpon the ſtraits and paſſages thereof; where hee attended with a thouſand choyce Chriſtians, hauing diſpoſed the reſt (which were leſſe aſſured, and worſe armed) vpon the top of the rockes and eminent places, as he thought it fit, to annoy the Moores, if they came on.

Oppa Archbiſhop of Seuile, an Apoſtat. He was firſt ſolicited by the Archbiſhop Oppa, to lay aſide armes, and to ſubmit himſelfe to the mercie of the Muralmumin Vlit; aſſuring him that he ſhould bee well intreated both in his goods and honour. That if he ſhould perſiſt in his rebellion, he ſhould conſider into what miſeries he plunged himſelfe, and what ſmall likelihood he had to make head againſt the great power of the Arabians, whom the force of all the Gothes could not reſiſt. Which perſuaſions Pelagius did vertuouſly reiect, ſo as comming to fight, God aſſiſted him, and gaue him victorie ouer this multitude of Barbarians, of whom there were ſlaine (as they write) aboue twentie thouſand vpon the place: not without ſome miracles in the furie of the fight; for they ſay, that the arrowes which were ſhot againſt the Chriſtians, returned againſt the enemies themſelues. Alcaman the Generall of this armie was ſlaine there, and no man knew what became of Oppa. This admirable victorie was the firſt teſtimonie which God gaue the afflicted Chriſtians of their reſtauration, the which Pelagius obtained in the yeare 718, Muſa and Tarif being not yet imbarked, but they parted ſoone after, leauing the reuenge of this loſſe to Abdulazis.

A notable victo- of the Chriſtians againſt the Moores.

A Tarif got the ſtart, and arriued at the Court of Miralmumin Vlit, before Muſa, whom he accuſed of many abuſes and exactions; and did ſo incenſe the Prince, as Muſa at his arriuall was not onely diſgraced, but condemned in a great fine, ſo as he died for griefe. His gouernment was giuen to Alahor by Vlit, or by his ſucceſſor Zuleima, otherwiſe called Zulcimin: for they ſay that Vlit died in the ſame yeare 718. Alahor hearing of the defeat giuen vnto the Moores by Pelagius, had a conceit, that it happened by the fraud or trecherie of Cont Iulien, and the children of Vitiza: whereupon he put them to death, and did forfeit their goods. Abdulazis, who held Seuile, being importuned by his wife, who was grieued, that from being a Queene ſhe was now become the wife of a Viceroy, or Gouernour of Spaine, B tooke vpon him the title and Royall Diademe, againſt the cuſtome of the Arabians: but it laſted not long; for in the third yeare of his raigne he was ſlaine in a church as he was at his prayers, by certaine Arabians, which had conſpired againſt him, being perſuaded that he was become a Chriſtian. His wife was alſo ſlaine.

Zulcima eleuenth Caliph.

After him Aiub raigned, who changed the royall ſeat from Seuile to Cordoua: ſome Authors ſay it was his ſucceſſor Alahor. He built againe the towne of Bilbilis, which had beene ruined; and called it by his name Calat Aiub. The Saraſines were growne ſo proud, as not contenting themſelues with the conqueſt of Spaine, they attempted to paſſe the Pyrenee mountaines, and inuaded the Gotick Gaule, which is at this day called Languedoc, all which they conquered in a manner, euen vnto the Alpes. And, whileſt they fed themſelues with C hope to become Maiſters of all Gaule, they neglected the affaires of Aſturia, and the enterpriſes of Pelagius: who hauing woon great honour by the victorie which he had obtained, he found himſelfe fortified in a ſhort time with a great number of Chriſtians, which came vnto him from all parts, yea out of thoſe townes which were held by the Moores: Wherefore he neither loſt time nor opportunitie, but taking occaſion when they were buſied in their other warres, he tooke Leon from them, going on ſtill in his courſe. This was in the yeare 722. Then he left (as the Spaniards ſay) the Gothes Armes, and carried a Lion gueules in a field argent, which are at this day the Armes of Leon: Yet he called himſelfe King of Ouiedo, without any other title. Yet it is not verie certaine, that theſe Armes of a Lion gueules were firſt of all carried by Pelagius; but it is without all queſtion, that the Lion which is in the D Armes of Leon, hath no reference to the name of the towne, which was in old time called Legio. Among others which had followed Pelagius in diuers incounters which he had againſt the Moores, there was a Nobleman of Biſcaie, of the bloud royall, deſcended from Ricarede, named Alphonſus, ſonne to one Peter gouernour of Biſcaie, or Duke, as they were then called, who, it is likely, was ſubſtituted in the place of Fafilla, ſlaine by Vitiza. To this Alphonſus (for that he was wiſe and valiant, and had drawne many good offices from him) hee gaue his daughter Ormiſinde in mariage; from whom and this Alphonſus are deſcended the kings of Leon.

Alphonſus a Biſcain ſonne in law to Pelagius, the ſtem of the kings of Ouiedo and Leon.

On the other ſide there was ſome alterations in Nauarre, whileſt the Moores were buſie in Languedoc, and other parts of Gaule, ſo as Garcia Ximines laid the foundations of his prin- E cipalitie or kingdome, in theſe mountaines. The hiſtories of Arragon attribute the honour of the beginning of this royaltie to their countrey, calling it the kingdome of Sobrarbre, the which are mountaines at this preſent in the confines of Arragon: But we find that this Garcia was Lord of Ameſcua and Abarſuſa, places neere vnto them, where as the towne of Eſtella was afterwards built. There were other enterpriſes made in Cattelognia, & elſwhere.

Nauarre or Sobrarbre.

After Aiub, Alor, or Alahor, ſonne to Abderramen, was Viceroy of Spaine, about the yeare 719, and the Æra 757: who ſhewed himſelfe rigorous to the Moores and Arabians, who had firſt taken and ſackt Spaine: whom he intangled in diuers accuſations, that he might ſpoyle them of the wealth which they had gotten. So as, if the Chriſtian Spaniards were puniſhed, thoſe which puniſhed them had no great content of the aduantage which God had giuen F them ouer his people. To Zubeima the Caliph, there ſucceeded in the yeare 719, two of his nephewes, Homar the ſonne of Abdimazir, and Izit, or Gizit, the ſonne of Abdimelec: but Izit died ſoone after, and Homar raigned alone; who ſent Adam the ſonne of Melic into Spain for Gouernour, who (as they ſay) made the bridge at Cordoua. We haue ſaid (according to the opinion of many graue Authors, well informed of the diſpoſition of the Arabians) that it is a nation which hath euer beene enemie to reſt, and to all good lawes and policie, the which

According to their naturall diſpotion, thoſe which inhabited Spaine, made hauocke of all things by their robberies and theſts: whereupon this Viceroy Adam puniſhed many of them by pecuniarie fines, and thereby made himſelfe partaker of their ſpoyles. They ſay he exacted the fift part of their ſubſtance: the which he did alſo of the inhabitants of the townes and caſtles of Spaine, which he tooke by force, and the twentieth part of them which yeelded willingly vnto him. He died at Tortoſe, returning from the ſpoyle of Tarraſſone. At that time the Sarraſines made great conqueſts in Gaule; they tooke Narbone, and beſieged Toloufe, vnder the conduct of Zama, who was ſlaine there. Eude, a Goth, a nobleman of Biſcaie, Duke of Aquitaine in the right of his wife, kindled this warre, and perſuaded Muniza, a Moore, making warre in Languedoc, to rebellion againſt Abderramen; giuing him a H

By reaſon wherof he was aſſailed by Abderramen, beſieged, and taken in Cerdagne, and his head ſent with his wife into Africke. Abderramen purſuing his victorie againſt Eude, defeated him neere Arles, and gaue him another rout about Bourdeaux, ſpoyling and burning all the countrey betwixt the Pyrenees & the riuer of Loire: Yet in the end they concluded a peace, the Moore fearing the French whom he had incenſed by theſe ſpoyles.

Anno 725. Euclid Caliph. Izit died in the yeare 725, whom Euclid his ſonne ſucceeded, and was vnfortunate. During whoſe raigne, Eude Duke of Aquitaine, being threatened by the French, who raigned in Gaule, to whom he was ſuſpect: and fearing their power, he called in againſt them that great multitude of Arabians, and Sarafines, which were defeated in Touraine by Charles I Eude drawes the Moores into Spaine, & then betrayes them. Martel; which ſome affirme, were aboue foure hundred thouſand men, who notwithſtanding were betrayed, and abandoned to the ſlaughter, by Eude, hauing ioyned with Martel the day of the battell, and turned his forces againſt them who were come, by his perſuaſion, to inhabit Gaule. Their Generall Abderramen gouernour of Spaine, was ſlaine there, with aboue three hundred thouſand Arabians. This memorable battell, which ſaued Gaule and the

Iahea 6 Viceroy. Moores. Adaiſa 7. Hiemen 8. Autuman 9. Albatan 10. Euclid ſent Iahea into Spaine for Viceroy, who gouerned two yeares, and was the ſixt, reſiding at Cordoua. To Ishea Adaiſa Alcazazin ſucceeded, a raſh inconſiderate man, and therefore ſoone depoſed: whom Hiemen ſucceeded, who liued but ſix monethes; and then Autuman was aduanced, but he died within foure monethes after. Albatan followed him, who was cruell and inhumane, by reaſon whereof he loſt both gouernment and life, by the commaundement of the great Emperor or Caliph, Euclid, hauing gouerned Spaine two moneths only. It may be it was in his time that the children of Eude Duke of Aquitain deceaſed, being

one. The ſons of Eude were Hunola, Vifar, and Aznor. The head of the Moores in this expedition, were Athin and Amorrhee: Athin was defeated by Charles Martel, and being chaſed out of Auignon, he fled to Narbone: where being beſieged, Amorrhee comming out of Spaine to raiſe the ſiege, he was alſo defeated with all his armie, and purſued and ſlaine neere to Colible, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Charles Martel purſuing his victorie, committed greater ſpoiles then the Sarraſines and Infidels had done. Athin ſaued himſelfe in Spaine, and hauing afterwards paſt into Africk, he died at the ſiege of Tanger.

Ouiedo. An. 735. This yere of Chriſt 735 king Pelagius died at Cangas, leauing to ſucceed him his ſon Fafila, and his daughter Orſuinde, or Ormiſinde, the wife of Alphonſo of Biſcaie, one after another; hauing raigned 19 yeres, or 17 according to the moſt certaine. His wife was called Gaudieuſe. M
They were interred in the church of S. Zulalia of Valania.

Fafila ſecond King of Ouiedo.

Vertue is not alwaies hereditarie. 6 Fafila ſonne to Pelagius, ſecond king of Ouiedo, raigned onely two yeares. He was not ſo carefull as his father, to aduance the Chriſtians Eſtate in Spaine. The Moores in like maner

A ner did not arme againſt him, for they were much troubled with the French warres. Wherefore this king giuing himſelfe to the pleaſure of hunting, more then was fit for his eſtate (not yet ſetled) was ſlaine by a Beare, which he purſued in the mountaines, being abandoned by his followers: Which ſome hold was in the yeare 737, but Garibay ſayes, that there is a great errour in the computation of theſe yeares. He was maried to a Ladie called Froleua, and they are both interred at S. Croix neere to Cangas.

After the death of Alhatan gouernor of Spain, Manes ſucceeded, who continued not long: Moores. then Mahumet, who liued but two monethes: After him Abderramen, who gouerned three yeares; who being dead, Abdemelic ruled Spaine foure yeares, who puniſhed ſome pettie ty-
B rants, and hauing drawne a new people out of Africke, he filled the townes that were made deſolate by the aboue mentioned defeats. He was chaſed out of his gouernement by Ocha, who held it fiue yeares: then Abdemelic returned, and gouerned a yeare and a halfe, in whoſe place Alcataran was gouernour: who ſeeking to free Spaine of many ſtrange ſouldiers, who were entertained then by the Caliph, he was ſlaine by them: So as the gouernment was vſurped by Aben Hax, who was preſently ſet vpon by the children of Alcataran; who hauing vanquiſhed him, he died within 15 dayes after: and then there grew great diuiſions and troubles in Spaine; to ſuppreſſe the which, the Emperour of the Arabians ſent Zubeir with great forces, who pacified all theſe diſſentions, and contented the mutined ſouldiers with great entertainments: to ſatisfie the which, he tooke from the Chriſtians (which liued vnder the ſubiec-
C tion of the Moores) the third part of their goods. This gouernour Zubeir meaning to enter into Gaule, was preuented by the king of the French, who it ſeemes was Pepin, and defeated beyond the Pyrenees. He alſo ſent a captaine againſt D. Alphonſo the firſt, king of Ouiedo: but he was vanquiſhed by the Chriſtian armie; and in this battell were ſlaine all the Arabian ſouldiers which had murined. After Zubeir, Abderramen came to gouerne Spaine: then Iber Vzit, who liued little, and to him ſucceeded Abubacar, but he was ſlaine there, and in his place Rodoan gouerned at Cordoua. It was the ſeat for the generall Gouernor of all Spain, of whom depended all other Gouernors, Captaines, or Admiralls.

Alphonſo, the firſt of that name, and third King of Ouiedo.

7 Alphonſo called the Catholicke, ſonne to Peter, Duke or Gouernour of the Cantabrians, Ouiedo. or Biſcains (of the Gothes race) deſcended from king Ricaredo, ſucceeded Fafila in the kingdome of Ouiedo, in the right of his wife Orſuinde or Ormiſinde, daughter to Pelagius, and ſiſter to Fafila, in the yeare of Chriſt 737, and of their Era 775. It is likely this was the firſt Anno 737 woman which did inherit the Crowne in Spaine, vnleſſe Alphonſo were choſen king by the Spaniards, the which is credible: for the right of ſucceſſion was not then in vſe among thoſe people, in regard of kingdomes. It is likely the name of Catholicke was giuen to this Alphon-
E ſo, by ſome writers, for that he was a deuout Prince, and verie curious to inrich temples: yet the title of Catholicke which is giuen to the kings of Spaine at this day, comes not from him, The ſurname of Catholicke. the which we know was granted by Pope Iohn the eighth, vnto king D. Alphonſo the third; and by Pope Iulio the ſecond, vnto the king D. Ferdinand the fift, in the time of our fathers, for ſome conſiderations which we will hereafter ſhew. This prince was warlike, and tooke from the Saraſines the townes of Lugo, Tuy, Aſtorga, and a great part of old Caſtille, the ſecond The conqueſts of king Alphonſo the firſt. yeare of his raigne: then Porto, Beia, Flauia, Ledeſma, Zamora, Cimancas, Duegnas, Saldagne, Miranda, Segobia, Oſme, Auila, Sepulueda, Birbieſca, and all the country of Bureba, Braga, Vila, Salamanca, and others, which at this day belong to Portugal, Leon, Caſtille, & Nauarre; reſtoring the Biſhops to their auncient ſeas, cheriſhing the Clergie, and making libra-
F ries in many parts of his countrey: he alſo tooke the towne of Pampelone in Nauarre. All which conqueſts he made, the Moores being not onely buſied in the warres of France, but in ciuile diſſentions among themſelues; being alſo fauored & receiued by the Chriſtians which were the inhabitants in many places, whom they called Muſarabes, liuing tributaries vnder the Moores. In his time Cixila was Biſhop of the Muſarabes of Toledo, a holy and learned Biſhops of Toledo in the time of the Moores. man, as they ſay, who ſucceeded Vrbain, & after him Peter, ſurnamed the Faire, gouerned that church.

Moores. The eſtate of the Arabians was full of troubles after the death of the Miralmumin Euelid, G being in contention for the gouernment: in the which Gizit the third was ſlaine, and Hizes his ſonne remained Emperour, who raigned a yeare: After whom Maruan, of the race of Humeia, raigned ſix yeares. But there grew great ciuile warres by reaſon of theſe diuiſions, the Anno 753 which in the end ruined their Eſtate. In the yeare 753 Touba was ſent to goueme in Spaine, a ſouldier, and a man of worth; but he liued onely a yeare. Ioſeph was ſubſtituted in his place, a great enemie to the Chriſtians: who hauing beene vnfortunate in his warres againſt king Fruela, who ſlue aboue 50000 of his men in two battels: he was diſdained by the Moores in Spaine, who called in Abderramen to rule ouer them.

Three Sunnes ſeene in Spaine. At that time there were three Sunnes ſeene in Spaine, and for the ſpace of two yeres there H fell not any raine from heauen, which cauſed a great dearth of corne, and of all other things: and ſoone after king Alphonſo died. Some hold that this king was the founder of the towne of Ouiedo built. Ouiedo, whereof he intitled himſelfe king: others ſay it was Pelagius; and ſome make it more auncient. He raigned 19 yeares, and liued 64, and was buried with his wife in S. Maries monaſterie at Cangas. They held him for a Saint, and they ſay, that at his funerall there were voices heard ſinging in the aire, this verſe in Latine; Ecce quo modo tollitur iuſtus, & nemo conſiderat, ablatus eſt à facie iniquitatis, & erit in pace memoria eius: Behold how the iuſt man is taken away, and no man conſiders it; he is taken from the face of iniquitie, and his memorie ſhall reſt in peace. He had three ſonnes by his wife Ormeſinde; Froila, who ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Ouiedo, Vimaran, and Aurelius; and one daughter Odeſinde: he had alſo one ſonne I called Mauregat, by a concubine.

D. Froila fourth King of Ouiedo.

Anno 756. 8 IN the yeare 756 Frotla was king in the place of his father Alphonſo. They attribute to Prieſts forbidden to marie. him, as a holy ordinance, that he did forbid the Clergie of Spaine to marie, the which they had vſed, and it may be abuſed ſince the raigne of Vitiza, and had made them ſubiect to the decree of Pope Gregorie the firſt, and the Councell of Rome. This act is written of him as good and holy, although in many other things he ſhewed himſelfe cruell and wicked. Ioſeph K gouernour for the Moores being in armes againſt him, and hauing ſpoyled the confines of A great defeat of Moores. Gallicia, they came to battell, which Froila woon: he ſlue 54000 Moores, and put the reſt with their Commaunder to a ſhamefull flight.

Nauarre or Sobrarbre. Garcia Ximines, who (as we haue ſaid) had begun a principalitie or royaltie in Sobrarbre, tooke to wife a Ladie of a noble houſe, called Iniga; by whom he had one ſonne, called Garcia Inigo. He intitled himſelfe king of that countrey: wherewith the Nauarrois being diſcontented, they abandoned him, and ioined to the king of Ouiedo. The firſt occaſion which the Chriſtians (inhabiting in the mountaines of Nauarre and Arragon) tooke to erect an Eſtate, and make head againſt the Moores, was of an aſſemblie at the interment of an Hermit which liued in the rockes neere vnto Iaca. This Hermit was buried in the place whereas afterwards the L monaſterie of S. Iohn de la Pegna was built, the which at the firſt was a Colledge of Chanoins. Garcia Ximines raigned 42 yeares, and left his pettie kingdome to Garcia Inigo his ſonne, to whom the Nauarrois ſubmitted themſelues againe: but Froila raigning in Ouiedo, forced them by armes to returne to his obedience.

Ouiedo. Froila maried the daughter of Eude Duke of Aquitaine, called Menine, or according vnto ſome, Momerane; by whom he had two ſonnes, Alphonſo, called the Chaſt, and Bermond, or Veremond, both which raigned, although that D. Bermond was made by the Clergie: and moreouer he had a daughter by her, called D. Ximina, who was mother to Bernard of Carpio. Title of Dom firſt vſed. This king did firſt vſe the title of Dom, which the king and all the Noblemen of Spaine haue euer ſince obſerued. What the furious deſire of raigne is, and with what iealouſie kings are M Froila murthers his brother. often tormented, Froila ſhewed by the cruell parricide of his brother Vimaran, whom he cauſed to be ſlaine through iealouſie, ſeeing him to be a gallant Knight, and generally beloued for his good parts; yet he repented the fact, but too late. For ſatisfaction whereof, they write, that he adopted the ſonne of Vimaran, called Veremond, to ſucceed him in the kingdome: the which hath bred ſome doubt, whether this Veremond (which came to the Crowne in the fourth

A fourth place after Froila) were the ſonne of Vimaran, or of Froila himſelfe; who ſoone after was alſo ſlaine by his other brother Aurelius, in reuenge of the death of Vimaran, hauing raigned eleuen yeares and a halfe, or thereabouts.

Moores. Abderramen vſurpes the Soueraignetie in Spaine.

9 During the raigne of this king, the Arabians of Spaine diuided themſelues wholly from the Caliphes of Damas, vnder Abderramen, who chaſed, and in the end ſlew the Gouernour or Viceroy Ioſeph, made himſelfe king and Miralmumin or Miramomelin, and held Spaine with that title 33 yeares, not acknowledging the Emperor or Caliph of Damas in any thing. This was in the yeare 757 of our redemption, and 138 yeares after the Moores deſcent in Spaine; by reaſon of the diuiſion of the ſoueraigne dignitie of the Arabians in the Eaſt: for againſt

B Maruan, who had ſucceeded Hizes Caliph of the Arabians at Damas, there had riſen many tyrants, whereof he puniſhed ſome, but Aſmulin vanquiſhed him. This was of the race of Mutar, who had raigned in Perſia, and followed his ſect, maintaining that Ali had beene the true Prophet, and greater then Mahumet: he commaunded then ouer the Coraſenes, a people in Perſia: He was aduiſed by Cataban his friend, to procure the ſlaues throughout all Perſia to kill their maſters, and to rob them; the which they did, and came rich with their maſters ſpoyles to Aſmulin. Soone after being impatient of eaſe, they diuided themſelues into two ſects, the Caiſmes and Lamonites; Aſmulin taking part with the Lamonites, defeated the others, and with his victorious bands aſſayled Iolin, Gouernour of Perſia, vnder the Caliph Maruan, whom he vanquiſhed, and Maruan alſo, who came againſt him with aboue three

The reſt of Maruans familie and followers were diſperſed in Africke, where they erected the kingdome of Fez, and ſome paſſed into Spaine, which might be that race of Abderramen, of whom we here intreat; who notwithſtanding Vaſee affirmes was baſely deſcended: and Garibay on the other ſide ſayes, that he was iſſued from the race of Aben Humeia, and from Zaineb the daughter of Mahumet. His father was called Moabia, and his ſeat was alſo at Cordoua: he brought his armie before Valence, which reſiſted him, and tooke it. They ſay, that the bones of S. Vincent were worſhipped there, and that many families among theſe Chriſtians, ill inſtructed, fearing the comming

D of this Sarracene king, diſlodged, and carried theſe relickes into the woods and mountaines, which lye betwixt Valence and the mouth of the riuer of Guadiana: and hauing paſſed vnto that point which in old time was called the holie Promontorie, they were encountred by a Moore of Fez, called Alibouz, who rauaged the countrey of Algarbe; he ſlew theſe men, tooke their children priſoners, and left S. Vincents bones vpon the field, where they were afterwards found, and thereof this Promontorie was called Cap S. Vincent.

Whence cape S. Vincent in Algarbe tooke the name.

The Almightie God (although that he had deliuered his Church into the hands of Barbarians and Infidels, by reaſon of the prophanation of his name, and that the Spaniards made little vſe of their chaſtiſements) maintained alwaies ſome light of the Goſpell among them, raiſing vp men, who entertained ſome order and ſhew of Chriſtianitie, and had the Scrip-

E tures and their ceremonies throughout all the towns of the Moores juriſdiction. They make mention of Verus Biſhop of Seuile, at that time a learned man, and of a good life. Cixilas was Archbiſhop of Toledo, to whom PP. Adrian (as the Spaniſh Authors ſay) did write a letter, blaming the cuſtome of the Chriſtians in Spaine to eat fleſh on Saterdayes; wherefore they made an order, not to eat any that day but the entrailes, head, and feet of beaſts, the which hath beene ſince obſerued.

D. Aurelius fifth King of Ouiedo.

Ouiedo. An. 767.

F D. Aurelius ſucceeded his brother D. Froila in the realme of Ouiedo, hauing ſlaine him in the yeare 767. notwithſtanding that, he left a ſonne called D. Alphonſo the chaſt, with other children: but the hatred which the noblemen of the countrey did beare vnto his father, was the cauſe of his reiection, being then alſo verie young: whereby it appeares, that the right of ſucceſſion was not in thoſe dayes practiſed in Spaine. This Prince was politicke, and of an actiue ſpirit, yet not giuen to armes: wherefore he made a peace with the Moores, ſo as during his raigne they did not attempt any thing one againſt another. The G bondmen in his countrey being mutined againſt their maſters, and in armes, they were ſuppreſt by the wiſdome of this king, and reduced to their firſt condition of ſeruitude. They report a ſhamefull and abhominable thing of him among Chriſtians, That in his capitulation with Abderramen to haue a peace, beſides that he made himſelfe his tributarie, he promiſed among other things, to giue euerie yeare to theſe Barbarians a certaine number of virgins, yet Vaſeus doth attribute it to Mauregat. He married his ſiſter D. Odeſinde or Vſende, to a renowmed knight called D. Sillo: and hauing raigned ſix yeares and ſix moneths, this king D. Aurelius died. All theſe kings were in a manner buried in the towne of Ianguas, which many write Cangas: We doe not find that he had either wife or children. H

D. Sillo, ſixt King of Ouiedo.

An.774. 11 D. Sillo his brother in law, and his ſiſter Vſende or Odeſinde, obtained the kingdome of Ouiedo, in the yeare 774.

Aznar firſt Earle of Arragon. 12 In Arragon there was an Earle called Aznar, riſen in armes: ſome hold, that he was ſonne or grandchild to Duke Eude of Guyenne, who comming to ſerue D. Garcia Inigo king of Sobrarbre, tooke Iaca, and obtained of him in gift the countrey which lyes betwixt the two riuers, called Arragon, with the title of Earle or Gouernour: dying, he left two ſonnes, I Galinde and Ximen Garſes.

Ouiedo. As for D. Sillo, the beginning of his raigne was troubleſome, many refuſing to obey him: wherefore to aſſure his eſtate, he renewed the peace with the Arabians in Spaine, and ſubdued his rebels by a victorie which he got of them vpon the mountaine of Zebrero in Gallicia. In the end, ſeeing that he had no children, he reſigned the charge of affaires to D. Alphonſo the chaſt, nephew to his wife, and to her, giuing himſelfe wholly to a contemplatiue life.

Moores. In his time the noblemen Arabians enjoying the townes and prouinces of Spaine, vnder the Miralmumin Abderramen, impatient one of another, according to the naturall diſpoſition of this mutinous nation, they fell to warre among themſelues: Abubatar Deuiſfer, K and others, had chaſed away Ibnaballa of Saragoſſe, who is alſo called Abi Arabi, who called in Charlemaigne king of France to his aid, and he entred into Spaine with a great armie, beſieged Saragoſſe, tooke it by compoſition, and ſetled Ibnaballa in his Seigniorie, making the noblemen Moores that were his neighbors, his tributaries. Among other conditions accorded betwixt Charles and the Moores, it was ſaid, that they ſhould ſuffer (others ſay heare) the preachings of the Chriſtians, the ſeruants of God.

The French drawne into Spaine by the Moores diuiſions.

D. Garcia Inigo, ſecond King of Sobrarbre or Nauarre. L

Nauarre or Sobrarbe. 13 IN this growing kingdome of Nauarre, D. Garcia Inigo had ſucceeded his father Garcia Ximenes in the yeare 758, who raigned 44 yeares. This king enlarged his limits by reaſon of the Moores diſſentions, and tooke Pampelone from them; the which we read was alſo taken about that time by Charlemaigne, king of France: ſo, as it ſeemes, that being readie to come into Spaine to ſuccour Ibnaballa, the pettie king of Sarragoſſe, he would ſeize vpon Pampelone, to aſſure his paſſage; and then hauing reſtored Ibnaballa, and defeated Abderramen, killing aboue 30000 of his Moores, as the Spaniſh Authors report, he demanteled it in his returne into France, ſo as it was eaſie for D. Garcia to ſeize thereon.

D. Mauregat, ſeuenth King of Ouiedo.

Ouiedo. An.783. 14 D. Sillo died in the yeare 783, hauing held the royall ſeat nine yeares and one moneth, and was interred at Ouiedo, in Saint Iohns Church, which he had built,

A built, and was afterwards tranſported to S. Saluador: After whoſe deceaſe, by a generall conſent, the realme of Ouiedo was giuen to D. Alphonſo the chaſt: but his vncle D. Mauregat, baſtard brother to his father, as he had beene vnlawfully begotten, ſo he ſhewed himſelfe in his actions and affections, both to him and the State, without law, without pietie, and without honour: for being deſirous to raigne, he layed a plot with the Moores, and by their aide chaſed Alphonſo his nephew out of the Aſturies and Leon, forcing him to retyre himſelfe into the countries of Alaua, and Biſcaye, where he had many allyes, who preſerued him from the treacherous practiſes of this tyrant. The accord hee made with the Barbarians, to procure ſuccours from them, was villanous, and vnworthie of

B a Chriſtian Prince: for hee bound himſelfe to pay them a tribute contrarie to all law and honeſtie, which was, fiftie virgines of noble families, and as manie of baſer condition, the which hee ſhould ſend yearely; this impure and brutiſh king expoſing thoſe poore Chriſtian creatures, by an expreſſe agreement, vnto the damnable appetite of Infidels: by reaſon whereof he was hated of all men, and (as it is likely) of God alſo. He raigned fiue yeares and fiue monethes, dying without children, and was buried at Prauia. A deteſtable tribute payed by a Chriſtian Prince to Infidels.

This Prince died in the yeare 787, and 170 of the Arabians, leauing eleuen ſonnes and nine daughters. with the which he did enrich the Moſquee which his father had begun at Cardoua, eſpecially with the pillage of Narbone and Girone. In Spaine he ſent a great armie vnto the Aſturies, againſt king D. Alphonſo the chaſt, who refuſed to ſend him that vnworthie and tyrannous tribute of virgines, whereunto king Mauregat the baſtard had ſubmitted himſelfe. He found the Chriſtians in armes neere vnto a Bourg called Ledos or Alado, where they fought with ſuch obſtinacie, as there were ſlaine aboue ſeuentie thouſand Moores vpon the place, with their Generall Muguay, by meanes whereof the kings of Ouiedo and Leon were from that time freed from that villanous tribute. This battaile was woon, whileſt that D. Bermond or Veremond the Deacon yet liued. The Moores were afterwards ſet vpon by the French, vpon the confines of Roſsillon, who did ſuccour and fauour the enterpriſes of D. Alphonſo the chaſt, in Caſtille and Gallicia, Charlemaigne then raigning. Wee read, that the French captaines forced Zato or Saad, Gouernour of Barcelone, to yeeld himſelfe tributarie to king Charles, and to receiue French garriſons into many places of that countrey: as they of Hueſca did alſo, who notwithſtanding freed themſelues ſoone after: for Hueſca lying farre into the enemies countrey, they could not ſo eaſily keepe it as Barcelone, being a ſea towne. There was then a battaile betwixt the French and the Moores in the valley of Curol, at this day Corbiere, in the countrey of Cerdane, which the Moores loſt. This was the firſt Prince of the Moores, which ſet any fleet to ſea in Spaine, hauing rigged forth many ſhips and galliots at Almerie, whereof he gaue the charge vnto a captaine called Mahamet, who ſackt the Iſlands of Maiorca, Minorca, Iuiza, and Sardaigne.

Nauarre.

Don Garcia Inigo, ſecond king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, had ſome difference at the paſſage which they ſay had been made by the French into Spaine, vnder Charlemaigne; for which cauſe Charles demanteled Pampelone, the which he had ſeized on, comming to Saragoſſe. This D. Garcia raigned 44 yeares, and had one ſonne called D. Fortun Garces, who ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Sobrarbre and Nauarre. He lyes at S. Iohn de la Pegna.

Arragon.

An. 795.

17 In Arragon there had ſucceeded to Cont Aznar, his ſonne D. Galinde, ſurnamed Aznarris, in the yeare 795. This Earles ſeat was at Iaca, acknowledging the kings of Nauarre for Soueraignes. We find nothing memorable written of him, but that he was founder of ſome Monaſteries, and built certaine forts, and among others the caſtle of Athares. He had one daughter called Theude, the which he married to Don Fortun, Infant of Nauarre: others ſay, that ſhe was firſt married to one Cont Bernard, a vaſſale to king Charlemaigne, who hauing ſeized on the mountaines of Ribagorſa, did much annoy the Moores. This Earle Galinde had one ſonne called D. Ximen Aznarris, Earle of Arragon after him, and another called Endregot Galinde: D. Ximen died in the battaile which D. Fortun king of Nauarre had againſt the Moores, who were entred into his countrey by the valley of Roncal, and left no children.

Cattelogne.

18 Cattelogne began alſo at that time to haue Chriſtian Earles. It is one of the moſt fruitfull countries in Spaine both for men and all commodities, and theſe Princes haue been alwaies called Earles of Barcelone, without taking any royall title. The name of Cattelogne is drawne diuerſly by writers: ſome deriue it from the auncient Caſtellans, which were vpon thoſe marches neere to the Auſetanes: others from a captaine named Catharlot, or Carthalon: others from the Gothes and Alains (people which inhabited there together) and make the word of Gottalania, ſince drawne to Cattalania: others not from the Gothes, but from the Cattes, a people of Germanie, mingled with the Alains: and others will deriue it from the Catalonicians, vpon the marches of Tolouſe. The Chriſtians inhabiting this countrey (after that vnfortunate yeare 714, when as the Moores made themſelues maſters of Spaine) ſollicited Charles Martel, (who then gouerned the French State, and had gotten many victories againſt the Moores) to be fauorable vnto them, and to helpe them to ſhake off theſe Infidels yoake, yea after that there was ſome forme of Eſtate erected by the Chriſtians in Aſturia and Nauarre; the which Martel graunted them, and when as his affaires in France gaue him leaue, he ſent a Germane knight called Otter or Oger Cathorlot, who was Gouernour of Aquitaine, of which countrey Martel had ſeized after the death of Count Eude. This captaine, accompanied with ſome bands of Germanes and French, gathered together ſuch of the countrey as were fit to beare armes, and tooke ſome frontier places from the Moores. Then died Charles Martel in the yeare 741, whoſe ſonne Pepin obtained the crowne of France,

Whence the name of Cattelogne comes.

A France, through the counſell and fauour of Pope Zacharie, about the yeare 750. During all the raigne of king Pepin, the Cattelans maintained themſelues in warre againſt the Moores, with the helpe of the French, without any great aduantage, or notable ſucceſſe, that is recorded; for the hiſtories of thoſe times are rare. After Pepin Charlemaigne raigned, whoſe ſonne Lewis came oftentimes into Spaine by Cattelogne, and there did ſome exploits of armes; as alſo Charlemaigne in perſon, both in Cattelogne, Nauarre, and Arragon: And for that the Cattelans were mingled ſtill with the French, during theſe warres, the Romane tongue which they ſpake (as in a manner all the reſt of the Spaniards) came to be corrupted among them, ſo as they made a diuers language to that which they vſe in Caſtille, not much
B different to that they ſpeake on this ſide the Pyrenees, in Aquitaine and Languedoc. The French made ſuch warre in Cattelogne, as a Gouernor of Barcelone, a Moore, called Zato, yeelded himſelfe vaſſale and tributarie to the Emperour Charles: after whoſe death (for hee kept his promiſe, although he were a Mahumetiſt) Bernard was made Earle of Barcelone, counted by the authors for the firſt, carrying this title, who intitled himſelfe alſo Earle, Duke, and Marqueſſe of Spaine, as it appeares in ſome letters which are found of him in the monaſteries of the country, in Ribagorſa, and at Saint Peters of Tauerna.

Bernard firſt Earle of Barcelone, ſubiect to the French.

Alphonſo, ſecond of that name, ninth King of Ouiedo, called the Chaſt.

Ouiedo. An. 795.

19 IN the Aſturies of Ouiedo, the yeare 795, D. Alphonſo was ſole king, without companion, D. Bermond being dead. He was called the chaſt, for he liued holily and chaſtly, without the companie of any woman, although he were married to a Ladie called Berthe; a liberall Prince to the poore, and greatly fearing God, aboue all a friend to Monks, and a great builder of Couents; yet notwithſtanding all theſe things, he was wiſe and valiant. He had (as we haue ſaid) one ſiſter, called D. Ximena, who ſeeing them careleſſe to marrie her, ſhe contracted her ſelfe ſecretly to Don Sandias, Earle of Saldagne, who was of good yeares; for he was aboue 29 yeares old when as the king D. Froila their father died: of which marriage
D came a ſonne called Bernard del Carpio. King D. Alphonſo (who thought his ſiſter ſhould haue beene chaſt like himſelfe) was verie much diſcontented at this marriage, and hauing cauſed Don Sandias to come to the town of Leon, whither he had called the noblemen of his realme, he condemned him as a traitor, to end his daies in perpetuall priſon, in the caſtle of Lune, hauing put out his eyes, he cauſed his ſiſter to be put into a Monaſterie of Nunnes, and yet he gaue order that the infant Bernard ſhould be nouriſht in Aſturia as his owne ſonne, who afterwards proued one of the wiſeſt knights of his age, but not verie fortunate. They attribute to this king the building of the chiefe Church in Ouiedo, called S. Saluator, yet others affirme it was the worke of king Sillo. But howſoeuer it were, D. Alphonſo did augment it, and enricht it with diuers jewels, yea with relickes which had beene tranſported from Toledo, E and other places, whereof this Church was the ſtore-houſe: moreouer, with a croſſe of gold, which they ſay had been made by two Angels, the which preſented themſelues vnto the king D. Alphonſo in the habit of pilgrims.

A ſecret marriage ſeuerely puniſhed.

20 To this is added the finding out of the Sepulchre of the Apoſtle S. Iames, neere vnto Iria, by the Biſhop of that place, called Theodemir, at the relation of two men, which the Hiſtorie of Compoſtella in Latine calls perſonatos, that is to ſay, masked, who ſaid they had ſeene Angels and torches about the place where his bodie was found, in a coffin of marble, in a wood, in the yeare 797, whereat the Spaniards themſelues do much wonder, ſeeing they find no mention in their Hiſtories of S. Iames Sepulcher in Spaine, in all the time which paſt ſince his death vnto the raigne of this Alphonſo: no not in the time of Miron, the firſt Chriſti-
F an king of the Sueues in Gallicia, who firſt erected the king of the Gothes that were Chriſtians, nor yet ſince. It was reuealed at that time by ſuch apparitions to Theodemir, who belieued it to be the verie bodie of S. Iames, and ſo perſuaded the king D. Alphonſo, who was wonderfull ioyfull thereof, and built a temple, endowing it with great reuenewes, taking this manifeſtation for a ſinguler fauour of God. The Spaniards haue ſince made him their Patron and Protector of their Countrie, calling on him in all their neceſſities eſpecially in the the warre. Neighbour Princes were amazed at this relicke: for we read, that Charlemaigne (in whoſe time D. Alphonſo began to raigne) being aduertiſed of this inuention, poſted thither, and afterwards obtained from Pope Leo the third, ſitting at Rome, That the Epiſcopall Sea of Iria ſhould be remoued to Compoſtella, vnder the Metropolitane of Braga, from the which it was ſince exempt, as wee will ſhew hereafter. In king Alphonſus time, and (as ſome thinke) when Charlemaigne was in Spaine, there were two Councels held againſt Elipand Archbiſhop of Toledo, and Felix firſt Biſhop of Vrgel, and their followers, infected with Neſtorius hereſie, who imagined a double perſon in Ieſus Chriſt, as he conſiſts of two natures, diuine and humane: for this cauſe Elipand is not in the catalogue of the Archbiſhops of Toledo: Felix had tryed in vaine to draw vnto his error Odeſinde widow to king Silo.

Moores.

Halihatan fourth king of the Moores: Warre betwixt him and his vncles.

An. 799.

21 Ahizmen Hizen or Ixeca, Miralmumin, deceaſed in the yeare 794, hauing raigned ſeuen yeares and ſeuen moneths; to whom ſucceeded Halihatan his ſonne, who either for ſtate, or for feare and diſtruſt, had an ordinarie gard of fiue thouſand horſemen, part Chriſtian renegado's, part Eunuches. In the yeare 799 Zuleema and Abdalla his vncles hearing of the death of Hizen, came out of Africk into Spaine (from whence they had beene chaſed) to trie if they might enter into Toledo, whereas Zuleima had raigned: they came to Valence, and armed themſelues with the forces of that towne, and ſo went to field, giuing them of Toledo to vnderſtand (whom they knew to be affected vnto them) of their comming, and deſigne: who acquainting other Moores therewith, they tooke armes for Zuleema, chaſing all ſuch out of the towne, as they thought oppoſite vnto them, and then they did aduertiſe Zuleima how that all went well for him; who preparing himſelfe to goe to Toledo, was encountred by the armie of Halihatan his nephew, by the which he was defeated and ſlaine, this yeare of 799. Abdalla fled, but afterwards conſidering that he had no meanes to rayſe his decayed fortunes, he came and yeelded himſelfe to his nephewes mercie, who receiued him, and vſed him honourably. So Toledo fayled the ſecond time to be made a royall ſeat, by the defeat and death of Zuleima: yet the inhabitants finding themſelues guiltie, would not truſt Halihatan, but maintained themſelues in their rebellion, for the ſpace of nine yeares. Halihatan being vnable or vnwilling to trie his forces againſt ſo great and well fortified a citie, ſought in the meane time to win them by all mild and friendly meanes. Among others, he imployed about this reconciliation a Moore, who was a knight, and borne at Toledo, yet then reſident at Hueſca, and Gouernour of thoſe marches: who being come into the citie with letters from king Halihatan, wrought ſo wiſely, as in a ſhort time the Toledanes returned to the kings obedience, to whom there was promiſed aſſurance, and forgetfulneſſe of all they had done; but there was nothing obſerued: for this Hambroz, to abuſe the Toledanes, ſaid, That he would not remaine in the caſtle, for feare to be ſurpriſed by the kings men, which arriued dayly, but cauſed another lodging to be aſſigned him, in a ſtreet called Moutichel, neere vnto S. Chriſtophers Church, in the which he made a caue vnder the ground, to murther them that had rebelled againſt the king. In the meane time, Halihatan vnder colour to make warre againſt the Chriſtians, and to ſuccour the frontier, cauſed his forces to approach neere the towne, vnder the commaund of a ſonne of his called Abderramen, the which by the means of Hambroz entred quietly into Toledo, and without any ſhew to doe harme. Abderramen lodged with Hambroz, where ſhewing a good countenance to the chiefe of the Toledanes, Moores, he inuited a great number of them to a ſtately feaſt which he had prepared for them. As theſe Moores came one after another, thinking to make good cheere, they were preſently layd hold on, and beheaded, by ſome that were appointed to that purpoſe, and then caſt into the vault. There had beene many diſpatcht in this manner, when as one of the gueſts which was inuited, diſcouering ſome bloud, grew amazed, and ſuddainely ſlipt out, and gaue an alarme to the towne, crying out, that they murthered the citizens in Hambroz lodging. The Toledanes being terrified with theſe newes, and hauing no meanes to make reſiſtance, and without any captaine to lead them, found no better expedient then to crie out for mercie, but it was in vaine: for then they purſued them openly, ſo as there was aboue 5000 ſlaine, to puniſh their offence committed againſt Halihatan; againſt whom, they of Cordoua being alſo rebelled, he cauſed 300 of them to be hanged vpon the riuer ſide: there was a captaine called Abdelcarin appointed for this execution, who a little before had ſubdued Calaorra. Halihatan growne proud with this

A this ſucceſſe, ſent his captaines to annoy the Chriſtians frontiers, who entred into Gallicia in the yeare 812, where he was vnfortunat in many encounters, by the prouidence of king D. Alphonſo. The like happened to Ores, Gouernor of Merida, who was defeated neere vnto Benevent in the territorie of Leon. The yeare after 813, another Moore called Alcama, Gouernor An. 813. of Badaios, layed ſiege to Zamorra, but he was forced to retyre. Not content with this, two armies of Moores entred into D. Alphonſo his countrey, in diuers places, againſt the which he oppoſed 2 armies; the one led by himſelf, the other by Bernard del Carpio his nephew, who was growne of good yeares, in both which he was victor; ſo as the Moores did forbeare for a time to annoy the Chriſtians, and fell to ſpoile one another: whereupon a great nobleman among
B them, called Mahomad, came out of the quarters of Merida, to ſeeke refuge of king D. Alphonſo, for that he was violently purſued, and could find no ſafetie in all the Moores countrey. D. Alphonſo entertained him, and aſſigned him rents to liue on in Gallicia: but he ſhewed himſelfe ingratefull & trecherous, raiſing a great armie by the intelligence he had with other Moores, to inuade the countrey of his benefactor: but they were readie in time to reſiſt him, and gaue him battaile, where there died aboue 50000 Moores. Mahomad their Generall being taken, was beheaded as a traitor. At that time Marſil or Maſsile, ſucceſſor to Ibnaballa, raigned at Saragoſſe, who was at the battell of Ronceuaux, where the French were defeated. It is certaine, as Authors write, that this battaile was giuen in the time of D. Alphonſo the chaſt, but the yeare is doubtfull, yet they hold it was a little before the death of Charlemaigne, who died a-

22 If that which the Spaniards write be true, it is moſt certaine, that among theſe Princes ambition went before, and religion followed after. D. Alphonſo hauing liued chaſtly, being ſorrie that he had no children, and for that he had receiued great aid from the Emperour Charles, and it may be preſumed, that ſo mightie a Prince was moſt neceſſarie to reſtore Spaine to her beautie, and the Chriſtians to their former poſſeſſion, or elſe for ſome other conſideration, he had a determination to make him heire of his eſtates after his death: but the Nobilitie of Spaine hauing notice thereof, did not allow it, refuſing to be vaſſales to any forraine Prince: yet D. Alphonſo had by his letters and embaſſages giuen great hope thereof vn- Ouiedo.
to Charles, who affected it, and had appointed the realmes of Ouiedo and Leon for Bernard, Charlemaigne made heire of Ouiedo, and afterwards reiected.
D ſonne to his ſonne Pepin, and did prepare himſelfe to come vnto Alphonſo, vnder colour of ſuccouring him againſt the Moores, but he had newes from him, that he was forced by his Earles and Barons to recall it, and therefore he entreated him to forbeare his comming: the which Charlemaigne taking for an affront, reſolued to force him by armes, to performe his promiſe: wherefore he raiſed a mightie armie of French, Germanes, and Italians, which were vnder his Empire, and ſent it beyond the Pyrenees, led by his beſt captaines: yea, ſome (who haue not duly conſidered the age of Charlemaigne, who was then 72 yeares old) ſay, that he was there in perſon; whereof the Spaniards being aduertiſed, they made a league of all the Chriſtian Potentates, of Gallicia, Leon, Arragon, Nauarre, and others, and of ſome Princes of the League of Chriſtian Princes and Spaniſh Moores againſt the French.
Moores, to whom the gouernment of the French in Spaine was ſuſpected; among the which E was Marſil of Saragoſſe. All theſe forces joyned together, ſtopt the paſſages, and forced the French to returne into their countrey, but with great diſaduantage and diſorder, through the ſtraits of the mountaines, whereas the Spaniards hauing ſeized vpon the paſſages, the foreward and battaile of the French were defeated, and their baggage taken, with ſuch ſlaughter, as they write there were aboue 40000 men ſlaine that day: among the which was Roland, Defeat of the French at Roncenal.
and all thoſe whom fabulous writers call Peeres of France, with other great perſonages.

In this action, the valor and good conduct of D. Bernard of Carpio, nephew to D. Alphonſo, was admirable, as alſo in his warres againſt the Moores, as the Spaniards write, who was for a long time held for the kings ſonne, and he himſelfe beleeued it: but being aduertiſed of his parents, and of the calamitie of the Earle of Saldagne his father, he made many petitions vn-
F to the king, and vſed all the means he could to moue him to pardon the injurie which he pretended had beene done him, and to free him after ſo many yeares impriſonment; the which he could not obtaine: wherefore being diſcontented, he retyred from Court into his country of Saldagne, where he ſhewed himſelfe as much as he could an enemie to king D. Alphonſo.

G

D. Fortun, third King of Nauarre.

Nauarre. *An.*802. 23 DVring the raigne of this king of Ouiedo and Leon, D. Fortun was the third king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, who came vnto the Crowne in the yeare 802, after the deceaſe of D. Garcia Inigo his father. He was not onely to make head againſt the Moores, but alſo againſt the French, who ſpoyled his countries of Nauarre and Arragon, as well as thoſe of the Mahumetiſts: for ſouldiours hold nothing holie, but that which is barren, and yeelds no bootie. During the raigne of this king was that famous H defeat at Ronceuaux, where he was with his Nauarrois, and other confederates, for the Spaniſh partie, where the French hauing beene defeated and ſtripped of their baggage, they afterwards did all they could to annoy Spaine. This king was married to Theude, daughter to D. Galinde, by reaſon whereof he did inherite (as ſome ſay) the countrey of Arragon: yet this vnion of Arragon and Nauarre is not receiued by all Authors, but is referred to a later time, and there are memorials found of other Earles in that countrey, after D. Galinde.

Of this marriage came the infant D. Sancho Garces, ſucceſſor in the realme of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, to D. Fortun his father, whom it may be this Theude had had to her ſecond husband: for ſome Authors ſay, that ſhe had beene formerly married to one of Charles I his captaines, and of his bloud, called Bernard, not he which gouerned Cattelogne. D. Fortun had great warres againſt the Arabian Moores, to whom, with the Arragonois, and other his allyes, he gaue battaile, at a place called Olcaſſa, or Olaaſt, in the which died D. Ximen Aznaris Earle of Arragon, brother to D. Theude, the which ſome maintaine did happen vnder D. Sancho, ſonne and ſucceſſor to D. Fortun, who was vanquiſhed and ſlaine by Muſa Aben Cacin or Heazin, king of Saragoſſe. The Chriſtians woon this battaile of Olcaſſa, by the valour of them of Roncal, who had for a teſtimonie thereof, the title and priuiledges of Gentrie, which they enjoy at this day.

K

D. Sancho Garces, ſixt King of Nauarre.

*An.*815. 24 D. Fortun hauing raigned thirteene yeares died, and there ſucceeded him, in the yeare 815, his ſonne D. Sancho Garces, who continued the warres againſt the Moores with good ſucceſſe. There is mention made of a battaile he woon againſt them, in the yeare 821, neere vnto Ochauiere; in the which the inhabitants of the valley of Roncal behaued themſelues ſo valiantly, as they deſerued a new confirmation and enlargement of their priuiledges of Nobilitie. Theſe people although they were ſubjects of Nauarre, yet they leuie an annuall tribute of the French, their neighbours, by an ac- L cord made in old time. It is a place vnder the juriſdiction of Sangueſſe, ſituated in the Pyrenee mountaines of Nauarre, confining vpon them of Val Breton, which are of France, from whom they exact three Cowes euerie yeare, on the third day of Iune, with certaine ceremonies obſerued of old time. Some thinke this tribute grew by reaſon of the warres which this king had with the Gaſcoines and French, who being incenſed with the Cont of Ronceuaux, did vſually inuade the territories of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, who after they had beene vigorouſly repulſed by him and his ſucceſſors, they were forced to make the abouementioned peace, and doe the homage.

Arragon. 25 In Arragon, D. Ximen Aznar, the ſonne of D. Galinde, hauing commaunded with the title of Earle (a gallant knight, who died in the battaile of Olcaſſa, following the par- M tie of D. Fortun Garces of Nauarre, or elſe in the ſeruice of D. Fortun his ſonne, about the yeare 803) to him ſucceeded his vncle, called D. Ximen Garces, notwithſtanding that he had a brother, whoſe name was Endregot, whether it were by force, or otherwiſe, the Hiſto- Diuers Earles of Arragon. ries make no mention. This D. Ximen Garces liued little, he was wiſe and valiant, and was ſlaine

A ſlaine in an incounter againſt the Moores. After him D. Garcia Aznaris was fift Earle of Arragon, who alſo did not long enjoy his eſtate, and was ſlaine fighting valiantly againſt the Moores in Spaine. D. Fortun his ſonne did inherite the Earledome of Arragon, who imployed himſelfe valiantly in the warres againſt the Moores: he died without any ſonne, ſo as Arragon was then vnited to Nauarre, by the meanes of D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fortun, or as ſome write, of D. Endregot Galinde, who was married to D. Garcia Inigo, ſecond of that name, king of Nauarre, ſonne to Inigo Ariſta, the which was the firſt woman which did inherite this Countie of Arragon, and brought in a cuſtome, that the women ſhould ſucceed. Succeſſion of women in Arragon.

B 26 Another Bernard, of whom we haue made mention, who intitled himſelfe Earle of Barcelone, Duke and Marqueſſe of Spaine, gouerned Cattelogne, about the yeare 796, for the French, after the death of Zato the Moore, being their vaſſale and tributarie. He had beene Gouernor of Prouence and Languedoc vnder the Emperour Charlemaigne. In Cattelogne he made ſharpe warres againſt the Moores, wherein he was aſſiſted by a Spaniſh knight called D. Geoffrey, the hairie, which ſucceeded in the gouernment of Barcelone. This Geoffrey was Lord of the caſtle of Arria, in the territorie of Conflent, and Countie of Barcelone; with the helpe of which D. Bernard he tooke from the Moores all the countrey which lyes betwixt the two riuers of Noguera and Lobregat: but after the death of Charlemaigne, a Gouernor of Guienne, called Aymon, hauing rebelled againſt the Emperor, Lewis his ſonne C and ſucceſſor, beſides the hurt he did in that Prouince, entred into Cattelogne, and tooke townes and caſtles, being fauoured by Abderramen king of the Moores at Cordoua: and in the yeare 820, theſe rebellious French and the Moores hauing joyned their forces together, they came and beſieged Barcelone. Cattelogne.

27 This Abderramen, ſecond of that name, had ſucceeded his father Halihatan, who died in the yeare 819, and of the Arabians 202, hauing raigned 24 yeares, who of many wiues, which Mahumets law doth allow, had left 19 ſonnes and 21 daughters. This warre of Cattelogne was one of Abderramens firſt exploits, in the which Barcelone was taken in the yeare 820, but ſoone after recouered by the Chriſtians. Moores.

In the yeare 824 died Don Alphonſo the chaſt, hauing inſtituted for his ſucceſſor D. Ramir, D ſonne to D. Bermond or Veremond the Deacon, rejecting D. Bernard of Carpio his ſiſters ſonne, who was his lawfull heire. This Prince raigned 29 yeares, and was buried at Ouiedo, in S. Maries Church, which he had built. He was a great benefactor of the Clergies. Wee find a donation made by him to the Church of Compoſtella, of about a league of ground about S. Iaques ſepulchre, but the date of theſe letters are of the yeare 835, which agrees not with that which Authors write of the death of this king. Ouiedo. An. 824. Letters of donation ſuſpect.

28 D. Ramir was ſonne to the king D. Veremond, called the Deacon, and adopted by D. Alphonſo his vncle, a generous and worthie Prince, and not inferior to any of his predeceſſors in vertue. In the beginning of his raigne he married a Ladie, called D. Vrraca, borne in old Caſtille, of which were borne two ſonnes, D. Ordogno who raigned, and D. Garcia. This king did that which all other Princes abhorre, for he receiued his ſonne to be a companion with him in the kingdome, and cauſed his brother D. Garcia to raigne with him, ſo as there were two courts and two kings in Ouiedo and Leon. The firſt warre which troubled this king was ciuile, by the rebellion of a nobleman of Aſturia, called Nepotian, againſt whom D. Ramir aſſembled his armie, in the towne of Lugo, and being come to battaile, he vanquiſhed him, F and put his men to flight: himſelfe being taken ſome few dayes after, had by the kings commaundement his eyes put out, and was put into a cloiſter of Monkes; an vſuall puniſhment in thoſe dayes for traitors and rebels. Ouiedo. Two brothers kings in one kingdome, and agree well; a rare example. A rebell puniſhed.

In this kings time, the fame of the miracles which S. Iaques did at Compoſtella, began to be ſpred ouer all Europe, ſo as many pilgrims came thither both by ſea and land, from all parts of Chriſtendome: but about the yeare 827, the coaſts of Gallicia were annoyed with Nor- An. 827.

great ſlaughter: thoſe which remained, recouered their ſhips, and came into the mouth of Guadalquibir, where hauing landed, they ſpoyled Seuile, and the countrey thereabouts, and then returned into their countrey. This king D. Ramir was troubled with another ſedition:
Aldered and Piniol, two Earles of his countrey, being riſen in armes againſt him in the yeare
An. 828. 828, againſt whom he marcht with his armie, tooke theſe two rebels, ſlew Piniol, with his H ſeuen ſonnes, confederates of his rebellion, and cauſed Aldered's eyes to be put out, and caſt him into priſon.

Moores. Abderramen Miralmumin of Spaine, had continued long in peace with D. Alphonſo, king of Ouiedo and Leon: but ſome yeares after his deceaſe, he had a deſire (for that he had had ſome good ſucceſſe againſt the Chriſtians in Spaine, and alſo at the perſuaſion of Idriz, who raigned then in Fez) to demaund of king D. Ramir the tribute of a hundred virgines, which king Mauregat had promiſed to pay to his predeceſſors, kings of Cordoua: the which was denied, as vnjuſt and vnworthie, by a generall conſent of the Prelates and Nobilitie of the countrey, aſſembled to this end in the towne of Leon; where by the ſame meanes there was a warre concluded againſt the Moores, to abate their pride. King D. Ra- mir hauing then called all the Nobilitie of his countries of Aſturia, Leon, Gallicia, and o- I who by the will of God reſumed courage in ſuch ſort, as the next day they preſented themvictorie, and that he himſelfe would be in the battaile, as Patron and Protector of his kingdome: and they affirme, that the armies being joyned the next day, S. Iaques appeared againe, couraging the Chriſtians as he had promiſed. Such apparitions will be receiued according to euerie mans pietie and good inſtruction. There are yet at this day found heads of darts and of launces in the place whereas D. Ramir obtained this victorie: by fauor whereof, he tooke Calaorra from the Moores, with other places along the riuer of Ebro; but L they returned ſoone vnder the dominion of the Moores, whoſe commaund was great at that time in Spaine.

Ouiedo. After this victorie, D. Ramir being at Calaorra with his brother D. Garcia, the Queene D.
Vrraca, and the infant D. Ordogno, being accompanied with the chiefe Prelates and Noblemen of the countrey, it was held fit to acknowledge the fauour and aſſiſtance, which they did beleeue S. Iaques had done them. Wherefore this king being perſuaded either by his dreames, or by his Prieſts, ordained, That all ſuch as dwelt about Compoſtella ſhould pay yearely a certaine meaſure of corne and wine to that Church, out of their reuenues, for the vow, for ſo this tribute was called; the which is payed at this day. Moreouer, that after any victorie

In

A In Cattelogne, the Chriſtians being much oppreſſed by the Moores, vnder the Miralmumin Abderramen the ſecond, the Emperour Lewis the gentle ſent an Abbot to comfort them: for he could ſend them no ſouldiors (ſay the Spaniards.) This Abbot was called Elizachar, who encouraged the Chriſtians in ſuch ſort, as Abderramen returning to the ſiege of Barcelone, accompanied with Cont Aymon, they found ſuch reſiſtance, as they were forced to abandon it, about the yeare 830. Bernard being much eſteemed for his valour, he was called home by the Emperour Lewis, who made him his Chamberlaine, and graunted him then (as ſome ſay) the title of Earle of Barcelone, and for this cauſe is accounted the firſt Earle of the Cattelanes: but it appeares elſewhere, that he had this title of Earle, yea of Duke and Marqueſſe long before, the which was nothing but Gouernor of the Countrey, or Prouince. Cattelogne.

D. Ximen Inigo, fift King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

39 TO D. Sancho Garces king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre (who died, as ſome report, in an encounter of the Moores, led by Muſa Aben Cacin, pettie king of Sarragoſſe) ſucceeded his ſonne D. Ximen Inigo, in the yeare 832. Of the deeds and manners of this king the Hiſtories make no mention, yea many Authors paſſe ouer theſe firſt kings of Sobrarbre, and begin the Hiſtorie of this Kingdome with D. Inigo Ariſta, who came afterwards to the Crowne. They hold, that D. Ximen is interred in the Couent of Saint Sauior of Leyre, with D. Nugna his wife. Nauarre.

D. Ordogno, eleuenth King of Ouiedo.

30 D. Ordogno, which is as much to ſay as Fortun, ſonne to D. Ramir, came vnto the Crown of Ouiedo and Leon, in the yere 831, according to the common opinion. Being entred into the gouernment of the State, he had warre with ſome people of the mountaines of Cantabria (which are not ſpecified) whom he vanquiſhed, and brought vnder his ſubjection. Ouiedo. An. 831.

D He married a Ladie called D. Monadona, or Munia Donna, that is to ſay, Donna Nugna, by whom he had fiue ſonnes, D. Alphonſo, who was king after him, D. Bermond, D. Nugno, D. Odoaire, D. Fruela, and one daughter. He did enlarge and beautifie the buildings of the townes of Leon, Aſtorgo, Tuy, Amaya, and others.

They make mention of a miracle in his time, in the perſon of a Biſhop of Compoſtella, ſucceſſor to Theodoric, and ſecond Prelate of that Church, named Ataulphe; who being accuſed of Apoſtaſie, and that he had reuolted from the Chriſtian religion to that of the Moores, being called to Court to purge himſelfe, he came to Ouiedo vpon a holie Thurſday, when as they did bait a Bull with dogs, hauing an intent to expoſe the Biſhop to the furie of this beaſt as ſoone as he ſhould arriue. But the Biſhop hauing ſaid Maſſe (as the Storie reports) attyred in A miracle.

E his Epiſcopall robes, came boldly to the kings palace, and paſſing by the place where they did hunt this Bull, as he ſaw him comming towards him, he opened his armes to take him, relying in God and his owne innocencie: but the beaſt came quietly vnto him, and ſuffred him to take him by the hornes, who led him vnto the king: whereat the king and all the aſſiſtants were ſo amazed, as they did preſently judge that he had beene wrongfully accuſed. But this holy man leauing his Church and flocke, retyred himſelfe into the deſerts, there to liue with beaſts, and became a Hermite. Of this Buls hornes they afterwards made relickes in the Church of S. Sauior at Ouiedo. Siſenand ſucceeded in his Biſhoprick, and was ſo vehement to purſue the puniſhment of ſuch as had falſely accuſed Ataulphe, as he neuer ceaſed vntill he had gotten a

F graunt from the king, that all their kinsfolkes ſhould be deliuered for ſlaues to the Church of Compoſtella, although they were not guiltie.

31 About the beginning of this kings raigne, there were great ciuile diſſentions among the Moores. A nobleman among thē, a Goth by nation, but a Moore by profeſſion, called for this cauſe Muſa Aben Cacin, that is to ſay, Muſa of the linage of the Gothes, rebelled againſt Abderramen Miralmumin. He raigned at Sarragoſſe, & drew to his partie Hueſca and Tafalla, and by his example he cauſed thē of Toledo to take armes, being ill affected to Abderramen, by reaſon Moores. Muſa Aben Cacin makes himſelfe king of Toledo.

of the rigours which his father Halthatan had vſed againſt them. This Moore fortified with theſe townes, rayſed a great armie, and cauſed a ſonne of his called Aben Lope or Lath, to enter into Toledo, and then to ouerrun the countries of Nauarre and Cattelogne; and ſo paſſed the Pyrenees, into the territories of the French. At his returne he cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed King and Miralmumin of Spaine, and tooke a towne belonging to the king D. Ordogno, called Albayda, fortified it, and put a garriſon into it: but his furie was ſtayed by D. Ordogno, who came & beſieged Albayda, and then with part of his forces he went to encounter him, as he aduanced to ſuccour the beſieged, fought and vanquiſhed him, killing 12000 horſe Moores, and an infinit number of foot, with Garcia ſonne in law to Muſa; he himſelfe eſcaped, being wounded in three places. The ſpoyle of this armie was great, and Albayda returned to the Chriſtians: After which rout, Lope who had beene left Gouernour at Toledo, made a league with D. Ordogno, the which he faithfully maintained both in warre, and all other things during his life. This Lope is numbred for the third king of Toledo, being a Moore. D. Ordogno did ſoone after aſſayle Ceyt, Gouernor of Coria, and Muſeres or Micaudi of Salamanca, Moores, whom he vanquiſhed, and tooke their Townes and Gouernments.

Aben Lope king of Toledo.

An. 839. About the yeare 839 Abderramen died, leauing by his wiues 87 children, that is, 45 ſonnes and 42 daughters, hauing held the realme of Spaine at Cordoua twentie yeares. It was in the 222 yeare of the Arabians. This Prince was full of ſtate, and was much pleaſed to make great buildings: he cauſed the places and ſtreets of Cordoua to be paued, and brought a great fountaine thither through pipes of lead, whereof ſome markes are yet to be ſeene about the Cathedrall Church, which was then the Moſquee. He was politicke, and was ſomewhat inclined to juſtice: he reformed the vnjuſt law of the Gothes, by the which the brother did ſucceed the brother, although he had children: he ſuffered the Chriſtians which were vnder his commaund to liue in great libertie, ſo as in the chiefe citie of Cordoua they had many Churches, as that of the Aſcile, Zoilus, Fauſtus, Ianuarius, Martial, Cyprian, Geneſius, and Eulalie. And in the ſuburbes, or neere vnto, there were eight Monaſteries; that of S. Chriſtopher, of the virgin Marie, called Cuteclair, S. Sauueur, Zoilus, Felix, Martin, Iuſtus, and Paſteur. He brought the making of ſilkes, with many other handie trades, into Cordoua: he cauſed money to be coyned with his name thereon.

The qualities of Abderramen 2.

His eldeſt ſonne Mahumet ſucceeded him, who was the firſt Miralmumin in Spaine of that name, and the fift king of Cordoua. Being ſetled, he marcht with an armie into Nauarre, from whence he was repulſed: wherefore he turned his forces againſt Toledo, which was in league with king D. Ordogno. Wherefore the Chriſtians who deſired to abate the power of the Moores, and to keepe them diuided all they could, came to ſuccour the Toledanes, being led by one of the ſonnes of king D. Ordogno: both armies met not farre from the citie, neere vnto the riuer of Guadacelette, but Mahumet had the victorie: there were ſlaine in this battaile 13000 Moores of Toledo, and 8000 Chriſtians; yet all this could not make him maſter of the towne. Mahumet being victor, he cauſed the heads of his enemies to be carried into diuers townes, to ſtrike terror into thoſe that would rebell; for it was the cuſtome of that nation at the change of Princes to ſtirre vp new troubles. This warre continued three yeares, vnto the death of the king D. Ordogno.

33 Cont Bernard of Barcelone liued at this time, much fauored in the Court of the Emperour Lewis the Gentle, not without enuie, eſpecially of ſuch as had had the gouernment of Prince Bernard the ſonne of Pepin king of Italie, in his youth. He was accuſed to haue committed adulterie with the Empreſſe Iudith: whatſoeuer the cauſe were, D. Geoffrey of Arria ſucceeded him in the Countie of Barcelone, in the yeare 839.

D. Geoffrey Earle or Gouernour of Barcelone.

Ouiedo.

In the yeare 841, king D. Ordogno being much afflicted with the Gout, and other infirmities, was withall oppreſſed with griefe for the rout of his men which he had ſent to ſuccour the Toledanes, whereupon he fell grieuouſly ſick and died, hauing gouerned the realme of Leon and Ouiedo tenne yeares. The letters and titles of the Church of S. Iaques of Compoſtella, giue longer liues to theſe kings: for there is one found of king D. Ordogno, of the yere 854, and another of the yeare 862, yea of 874, wherefore there is no great certaintie of the time in the raignes of the kings of Ouiedo and Leon. Theſe letters and titles differ aboue 33 yeares from the common opinion.

D. Alphonſo

D. Alphonſo, third of that name, twelfth King of Ouiedo.

34 ALphonſo the Great, ſonne to D. Ordogno, was but foureteene yeares old, or ten, as ſome ſay, when he began to raigne: a prince endowed with all royall vertues, whoſe life and gouernment was long. His entrie was diſquieted by a knight of Gallicia, called D. Froila Bermudes; who contemning the kings youth, did riſe and ſeiſe vpon the Crowne. D. Alphonſo being retired to Alaua, to preſerue himſelfe againſt this tyrant, as he was buſie to raiſe an armie of his friends and ſubiects, he had newes, that D. Froila being come to Ouiedo, the chiefe towne of the whole realme, to be crowned there, he had beene ſlaine by the Senators and Councellors, which had conſpired againſt him: wherfore he came thither, was receiued, and recouered his realme in peace. Then was there gouernour in Alaua a knight called Eylo, or Zeybon, brother to one Zenon, which ſome Authors ſay, had beene Lord of Biſcaie. This Eylo, as ſoone as Alphonſo was ſetled in his realme of Ouiedo, rebelled againſt him, and drew from him all which the kings of Ouiedo held in that prouince. D. Alphonſo (who was then at Leon) being aduertiſed of this diſorder, marcht with ſuch forces as he could gather readily together, towards Alaua, where his preſence cauſed him to be generally obeyed. He tooke this gouernor and carried him to Ouiedo, where he ended his dayes in priſon. Anno 841 Ouiedo. Tyrannie and vſurpation iuſtly puniſhed.

Mahumet, firſt Moore of that name, raigned then in Spaine; againſt whom the earle of Barcelone made ſharpe warres, but with ſmall ſucceſſe. He ſent an armie againſt the Chriſtians, led by two captaines, Imundar and Alcama, the which came and lodged about Leon, as if they would beſiege it, in the yeare 842. But king D. Alphonſo ſuccoured it, and forced the Moores to retire. In the end of Abderramens raigne there had beene a great perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which dwelt in the Moores countries; whereof their inſolencies and rebellions was the cauſe. They had, as we haue ſaid, libertie of their religion, and they were ſuffered to build Temples and Monaſteries at their pleaſures: their Prieſts and Monkes did freely vſe their ſeuerall habits: They had Iudges and Rectors among them to adminiſter iuſtice, vnder the authoritie of the Mahumetane kings: onely they were forbidden to enter into the Moſquee, and not to ſpeake ill of their Prophet Mahumet. They payed tributes, the which were ſometimes augmented, as neceſſitie required, or according to the paſsions of their kings. Whereupon many Chriſtians tooke occaſion to murmure, and to make bitter complaints, the which did incenſe the Moores. Some Chriſtians of more iudgement exhorted the reſt to patience, foreſeeing the miſchiefe, but it was in vaine; yea Accafred a Biſhop, and Seruand an Earle, who were of theſe moderators, were condemned by a Councell, and are blamed by the Authors of Hiſtories, who haue made no ſcruple to put in the number of Martyres thoſe rebells which periſhed in this maſſacre, the which was great, and continued ten yeares, for an aduertiſement to all others, not to riſe againſt their prince, to whom they are made ſubiect by the will of God, eſpecially for their temporall goods. Moores. Anno 842. The libertie of Chriſtians among the Moors in Spaine.

In the meane time the quarell betwixt this Miralmumin and them of Toledo, continued; and their obſtinacie was ſuch, as Mahumet, ſeeing they would not acknowledge him vpon any conditions, he ſent a mightie armie againſt them, vnder the conduct of his brother, or as ſome hold, of his ſonne, called Almondir, who ſpoyled, raſed, and burnt all that was within the territorie of Toldo, and yet no man durſt make head againſt him, his forces were ſo great. King D. Alphonſo imbracing this occaſion of the Moores diuiſions, being entred into league with the French and Nauarrois, he entred and ſpoyled their countrey. They hold that Bernard of Carpio was chiefe of this armie. Mahumet did aboue all things deſire to ſubdue them of Toledo, the which was a great and ſtrong citie, and therefore hard to be forced: Wherefore he reſolued to reduce it to extremitie of victuals, by a long ſiege, and ſo force them to yeeld. And hauing raiſed a great armie in the yeare 848, he led it himſelfe in perſon againſt the Toledanes, who iſſued out of the towne, reſoluing to fight with him, but it was to their loſſe and confuſion, for they were forced to retire with ſhame; the towne was beſieged, the bridge vpon the riuer of Tayo (the worke of king Hiſem) was beaten downe (the Moores call bridges Alcantara) and all meanes of ſuccours taken from the inhabitants. Wherfore they began D. Alphonſo ſpoyles the Moors country. Anno 848.

began ſomewhat to yeeld, and to talke of a compoſition; wherein they were heard and ſatiſ- G fied: ſo as Mahumet entred the citie with great ioy, hauing reduced ſo great a people vnder his obedience: From whence he ſent ſome troupes to ſpoile the Chriſtians countrey, as far as the riuer of Duero; who were charged, repulſt, and forced to leaue their bootie, by D. Bernard of Carpio, and others. Lope, who called himſelfe king of Toledo, ſaued himſelfe, and fled with his brethren, and Abdalla his ſonne, to the king D. Alphonſo; who receiued them courteouſly, and made ſuch eſteeme of theſe Moores, as he gaue them his ſonne D. Ordogno to inſtruct in armes and ciuilitie. Abdalla made no long aboad there, for being thruſt on with enuie againſt his vncles, he made his peace with king Mahumet, and retired to Cordoua, from whence he made great ſpoile vpon the Chriſtians countrey: but he was incountred and de- H feated at a place called Cillorico, and forced to raiſe his ſiege from Pancoruo with ſhame. Afterwards he came to fight with two Zimaels, the one his vncle, the other his brother, in the territorie of Toledo, whom he vanquiſhed, and tooke priſoners: And as he was of a ſtirring ſpirit, and enemie of all reſt, he drew vpon him both the Chriſtians and Moores, by the ſurpriſe he made of Sarragoſſe, where he maintained himſelfe, notwithſtanding all the forces of Mahumet, who ſent Almundar his ſonne, and Aboaly a captaine, againſt him, with great forces. And although that Abdalla were on the other ſide moleſted with the forces of D. Alphonſo, (who during theſe warres had ſeene the monaſterie of S. Faconde burnt, the which he afterwards cauſed to be built vp againe) yet his poſteritie raigned at Sarragoſſe. Mahumet hauing diſpoſed of this new conqueſt, returned to Cordoua, vnder whoſe commaund Toledo remai- I ned for ſome yeares.

The works of pitie of D. Alphonſo.

After theſe happie exploits the Moores were content to reſt a while, and to ſuffer the Chriſtians to liue in peace, and D. Alphonſo in the meane time gaue himſelfe to works of pietie, according to the inclination and inſtruction of thoſe times. He cauſed S. Iaques church to be new built of free ſtone, and inricht with pillers and other workes: imploying therein part of the ſpoile which he had taken from the Moores; for this church at that time was but of earth. He beſtowed great almes of the poore, and widowes. He was ſolicited by Bernard of Carpio, to deliuer the earle D. Sandias, his father, out of priſon, where he had remained ſo many yeares: but (notwithſtanding all the great ſeruices which he pretended to haue done) he could not Salamanca, where neere vnto it he built a fort, which he called Carpio, of his owne name, from whence he did much annoy the Aſturians, and them of Leon. It was ſituated three leagues from Salamanca, vpon the riuer of Tormes.

D. Inigo Ariſta, ſixt King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

Nauarre. An. 940.

36 D. Inigo, ſurnamed Ariſta, came to the Crowne of Nauarre about the yere 840. Some ſay he was ſonne to D. Ximenes aboue mentioned; others (among the which is Surites the Spaniard) affirme, that he was ſon to the earle of Bigorre, called Simon; and that he L was choſen by the ſuffrages of the men of war, king of Sobrarbre, by reaſon of his vertues and valour: ſo little certaintie there is in antiquitie, eſpecially of the beginning of races and families. The name of Ariſta was giuen him, by reaſon of his vehemencie and heat in war. The Spaniards call a couragious and hardie man Ariſco. He was the firſt of the kings of Nauarre, that was annointed and crowned after the maner of our kings of France, the which was obſerued in the other following kings, although ſome beleeue, that this cuſtome came onely into Nauarre, after they had kings of the houſe of Champagne. The French, among other Chriſtian nations, haue retained it of the ceremonies of the ancient law of the Iewes, by the aduice of their Biſhops. He tooke for his Armes a Croſſe argent in a field azure. During his raigne, and ſome yeres after, the Epiſcopall ſeat of Pampelone was in the royall abbey of S. Saluator of M Leyra, yet holding the title of Biſhop of Pampelone, or of Iruna, by reaſon of the warre and ſpoyle which the Moores made. There is no great certaintie among writers of his deeds, the time of his death, nor of his funeralls, nor yet of his wiues familie, whom ſome call Oneca, which is to ſay, Iniga; others Theude: bringing the one from Pampelone, the other from Biſcaie. It may be he had two ſo named.

D. Geof-

A D. Geoffrey of Arria was earle of Barcelone after the death of Bernard, about the yeare 840, by the liberalitie and grant of the Emperor Lewis the Gentle. He was maried to a French ladie, called D. Almira, by whom he had a ſonne called D. Wiffred, or Geoffrey the hairie, who was the firſt proprietarie earle after his father, but not immediate. Cattelogne was then vnder the ſoueraignetie of France; and there are priuiledges found, granted by king Charles the bauld, ſonne to the Emperour Lewis, in the yeare 844, whereby the inhabitants of Barcelone are made as free as the French, hauing libertie to adminiſter iuſtice, and to liue according to the auncient lawes of the Gothes. This Cont Geoffrey imployed all his meanes to make war againſt the Moores, he attempted the towne of Tortoſa, but in vaine: yet hee tooke from B them, and from the tyrant and rebell Aymon, that which they had vſurped of his gouernment ſome yeares before. He was purſued by a Cattelan knight, called D. Salamon, earle of Cerdagne, who enuied him, and ſlandered him to the king his Soueraigne: wherefore being called to Court, as he was going vpon the way, he was ſlaine in Auvergne, in the yeare 858, according vnto ſome.

Cattelogne.

Cattelogne vnder the ſoueraignetie of France.

Earle of Cattelogne murthered.

During theſe yeres king D. Alphonſo was much troubled with the warre which D. Bernard of Carpio made againſt him, who gaue him diuers routs; ſo as he was forced to leaue the Lions ſkin, and to vſe the Foxes, at the leaſt there was great ſhew of deceit: for the king ſeeing that he could not ſuppreſſe D. Bernard, he offered to releaſe his father, who was now verie old, if
C he would deliuer into his hands his new fort of Carpio: the which Bernard, by a ſingular pietie, did willingly grant, and was readie to deliuer his fort into the kings hands, the which he did preſently raſe. Thoſe which went to the caſtle of Lune, to draw D. Sandias out of priſon, found him dead, as they reported: wherefore Bernard holding himſelfe abuſed, made great complaints vnto the king; but he was commaunded to depart out of the territories of Ouiedo and Leon, and the dependances thereof. Whereupon he retired into Nauarre, and then into France: yet ſome ſay, that he returned into Spaine, and there died, and that he was buried in the monaſterie of Aguilar del Campo.

Ouiedo.

Cruelties of king D. Alphonſo.

Zeno brother to D. Eylo, or Zethon, whom we had confined into Ouiedo, in the beginning of the raigne of this Alphonſo; who being made earle or gouernour of Biſcaie, by the kings bountie, would rebell as his brother had done, forcing the king to ſend an armie againſt him,
D by the which he was vanquiſhed, taken, and led to Ouiedo, where he ended his dayes in priſon. This Zeno left two daughters, the one called Theude, was maried (according vnto ſome) to D. Inigo Ariſta, king of Nauarre; and the other D. Iniga, to the infant D. Surta, of whom we ſhall hereafter ſpeake. This was in the yeare 856.

Rebellion of the gouernor of Biſcaie.

All this time, and to the yeare 859, there had beene a ſuſpenſion of armes, betwixt king D. Alphonſo and the Moores; but that yeare king Mahumet went to armes, and came and beſieged the towne of Coimbra, belonging now to Portugal: but D. Alphonſo forced him to raiſe his ſiege, and not content therewith, entred into the Moores countrey, waſted it, and returned with great ſpoyles, continuing euerie yeare to annoy them in ſuch ſort, as they were conſtrained to accept of a truce for three yeares, with the preiudice of their reputations, and great diſ-
E aduantage in their iuriſdictions. Then there raigned in Sarragoſſe a Moore, called Aben Alfaie. The reſt of Mahumets raigne vnto his death, was ſpent in voluptuous luſt and idleneſſe. In his time there was a great earthquake in Spaine, and a little before his death lightening entring into the Moſquee, where he was, ſlew two Noblemen Moores, neere vnto him.

Anno 859.

D. Garcia Inigues, third of that name, and ſeuenth King of Nauarre.

F 37 About the yeare 867, as ſome Authors write, died D. Inigo Ariſta, king of Nauarre, to whom ſucceeded D. Garcia Inigues, his ſonne, the third of that name, who vnited the countrey of Arragon to Nauarre, by marying with D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fortun, the laſt earle, or of D. Endregot Galinde, of the ſame houſe and familie of Arragon. He had two ſons by this Ladie, D. Fortun, and D. Sancho Abarca; and one daughter, called D. Sanctina, or Sancha. They write this fable of D. Sancho, That the king going inconſiderately with his queene through through the mountaines of Nauarre, he was ſurpriſed by certaine Moores, and ſlaine, and the queene ouerthrowne, being thruſt into the bellie with a Moores launce, at ſuch time as ſhe was great with this D. Sancho. Some houres after, a knight whom they called D. Sancho of Gueuara, paſſing that way, met with this pitifull ſpectacle, and ſaw that the child had thruſt forth a hand by the mothers wound, and had laboured to come forth there: wherefore this knight lighting from his horſe, made the wound greater, ſo as he drew forth this infant aliue, without any harme: then he carried it to his houſe with good witneſſes, where he cauſed it to be nouriſhed according to his degree, vntill he grew great, and then he preſented him to the Eſtates of the realme, and made him be acknowledged for their lawfull king. But, as we ſay, it is like to be a fable, and hath no great authoritie; yet they ſay, that the ſurname of Ladron, which is peculiar to the houſe of Gueuara, came for that this knight did ſecretly nouriſh the infant D. Sancho. D. Sanctina the daughter, was maried to king Ordogno the ſecond, ſonne to Alphonſo the great. G H

Biſcaie. 38 They hold opinion, That the lords of Biſcaie had their beginning at this time in D. Suria, whoſe poſteritie was famous for many yeares: for after that D. Zeno had beene vanquiſhed, and led priſoner, as we haue ſaid, the Biſcaines ſeeing themſelues without a head, fell to mutinies and ſeditions. Thither was ſent D. Ordogno, ſonne to king D. Alphonſo, whom they called Earle of Aſturies, who began to ouerrun and ſpoyle the countrey. The townes and comminalties aſſembled to make head againſt him, chuſing D. Suria for their captaine, who was deſcended from the bloud royall of Scotland, by his mother; and had maried a daughter of Cont Zenos, called D. Iniga, but at that time deceaſed. The forces of either part came to fight, in a place called then Padura: The battell was ſharpe and cruell; and for that the whole countrey did ſwim with bloud, the place was from that time called Arrigoriaga, which in the countrey language ſignifies, a vermilion ſtone. The Biſcaines, with the aid, and by the valour of D. Sancho Eſtiguis, Lord of Durando (who ended his dayes in this battell) won it; which was in the yeare 870. After this victorie the Biſcaines choſe D. Suria for their Lord, as well for that he was ſonne in law to their laſt Earle and gouernour Zeno (by his daughter, notwithſtanding we doe not read that he had any children) as for the valour and good conduct they had ſeene in him in this warre. This D. Suria did preſently after marie the daughter of D. Sancho Eſtiguis, in whoſe right he got the Seigniorie of Durando, which was vnited vnto Biſcaie: whoſe poſteritie did enioy thoſe lands, vntill the time of D. Henrie the ſecond of that name, king of Caſtille and Leon. The linage of D. Suria, was called de Haro. Caſtille the old had alſo an Earle, called D. Diego Porcello. I K

Anno 874. the laſt truce made with the Chriſtians, died in the yeare 874, leauing 54 children by his wiues, whereof 34 were males, and 20 females. He had held the kingdome 35 yeares, and Almundir ſixt king of the Moores at Cordoua. his death was in the 257 yeare of the Arabians raigne. His ſonne Almundir ſucceeded him, who liued but two yeares, hauing done nothing worthie of memorie; againſt whom they of Cordoua rebelled, notwithſtanding that he offered to free them of the tenth part of their tribute, which they paid. He left ſix ſonnes, and ſeuen daughters. L

Ouiedo. Such was the eſtate of Spaine in the time of king D. Alphonſo, who had to wife a Ladie of the bloud royall of France, called Ameline, but they changed her name to D. Ximena; by whom he had foure ſonnes, D. Garcia, D. Ordogno, D. Fruela, who raigned, and D. Gonſalo the Archdeacon. This king in his later dayes gaue himſelfe wholly to workes of pietie, building of churches and monaſteries, indowing them with rents and great reuenewes, and adorning them with iewels, veſſels of gold and ſiluer, and precious ornaments, according to the ceremonies brought in and maintained in the Church.

In the yeare 877 the church of S. Iaques was conſecrated at the inſtance of this king, and by the authoritie of Pope Iohn the eighth, where many Biſhops were preſent. And it is to be noted, that in thoſe dayes the citie of Ouiedo was full of Biſhops without any flockes; for M
Ouiedo the towne of Biſhops they did chuſe Biſhops of townes that were in the Moores poſſeſsion, keeping an account of their ſucceſsion; all which did liue in Ouiedo, and therfore it was called the Towne of Biſhops.
Ouiedo made an Archbiſhoprick. This king being verie deſirous to aduance the Hierarchie of the Clergie, laboured to haue the Epiſcopall ſea of Ouiedo, and the Cathedrall church of S. Sauueur, made an Archbiſhopricke Metropolitane; and the firſt Archbiſhop thereof was D. Hermenegilde, who was Biſhop thereof thereof before: in which towne of Ouiedo there was a Councell celebrated. Whileſt this prince was thus buſied in theſe workes of pietie, D. Garcia his eldeſt ſonne, by the bad aduice of D. Ximena his mother, rebelled againſt him: but the father cauſed him to be ſurpriſed in Zamora, and to be brought priſoner to the caſtle of Gordon. This towne of Zamora was called Sentica, or Sarabris, and had beene held, and in a manner ruined by the Moores, who called it Medina Zamorathi, that is to ſay, the citie of Lazul, or Turkiſh: for about it there are certaine mountaines hauing many veines of ſtones, which we call Lapis Lazuli, or azure ſtones.

The impriſonment of D. Garcia incenſed the other brethren againſt the king their father, being alwaies animated by the counſell of the queen their mother, who loued not her husband. Theſe princes, with D. Nugno Fernandes, father in law to D. Garcia, and other noblemen of this conſpiracie, made warre againſt D. Alphonſo, the which continued two yeares, and in the end forced him to leaue his Crowne and royaltie. Theſe troubles gaue meanes to D. Suria, now earle of Biſcaie, to ſettle his eſtate. King D. Alphonſo being thus forced, reſigned his Scepter to his ſonne D. Garcia, in the yeare 886, hauing raigned 46 yeares. To D. Ordogno, his ſecond ſon, was aſsigned Galicia, with the title of a Royaltie. And in this manner theſe wicked children, by the inſtigation of an indiſcreet, and ill affected mother, diuided the ſpoyls of their liuing father. You muſt obſerue, that the yeares of the deceaſe of theſe kings of Ouiedo, are verie vncertaine; for if we ſhall beleeue the letters of donation, and priuiledges, which are extant in the churches of Spaine, it will appeare that this king raigned in the yeare 899.

A king forced by his children to leaue his crowne.

An. 886.

Galicia a kingdome.

The prouince of Alaua was great, and carried the title of a kingdom in thoſe times among the Moores, who enioyed a part thereof, reſiding in the vallie of Burunda, againſt whom the kings of Nauarre had continuall warre; and eſpecially in the time of D. Garcia Inigues, mention is made by ſome writers, and alſo by the titles of the Church of Pampelone, of a battell fought in the vallie of Iunquera, betwixt Abderramen king of Cordoua, and the Chriſtian kings, D. Ordogno, and this king D. Garcia, the which was loſt by the Chriſtians: But the computation of times contradict it: of which famous battell there ſhall be more ample mention made in the life of D. Ordogno. The moſt approued Authors write, that D. Garcia Inigues died in the vallie of Ayuar, in a battell againſt the Moors, in the yere 885; whereof the inſcription vpon his tombe makes mention, at S. Iohn de la Pegna, the Æra 923.

Nauarre.

D. Garcia the firſt, and 13 King of Ouiedo.

40 D. Garcia was the firſt of that name which raigned in Ouiedo. There is no mention made in ſtories of his vertues and generous deeds; it may be by reaſon of his impietie, hauing diſpoſſeſt his father D. Alphonſo of his kingdome, who of a king became his ſons lieutenant, if it be credible, that being deſirous to aduance the Chriſtians affaires, he demanded forces of D. Garcia to inuade the Moores, the which the ſonne raigning, granted him, relying in the bountie of his depoſed father. And in this qualitie D. Alphonſo did many exploits of armes, gaue routs, and did much harme to the Infidels. We read, that about the yeare 887 this depoſed father died in the towne of Zamora, and was buried at Aſtorga, and ſome time after tranſported to Ouiedo.

A king diſpoſſeſt makes himſelfe his ſons lieutenant.

Anno 887.

After the deceaſe of D. Alphonſo, the king D. Garcia led an armie againſt the Moores, and ſpoyled much of their countrey; againſt whom came a great captaine of that nation, called Ayola, ſo as there was a furious battell, but D. Garcia had the victorie. The Moores defeated, and their captaine priſoner, as they led him away he eſcaped, for want of good gard. D. Garcia hauing raigned three yeares, he died at Zamora, in the yeare 889, hauing no children.

Moors defeated

41 At that time Abdalla was Miralmumin, or Soueraigne King in Spaine ouer the Moors, who had ſucceeded king Almundir his brother, in the yeare 876. In the firſt yeare of his raigne there was a ſurceaſe from armes, betwixt the Mahumetiſts and the Chriſtians, vntill the yere 886, that D. Alphonſo, no more king, but in qualitie of his ſonnes lieutenant, began to annoy the Moores, and after his death D. Garcia his ſonne, gaue the foreſaid rout to Ayola, whom ſome call Ayaya. King Abdalla died in the yeare 889, according to the moſt approued, leauing 11 ſonnes, and 13 daughters, hauing raigned 13 yeares.

D. Fortun, ſecond of that name, eighth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre. 42 THe Scepter of Nauarre, after the death of D. Garcia Inigues (although that ſome haue written of an Interregnum of many yeares, whileſt that D. Sancho was yet vnknowne, and bred vp in the houſe of Gueuara) came without all doubt to his eldeſt ſonne D. Fortun the ſecond of that name, in the yeare 885; after whoſe deceaſe there could be no Interregnum, ſeeing he had a daughter maried to D. Ordogno the ſecond, of Ouiedo, who without doubt H ſhould haue ſucceeded her father: for the right of ſucceſſion had euen then taken place, euen of women, aboue the election, which had been accuſtomed in all auncient time among thoſe people. There is a teſtimonie of this king D. Fortun, in a Charter of donation which he made to the monaſterie of Leyre, in the Æra 939, which comes to be the yeare 901. It is written in the remembrances of the houſe of S. Sauueur of Leyre, That when as the king D. Garcia his father was ſlaine, he was at Cordoua. Whereby it appeares, that the Moores which ſlew him, were not of the league with the kings of Cordoua, but ſome theeues, or factious perſons, as this nation had beene accuſtomed to liue in perpetuall diuiſion and quarels. D. Fortun being king of Nauarre, he was alſo earle of Arragon, by ſucceſsion from his mother. There is not any notable thing written of this kings geſts, but that he was verie deuout, and I did cheriſh Monkes, and religious perſons, to whom he gaue great gifts.

Barcelone. 43 In Cattelogne after the death of Cont Geoffrey, who was ſlaine in Auvergne, D. Salamon, earle of Cerdagne, who had beene his competitor, and enuied him, was made earle and gouernour. The Spaniards hold, that Cattelogne, and the countie of Barcelone, was then fallen to the Soueraigntie of Prouence and Bourgongne, whereof Charles, ſonne to the Emperour Lothaire, and nephew to Lewis the Gentle, was king; by whoſe grant this earle of Cerdagne did for his life-time inioy that title and dignitie, whileſt that the ſon of D. Geoffrey (who carried the fathers name, and was afterwards ſurnamed the Hairie) was bred vp in Flanders, in a knights houſe, to whom king Charles had recommended him. About the yeare 864 kings Charles died, and Prouence came to the hands of the Emperour Lewis the ſecond, his K brother, who alſo died in the yeare 876, and the empire fell to Charles the Bauld, his vncle, king of France, and by conſequence Prouence and Cattelogne, which depended thereon: during whoſe empire D. Geoffrey the Hairie, being now great, came to Barcelone, whereas the counteſſe Almira, his mother, yet liued, by whom he was knowne, and made knowne to the chiefe men of Barcelone, who had been friends to his deceaſed father: who made no delay to conſpire with D. Geoffrey, for the killing of the earle D. Salamon, t he which they did preſently effect in the place of Bercas in the yere 877: and by that meanes D. Geoffrey the Hairie was reſtored to his fathers dignitie W.hileſt he was bred vp in the houſe of this Flemiſh knight, they ſay, he fell in loue with one of his daughters, with whom he contracted a ſecret mariage, the which notwithſtanding came to the knowledge of the mother, who could well conceale it L vntill a fit opportunitie. Finding himſelfe ſetled in his eſtate and dignitie, at Barcelone, he ſent for his wife, and confeſt the mariage vnto his father in law, who was nothing diſpleaſed therwith; by whoſe meanes he obtained pardon for the murther which he had committed on the perſon of Cont Salamon, of the king of France, and Emperour Lewis the Stuttering, ſucceſſor to Charles the Bauld, his father, by whom the Flemmiſh knight was much fauoured. And the Spaniſh hiſtories report, That the Emperour Lewis receiued good ſeruice from Geoffrey the Hairie, in the warres he had againſt the Normans, whither he led a goodly troupe of horſe out of Barcelone, and ſhewed great proofes of his valour and conduct; ſo as he was greatly eſteemed, and beloued. And as in a certaine defeat of the Normans he had beene wounded in diuers parts of his bodie, ſo as his Armes were all couered with bloud; ſhewing himſelfe in M this eſtate before the Emperour Lewis, he beſought him to giue him Armes, which he and his poſteritie might lawfully carrie. The Emperour being glad of his demaund, ſtretching forth his foure fingers, he dipt them in the bloud which ran from the earls wounds, and made foure markes vpon a golden ſhield which he carried, being plaine, without any deuice; and ſaid vnto him, Earle, hereafter theſe ſhall be your Armes. For the which he moſt humbly thanked the Emperour:

A Emperour: ſo as euer ſince they haue carried foure bloudie ſtrokes, which we call Gueules, in a field Or. This is the beginning of the Armes of the earles of Barcelone, and ſince kings of Arragon, although that their beginning was from Cattelogne. The Armes of Barcelone and Arragon.

He did likewiſe ſerue king Charles the Groſſe, who was Emperour after Lewis the third, in his warre againſt the Normans: but in his abſence the Moores entred the territorie of Barcelone, and committed great ſpoyles. Whereof Cont Geoffrey being aduertiſed, he demaunded leaue, and beſought the king to grant him men and money, to repulſe the Infidels out of his gouernement: but not able to obtaine it, by reaſon of the weakeneſſe of his affaires, he had a better condition: For in conſideration of his valour and good ſeruice,

B king Charles gaue the countie of Barcelone in proprietie to him and to his heires for euer, in the yeare 884, reſeruing onely the ſoueraigntie to the kings of France: the which continued vnto the time of Lewis the ninth. We will therefore place this earle for the firſt of them of Barcelone, for that he was a Proprietarie. Cattelogne giuẽ in proprietie to Geoffrey the Earle, vnder the ſoueraigntie of France.

Returning to Barcelone with this grant, he brought with him many ſtrange knights, with whoſe helpe he recouered all that which the Moores had vſurped vpon the territories of Barcelone, and Cattelogne. He is commended for his religion, for that he did build (to burie himſelfe and his ſucceſſors in) the monaſterie of our Ladie of Ripol, where his eldeſt ſonne Rodolphus made himſelfe a Monke; who, they ſay, was borne in Flanders, before the mariage was publiſhed; and was Abbot of Ripol, and afterwards Biſhop of Vrgell. Others ſay, That

C this monaſterie was founded by D. Geoffrey of Arria, his father. He had other children by this Flemmiſh ladie, which were D. Geoffrey, who died of poiſon, being but young; D. Mir, who ſucceeded him in the earledome; D. Suner, or Seniofrid, who was earle of Vrgel; and one daughter. He was founder of the monaſterie of Monſerrat, and did many ſuch like workes.

D. Ordogno, ſecond of that name, and 14 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

D

45 TO D. Garcia his brother D. Ordogno had ſucceeded in the realme of Ouiedo, in the yeare 889. The bountie of this prince made the Spaniards thinke that his father D. Alphonſo was riſen againe, he did ſo well imitate his vertues in all the courſe of his life. His religion, after the manner of thoſe times, is commended, for that hee cauſed Mondognedo to be made a Biſhopricke, and did much good to churches. He was maried firſt to D. Munia, whom others call D. Eluira, by whom hee had foure ſonnes, D. Sancho, D. Alphonſo, D. Ramir, D. Garcia, and one daughter, D. Ximena, whereof D. Alphonſo and D. Ramir were kings of Ouiedo. For his ſecond wife hee maried D. Arragonde, or it may be, Radegonde of Gallicia, whom he did repudiat for certaine cauſes. Ouiedo.

E Laſtly, he tooke to wife the Infanta of Nauarre and Arragon, D. Sancha, or Sanctina, daughter to king D. Garcia Inigo, and of D. Vrraca.

The firſt exploits of Armes he did, were in Galicia, when as he was but a pettie king or gouernour, ouerrunning the Moores countrey confining vpon him, euen vnto Andalouſia, and carried backe great ſpoyles, with the which he retired ſafely to Viſeo, which is at this time in Portugal.

At the ſame time Abderramen, the third of that name, came to bee king of the Moores; hee was ſurnamed Almanſor, and Ananzer Ledin Alla, which ſignifies, Defender of the Law of God. Some are of opinion, that he was the ſonne of Mahumet the ſonne of Abdalla, to whom hee ſucceeded: againſt whom D. Ordogno raiſed an ar- Moores. Abderramen Almanſor, 8 king of the Moores at Cordoua.

F mie, and entring the territories of Toledo, came and beſieged Talauera, which is now called de la Roine. Hee defeated the ſuccours of Moores which Abderramen ſent, tooke the Generall of this armie, and forced the place and ſacked it. Wherewith Abderramen being much moued, meaning to reuenge it with aſſurance, hee demaunded ſuccours from Almotaraph, king of Mauritania Tingitana, where the kingdomes of Fez and Marocco are at this preſent. And hauing by that meanes aſſembled a great armie of

Moores,

Moores, Affricans, and Spaniards, he ſpoyled the Chriſtians countrey, as farre as the riuer G of Duero, and the towne of S. Stephen de Gomas, where there was an incounter, and the Moores defiated. Moores vanquiſhed; and the Generalls and Lieutenants of the two kings, Abderramen and Almotaraph, ſlaine; which incouraged D. Ordogno to proceed: ſo as in the yeare 894, hee Anno 894. entred the countrey called Eſtrema-dura, croſsing the riuers of Tayo and Guadiana, vnto Merida and Badaios, the territories of which townes he ſpoyled. The Moores inhabiting theſe townes, not daring to ſallie forth, they purchaſed a truce of ſome monethes, for a great ſumme of money.

This loſſe tormented Abderramen, and inflamed him to reuenge; wherefore in the yere Anno 895. 895 he entred Galicia with a great power, where he committed infinit ſpoyles. In the end H both armies being met, there was a bloudie battell, which continued almoſt a whole day, with vncertaintie which had the victorie. Abderramen being afterwards fortified with new ſuccours from Affricke, he came againe to waſt the countrey of king D. Ordogno, and entred by the prouince of Alaua, into the territories of the king of Nauarre, which ſhould be at that time D. Sancho Abarca, or rather his brother D. Fortun the ſecond, and not D. Garcia Inigues, their father, who they hold died in the yeare 885: And then there was a great Battell of Ionquera loſt by the Chriſtians. battell giuen in the vallie of Ionquera, in the which many braue Chriſtian knights were ſlaine. The Mahumetiſts being victors, many townes and forts of Nauarre fell into the Infidells hands. King Abderramen returned victor vnto Cordoua, leading with him many priſoners, and a rich bootie. In this troupe of priſoners were the Biſhops of Salamanca I and of Tuy. He of Tuy, called Hermogius, not able to endure the hardneſſe of the priſon, being old, laboured to get out, giuing for hoſtage of his ranſome a nephew of his, called Pelagius, a goodly young youth, about fourteene yeares old, who had beene bred vp religiouſly, and in the feare of God. Being come into the Moores hands, king Almanſor being thruſt on with a deteſtable deſire, would haue abuſed him at his pleaſure, and haue perſuaded him to follow Mahumets ſect: the which this holy youth did vertuouſly reſiſt. Where-Pelagius a holy youth cruelly murthered. fore the king being inraged, he cauſed him to be murthered with many torments, and to be caſt into the riuer of Guadalquibir, where his bodie being found, it was buried by the Chriſtians: Whoſe memorie, for his great vertues in ſo tender yeares, merits to liue for K euer.

Ouiedo and Leon. King D. Ordogno deſirous to repaire the loſſe which the Chriſtians had receiued in the val-
Anno 896. lie of Ionquera, entred in the yeare 896, into the Moores countrey with great forces, where hee tooke and ruined many townes; and meeting no incounter, hee returned to Zamora. As for the religious deeds of this king, they make particular mention of the building of S. Maries church, in his owne royall Palace of Leon, which he made the Cathedrall church of that towne, and indowed it with reuenewes, and many iewels; inducing the other noblemen, by his example, to doe the like. He cauſed himſelfe to be crowned in this new Temple with great ſolemnitie, being the firſt of thoſe kings which intitled himſelfe king of Ouiedo and Leon: for vnto theſe times they hold, That theſe kings tearmed themſelues onely kings of Ouiedo, without any addition of Leon. Before the Cathedrall church L of Leon, were thoſe of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, without the circuit of the walls in thoſe times, the which he did inlarge, and made the towne much bigger, enriching it with many buildings, exemptions, and priuiledges.

We haue ſaid before, That there was a great errour in the computation of the raignes of theſe kings of Ouiedo, and great confuſion in conferring them with thoſe that haue raigned in Nauarre, and the other Potentates of Spaine: for the Authors doe ill agree with the Charters and titles of priuiledges, donations, and foundations, which are found in the true ſtories of Monaſteries, and other churches of Spaine: eſpecially it is vncertaine what kings of Nauarre were in the time of king D. Ordogno, nor when he maried his laſt wife D. Sanctiua, daughter to king D. Garcia Inigues the ſecond, whether in his life time, or during the raigne M of D. Fortun, and D. Sancho Abarca, his children: the fact is cleere, but the time is doubtfull. Some Authors write, That this king D. Ordogno, made this league with D. Sancho Abarca, king of Nauarre; and that hauing ioyned their forces together, they inuaded the countrey of Rioje, which the Moors held, and hauing forraged it, they returned with great ſpoyles, hauing found no reſiſtance.

Caſtille.

A 47 The worthie and memorable deeds of this king are blemiſhed with the cruelties hee vſed againſt the earles of Caſtille. We haue made mention of Cont D. Diego Porcello, or Lechon, in the Spaniſh tongue, who gouerned Caſtille in the time of king D. Alphonſo the great: beſides there is mention of other earles and gouernors of the countrey, the which for that it was great, and compaſſed in by the Moores countrey, had need of many heads and captains to defend the frontiers of Ouiedo and Leon, vnder whoſe ſoueraigntie Caſtille was. Among others, we find D. Nugno Fernandes, who it is likely was father in law to D. Garcia, king of Ouiedo, brother to this king D. Ordogno, D. Almondar le Blanc, D. Diego his ſonne, D. Fernando Anzurcs: all theſe commaunded there, and were great noblemen in the ſaid countrey
B of Caſtille, about the yeare 889, which they hold to be the firſt of D. Ordogno, king of Ouiedo and Leon. It is not verified vpon what ſubiect they fell in diſgrace with this king, if it were not by reaſon of the practiſes of D. Nugno Fernandes, and D. Garcia, againſt king D. Alphonſo the great; kings being alwayes iealous of their eſtates, and enemies to them that attempt againſt their Soueraigne Princes, the which in ſome is accompanied with an enuie of their glorie, whom (being their ſubiects) they know to be aduenturous, fit for great enterpriſes, and to execute them happily. So it may be D. Ordogno fearing that theſe earles (who had fought valiantly againſt the Moores, and well defended their prouinces; for the which they were beloued, and reſpected of the people) ſhould grow too great, to the prejudice of his royall Maieſtie, he meant to murther them. He therefore called them vpon a ſafeconduct
C to a place called Regular, vpon the riuer of Carrion, making ſhew, that he would treat ſecretly with them of matters of great importance. Whither being come, he cauſed them to be apprehended, and carried with good gards to Leon, where ſome dayes after, without any formall proceeding, he cauſed them to be murthered in the priſon. D. Diego Porcello, as ſome thinke, was of this number. D. Nugno Bellides maried his daughter D. Sulla, of whom were borne two ſonnes, D. Nugno Nugnez, Razura, grandfather to the earle D. Fernand Gonſales, and the other was Iuſtus Gonſales, grandfather to the Lord of Lara.

Earles and gouernors of Caſtille murthered

D. Diego Porcello the ſtemme of the princes of Caſtille.

A yeare after this tyranous action, the king D. Ordogno died, according to the common opinion, in the yeare of our ſaluation 897; but according to the letters and titles of donation of the abbeyes and churches of Spaine, he liued in the yeare 919, as Garibay ſaith, who
D hath made a diligent ſearch: Of the authoritie and truth of which charters we may iuſtly doubt. This king raigned eight yeares, and was buried at Leon, in the new Cathedrall church of Saint Marie the great, the firſt of thoſe kings which had beene interred at Leon.

D. Froila, ſecond of that name, and 15 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

E 48 AFter the death of D. Ordogno, the realme was held by his brother D. Froila, who vſurped it from his nephewes, D. Alphonſo, and D. Ramir, ſonnes to the deceaſed. He is not put in the catalogue of the kings of Ouiedo, it may be by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of his raigne, or in deteſtation of his cruelties, which purchaſed him the ſurname of Cruell; or for ſome other conſiderations. He had maried a ladie called D. Munina, or D. Nugna, by whom he had three ſonnes, D. Alphonſo, D. Ordogno, and D. Ramir; and by a concubine, a baſtard called D. Fruela. Of this baſtard iſſued D. Pelagius, called the Deacon, who maried D. Aldonſa, grand child to D. Bermund the Goutie, whereof we will make mention. King D. Fruela was a tyrant, and therefore fearefull and ſuſpitious, ſo as he vſed great crueltie againſt the nobleſt perſonages in Spaine, he put ſome to death, baniſhed many, and afflicted euerie eſtate. Among the reſt he put to death the children of a noble knight, called D. Olmunde, or F Dimunde, baniſhed D. Frominio their brother, who was Biſhop of Leon, and committed many other ſuch outrages; yet couered with the cloke of iuſtice, as tyrants doe vſually.

Iudges choſen in Caſtille.

Gouernors or Iudges among them, whereof the one ſhould haue charge of the war, and the other ſhould take knowledge of ciuile cauſes. Theſe were Nugno Razura, and Flauin Caluo his ſonne in law. Nugno Razura was ſonne to Nugno Bellides, a German knight, who they ſay was the firſt founder of the citie of Burgos, ſo called by him, of a German word, ſignifying a habitation of people. This knight comming into Spaine vpon deuotion, to viſit S. Iaques ſepulchre, was there maried to D. Sulla, daughter to D. Diego Porcello, and had by her this D. Nugno Razura, a knight, who was wiſe, valiant, and much eſteemed, by reaſon of his modeſtie. He had one ſonne and one daughter by his wife, D. Gonſalo Nugnes, and D. Eluira Nugnes, or elſe D. Thereſa Nugnes, ſurnamed Bella, either for that ſhe was exceeding faire, or to ſeeme to be ſo: for the cuſtome of the auncient was to giue their children pleaſing names and ſurnames, thinking they ſhould thereby purchaſe fauour with men; and that a goodly name gaue ſome marke or impreſſion to the perſon conformable to that which it did ſignifie. This ladie D. Bella was maried by her father, to Flauin Caluo, a knight of Caſtille, lord of Biuar, by whom deſcended by fiue degrees, Cid, Ruys, Diaz, who was a wiſe and valiant knight. By theſe two Caſtille was gouerned without oppoſition: for that the king D. Fruela being hated, and ill obeyed, by reaſon of his tyranie, and tormented with continuall diſtruſt, being alſo growne a leaper, could not bring any armie againſt them. Wherefore this manner of gouernement was ſetled among the Caſtillans, and the countrey was diſmembred from the Crowne of Ouiedo, for a time; and the riuer of Piſorga diuided Caſtille the old from the kingdome of Leon. D. Nugnes determined of ciuile cauſes with great equitie and iuſtice. Flauin Caluo managed matters of ſtate, and warre.

Mention is made in certain priuiledges giuen by the firſt kings of Caſtille, to certain towns of that countrey, of a volume of the Caſtillian Lawes, according to the which iuſtice ſhould be adminiſtred, called the booke of Iudges: the which was of great authoritie, vnto the time of king D. Alphonſo the Wiſe, ſonne to D. Fernand the third, that the Lawes of the ſeuen parties were brought in, according to the which this realme was afterwards gouerned.

Ouiedo and Leon.

King D. Fruela, without reſt among his ſubiects, without warre againſt the Moores and Infidels, without honour in any of his actions, and without health in his perſon, infected with leproſie, raigned onely foureteene monethes, and was interred at Leon, in the chiefe church, in the yeare 898, according to the common opinion: but there are letters in the treaſurie of Saint Iaques, of a donation, of twelue miles of ground to this church, made by this king, dated the 28 of Iune 924, which Garibay ſaith he hath ſeene.

We haue apparent Arguments in this ſeuenth Booke, of the religious diſpoſition in auncient Princes, in the reſolution which two Kings of this age tooke, the one of Nauarre, the other of Leon, to leaue their regall Scepters and become Monkes: A preſident which was not rare in that age, but was afterwards imitated by others. Whether this proceeded from zeale of Religion, grounded vpon any certaine knowledge, or from baſeneſſe, and want of courage, & from meere ignorance of their ranks and royall callings, they can beſt iudge, who know by good and holie inſtructions, what ordinarie occaſions Kings, and other Soueraigne Magiſtrates, haue in their lawfull calling, to ſhew themſelues, and to be, truely religious.

D. Sancho Abarca, ſecond of that name, and ninth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

1 AFter the death of King D. Garcia Inigues, his ſonne D. Fortun being come to the Crowne in Nauarre and Arragon, about the yere 885, as we haue ſaid in the former Booke, hauing raigned ſome years, being moued with deuotion, and ſeeing himſelfe without children, and old, he became a Monke in the monaſterie of S. Sauiour at Leyre, the which they hold was in the yeare 901; leauing the realme of Nauarre, and the earledome of Arragon, to D. Sancho Abarca, his brother, ſo called by reaſon of a certaine kind of breech which he ware: Who, they ſay, being come with the queene D. Toda his wife, to the ſaid monaſterie of Leyre, receiued the bleſſing

D. Fortun king of Nauarre, makes himſelfe a Monke.
*An.*901.

A ſing of his brother D. Fortun, from whom alſo they receiued a Crowne, with many other precious jewels.

The king D. Sancho had by this wife a ſonne called D. Garcia Sanches, bearing his grandfathers and fathers names together: ſome giue him three ſonnes more, D. Ramir, D. Gonſal, and D. Ferdinand. He had fiue daughters by her, whereof the eldeſt, called D. Vrraca Ximenes, was wife to D. Alphonſo the fourth of that name, king of Ouiedo and Leon: the ſecond, D. Maria, Counteſſe of Barcelone, being married to D. Seniofrid, the fift Earle: the third, D. Thereſa, who was married to D. Ramir, king of Ouiedo, brother to D. Alphonſo: the fourth, D. Sancha, Counteſſe of Caſtille, the ſecond wife of D. Fernand Gonſales: and the

B youngeſt was D. Blanche Velaſque, whoſe marriage is vncertaine. This was a generous and worthie king, and in continuall warres againſt the Moores raigning in Alaua, and vpon the confines of Nauarre; whoſe lands he did often ouerrun, razed many places, and built others: the particularities whereof are vncertaine, by reaſon of the negligence or defect of writers of thoſe times: but in generall they hold, that he did ſubject vnto his Crowne and made tributarie all the people which were betwixt his confines and the mountaines of Oca, of either ſide, following the courſe of Ebro vnto Tudele, and from the mountaines to Hueſca: yea, paſſing the Pyrenees, he conquered from the French that part of Gaſcoine where the Baſques are, which is at the foot of the mountaines: but whileſt he was thus buſied, the Moores came and beſieged Pampelone, thinking to take it before that the king D. Sancho ſhould come to

C ſuccour it; but it happened otherwiſe: for the beſieged were not onely relieued, but the Moores chaſed away, and purſued farre into their countrey, with great loſſe of their men. In theſe warres the vertue and proweſſe of them of Sobrarbre and Ribagorſa was great, eſpecially of a captaine called Centullo.

The auncient confines of Nauarre.

D. Alphonſo, fourth of that name, and 16 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

D 2 BY the death of king D. Fruela, the kingdome of Ouiedo and Leon came to the children of D. Ordogno; and Alphonſo the fourth, called the Monke and the blind, raigned: who hauing held the Crowne little aboue fiue yeares, and had had a ſonne by D. Vrraca Ximenes his wife, which he called D. Ordogno, afterwards ſurnamed the bad, had a deſire to become a Monke, and for want of courage to paſſe his life in idleneſſe, leauing the charge which God had giuen him, to rule and gouerne the Chriſtian people preſerued in Spaine: wherefore he gaue his brother D. Ramir to vnderſtand thereof, who was then reſident at Viſeo, one of the frontiers of the Moores countrey, perſuading him to come vnto him, meaning to reſigne the Scepter of Ouiedo and Leon. Theſe newes were not a little pleaſing vnto D. Ramir, who preſently came to Zamora, where king D. Alphonſo remained, and was there

E ſeated by him in the royall throne. D. Alphonſo retyred himſelfe into a Monaſterie called Dominus Sanctus, at this day Sahagun, vpon the riuer Cea, a houſe built by king D. Alphonſo the great, the third of that name.

Ouiedo and Leon.

D. Alphonſo leaues his Crowne to become a Monke.

D. Ramir the ſecond, and 17 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

3 THus D. Ramir became king beyond his expectation, in the yeare 904, of Ouiedo and Leon. From that time the royall title was attributed to the citie of Leon, ſuppreſſing

F Ouiedo, for that it was the greateſt towne, and beſt peopled of all this kings Eſtate. D. Ramir had by his wife D. Thereſa, daughter to king D. Sancho Abarca of Nauarre, three ſonnes, D. Bermudo, D. Ordogno, and D. Sancho, and one daughter D. Eluira, who was profeſſed a Nunne in the Monaſterie of S. Sauueur, in the citie of Leon, built by the king her father for her ſake. The warres betwixt the Chriſtians and the Moores, which had lyen long dead, were now reuiued at the comming of this king, for the which he prepared himſelfe. D. Alphonſo

D. Ramir hauing leuied a great armie, with a deſigne to imploy it againſt the Infidels, was forced to turne head againſt his owne ſubjects, and came to the ſiege of Leon, the which continued two yeares: in the end D. Alphonſo being vnfurniſhed of all neceſſaries, as well as of judgement, yeelded to his brothers diſcretion, who kept him priſoner.

4 Theſe diuiſions did the more aſſure the reuolt of Caſtille, and the new Eſtate of that countrey, vnder Iudges elected, whereof the two firſt being dead in the time of D. Alphonſo the Monke, D. Gonſalo Nugnes had ſucceeded in the gouernment of Caſtille. This knight was bred vp in all vertue, ciuilitie, and good behauiour, by the care of D. Nugno Razura his father, who being wiſe and vertuous, was carefull to giue him good maſters, in all commendable exerciſes, worthie of a child iſſued from a noble familie: and moreouer, had made all the beſt families of the countrey partakers of this happineſſe, cauſing the gentlemens ſonnes of Caſtille to be bred vp with his ſonne in the ſame diſcipline; ſo as in a ſhort time the Court of Caſtille was furniſhed with as many gallant young gentlemen as any countrey in the world. Nauarre.

The generall Hiſtorie of Spaine makes mention of a warre betwixt D. Sancho Abarca of Nauarre, and D. Fernand Gonſales, Earle of Caſtille, grounded vpon the reparation of many domages done by the Nauarrois, paſſing and repaſſing through the countrey of Caſtille, vnder colour of making warre againſt the Moores: with whom the king D. Sancho made a peace, to the prejudice of the Caſtillans and others their neighbors; the which did much diſcontent them. Wherefore the Earle D. Fernand demaunded reſtitution of the ſpoyle and exceſſe which had beene committed in his countrey: but his meſſengers were ſent backe with injurious words and diſgrace; by reaſon whereof they came to armes, and there was a ſharpe encounter of two armies, in a place called Era de Gollanda, where there was much bloud ſpilt. The two Princes D. Sancho and D. Fernandes encountring during the fight, they ran one at another with ſuch animoſitie, as both horſe and men were ouerthrowne to the ground. The king D. Sancho was found dead with the charge of a launce, and D. Fernandes ſore wounded. This misfortune being knowne in the Nauarrois armie, daunted their courages, ſo as the Caſtillans woon the field. The ſame generall Hiſtorie reports, that an Earle of Tolouſe being come with a great armie to ſuccour the king D. Sancho, being deſirous to reuenge the death of his friend and allie, and hauing joyned with the remainders of the forces of Nauarre, he was againe fought withall, vanquiſhed, and ſlaine by D. Fernand, who deliuered the bodies of theſe Princes thus ſlaine to their ſubjects to burie them. Of the time of this defeat, or of the manner of D. San. Abarcas death, there is no great certaintie in that which is related in this generall Hiſtorie, yet they conjecture it was about the yeare 920. It is without all queſtion, that he was a valiant and couragious Prince, and ſo famous, that euen at this day there is not ſo poore a woman in the kingdome of Nauarre, nor any other perſon (although he be ignorant of the name of other kings) which knowes not that of D. Sancho Abarca; all which ſpeake and make an honourable mention of him, as of a wiſe and vertuous Prince. He did enlarge the limits of Nauarre, conquering much on euerie ſide from the Moores, euen along the riuer of Ebro, whereof a caſtle neere vnto Sarragoſſe doth beare witneſſe, which carries his name vnto this day. There are many other markes found of him in Spaine: the caſtle of Ses, and that of Arraſate (ſince called Mondragon) in Guipuſcoa, (but ruined at this day) are his workes. They hold, that he did people the towne of Logrogno in Rioje, and walled it about. There is ample mention made of him in a Charter of priuiledge and donation, of the places of S. Vincent and Ledena, to the Monaſterie of S. Saluator de Leyre, dated in the yeare 919, whereby many things which are written doubtfully of this king, are made plaine and confirmed: among others, it appeares thereby, that he was ſonne to D. Garcia Inigues, brother to D. Fortun, and husband to D. Toda. About this time, king D. Ramir deſirous to enlarge his kingdome, and to diminiſh the power of the Moores in Spaine, led a mightie armie into the countrey of Toledo, ſo as in the yeare 923 he beſieged Talauera, called at this preſent, La Roina: and as the Moores came to ſuccour it, he gaue them battaile, where he ſlew twelue thouſand, and tooke ſeuen thouſand priſoners. This was the laſt exploit of warre which this king did. A little before he had married his ſonne D. Ordogno to D. Vrraca, daughter to the Earle of Caſtille, D. Fernand M

He married ſomewhat late, and begatt three children, the firſt was called D. Seniofrid, who was Earle of Barcelone after his father, the ſecond D. Oliban, he was ſurnamed Cheurette, by reaſon of a bodily infirmitie, whereunto he was ſubject; for when he would ſpeake, he muſt of force ſcrape the earth, before he could pronounce a word, he had ſuch an impediment in his ſpeech: he had for his portion the Countie of Cerdagne and Beſalu, after the deceaſe of his father. The third called D. Mir, was Earle and Biſhop of Girone. 7 TO D. Ramir of Leon ſucceeded D. Ordogno his ſecond ſonne, in the yeare 924, but the titles and letters of Monaſteries and Churches of Spaine, as of S. Iaques of Compoſtella, of S. Emylian of Cogolla, of S. Felix of Oca, of priuiledges, donations, and confirmaD tions graunted vnto them by king D. Ramir, and other noblemen of his time, ſhew, that he was yet liuing in the yeare 934: but there is little certaintie in the computation of theſe kings raignes, nor in the charters which are produced by men of our time. This Prince D. Ordogno is commended by the Spaniards to haue beene mild and courteous, ſo as he was greatly beloued of his ſubjects. He had ſome croſſes in the beginning of his raigne, by the flatterers and corrupters of young Princes (an ordinarie plague in Courts) who debaucht his younger brother D. Sancho, and perſuaded him to rebell againſt him, who fled into Nauarre, to be aſſiſted with the forces of that kingdome to execute his deſigne. Leon. Flatterers make D. Sancho rebell againſt the kings brother.

8 THere are ſome errors which are remarkable in this place in ſtories; that is, who raigned at that time in Nauarre: for ſome hold, that the young Prince D. Sancho had recourſe vnto king D. Sancho Abarca, his grandfather by the mothers ſide: others ſay, it was to his ſonne Garcia Sanches, the which is more probable, the moſt diligent Authors affirming, that the king D. Sancho Abarca died during the raigne of D. Ramir, father to this king D. Ordogno, about the yeare 920, hauing raigned twentie yeares or little leſſe ouer his ſubjects, and valiantly repulſed the Infidell Moores, gouerning in Alaua, and elſewhere in his conF fines; to whom his ſonne D. Garcia Sanches ſucceeded in the realme of Nauarre and Countie of Arragon. Wherefore without all doubt Prince D. Sancho, brother to D. Ordogno of Leon, had recourſe vnto him, and by his meanes was alſo fauoured by Cont D. Fernand of Caſtille, the warres being pacified betwixt the Caſtillans and the Nauarrois: of which nations hauing raiſed a great armie, theſe three Princes entred the territories of king D. Ordogno, and marcht as farre as the royall citie of Leon: but king D. Ordogno had ſo wiſely Nauarre.

prouided for his affaires, as they were forced to returne, and to abandon their enterpriſe, reaping nothing for their paine, but the hatred of the king of Leon; the which did ſo incenſe him, as he put away his wife D. Vrraca, daughter to the Earle D. Fernand Gonſales, and married a Ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had a ſonne, called D. Bermond, which came to the Crowne of Leon. By reaſon of theſe troubles, the Gallegos, or they of Gallicia rebelled againſt king D. Ordogno: but he ſoone reduced them to their obedience by armes: and being encouraged by this happie ſucceſſe, he entred into the Moores countrey, and paſſed the riuers of Duero and Minio, waſting the countrey with fire and ſword, euen vnto Lisbone, finding not any one to make head againſt him, ſo as he returned ſafe with his armie, laden with great ſpoyles; and without any great ſtay being incenſed with the injurie which he had receiued from Fernand Earle of Caſtille, who had fauored and ſuccoured D. Sancho his brother, who was rebelled, marcht with his forces towards Caſtille, with an intent to doe him all the harme he could.

Caſtille.

The wiſdome and dexteritie of D. Fernand was ſuch, as of an enemie he made him a friend, ſo as he returned into his countrey well ſatisfied, and after that time they joyned their forces together to annoy the Moores: whoſe king Abderramen reſiding at Cordoua, deſirous to reuenge the outrages which the Chriſtians and their king D. Ordogno had done in the territories of Lisbone, and others of thoſe marches, hauing alſo a new ſubject by the taking of his caſtle of Carranſo, by the Earle D. Fernand, he rayſed a mightie armie of Moores, in the which they ſay was aboue 80000 fighting men: and hauing giuen charge thereof to a Mooriſh knight much eſteemed, whom they called Alhagib Almanſor, he ſent him into the territories of Caſtille, the which did much trouble D. Fernand, for that all his forces of Caſtille were ſmall to oppoſe againſt ſo mightie a power as that of the Moores, wherefore he demaunded ſuccours, and obtained them from king D. Ordogno; yet Caſtille was ouerrun by the Moores armie, from S. Steuen of Gormas vnto Burgos. In the end, D. Fernand did ſo purſue them, as hee forced them to fight, neere vnto a place called Dozio, where the Moores were defeated, with great ſlaughter of their men. The Spaniards report, That D. Fernand was foretold of this defeat of the Moores by a holie hermit, dwelling neere to Lara, called Pelagius, and that the armies being farre one from the other, D. Fernand being encamped in that place, he had a deſire to hunt, and hauing rowzed a Boare, he purſued him to the hermits cell, where he ſhut him vp. There was a Chappell and an Altar dedicated to S. Peter, for the reuerence whereof the Earle would doe no harme vnto this beaſt. Whileſt he ſtayed there, the hermit arriued, who entreated the Earle to lodge that night with him and his religious, being late, the which he did. In the morning the hermit Pelagius reuealed vnto the Earle, that he ſhould be victor ouer this great armie of Moores, exhorting him to take courage, and to truſt in God, and aboue all to remember the poore Friers, when he had gotten this victorie. So the Earle returned to his armie ſo full of hope, as no counſell could diſſuade him from the Moores armie, being great and mightie, with a handfull of men; and he had the victorie, as we haue ſaid. Returning to Burgos, he remembred the religious, whom he made partakers of the ſpoyle, and in time built a Monaſterie for them to S. Peter, vpon the riuer of Arlance, and gaue it good reuenues, where this Earle and his ſucceſſors were afterwards buried. The Moores hauing leuied new troupes, returned into Caſtille, and were againe vanquiſhed by the Caſtillans and Nauarrois, about the yeare 927, and neere vnto the towne of S. Steuens, vpon the riuer of Duero.

Leon.

10 TO D. Ordogno there ſucceeded in the realme of Leon D. Sancho his brother, who was ſurnamed the fat, for that he was exceeding corpulent; wherefore it ſeemes he

he was more carefull to pamper his bodie, then to attempt any great actions: and for that in thoſe dayes the Arabians had the fame to be verie expert in the art of Phiſicke, and that the towne of Cordoua was full of ſuch people, eſpecially the Court of king Abderramen, he entertained friendſhip with this king, and went to Cordoua, that he might haue aduice and helpe for his indiſpoſition; wherein Abderramen ſhewed himſelfe courteous and faithfull, receiuing him with all the honour fit for ſuch a king, and furniſhing him with the beſt Phiſitians of his Court, by whoſe diligence and judgement he was freed from the infirmitie which had long troubled him. Arabian Phiſitions in great requeſt.

Whileſt that D. Sancho was in the Phiſitians hands at Cordoua, the Leonois conſpired againſt him, and did aduance to the royall throne D. Ordogno, ſurnamed the bad, ſonne to D. Alphonſo the Monke, whereunto they were ſollicited by D. Fernand Gonſales, Earle of Caſtille, whoſe daughter D. Vrraca, who had beene rejected by D. Ordogno laſt deceaſed, they cauſed this other Ordogno to marrie: but D. Sancho being aduertiſed of theſe newes at Cordoua, he entreated king Abderramen to continue him his fauour and friendſhip, and as he had beene the meanes for the recouerie of his bodily health, ſo he would alſo aſſiſt him to maintaine his eſtate and dignitie: Whereunto the king did verie kindly conſent, and gaue him great troupes of his nation and ſect, with the which he marched towards his countrey, the which he recouered without any great difficultie, for that the conſpirators of the countrey could not of themſelues reſiſt ſo great forces. And as for the Earle D. Fernand, he had worke ynough in his owne countrey, whereas a nobleman, called D. Bela de Nagera, had put all in trouble and ſedition during his abſence, in laying the plot againſt the king D. Sancho, with them of Leon; who being vnprouided of force and counſell, retyred with D. Ordogno into the Aſturies, to liue there in the mountaines and places of ſtrength: but D. Ordogno not finding himſelfe ſafe ynough in thoſe parts, he fled into Caſtille, to his father in law; who obſerued in that, and other actions of his, a notable cowardiſe: whereat he was ſo incenſed, as he tooke his daughter Vrraca from him, and chaſed him out of his countrey. So D. Ordogno not knowing whither to flye, went vnto the Moores, but he was ſlaine neere vnto Cordoua. Rebellion in the kingdome of Leon. D. Bela of Nagera troubles the eſtate of Caſtille.

This partie of the Moores had beene embraced with better ſucceſſe, a little before, by D. Bela de Nagera, who had rebelled againſt the Earle D. Fernand, and was expelled by him; who it may be perſuaded the expedition which was made into Caſtille, in the yeare 931, by king Abderramen, vnder the commaund of Alhagib Almanſor, who had alreadie (to his loſſe) tryed the force of the Chriſtians, as we haue ſaid: againſt whom, D. Fernand hauing fortified himſelfe with the ſuccours of the Biſcaines, and of their Lord D. Lope Diaz, who was grandchild to D. Suria, and ſonne to D. Inigo, ſurnamed Eſguerra, which ſignifieth deafe in the countrey language, and with other friends his neighbors, he preſented himſelfe in battaile neere to Hazignas, where they fought three ſeuerall daies, with great obſtinacie on either ſide: but in the end the Moores were vanquiſhed, and loſt more men than they had done in the former battailes. The Spaniſh writers make mention here of another apparition of S. Iaques, fighting for the Chriſtians againſt the Infidels, to whom they attribute the honor of this victorie. Caſtille. An. 931. Moores defeated.

The king D. Sancho being reſtored, he married D. Thereſa, and hauing puniſhed ſome confederats of this rebellion, he made a generall aſſemblie of noblemen, both of his ſubjects and allies, at Leon. D. Fernand Gonſales could not well excuſe himſelfe, wherefore he went well accompanied, and was notwithſtanding verie honourably entertained by the king. They report, That among other exquiſit things which D. Fernand brought out of Caſtille, to make ſhew of in that Court, he had a goodly horſe, and one of the beſt Gothawkes that could be ſeene, whereof the king was wonderfully deſirous, cauſing ſome to entreat the Earle to ſell them to him, and that he ſhould aske what price he pleaſed. The Earle anſwered, That he would willingly giue them vnto the king, but he would not ſell them: but the king would not receiue them of gift, but made ſuch meanes by his friends to buy them, as in the end there was a price ſet, which was to be payed at a certaine time, vpon condition, That if the king failed at the day of payment, the ſumme agreed vpon ſhould be doubled, to the benefit of the creditor: of which accord there were letters drawne and ſigned. The reſt of the time which D. Fernand remained in the king D. Sancho his Court, was ſpent in pleaſure. Leon. A roſh bargaine made betwixt Princes in ſport, and entertained by force.

In the end of the Aſſembly, there was a particular treatie of the marriage of D. Fernand, a widower, with D. Sancha the Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to D. Sancho Abarca, and ſiſter to D. Garcia, then raigning in Nauarre, and Arragon. This marriage was propounded by the Queene D. Thereſa, mother to the king D. Sancho Gordo, and ſiſter to D. Sancha; not for any loue ſhe bare to the Earle of Caſtille, but to intrap him in the ſnares which ſhe had prepared for him, in hatred and reuenge of the death of king Sancho Abarca her father, whom he had ſlaine in warre, as we haue ſaid before. The Earle conſented to this marriage, and tooke his leaue of the King and Queene, and of the Noblemen of the Court, and went into Caſtille, to prepare himſelfe for his future marriage: but he found, that during his abſence the Nauarrois had ſpoyled his countrey, and done manie acts of hoſtilitie againſt his ſubjects; whereof he complained firſt by embaſſages and meſſages, and demaunded reſtitution of that which had beene taken, but it was in vaine: Wherefore being a Prince full of courage, he went preſently to armes, and entred into the territories of Nauarre, where he encountred an armie of Nauarrois, and defeated it, and ſo righted himſelfe.

Warre betwixt Caſtille and Nauarre.

Nauarre.

The treatie of marriage was ſtill continued, by the meanes of the Queene mother of Leon, ſiſter to D. Sancha, Infanta of Nauarre, who had plotted with the king D. Garcia Sanches, her brother, to entrap the Earle vnder this colour of marriage, and to be reuenged of him at their pleaſures. There was ſuch ſending on either part, as in the end the Earle was perſuaded to goe into Nauarre to conclude this marriage, and hauing agreed with D. Garcia, king of Nauarre, That their enterview ſhould be at a place called Cireugna, either of them accompanied with fiue knights onely. The Earle being arriued, the king came with fiue and thirtie horſemen: wherefore the Earle ſeeing himſelfe thus ſurpriſed, thought to ſaue himſelfe in an hermitage neere adjoyning, but the holineſſe of the place could not defend him, but he was beſieged, and forced to yeeld, vpon condition they ſhould not put him to death. Being taken, he was ſhut vp in a fort called Chaſteau Vieil, or the old caſtle, and but hardly entreated. A while after, an Italian knight of Lumbardie, going in pilgrimage to Saint Iaques of Compoſtella, that way, and hearing that the Earle D. Fernand was detained priſoner there, he was verie deſirous to ſee him, for that he had heard ſo much fame of his vertues and valour, and at length found meanes to ſpeake with him. At his departure from thence, this knight went to the Infanta D. Sancha, who was both faire and louelie, whoſe heart he did ſo mollifie with good words, as ſhe began to loue, and to deſire D. Fernands libertie and companie. This Ladie moued with this affection, wrought in ſuch ſort, as one night ſhe deliuered him out of priſon, hauing plighted their faithes, and promiſed marriage one vnto the other, without the priuitie of the king D. Garcia Sanches, and together tooke their way to Caſtille, where they had ſcarce entred the limits, but they met with great troupes of ſouldiours. Theſe were the Earles ſubjects, who vpon the newes of his impriſonment had aſſembled themſelues together in armes, and hauing made an Image like vnto their Lord, they had all taken a ſolemne oath before it, That not any one of them ſhould returne vnto his houſe, vntill the Earle were deliuered, and that whoſoeuer ſhould doe otherwiſe, ſhould bee held for a traitor. Being thus reſolued, they came into Nauarre, when as they had this happie encounter of the Earle D. Fernand, and the Counteſſe D. Sancha his ſpouſe, whom they receiued with all the honour and ſignes of joy, that the place and their furniture would permit.

Caſtille.

The king D. Garcia Sanches being aduertiſed of his ſiſters flight, and the Earles deliuerie, was wonderfully incenſed; he leuied an armie, and entred into the territories of Caſtille, whereas the Earle came to encounter him with a great power, and gaue him battaile, in the which the Nauarrois were defeated, and the king D. Garcia taken priſoner, being ouerthrowne with the blow of a launce, by the Earle himſelfe, who had ſought for him, and encountred him in the fight. So he was led to Burgos, and there remained thirteene moneths in ſafe keeping. Then at the entreatie of the Counteſſe D. Sancha he was ſet at libertie, and ſent into his countrey honourably attended. Yet for all this, the quarrels betwixt Caſtille and Nauarre were not ended: for a while after, the Earle D. Fernand being gone to Leon, the Nauarrois defeated, and the king D. Garcia Sanches taken priſoner.

A the king of Nauarre came againe with an armie, by the mountaines of Oca and Bureua, and ran as farre as Burgos, doing what he could to perſuade the Counteſſe D. Sancha to goe away with him, but ſhe would giue no eare to him; wherefore he returned with a great bootie, hauing much ſpoyled the countrey. The Earle at his returne being informed of all which the king of Nauarre had attempted, complained firſt by embaſſages, and demaunded reparation of dommages which his ſubjects had endured, and hauing no reaſon done him, nor any good anſwer made, he tooke the courſe of armes, and led an armie into Nauarre, where he gaue battaile vnto his enemies on the plaines of Valpierre, neere to Nagera and Brion, where the Nauarrois were manie in number, and well ap-

Thoſe of Caſtille were in great danger, yet the equitie of their quarrell gaue them force and courage, ſo as they remained victors, and the Earle had full ſatisfaction of the wrongs and injuries which the king of Nauarre had done him. Such were the occaſions, progreſſe, and end of the quarrels, betwixt Nauarre and Caſtille, according to the Spaniſh Chronicles, to the yeare of our Lord 934. After this, the countrey of Caſtille was in peace for a time, and the Earle D. Fernand had no other care, but to gouerne his ſubjects well, vnder good lawes, when as in Leon there was great trecherie practiſed againſt him, by the king D. Sancho, who was ſorrie that the deſignes of Nauarre had not ſucceeded as he deſired.

This king made an Aſſembly of all the Earles and Noblemen, and appointed his Court

C in the citie of Leon, whither the Earle of Caſtille was alſo called: who although hee were ſufficiently informed, whence all the wrongs came that were done him, and of the little good they wiſht him in that Court, yet could he find no meanes to excuſe himſelfe, and (which was worſe) there were verie few of his friends. Being come to the gates of the citie, he might eaſily perceiue that he was not welcome, for that no man came to meet him, as they had done at other times; wherefore he entred into the citie like a priuate man, and of meane eſtate. Comming to kiſſe the kings hands, he was receiued with a frowning countenance, and ſowre ſpeeches, telling him, that he detained the Earledome of Caſtille from him: Whereupon the Earle ſeeking to ſatisfie the king with good reaſons, hee was not heard, but put in ſure gard, and kept in the citie of Leon, in the

The newes of his reſtraint did much trouble all Caſtille, but eſpecially the Counteſſe, whom the good and well affected knights of Caſtille ſought by all meanes they could to comfort, promiſing all their meanes for the Earles deliuerie. This Ladie being of a noble courage, and confirmed by the loyaltie ſhe found in his ſubjects, put her ſelfe preſently vpon the way, being accompanied by the chiefe of the nobilitie of the countrey, and going by ſecret and vnknowne paſſages, ſhee came neere vnto the citie of Leon; where ſhee left her troupes in ambuſh, and taking the habit of a pilgrime, pretending to goe and viſit the ſepulchre of S. Iaques, ſhee entred into the citie, being accompanied onely with two men. The king being preſently aduertiſed of the Counteſſes arriuall, he came vnto her,

E and deſirous to doe her honour, being his aunt, he ſuffered her to ſee her husband who was priſoner, and to remaine that night with him, and commaunded for her ſake, that they ſhould take off his yrons, wherewith he was bound. Theſe two louers paſſed that little time which was allowed them to be together, in comforting one another, and in praying vnto God; and hauing concluded betwixt themſelues what was to be done, this vertuous Princeſſe D. Sancha gaue an example to all her ſex, of what power conjugall loue is in a generous heart: for ſhe attyred her husband ſo handſomely in her pilgrimes weed, as the keepers of the priſon being deceiued therewith, let him goe, thinking it had beene ſhee. The Counteſſe in the meane time remained priſoner: ſo as before they could diſcouer the fraud, D. Fernand had meanes to get out of the towne, and to come vnto his knights,

A rare example of conjugall loue.

F which lay in ambuſh, by whom hee was conducted into his countrey. This fact of the Counteſſe being reported vnto the king, he was ſo farre from blaming her, as admiring the force of ſo holie a loue, he deliuered her, honoured her, and ſent her home to her husband, with a traine fit for her calling, although he were verie ſorrie that the Earle had ſo eſcaped.

Vertue is reuerenced euen of enemies.

The king D. Sancho was ſtill a debtor to the Earle of Caſtille, not onely for the price of his horſe and hawke, but alſo for the multiplication thereof, the day of payment being long before expired: wherefore the Earle ſent to demaund his money of the king: and hauing neither payment, nor good wordes, he began to ſpoyle the territories of Leon: whereupon the king commaunded his Treaſurers to verifie this debt, and to ſeeke for meanes to diſcharge it. The ſumme was ſo often doubled and multiplied, from day to day, after the terme prefixed, as they reported vnto the king, That all the wealth of the kingdome of Leon would not be ſufficient to pay that which was due vnto the Earle of Caſtille: wherefore after manie conſultations and meſſages ſent on either part, the king D. Sancho and the Earle D. Fernand fell to an agreement, That the king to be freed of this exceſſiue ſumme of money, did remit vnto the Earle D. Fernand the lands and ſeigniories of Caſtille, to enjoy them abſolutely, without any reſeruation of fealtie, homage, nor vaſſallage to the Crowne of Leon, but freely and as Soueraignes, he, and his in perpetuitie, whereof letters were paſſed in the yeare 939. This was the meanes, as the Hiſtories of Spaine report, of the Soueraigntie of Caſtille, and ſeparation thereof from the realme of Leon and Ouiedo, the which countrey from an Earledome became a royaltie, and in the end the mightieſt of all that Continent, as we ſee it in our time. The Earle D. Fernand did at that time hold in the Prouince of Rioje, the lands of Cerezo and Granon, and by many letters of donation graunted by him to the Churches and Couents of his countrey, he is intitled Lord of Alaua: whereby we muſt note, that the countrey of Alaua was in his time of a larger circuit then it is now: for the kings of Nauarre held much of it, and did alſo tearme themſelues Lords: ſo did the Moores, diſperſed ouer all Spaine, and holding great Seigniories, townes, and forts there, vnder their king Abderramen, being reſident at Cordoua.

Moores.

This Arabian king, for his laſt exploit of warre, had ſent an armie of Moores into the territories of Leon, which layed ſiege before the citie, from whence notwithſtanding they were forced to retyre, by the vertue and good gouernment of thoſe that were within it, as well ſouldiors as citizens. Soone after this king died, the which, according vnto ſome, was about the yeare nine hundred thirtie nine, and of the Arabians raigne three hundred twentie two, hauing raigned fiftie yeares in Spaine. Hee was a louer of learning, ſo as in his time, Philoſophie, Phiſicke, and all other Arts, did flouriſh at Cordoua.

Sedition in Galicia.

During this time, there aroſe a great tumult and ſedition in Gallicia, vpon certaine priuate mens quarrells, who ſlew one another cruelly, without any reſpect vnto the king nor juſtice: Wherefore the king D. Sancho was forced to lead an armie thither, with the which he did puniſh ſome of the mutines, and did force ſome of the reſt to leaue the countrey. They paſſed the riuer of Duero, and yet retyred into a countrey which did belong vnto the juriſdiction of Leon, in that quarter, the which was gouerned by an Earle, or Gouernor, called D. Gonſales, vnder the king D. Sancho. This bad vaſſale, in ſtead of ſupporting the kings juſtice againſt theſe mutines, tooke armes in their fauour, and was ſo raſh as to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the kings forces, which purſued them into his gouernment: but remembring his owne follie in time, he had recourſe to the the kings clemencie, who pardoned him, making him onely to confeſſe his fault, and to take a new oath of fealtie: yet this trecherous and ingrateſull wretch, ſmothering in his breaſt the venome of treaſon, within few dayes after poyſoned his king and naturall Prince with an apple which he gaue him. The king, who diſtruſted nothing, did preſently bite of it, but his heart being ſuddainely infected with the poyſon, he began to ſhake, and to ſhew other ſignes that he was ſtrucken with death; wherefore he made haſt to returne to Leon, but he died vpon the way, in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, and of our redemption 941, and lyes at S. The religion of Spaine in thoſe times was wholly reduced to the ſeeking out of Martyrs bones, and other relickes. The building of Monaſteries, gifts, and foundations, were held moſt meritorious, as well for the liuing as for the dead. You may conjecture, that the other Biſhoprickes were no better furniſhed then that of Compoſtella. Theſe kings made foundations, and gaue infinite priuiledges to Abbots and other Clergie men, for the redemption of their ſoules, and of their predeceſſors, as their letters aboue mentioned containe.

D countrey, by letters dated in the yeare nine hundred thirtie foure. The Biſhops did the like for their parts. Galinde Biſhop of Pampelone, for the great deuotion which he had vnto the Couent of S. Sauiour of Leyra (where ſometimes had beene the Epiſcopall ſeat of Pampelone) gaue vnto the Abbot and religious of that place all the titles of the Archpreſbiterie of the valley of Onſella, by an Inſtrument dated nine hundred thirtie eight. The king D. Garcia, and D. Thereſa his wife, gaue Villar de la Tour, neere vnto Nagera, with all the territorie and iuriſdiction, to the ſame Monaſterie, in the yeare nine hundred fortie three. Moreouer, by other letters, dated in the yeare nine hundred fortie foure, D. Garcia, and the Queene his wife, and D. Galinde the Biſhop, (who is there called by the King, his lord and maſter) confirme the donation of part of the titles belonging to the Biſhop, of the places aboue mentioned: And beſides, there is another donation made of all that the king

E of Nauarre ſhould conquer from the Moores, Infidels, and Barbarians.

D. Ramir, the third of that name, and twentieth King of Leon.

12 IN the yeare nine hundred fortie one, D. Ramir was ſetled king at Leon: at whoſe comming the Norman pyrats did much annoy the coaſt of Gallicia. This king being verie young, he was gouerned by the Queene D. Thereſa his mother, and by D. Elutra, Leon.

F ſiſter to the deceaſed king his father, being a religious woman. The peace which had beene treated with Hali Hatan, was confirmed by the mediation of the Biſhop D. Velaſco, who was at Cordoua, at the death of D. Sancho, and had brought with him the bodie of the infant Pelagius, the which was layed in a Monaſterie built to that end by the deceaſed king. Monaſterie of S. Pelagius.

The Normanes which came into Gallicia, being led by a captaine called Gundired, ſpoyled all along the ſea ſhore; and entring into the maine land, they burnt townes, villages, and caſtles, ſpoyling and putting all to the ſword they encountred, holding as it were the poſſeſſion of Gallicia for the ſpace of two whole yeares, the which the king D. Ramir had no meanes to reſiſt, by reaſon of his nonage: yet in the end he was perſuaded to ſend ſome troupes of ſouldiors, vnder the commaund of an Earle called D. Gonſalo Sanches, who watched his opportunitie ſo well, as he defeated the Normanes, ſlew their captaine Gundired, and burnt their ſhippes. D. Siſenand ſecond Biſhop of Compoſtella, had beene ſlaine by theſe pyrates: he was a turbulent man, and an vnworthie Prelate, of whom Hiſtories report, that for his vices, prodigalitie, and lewd life, the king D. Sancho the fat had cauſed him to be put in priſon; in whoſe place Rodoſinde was choſen, a holie man and of good fame, a Monke of the Order of S. Benet: but after the death of D. Sancho, Siſenana being gotten out of priſon, he came with force to enter his Biſhopricke, being reſolued to kill Rodoſinde: the which he had effected, if this holie man had not willingly quit the place, returning to his Monaſterie, where he ended the reſt of his dayes. Afterwards, Siſenand purſuing the Normanes, being more fit to commaund ſouldiors then to gouerne the Church of Chriſt, hee was ſlaine with an arrow neere vnto Fornellos. Such were the Biſhops for the moſt part in thoſe times. The Eſtate of Leon was by this meanes peaceable, both within it ſelfe, and in regard of enemies abroad, hauing peace with the Moores.

Caſtille.

King Hali Hatan being loth that the beginning of his raigne ſhould paſſe without ſome famous exploit, being alſo ſollicited by D. Bela of Nagera, a knight of Alaua, who (as we haue ſaid) had beene expelled by D. Fernand, Earle of Caſtille, and was retyred to the Moores Court at Cordoua, hee rayſed a mightie armie, the which hee ſent to ruine the Earle of Caſtille (againſt whom he had a ſpleene, for the former warres) and tocke from him Sepuluedas, S. Eſtienne of Gormas, and other places, about the yeare 942, the which the Earle of Caſtille could not ſuddainely preuent, whereat he was ſo much diſcontented, as within few dayes after he died in Burgos, to the great griefe of all the people of Caſtille, and was interred in the Monaſterie of Arlanſa, which he founded. There is ſome reaſon to doubt of the yeare of his death, for that there is found in the Inſtruments and Titles of donation made by him, to the Monaſterie of S. Emylian, of the towne of Saint Marie de Pezuegos, dated in the yeare 944; to the Church of S. Martin of Granon, the yeare 945; of certaine houſes in the towne of Salines; of the Church of S. Stephen of Sabredo, dated 947, to the ſame Monaſterie: of the Church of S. Iohn Baptiſt of Ciguri, vpon the riuer of Tiron, the which runnes into the riuer Ebro, neere vnto the towne of Haro: where it is expreſſely ſaid, that the Earle D. Fernand and D. Sancha his wife make this donation to the Abbot and religious of the ſaid Monaſterie, and to their ſucceſſors, for the loue of the glorious Confeſſor S. Emylian, that at the dreadfull day of judgement they might deſerue to heare that comfortable voice of the Lord, Come ye bleſſed of my father, &c. In theſe letters D. Ferdinand did intitle himſelfe Earle of Caſtille, of Alaua, and of Nagera.

There are regiſters and memorials found alſo in the Monaſterie of S. Emylian, making mention of the Earle D. Fernand and of D. Vrraca his firſt wife, of the yeare 964, the which without doubt is falſe and counterfeit, as in truth there is no great certaintie in any thing which the Monkes produce of their priuiledges, donations, exemptions, and other graunts of auncient kings. It is to be ſeene vpon the tombe of D. Sancha, Counteſſe of Caſtille, in the great Chappell of S. Peter of Arlanſa, that ſhe died that yeare 964: and in the Æra 1002, to Cont Fernand Gonſales ſucceeded his third ſonne D. Garcia Fernandes, the firſt of that name in the Earledome of Caſtille, and other places aboue mentioned, in the yeare, according to the common opinion, 942.

Donations, priuiledges, and other titles of Monaſteries vncertaine.

Moores.

13 The Moores being maſters of the field in Caſtille, there being no forces together to withſtand them, being puſt vp with ſucceſſe, they entred the territories of Leon, breaking the peace which they had with the king D. Ramir, without any ſubiect, and came and beſieged the towne of Zamora, the which they tooke, and ruined. whom they called for that reſpect Muſarabes, had remained in great tranquilitie and peace, without forcing them in their religion in any ſort whatſoeuer: Moreouer, they had juſtice duely adminiſtred, paying the penſions and tributes which were impoſed vpon them, whereby they were aſſured from all violence. But Hali Hatan being come to the Crowne, he was ſo zealous in his religion, and conceiued ſo great a hatred againſt that of the Chriſtians, as he publiſhed an edict, by the which all Chriſtians dwelling vnder his iuriſdiction, were commanded to abiure the religion of Ieſus Chriſt, and cauſing themſelues to be circumciſed, to imbrace that of Mahumet, vpon paine of death. Then did the ſpirit of God quicken in the hearts of many, the fire which had beene ſmothered by the humane traditions; and inſtructing them inwardly (ſeeing that ordinarie meanes failed, or were corrupted) made it appeare vnto the world, that the true religion hath no better meanes of propagation, than perſecution: for loue and charitie ſurmount nature, making the dull quicke witted, cauſing them which were in a manner dumbe to ſpeake, and giuing force and courage to the ſimple and weake. Many Chriſtians of all ſexes and ages, did vertuouſly confeſſe the ſaluation we haue in Ieſus Chriſt, by his onely merit and ſatisfaction, before the Inquiſitors and Iudges, which were ſent by this barbarous king. The names of which holie martyrs are worthie of memorie, to be a preſident to all the faithfull; but we haue too few of them. In the citie of Cordoua there were put to death, for the teſtimonie of Chriſts truth, Aurelius, Gregorius, and Felix, with their wiues, Natalia, Creſcencia, and Lilioſa. In the territorie of Rioje, Victor, borne at Cerezo (who had long defended his fellow citizens from the violence of the Moores) was beheaded. At Boſca, neere to Nagera, Nunilla and Allodia, two holy ſiſters, ſuffered death: Yet by the letters and priuiledges of the kings of Nauarre, giuen to S. Sauiour in Leyre (where they ſay they were buried) it ſeemes their death was long before this perſecution. In Arragon, in the towne of Iaca, the holie virgine Euroſia ſuffered: and many others in diuers parts of Spaine, where the Moores commaunded. Thus were the Chriſtians afflicted both in peace and warre, by armes, and by vniuſt proceedings.

Martyres vnder the Moores.

The Authors of the Spaniſh Hiſtorie make no mention, that the king D. Ramir had any great care to ſuppreſſe the inſolencie of theſe Arabian Infidels, nor to be reuenged for their breach of peace, and the ruine and euerſion of ſuch a towne as Zamora was: but they onely ſay, That about the yeare 955, being of full age, he maried with a ladie called D. Vrraca, by whom it is not found that he had any children: and abandoning himſelfe to a voluptuous life, he contemned all good counſell: ſo as the earles and noblemen of Gallicia, ſeeing his follie, and diſcontented with his vices, they skorned him, and would no more acknowledge him for their king. Whereupon they did chuſe D. Bermund, ſonne to the laſt king D. Ordogno, and intitled him King of Gallicia: which title and countrey he enioyed ten yeares, notwithſtanding all the attempts of D. Ramir, who made warre there two whole yeares, with great loſſe of his beſt men.

D. Garcia Fernandes new Earle of Caſtille, reſiſted the Moores valiantly, and being alſo inuited by the baſeneſſe of king D. Ramir, and it may be by the remembrance of the injuries done by the king D. Sancho to the Earle D. Ramir, and the wrongs done by him alſo vnto the Earle D. Fernand his father, he entred the territories of Leon, and withdrew ſome places from him, ſo as falling to an accord, the riuer of Carrion was made the bounds betwixt the Eſtates of Leon and Caſtille. They hold, That this earle D. Garcia Fernandes, did build in Curuas Rubias, the monaſterie of S. Coſme and Damian, and indowed it with great priuiledges, lands and poſſeſſions: retaining ſuch a right of patronage, That if any gentlewomen of his familie ſhould want meanes to marie them according to their eſtates, or would liue vnmaried, they ſhould be prouided for, and entertained: leauing to the religious which ſerue in the monaſterie, a competent penſion to nouriſh them. This earle did augment the number of horſemen in Caſtille to ſix hundred, which at his fathers death were but two hundred. He maried twice to French ladies, but vnfortunatly: his firſt wife was called D. Argentina, daughter to a French earle, with whom hee fell in loue, when as in the companie of her father and mother, ſhe paſt through Caſtille, in pilgrimage to S. Iaques of Compoſtella, and demanded her of her father: but ſhe proued vnchaſt, abandoning her ſelfe to a French knight, who came from S. Iaques, and carried her away into France, the earle being ſicke in bed, ſix yeares after their mariage. peares by the inſcriptions of the ſaid monaſterie. Moreouer, he had another ſonne, called D.

buried with her husband) it is ſaid, that ſhe was neece to the Emperour Henrie: and is in all places called Abba, or Ogna. Beſides theſe two ſonnes, ſhee had one daughter called D. Vrraca, who was profeſt in the monaſterie of S. Coſme and Damian, about Arlanſa. During the time the earle was in France to ſeeke meanes to be reuenged, and to get his new and they write, That in the way they forced the monaſterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, and

Biſhop. is written in the Spaniſh Hiſtories, that D. Bermond raigning in Gallicia, by an accord made with D. Ramir king of Leon, and making his ordinarie reſidence in the towne of S. Iaques, there came to the Epiſcopall dignitie of that place, D. Pelagius, Biſhop of Lugo, ſonne to Cont Roderigo Velaſques: who ſhewing himſelfe a prophane man, and diſpoſing of Eccleſia-ſticall dignities to vnworthie men, deſerued to be expelled, by the king D. Bermond, who aduanced in his place a Monke of Saint Benoiſt, called D. Pedro of Monſorio, of a reaſona-ble good life. Cont Roderigo and his followers being incenſed at this diſgrace done vnto his ſonne, called the Moores into Gallicia, to be reuenged of the king D. Bermond. King Hizen was verie young at the deceaſe of his father Hali Hatan; wherefore a nobleman among the Moores, valiant, and verie famous, called Mahomad ibne, Aben Hamur, and by L ſurname Alhabib Almanſor, tooke vpon him the gouernement of the realme of Cordoua, and of all Spaine vnder the Moores juriſdiction, the which he held fiue and twentie yeares:
and they report, that during his life, they entred two and fiftie times into the Chriſtians countrey; and that he was of ſuch credit among the Moores, as all was done by his aduice and counſell, Hizen hauing nothing but the bare name. Conſidering the name and ſurname of this great captaine, it is to be preſumed he had beene ſent out of Affricke, by Manſor, Mi-ralmumin of Maroc, then raigning, to gouerne Spaine during the minoritie of the king of Cordoua: for Alhabib Manſor, is interpreted, Captaine, or protector and defendor of his king Manſor: Almanſor ſignifies victorious. The proper name of the Miralmumin was Bal- haraho. The Moores in Spaine drew great ſuccours from Affricke, in manner of a Croiſa- M doe, and vnder the title of religion. The firſt paſſage of the Moores into the Chriſtians countrey, in the raigne of this king, was in the yeare 963, at the inſtance of Roderigo Velaſques, into Gallicia, where he committed infinit ſpoyles, and ruined part of S. Iaques church. But the plague being in his campe, he was forced to retire, and could not wholly ruine the countrey, as he had intended.

The

A The king D. Bermond, and the noblemen of Gallicia, after the Moores retrait, repaired the ſpoyles which they had made, as well as they could. In the meane time the king D. Ramir died without children, in the yeare 965: ſo as the kingdome of Leon came to the king D. Bermond. D. Ramir was interred at Deſtriana, a monaſterie of a royall foundation, and a long time after tranſported to Aſtorga. S. Iaques church being repaired, and newly conſecrated, D. Pedro of Manſorio, the Biſhop, died; and in his place D. Pelagius Diaz was choſen, a lewd man, and a contemner of all religion: wherefore he was iuſtly expelled, and Vimare his brother aduanced in his ſtead, who for his vices deſerued by a juſt judgement of God, to be drowned in the riuer of Minio. There was another ſubſtituted to him of as bad a life, the which B was put in priſon by the king D. Bermond. Thus was the church of S. Iaques ſtill furniſhed with bad Paſtors.

15 DOn Bermond, or Veremond, or Bermund, ſonne to king D. Ordogno the third, vnited the two realms of Leon and Gallicia, being receiued after the death of D. Ramir, without any difficultie.

Leon. Anno 965.

C In the beginning of his raigne, or thereabouts, Alcorrexi was famous: hee was the firſt Moore (of whom any mention is made) that was called King of Seuile, ſince the Monarchie of the Arabians in Spaine: who ſpoyled all that part of Gallicia which now belongs to Portugal, and lyes betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio; and paſsing on he waſted all the countrey vnto S. Iaques, the which he ſacked, and ruined. His armie was infected with the plague, as that of Almanſor, or Mahomad Ibne Aben Hamur, had beene; who returned into the territories of Leon, and that knight of Alaua, aboue mentioned, marching with him, accompanied with a band of Chriſtians his friends and partiſans, he defeated the king D. Bermond in battell, at the riuer of Eſtolle, beyond Duero, and beſieged the citie of Leon, from whence he was forced to raiſe his ſiege, by reaſon of the waters and Winter. In the Spring he returD ned to this ſiege, into the which the king had put an earle, called Don Guillen Gonſales, gouernour of Gallicia, who did his beſt indeuor to defend it: for being ſicke in his bed, he cauſed himſelfe to be carried in a litter, to the place where as the Moores made their greateſt attempt, and defended it three dayes: but in the end, not able to reſiſt ſo great a power, the towne was taken, D. Guillen, and many other braue men, were ſlaine, and the ſacke giuen to the ſouldiers. D. Bermond had beene carefull to retire the bodies of kings his predeceſſors, and eſpecially the reliques and other jewels of the temple, the which he cauſed to bee tranſported to Ouiedo. This calamitie happened in the yeare 968, the which fell alſo vpon Aſtorga, Valence de Campo, Sahagun, Gordon, Albe, Lune, and other townes which were ruined. Then the Moores entring Caſtille, they tooke and ſackt the townes of Oſma, Berlanga, AtiE enſa, and other places, whereof ſome were ruined and ſome made tributarie. And with this ſucceſſe they returned with their victorious armie to Cordoua, with great ſpoyls, and (which was moſt lamentable) a great number of poore Chriſtian ſlaues of all ſexes and ages: and to increaſe their miſeries, and to aggrauate their guilt, they were for the moſt part ſo careleſſe of God and all religion, as they betrayed their brethren and companions vnto the Moores, without reſpect of bloud, countrey, profeſsion, or honour.

Diuiſion of Chriſtians giues an entrie to the Infidels.

In Caſtille there was a knight called D. Ruy Velaſques, lord of Villaren, whoſe ſiſter D. Sancha was maried to D. Gonſal Iuſte, ſonne to that Iuſte Gonſales who was iſſued from a daughter of D. Diego Porcello; and who enjoyed the Seigniories of Salas and of Lara. D. Gonſal Iuſte, and D. Sancha his wife, had ſeuen ſonnes, whom they commonly called the children of F Lara, or of Salas, bred vp in all vertue, by a diſcreet knight, called Nugno Salido, who was valiant and hardie; all which were made knights in one day, by the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, vnto whom they were allied. It happened, that D. Ruy de Velaſques, their vncle by the mothers ſide, maried a ladie borne in Bureua, the chiefe towne of which country is Birbieſca: her name was D. Lambra, allied alſo to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes: ſhe was young indiſcreet, proud, and high minded. Whoſe mariage was celebrated with great pompe in the citie of Burgos, whiwhither came many knights from Caſtille, Leon, Nauarre, and other places, and among others, D. Gonſal Iuſte, and his wife D. Sancha, with their ſeuen ſonnes aſsiſted. During the ſolemnitie of this mariage, which continued fiue weekes, the younger brother of the ſeuen had ſome vnkind ſpeeches with D. Aluaro Sanches, couſen to D. Lambra the Bride, who were for that time reconciled by the meanes of the earle D. Garcia, and of D. Gonſal Iuſte, father to one of the contendants. But the new maried wife was ſo incenſed for this breach with her couſen, as ſhe conceiued a deadly hatred againſt all the houſe of Lara. The mariage being ended, D. Sancha went with her ſeuen ſonnes, to accompanie the maried couple to their houſe at Barbadillo, whereas D. Lambra eſpying one day the younger brother (which had the quarell with her couſen) in an orchard, bathing a Goſhawke, ſhe commaunded a groome to caſt a filthie Cocumber at him, to doe him a deſpight: wherewith the knight, and his brethren, who were preſent, being moued, they purſued this groome in ſuch a rage, as thinking to ſaue himſelfe by the fauour of his ladie, he was ſlaine neere vnto her, who could not ſaue him.

Diſpoſition of a woman inclined to reuenge.

At the ſame time neither D. Ruy Velaſques, nor D. Gonſales Iuſte, were with their wiues, for they did accompanie the earle D. Garcia, who preſently after this mariage, went to viſit his countrey, and the forts of Caſtille: but when as they were returned to Barbadillo, they vnderſtood (to their great griefe) of this outrage. Euerie one retires to his own houſe; D. Lambra mad with rage & impatiencie, wept, & exclaimed continually, ſaying vnto her husband, That if he did not revenge this affront done vnto her ſelfe, ſhe ſhould neuer liue contented. And ſuch was the importunitie of this woman to her indiſcreet & ill aduiſed husband, as, to ſatisfie her, he reſolued to commit an act, vnworthie not onely of a Chriſtian knight, but of any one that carried but the ſhape of a man: For he had ſecret intelligence with Almanſor, Conſtable of Cordoua, vtterly to ruine this familie of Lara. Making ſhew therefore to haue ſome buſineſſe of importance with this Moore, and his king Hizen, he intreated his brother in law D. Gonſales Iuſte, to goe to Cordoua, with letters which he gaue him; whereunto he offered himſelfe willingly. In the meane time the traitor Velaſques had written to Hizen and Almanſor, That they ſhould put him to death; & moreouer, that if he ſent any one with a good troup into Caſtille, he would deliuer the ſeuen ſonnes vnto him, which were the moſt redoubted knights, and the greateſt enemies to the Arabians, that the earle of Caſtille had in his Court. D. Gonſales Iuſte being arriued at Cordoua, and hauing preſented his letters vnto the king, he was preſently put in priſon: for the king being wiſe, although an Infidell, would not altogether countenance ſo great a treaſon. Wherefore he kept this embaſſadour aliue; yet he ſent preſently towards the countrey of Almenar (where theſe brethren ſhould be deliuered vnto him) a captaine with a great troupe of ſouldiers, where (as they write) D. Ruy de Valaſques gaue ſuch order, as the ſeuen brethren fell into an ambuſh of Moores, being accompanied onely with two hundred horſe, which made reſiſtance: but the enemies were ſo many, as one of the brethren called Fernand Gonſales, and all the two hundred, with Nugno Sallido, were ſlaine vpon the place: the other ſix eſcaped, and hauing drawne together three hundred horſe more, and returned to the combat, they were againe defeated, and taken by the Moors, who cut off their heads, and ſent them all to Cordoua, as well thoſe of the ſeuen brethren, as that of their Gouernour Nugno Sallido.

A Mahumetiſt more courteous to a ſtranger, then D. Ruy de Velaſques a Chriſtian, to his own bloud.

The lamentable death of the ſeuen brethren of Lara.

The king was verie glad to ſee himſelfe freed from ſuch redoubted enemies; and to afflict the father, who was priſoner, he cauſed theſe heads to be ſhewed vnto him: who knew them, and was ſo oppreſt with griefe, as he fell downe dead vpon the place. Being taken vp, and reuiued, he made ſuch pitifull lamentations, as euen the barbarous king himſelfe was much moued, and thought euen then to ſet him at libertie, deteſting the wickedneſſe of that traiterous Chriſtian D. Ruy de Velaſques.

Humanitie of king Hizen to his priſoner.

They ſay, That whileſt D. Gonſales Iuſte was detained in priſon, but not verie ſtraitly, being often viſited by noblemen and ladies, that were Moores, there grew ſo great familiaritie betwixt him & one of the chief ladies of the kings houſe, which, ſome ſay, was his ſiſter, as he got her with child: which perceiuing, about the time of his deliuerie, they tooke good order for the infant, when it ſhould be borne. It was a ſonne, whom they called Mudarra Gonſales, who reuenged the treaſon of D. Ruy Velaſques, committed againſt his father and brethren. D. Gonſales Iuſte returned to Salas, with gifts from the Mooriſh king. As for the bodies of the dead, they were interred, but no man knowes where; for there is ſome queſtion about it, betwixt the the Monkes of S. Peter of Arlanſa, and thoſe of S. Emilian of Cogolla; the which we cannot deſide, either of them maintaining to haue in their churches and conuents, the tombes of theſe ſeuen brethren, their father, and Gouernour, without any great prooſe of their aſſertions, as in other things. Such was the diſpoſition and affection of men of that age, who called themſelues Chriſtians. They hold, that theſe things happened in the yeare 969; ſome ſay it was ſome yeares before. But euerie one to reuenge his priuate quarels, did hazard the publick: and not able to oppreſſe their enemies by open force, they vſed vnlawfull and damnable meanes, to wrong one another, making way for the Moors, or rather inuiting them, to inuade the Chriſtians countrey. Anno 969.

In the yeare 975 a great armie of Moores, both Spaniards and Affricanes, led by that famous captaine Alhabib Almanſor, inuaded the countrey betwixt Duero and Minio, and from thence into Gallicia: ſo as the towne and church of S. Iaques was taken by them, ſackt and ruined. Yet the Spaniards ſay, That the Apoſtles ſepulchre could not be violated, being terrified with a great light which came out of it: but they onely tooke the little bells in the ſteeple, and carried them away with the reſt of the prey to Cordoua, where they made them ſerue for lampes to their great Moſquee. In the meane time (as Authors write) the Moores armie was ſo afflicted with the plague, and bloudie flix, as being forced to diſperſe themſelues, they were cut in peeces by D. Bermonds troups, which he had ſent to follow them in their retrait: So God by his power did ſupplie the defects of indiſcreet and cowardly Chriſtian Princes. Leon. An. 975. S. Iaques taken by the Moores.

The king D. Bermond, as the Spaniſh Hiſtories write, was wiſe, but withall had great defects. He was light of beleefe, and ſoone incenſed; and withall, ſo much giuen to his delights and pleaſures, as he had both bodie and mind corrupted. He did inceſtuouſly entertaine two ſiſters for his concubines, before he maried; by the one of which he had a ſonne called D. Ordogno; by the other a daughter named D. Eluira. After which he maried D. Velaſquita, whom he put away, after that he had had a daughter by her, called D. Chriſtina. To his ſecond wife he maried a ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had D. Alphonſo, who was king after him, and one daughter called D. Thereſa, who was profeſt a Nunne, and was borne before her brother D. Alphonſo. He became full of the gout, by reaſon of his exceſſe, ſo as he was lame of his limmes, and therefore was called the Goutie. Pleaſures corrupt both mind and bodie.

D. Sancho Garces, third of that name, and eleuenth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

16 THere is no great certainetie of the exploits of the kings of Nauarre in theſe times, either through the negligence of Hiſtorians, or the loſſe of their writings. They conieture, that the king D. Sancho Garces liued vnto the yeare 969; and that he was interred in the monaſterie of S. Sauiour of Leyre: to whom ſucceeded his ſonne D. Sancho Garces, whom he had by D. Thereſa, by whom he had alſo D. Ramir his ſecond ſonne, who gouerned the prouince called Vicaria. He had daughters, D. Vrraca, Ermeſilda, and Eximena. The king had to wife a ladie called D. Vrraca Fernandes, by whom he had three ſonnes, D. Garcia, D. Gonſales, and D. Ramir.

Leon.

This king D. Sancho Garces, the third of that name, raigning; the king D. Bermond ſeeing the great miſeries which fell daily vpon the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their diuiſions, whereof the Infidell Moores made their profit, he ſought by all meanes poſsible to make a good vnion betwixt Leon, Nauarre, and Caſtille: the which tooke good effect, for all the Princes and Lords of theſe Eſtates, ſhewing themſelues readie, and deſirous to be reuenged of the wrong which the Moores had done in Gallicia, Caſtille, and elſewhere, they vnited their forces, and came to incounter the Moores with a goodly armie (theirs being not leſſe) at a place called Calacanaſor, an Arabian word, which ſignifies yoake: where there was a memorable battell, and great effuſion of bloud, eſpecially of the Moores: and yet the fight hauing continued a whole day, the victorie ſeemed doubtfull. But Alhabib the Arabian hauing gathered his forces together, and viewed his great loſſe, he diſlodged in the night, with ſo great griefe, as he died within few dayes after, at a place called Begalcoraxo, or Borgecorex. The Chriſtians at the breake Battell memorable at Calacanaſor.

breake of day, ſeeing their enemies diſlodged, ſacked their campe; and by the conduct of G of D. Garcia Fernandes, earle of Caſtille, who was the chiefe Commaunder in this warre(for the king D. Bermond, although he cauſed himſelfe to be carried in the armie, was vnable, by reaſon of his gout) purſued the Moores, whereof they made a great ſlaughter, putting all the reſt to flight in great confuſion. This Alhabib the Arabian, was without doubt a great ſouldier; and, they ſay, that for griefe of this loſſe he would neither eat nor drinke, and ſo aduanced his owne death. The Moores carried him to Medina-Celi, then called Zelim, where they buried him. He left one ſonne, called Abdemelic Abundaſin, who had accompanied him in all his warres, and was in like manner a braue and valiant knight; who had the ſame charge of Captaine generall, as his father: and being deſirous to reuenge this loſſe, led an armie the ſame H yeare towards Leon, the which he ruined, euen to the verie foundations. D. Garcia Fernandes, earle of Caſtille, gathered together all the forces he could in Leon and Caſtille, fought with him, and put him to rout: ſo as after that time the Moores came into the dominions of Chriſtian Princes with more reſpect. After which things, the two Princes reſtored the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, to their poſſeſsions and rights which belonged vnto them, and ſought to giue euerie man contentment, in regard of priuat quarels, that by theſe occaſions the Mahumetiſts might not attempt againſt their Eſtates. Theſe ſpoyles which the Moores had made in the countries of Leon and Caſtille, were the cauſe of a great dearth, the land being vnpeopled both of men and cattell, ſo as it lay waſt: And withall there was a great drought, the wrath of God hauing ſhut vp heauen for many dayes, without ſending any raigne in that I region. And for that in thoſe dayes they held no crime ſo capitall, as to lay hands vpon Clergie men, the Spaniards did beleeue, that theſe calamities had fallen vpon them, beſides the warres, for that the king D. Bermond had cauſed D. Gudeſteo, Archbiſhop of Ouiedo, to be put in priſon, or giuen him in gard to D. Ximeno, Biſhop of Aſtorga, vpon ſome ſlaunderous accuſations, wherewith this Prelate was charged, and too lightly beleeued by the king, who was much ſubiect to that vice of credulitie. And thereupon they ſay, That God had reuealed to certaine religious men, that he was reſolued to ſend the plague for a third ſcourge, by reaſon of the vnjuſt impriſonment of this Biſhop. Whereof the king D. Bermond being aduertiſed, he was verie ſorrowfull for his offeuce, and repenting, demaunded pardon. Where- K fore vpon the Biſhops deliuerie the wrath of God was appeaſed, and it began to raine. From that time the king gaue himſelfe to all workes of pietie, and did, as well as he could, repaire the ruines which had beene made by the Moores throughout his kingdome, eſpecially of the church of Saint Iaques. He gaue many gifts, and did almes deeds, yet with the aduice of the Prelates of thoſe times. As for juſtice, he had alwayes a care thereof; and, as they ſay, reſtored the auncient lawes of the kings of Gothes, and the decrees of the Church, commanding that juſtice ſhould be done to euerie one throughout his realme accordingly. His death,

Death of Alhabib Almanſor.

Anno 982. according to the common opinion, was in the yeare 982, at a place called Berizo, otherwiſe the good towne of Bereſto; where he was interred, and three and twentie yeares after taken vp, to be laid in the church of Saint Iohn Baptiſt at Leon. Among his children we haue made mention of one daughter, D. Chriſtina; ſhe was maried to a nobleman, or Prince of the bloud L royall, called D. Ordogno, who was blind; by whom ſhe had three ſonnes, D. Alphonſo, D. Ordogno, D. Pelagius; and one daughter, D. Aldonſa. This Aldonſa maried D. Pelagius the Deacon, ſonne to the Infanta D. Fruela, baſtard to Fruela the ſecond, king of Leon: of which mariage iſſued D. Pedro Ordognes, D. Pelagius, D. Nugno, and D. Thereſa, who was ladie of Carrion, where ſhe cauſed the church of Saint Pelaio, or Pelagius, to be built.

In Cattelogne the State was quiet, during the minoritie of the earle D. Seniofrid, vnder the gouernement of the earle of Vrgel, of the ſame name: from which earle iſſued D. Borel and D. Armingol, or Ermengaud, Biſhop of Vrgel, reputed a Saint. His regencie continued two and twentie yeares, which ended in the yeare 950, When as hee reſigned the gouernement of the Eſtate to his nephew, the earle D. Seniofrid, who was maried to D. Maria, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to D. Sancho Abarca, by whom hee had not any children; M and dying about the yeare 967, he left for his ſucceſſor his couſin D. Borel, ſonne to the earle of Vrgel; for that his brother D. Oliban was vnfit to gouerne ſuch an Eſtate, by reaſon of many imperfections, beſides that of his ſpeech, as the Spaniards write: Yet this D. Oliban did riſe in Armes againſt his couſen, and was the cauſe of great diuiſions and factions in the countrey:

A trey: by reaſon whereof the Arabians watching ſtill their opportunitie to annoy the Chriſtians, entred the territories of Barcelone, where they committed infinit ſpoyles. This D. Borel remained earle in the end, and is numbred the fourth proprietarie of Cattelogne. He had one ſonne, called D. Raymond Borel, who was borne in the yeare 970, of the counteſſe Leodegarde, his firſt wife, and was earle after him. To his ſecond wife he maried Aymerude, and by her had D. Ermingaud, or Armingol, who was earle of Vrgel; and one daughter, named Borella, or, as ſome ſay, Engelrade, who was profeſt a Nunne. He defended his countrey valiantly againſt the incurſions and furie of the Arabians, but with no great ſucceſſe. He cauſed forts to be made where need required, to ſtop their incurſions, and aſſure his countrey.

B D. Oliban, his couſen, reſigned his intereſt, for that he would not fauour the Infidels by a ciuile warre, and giue them meanes to inuade Cattelogne, contenting himſelfe with a priuate life. He was father to D. Bernard, ſurnamed Briſefer, or Breake-yron, who was earle of Beſalu, of D. Geoffrey earle of Cerdagne, and of a third ſonne, called D. Oliban, who was Biſhop of Vic d'Oſana, and had beene Abbot of Ripol, a monaſterie reedified in the yeare 976, by the earle D. Borel: In the which yeare the Nunnes of Monſerrat were tranſported to the Monaſterie of Mon-Iuhy, neere vnto the caſtle of the Port, built by the ſame earle, and in Monſerrat were placed the Monkes of Saint Benoiſt: to which place the earle D. Borel gaue great lands and poſſeſſions, which he bought from priuate men. Leon.

Anno 982.

18 AFter king D. Bermond, D. Alphonſo his ſonne did inherite, being the fift of that name, and two and twentieth in order of the kings of Leon, in the yeare 982, being onely foureteene yeares old. His father had giuen him, to breed vp, to the earle of Gallicia, called D. Melendo Gonſales, and to his wife D. Maior, whoſe daughter, D. Eluira, he maried, when he came to age: of whom deſcended D. Bermond, who ſucceded his father in the realme of Leon, and D. Sancha promiſed after the deceaſe of the king D. Alphonſo, vnto D. Garcia, earle of Caſtille; but he dying, ſhe was wife to D. Fernand the Great, the firſt which carried that title of king of Caſtille, ſonne to D. Sancho the elder, king of Nauarre. In

E the time of this king D. Alphonſo, Zephirus Biſhop of Aſtorga liued, who writ ſome Hiſtories of Spaine.

Caſtille.

We haue heretofore made mention of the loues of Gonſal Iuſte, being priſoner at Cordoua, with a Princeſſe, a Moore; the which proceeded ſo farre, as when he was ſet at libertie by king Hizen, ſhe was with child, and was brought in bed of a ſonne, named Mudarra Gonſales. Thoſe that haue written the Hiſtories of Spaine, ſay, That he was nouriſhed and inſtructed in the citie of Cordoua, by the diligence of his mother (whom they make ſiſter to king Hizen) in all things befitting a Prince; ſo as hee was much beloued by the king his vncle, by whom he was armed a knight, at the age of tenne yeares, and became valiant and redoubted, as much as any of his time.

F When he came to yeares to judge of honour, his mother told him who was his father, and by what meanes ſhee had beene familiar with him, and eſpecially the death of his ſeuen brethren of Lara, by the treaſon of D. Ruys Velaſques, and the damnable appetite of reuenge of D. Lambra his wife. Wherefore this young nobleman had a wonderfull deſire to ſee and know D. Gonſal Iuſte, his father. Hauing therefore not onely obtained leaue, but alſo an honourable traine of noblemen and knights from the king, he came to Salas, where the father and the ſonne had meanes to know and aduow one another, to their great joy and content: and ſoone after Mudarra, hauing left the law of Mahumet, was baptized, and made a Chriſtian. Then he came in companie with his father to Burgos, to kiſſe the hands of the earle D. Garcia, and to watch an opportunitie to kill his vncle D. Ruis Velaſques, and to reuenge the death of his ſeuen brethren; the which he did execute in time, as D. Ruis went from Burgos to his houſe of Barbadillo: and finally, hee found meanes to get D. Lambra into his power, whom he cauſed to be hung vp, and then burnt her bodie: but it was after the death of D. Garcia, earle of Caſtille, to whom ſhee was allied. And for that he was verie like to the youngeſt of the ſeuen ſonnes of D. Sancha his mother in law, ſhe did loue him as deerely as if ſhe had beene his owne mother.

O'd offences puniſhed.

The Monkes of Saint Peter of Arlanſa ſhew a tombe in their church, without any inſcription, the which, they ſay, is the tombe of that knight D. Mudarra: of whom they make this Genealogie, or deſcent; which is, That he had one ſonne, named D. Ordogno de Lara, from whom iſſued D. Diego Ordogno de Lara, who did fight a combat at Zamora, againſt D. Arias Gonſales: from D. Diego Ordogno deſcended D. Pedro de Lara, and from him the earle D. Almaric of Lara, whom others call Malrique, or Manrique, who was lord of Molina des Comtes: and from him, they ſay, are deſcended, the Manriques of Lara in Caſtille. This earle D. Almaric, or Manrique de Lara, had one daughter, called D. Malfada Manrique, who was the firſt queene of Portugal, wife to D. Alphonſo Henrie, king of Portugal, of whom we will ſpeake hereafter.

Poſteritie of Mudarra Gonſales, from whence are deſcended the Manriques of Lara.

About the yeare 982, when as king D. Alphonſo came to the Crowne of Leon, there were great alterations in Caſtille; for that D. Sancho Garcia, ſonne and heire to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, rebelled againſt his father, and put Caſtille into factions. Whereupon the Moores failed not to enter the countrey of Caſtille, deſtroyed the citie of Auila, tooke Saint Eſtienne de Gormas, and Crugna in the biſhopricke of Oſma, ſlue, ſpoyled, and burnt all where they paſt.

Rebellio of the ſon againſt the father.

D. Garcia Fernandes being gone to field with thoſe ſouldiers of Caſtille whom hee thought to be beſt affected vnto him, being but few, in compariſon of the Moores, hee did hazard a battell; in which fighting valiantly, hee was enuironed by a multitude of his enemies, where his men were cut in peeces, and hee himſelfe taken aliue by the Moores, but ſo ſore wounded, as he died within few houres after. His bodie was afterwards redeemed for a great ſumme of money, and buried in the monaſterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, reedified by him ſeuenteene yeares before. This happened about the yeare nine hundred foureſcore and ten, or according to the inſcription of his tombe, nine hundred foureſcore and fiue. Then D. Sancho his ſonne, ſurnamed Garcia, was earle, without any contradiction; and, except this diſobedience againſt his father, he was a good Prince, and loued his ſubiects.

Defeat of the Caſtillans, and death of their earle.

*An.*990.

19 Whoſoeuer was mother to D. Sancho, either Abba, Ogna, or Sancha daughter to the knight which was ſlaine by D. Garcia, or elſe allied to the Emperour Henrie, there is a tragicall act reported of her in the Hiſtories of Spaine: That, being widow to her husband D. Garcia Fernandes, ſhee fell in loue with a Prince of the Moores, whom ſhee had heard was verie ſufficient in Venus ſports: ſo as ſhee had a ſecret treatie with him, to marie him; promiſing (to the end they might with more eaſe effect their deſigne) to make away her ſonne, by poyſon, vpon the firſt opportunitie: But God would haue this wickedneſſe diſcouered to the earle D. Sancho, the day before it ſhould bee put in execution. Wherefore being verie carefull of all things, as the mother and the ſonne dined together on the day appointed, the earle calling for drinke, they brought him a cup full of wine, mingled with poyſon: Then diſſembling what hee knew, he intreated his mother to drinke firſt, as if hee would doe her honour; but ſhee refuſing it, hee ſtill perſiſted, and in the end forced her to drinke this poyſon, whereof ſhee died. The generall Chronicle ſayes, That thereof grew a cuſtome in Caſtille, to make the women drinke firſt, the which is obſerued at this day in Biſcaie, and other parts in Spaine, by way of ciuilitie.

A diſhoneſt deſire of a counteſſe of Caſtille, and her impietie againſt her ſon.

Cuſtom to make the women drinke firſt in Spaine.

This

A This accident was the cauſe which made the earle D. Sancho to build the conuent of Saint Sautour of Ogna, where he placed Nunnes, and made a daughter of his, called D. Tygrida, Abbeſſe; thinking thereby to expiate his offence, for that he had haſtened his mothers death. Since there were Monks put in this monaſterie, and the women were tranſported elſewhere, by the king D. Sancho the elder, ſonne in law to this eale D. Sancho Garcia, and husband to D. Nugna: for the earle had by his wife D. Vrraca, one ſonne, who was called D. Garcia, who was earle of Caſtille after him; and three daughters, D. Nugna, who was queene of Nauarre, D. Thereſa, queene of Leon, wife to D. Bermond the third, and laſt of that name, theſe two ſiſters were elder than the Infant D. Garcia; and the third was the aboue named D. Tygrida, Abbeſſe of this monaſterie of S. Sauiour. Genealogie of Caſtille.

B 20 Whileſt theſe things paſt in Caſtille, the Moores entred Cattelogne with a great power, about the yeare 986, and gaue a great rout to the earle D. Borel, who thought to repulſe them neere to Moncada and Matabous: After which they beſieged Barcelone, and tooke it by force, with all the pitifull ſpectacles of crueltie, couetouſneſſe, and infamie, that are vſed in the like caſe; doing the like in many other places. Then laden with ſpoyles, and drawing after them an infinit number of poore Chriſtian ſlaues, they returned into their countrey. The earle, who was retired into the mountaines, hauing gathered together all the horſe and foot he could, returned to Barcelone, tooke it againe, and recouered all the places which the Moores had taken. Cattelogne was againe inuaded by the Moores Cattelogne. Barcelone taken and ruined by the Moores.

C which held Tortoſa, Lerida, Fraga, and other places, being joyned with them of the Iſle of Majorca, who once againe defeated the earle D. Borel: and thinking to ſaue himſelfe with about threeſcore horſe, he was purſued; and being forced to ſhut himſelfe vp in the caſtle of Gautha, neere to Caldes, he was forced, and ſlaine there, with all thoſe that were in his companie, in the yeare 993, hauing beene earle of Barcelone ſix and twentie yeares, where his ſonne D. Raymond Borel ſucceeded him. We find, that Lothaire king of France (vnder the ſoueraignetie of which kingdome the earledome of Barcelone was at that time) granted a great priuiledge to the monaſterie of S. Cucufat, in the vallies neere to Barcelone, giuen at Compiegne, in the yeare 987. Earle of Barcelone ſlaine by the Moores.

But returning to D. Sancho Garcia, earle of Caſtille, he being loath to leaue his fathers Caſtille.

D death vnreuenged, confirmed the league which his predeceſſor had made with Leon and Nauarre, and in the yeare 992 entred into the Moores countrey, by the realme of Toledo, with a great armie, ruining and ſpoyling all where he paſt, as the enemies had done in Leon and Caſtille: paſſing on into diuers other juriſdictions, where he had good opportunitie to ruine, burne, kill, and carrie away what he pleaſed, for that the Arabians were then full of factions for the ſoueraignetie. There was no head, order, nor councell, to oppoſe againſt the violence of this incenſed earle, ſo as he ranſomed many townes, and drew great ſummes of money from them, as well to ſpare their countrey, as to redeeme priſoners. He tooke the towne of Sepulueda, which was then a frontier for the Moores towards the ſtrait of Sumoſierra. Hee granted many priuiledges to the inhabitants thereof, reſtoring them to The exploits & conqueſts of D. Sancho, earle of Caſtille, vpõ the Moores.

E their auncient juriſdictions. He recouered the townes of Pennafiel, Maderuelo, Monteio, Gormas, Oſma, and Saint Eſteua; which places had beene loſt after the battell where his father D. Garcia was ſlaine. The earle did all theſe braue exploits againſt the Moores: but ſome hold, and not without reaſon, that they were before the death of the counteſſe his mother; who at the returne of this voyage (which was in the yeare 992) had newes what this aboue mentioned Prince of the Moores could doe with women: of whom ſhe grew ſo far in loue, as ſhe forgot all pietie, and honour, and in the end loſt her life. His name is not written by any Author. If the earle did much annoy the Moores by open warre, he did no leſſe by ſecret practiſes, entertaining factions among them, to trouble their eſtate, and make them more eaſie to be ſpoyled.

F 21 There were great ſeditions among the Arabians after the death of Abdemelic Abundaſin, Captaine generall, or Conſtable to king Hizen: for hauing beene ſubſtituted in the place of his brother, called Abderramen, and ſhewing himſelfe too ſeuere and proud in his commaunds, his place ſeeming alſo to be of too great authoritie, he was ſlaine by the ſouldiers: which bred great quarels and factions. D. Sancho, earle of Caſtille, and D. Alphonſo, Moores.

The declining of the Moores Monarchie in Spaine, by their diuiſions.

king of Leon, ſought by all meanes poſsible to entertaine theſe diuiſions, ſometimes fauou- G ring one partie, ſomtimes another: ſo as from that time the Arabians power began greatly to decline in Spaine, as it had beene alreadie diſmembred in the Eaſt, by their diſcord and furious deſire of raigne, the which we will hereafter relate in a more conuenient place.
The Eſtate of Miralmumin Hizen was wonderfully troubled in thoſe times, by many which deſired either to raigne, or to haue the greateſt charges in the kingdome of Cor-doua, namely, the dignitie of Alhabib: among the which there was a Moore, called Zuleima, ſtronger than the reſt, by the ſupport and fauour hee had from D. Sancho, earle of Caſtille: He tooke and ſhut vp Hizen, after that he had raigned three and thirtie yeares, Zulcima 11 king of the Moores at Cordoua. foure monethes, in the 379 yeare of the Arabians, and made himſelfe king of Cordoua, H in the yeare of our redemption 989. He was an African, or Barbarian, and was much fauoured from beyond the ſeas. In his raigne was the laſt rout giuen to the Cattelans, and their earle forced, and ſlaine, as we haue ſaid. But he did not long enjoy this Eſtate of Cor-Mahumad the third, the 12 king at Cordoua. doua; for another nobleman of great power, called Mahumad Mehedi, or Almohadi, of the linage of Aben Humeya, roſe vp againſt him, and depriued him of his kingdome in Spaine, in the yeare of our Lord 993, which he had maintained foure yeares, with great toyle and difficultie.

Abdalla king of Toledo. In his time there raigned a Moore at Toledo, called Abdalla, who was ſolicited in ſuch ſort by D. Alphonſo king of Leon, as they contracted together, and did ſweare a perpetuall offenſiue and defenſiue league betwixt them: the which was ſo ſtrongly confirmed, as D. I Alphonſo gaue his ſiſter D. Thereſa, a Chriſtian, in mariage to Abdalla, an Infidell king, and ſent her to him to Toledo, notwithſtanding that ſhe did contradict it all ſhe could. They ſay, That this Moore being readie to conſummate the mariage, he was admoniſhed by the Ladie, that it was not lawfull to doe it, ſeeing they were of two diuers religions; and that for ſo prophane a contempt, he might aſſure himſelfe God would puniſh him grieuouſly, if he reſolued to proceed. But notwithſtanding all her allegations, the Moore would not for-Mariage betwixt a Chriſtian and an Infidell, reproued of God. beare to accompliſh his deſire; but he was preſently ſurpriſed with ſuch a terrour and amazement, as if death had approached. Wherefore repenting himſelfe, he ſent backe D. Thereſa to Leon, to the king her brother, with great ſtore of treaſure, and rich jewels, for that he would not touch her. This princeſſe liued long in Leon, in the habit of a religious woman, K and in the end put her ſelfe into the monaſterie of Saint Pelagius, where ſhe died, and was interred.

In the meane time Mahumad the third, or Mahumet, of the race of Aben Humeia, ſurnamed Almohadi, ſetled himſelfe in the realme of Cordoua, and was Miralmumin of the Arabians in Spaine; who ſhewed himſelfe ſo cruell in the beginning, againſt the inhabitants of Cordoua, partiſans to Zuleima his predeceſſor, of the linage of Aben Alaueci, that many of them fled out of the citie, aud liued in baniſhment. By reaſon of this diuiſion, many other noblemen, Moores, ſeiſed vpon places and prouinces in Spaine, of the juriſdiction of the Miralmumins of Cordoua: as Abdalla did, who (as we haue ſaid) had ſeiſed vpon the citie of Toledo, & reſtored the royall ſeat there, where he was the fourth king: ſince which time it continued a royal- L tie, and returned no more vnder the ſoueraigntie of the kings of Cordoua. In ſome Authors Fable of Galiena. we find a tale of a Gentlewoman called Galiena, daughter to Galafrey, king of Toledo, who by her beautie drew Charlemaine out of France to Toledo, where he did fight with a knight called Bramante, that would haue maried her: and, they ſay, that Charles being victor, he led faire Galiena into France. But there is no great probabilitie, that this happened to Charlemaine. It may be that ſince there was a Galiena, daughter to ſome Gouernour of Toledo, called Galafrey, famous for ſome like act: For we find in the citie of Toledo, a place called Galienas Palace, where as now the Monaſterie of S. Foy is: and in like manner at Bourdeaux in Guienne. Which ſhewes, that ſome ladie of fame came out of Spaine into France, but conducted by ſome other Charles than he that was king and Emperor, ſurnamed M the Great. Zuleima being expelled by Mahumet, fled from towne to town, being accompanied by many Moors and Barbarians, who conſpired againſt him, in fauour of a couſen of his called Maroan, whom they would chuſe for their captaine: but being ready to kill him, Zuleima being aduertiſed, and prepared, ſlue them which pretended to murther him: As for his couſen Ma-

roan,

A roan, he ſaued his life, but he kept him in a ſtrait priſon. Being enuironed with ſo many miſeries, chaſed from Cordoua, a vagabond, and not ſafe among his owne followers, he had recourſe vnto D. Sancho, earle of Caſtille, craning ſuccours from him, to recouer his Eſtates. Wherewith the earle was verie well pleaſed, and led a great power of Chriſtians into the Moores countrey; and with him D. Raymond, earle of Barcelone, as ſome write. Mahumet did alſo make great leuies of ſouldiers, whereof the Alhabib, or Generall, was Albaharin Almaharin, who did reſide at Medina Zelim, or Celi; and had commaundement to come and joyne with the armie, with all the forces he could make. Their forces being joyned of either ſide, there was a fierce and bloudie battell, betwixt Zuleima and Mahumet; whereas Zuleima Cruell warres betwixt the Moores.
B (who had the forces of Caſtille with him) was victor, haning ſlaine fiue and thirtie thouſand of his enemies vpon the place: and purſuing his victorie, he chaſed Mahumet, and thoſe which remained, as farre as Cordoua. And whileſt that Zuleimaes men and the Chriſtians were buſie at the ſpoyle of the ſuburbs, the Alhabib Albaharin abandoned his king, and tooke his way to Medina Celi, with thoſe that would follow him. It was then a great fort and rampar of the Moores Eſtate, againſt Caſtille, Arragon, and Nauarre. Mahumet ſeeing himſelfe defeated, and abandoned, was ſo faint-hearted, as he ſhut himſelfe vp into the fort of Cordoua, reſoluing to deliuer king Hizen, who was a priſoner there: chuſing rather to ſee Hizen raigne than Zuleima. The people of Cordoua hearing ſpeake of their true king Hizen, made ſo great an exclamation of joy, as Mahumet thinking himſelfe loſt, and fearing to C die, fled and hid himſelfe in a Moors houſe, who was borne at Toledo, and verie confident vnto him, with whom that night he fled to Toledo. Wherefore Zuleima entred into Cordoua, and raigned againe, Mahumet hauing beene king but one yeare, which was in the yeare of Chriſt 994, and of the Moores 377. A memorable date, for that this yeare the ſeuen Princes Electors in Germanie were inſtituted at the inſtance of the Emperour Othon, and Pope Gregorie the fift. Anno 994. Inſtitution of the Princes Electors in Germanie.

King Zuleima being reeſtabliſhed in Cordoua, he ſent backe D. Sancho, earle of Caſtille, and his men, well ſatisfied, rewarding euerie one according to his degree. Yet he was not receiued, nor obeyed, throughout all the townes of his juriſdiction, but ſome maintained Hizens partie, who was priſoner at Cordoua. Mahumet Almohadi being come to Toledo, Ab-
D dalla raigned there, but not verie quietly in the beginning; but the hatred the Toledanes did beare to the kings of Cordoua, made his way the more eaſie. Neither of theſe two tyrants raigned long; for Albaharin the Alhabib, who liued at Medina Celi, hearing that Zuleima was much troubled to ſubdue the people of the juriſdiction of Cordoua, which were rebelled againſt him, he made a leuie of ſouldiers, both Moores and Chriſtians, and came to Mahumet Almohadi, at Toledo, who had beene newly made king of that citie; but the manner how is not ſpecified in Hiſtories. There hauing raiſed a great armie, they tooke their way to Cordoua, to deliuer king Hizen, who was priſoner. Whereof Zuleima being aduertiſed, he reſolued to defend himſelfe, calling all his friends and vaſſals together, wherof moſt of them excuſed themſelues, ſhewing that they were naturally bound vnto
E king Hizen, for whoſe deliuerie they knew Mahumet had taken arms, with Albaharin, and ſome Chriſtian captaines which were in their armie, whereof two are called Bermondo, and Argomento. Notwithſtanding this refuſall, Zuleima relying vpon the forces of Barbarie, who aſſured him that they would neuer forſake him, ſallied out of Cordoua, and came and affronted the enemie, nine leagues from the citie, at a place called Hacantalbaſar; where his Battell betwixt the Moores.
first charge was ſo furious, as he put the formoſt of the enemies ſquadrons to rout, and ſlue ſo many, as hee thought all had beene defeated, and Mahumet dead: but the Chriſtians which were in Mahumets armie, rallied their diſordered battell, and charged Zuleimaes men with ſuch violence, as they made them quit the field, with great ſlaughter of the Barbarian Africanes. Zuleima ſaued himſelfe with a ſmall troupe in the fort of F Caſra. They write, that in this battell there died thirtie thouſand Moors, and nine thouſand Chriſtians; among which were D. Arnoul, Biſhop of Auſa, Ætius Biſhop of Barcelone, and Otho of Girone, who carried armes for the Moores quarels: by the loſſe whereof Zuleima left the realme of Cordoua the ſecond time, where hee had raigned a yeare. Hizen a priſoner reſtored to realme of Cordoua.
This was in the yeare 995. Hizen was reſtored to his royall Eſtate by the victors, the people of Cordoua being affected to him, and did mutine to haue him: and Mahumet was the more inclined to him, for that he was ſetled at Toledo. The victor prepared to beſiege Cafra, to expell Zuleima, and to ſpoyle the treaſure that was within it: but foreſeeing the danger, he diſlodged, and carried away with him what he could. G

The caſtle being abandoned, was taken by them of Cordoua, and that which remained ſpoyled, and the ſouldiers which were found in it, ſlaine. The bootie which was taken in this caſtle, was carried to the great Moſquee at Cordoua, and there conſecrated. This done, Albaharin the Alhabib, led the armie againſt ſome places in Andalouſia, which continued in their rebellion ſince the former diuiſions; he beſieged Almerie, which was defended by Afila, a Moore of a great houſe, and battered it twentie dayes: the which in the end was forced, and Afila, with ſome of his children, drowned. The like happened to the townes of Iaen, Baeſa, and Ariona, the which were kept for king Hizen. In this manner did the Moores make warre, being diuided into two factions, whereof the one held the partie of Hizen, and of the Moores in Spaine, and the other of the Barbarians, and Moores of Affrick, of whom Zuleima was the chiefe in Spaine. H

Obeidalla ſixt king of Toledo.

Mahumet Almohadi raigned at Toledo after Abdalla verie little; for the Hiſtorians make preſent mention of his ſonne Obeydalla, ſixt king of Toledo: againſt whom, king Hizen ſeeing himſelfe now ſetled in his kingdome, ſent his lieutenant with a great armie, to reduce them of Toledo vnder his obedience: who made a ſallie vpon them of Cordoua, where there was a cruell combate: but the end was ſhamefull for the Toledanes, who loſt their king Obeidalla there, and many of their men. Yet were they not daunted, neither did they abate any thing of their rebellious contumacie againſt Hizen, and the Eſtate of Cordoua, whom they did hate extreamely: For preſently after their defeat, and the death of their king Obeidalla, they choſe another of the ſame linage of Aben Humeia, called Hairam, the ſeuenth king in number, who left the Scepter of Toledo to his deſcendants, vntill it was conquered by the Chriſtians. This paſt about the yeare 1000, when as king Hizen, thinking himſelfe to be in more quiet and ſecuritie then euer, he found himſelfe plunged in greater troubles then before: for the Moores were ſo greedie of commaund, as thoſe which had any authoritie or power, would make head againſt whom ſoeuer that would commaund them. The which was no wonder, for that in the citie of Cordoua, and the juriſdiction thereof, there were infinit families deſcending from kings of the Moores, iſſuing from the race of Aben Humeia: which grew by reaſon of their pluralitie of wiues, which their ſect allowed; which was the cauſe of ſeditions and reuolts, for the deſire of rule. Cattelogne.

During theſe ciuile warres, the Cattelans and Barcelonians had beene in peace, and free from the Moores inuaſions, and had rather ſought to annoy them, or inuade them, either alone, or joyntly with the Caſtillans. D. Raymond Borel, the earle, who had ſucceeded his father, did burie, in a manner at the entrie of his principalitie, his couſin D. Oliban Cabrica, earle of Cerdagne and Beſalu, at our Ladie of Ripon, in the yeare 994: whoſe Eſtates were diuided among his children D. Bernard Briſefer, and D. Geoffrey. This new earle had fortified Barcelone, and repaired all the ſpoyles which the Moores had made during the warre againſt D. Borel his father; joyning the Monaſterie of Montjuhy to the walls of Barcelone, and called it S. Peter of the virgines, to gratifie D. Borella his ſiſter, whom ſome call Engelrade, Abbeſſe of that place. There is no mention made of him in Hiſtories, but that he had one ſonne called D. Berenger Borel, in the yeare 995, who ſucceeded him after his death. L

D. Garcia, called the Trembling, fift of that name, and 12 King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

23 IN the ſame yere of the deceaſe of the earle D. Borel, which was 993, died (according to the common opinion of writers) D. Sancho the 3, ſonne to D. Garcia Sanches, king of Nauarre; but it is moſt vncertaine: for the computation of the liues and raignes of theſe firſt kings of Nauarre, Leon, and other Princes and Potentates of Spaine, is ſo diuers and confuſed in their writings, as no man can judge rightly of them. D. Sancho gaue for the M

ſoules

A ſoules health of his ſonne D. Ramir, to the Monaſterie of S. Emylian, the towne of Cardegnas, with all the appurtenances. Afterwards D. Garcia his ſonne, ſurnamed the trembling, ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Nauarre, and the Countie of Arragon. This ſurname was giuen him, for that when he entred the combate, he did tremble, not for feare, but by a naturall cuſtome: the which did afterwards turne into force and valour, being a little heat. In a certaine priuiledge and donation made in the yeare 996, of the towne of Herrero, granted by this king D. Garcia to the Monaſterie of S. Emylian of Cogolla, mention is made of D. Sancho and D. Garcia, his nephewes, who were ſonnes to D. Ramir, his brother, whom they called king of Arragon; it may be it was onely in title: he died in the life time of D. Sancho
B their father, and by his death Gonſalo their other brother is ſaid alſo to haue raigned in Arragon with D. Vrraca, Queene mother to theſe three Princes, and not the children of D. Ramir, the which is a ſtronger argument that they were but titles. To which place of S. Emylian, this king D. Garcia and D. Ximena his wife make another donation of the water which comes from the valley of Alanſon, to water their fields and orchards one day and a night in the weeke; to which titles D. Vrraca is alwaies ſet: for it was alwaies a cuſtome of the Princes in Spaine, for honours ſake, to name their mothers and wiues, in all letters of donation and priuiledges which they graunt; for they ſoule (ſay they) and that of their father, and they make this donation to S. Emylian, whom they call their Patron, as they had beene taught. Without doubt their deuotion in thoſe times to S. Emylian had beene verie great,
C who was called on as an Aduocate and Patron by the Chriſtians in Spaine, from Burgos vnto the Ocean: of the which there are two Monaſteries, the one called the higher, the other the lower.

D. Garcia the trembling married D. Ximena, and yet there is great diuerſitie among Authors touching the name of this Ladie, by whom he had D. Sancho, who was king after him. He recommended his education and bringing vp to D. Sancho, Abbot of Saint Saluator of Leyre, who was afterwards Biſhop of Pampelone. The qualities of this king are little knowne, for want of auncient records, whereof they commend one, the which is queſtionable, whether it be a vertue or a vice, That he could neuer refuſe any thing that was demaunded of him: but they chiefely merit to be held liberall, when as they giue, with judgement,
D meaſurably to men of merit, otherwiſe they are tearmed prodigall, ignorant, careleſſe, and contemners of the chiefeſt point of their charge, which is, to diſtribute rewards and puniſhments equally. There is no mention made of his warres and enterpriſes. He raigned, as they eſteeme, ſeuen yeares, and ſo he died in the thouſand yeare of our Sauiour. His bodie, as ſome hold, was buried at S. Iohn de la Pegna; others ſay, at S. Saluator at Leyre, which place was more famous, and of greater authoritie.

Rewards and puniſhments maintaine all Eſtates.

24 D. Sancho ſucceeded his father D. Garcia the trembling in his Eſtates, accounted the thirteenth king of Nauarre; a vertuous and valiant Prince, and famous for his great exploits; during whoſe raigne, the Hiſtorie, and eſpecially the computation of times, begins to be more plaine and certaine, than in the time of his predeceſſors.

25 In the yeare 1001 of our redemption, and the 384 of the Arabians Empire, and 287 of their entrie into Spaine, Zuleima being abandoned by the Caſtillans, he had recourſe to the king of Sarragoſſe and Carrace, with whoſe aid he recouered Cordoua, and made himſelfe king againe, Hizen being fled into Africke; one of whoſe captaines, called Hali Hatan, F holding Orichela, called Hali Gouernor of Ceuta, and cauſed him to paſſe with ſome forces into Spaine, in hope to raigne there. Theſe two did beſiege and take Cordoua, and Zuleima in it, whom Hali ſlue with his owne hands: but it was not long before Hali Hatan did riſe againſt Hali, whom he troubled much for the ſpace of two yeares, and after ſome battailes woon and loſt on either ſide, he cauſed him to be ſecretly ſlaine in a bath, in the towne of Iahen, by ſome of his Eunuches, whom he had corrupted, in whoſe place, the noblemen and knights knights of the Moores which were at Iahen, choſe his brother Cacin, who kept at Seuile, G in the yeare 1003, and 386 of the Arabians raigne. Manie African Moores of Barbarie, (ſome ſent for, ſome voluntaries, to ſeeke their aduentures) paſſed dayly into Spaine, by reaſon of theſe conſpiracies and ciuile diſſentions; of which, Cacin the new king had manie which followed his partie, as his deceaſed brother had. Being come to Iahen, he cau-ſed a diligent ſearch to be made for thoſe trecherous Eunuches which had ſlaine the king, but they could find no more but two, whom he put to death, and then it behooued him to defend himſelfe: for Hali Hatan ſeeing that he could not raigne, procured him great enemies, that is, Abderramen Almorrada, of the bloud royall of Aben Humeya, who go-uerned in Murcia, ſending meſſagers with all kinds of perſuaſions, and other meanes, to H induce the pettie Arabian kings, which held Sarragoſſe, Valence, Tortoſa, and other townes and forts in Spaine, to joyne with him, to reſiſt (ſaid he) the Barbarian Moores which came to inuade Spaine: wherefore Abderramen was created King and Miralmu-min by them, but hee neuer held the chiefe towne of Cordoua. Hauing rayſed an armie of all thoſe of his faction, he beſieged and tooke the towne of Iahen, cutting the Moores in peeces, which held it againſt him, and from thence went to other places, which hee ſeized on, and in a ſhort time became Lord of a great countrey; the which Hali Hatan and another captaine of his traine, called Almundar, Aben-Alſaie, did verie much enuie, and as they had helped to rayſe him to that height, ſo they ſought all meanes poſſible to pull him downe, and not onely to depriue him of his eſtates, but alſo of his life, ſaying, I That it was not reaſonable any other than themſelues ſhould reape the fruits of their labours, and the conqueſts gotten with the price of their blouds. For the effecting whereof, they filled the kings Court and campe with quarrels and diſcontents, among the commaunders and captaines, watching ſome fit opportunitie to execute their malicious de-ſigne. King Abderramen purſuing his good fortune, came to beſiege Grenado, the which at that time was reaſonably great, and well peopled, and commanded by a pettie king, a Enuie and trecherie among the Arabians. Moore, called Bedeci, Aben Abus. There theſe two conſpirators, Hali Hatan and Almun-dar (making ſhew to imploy themſelues faithfully in any thing that might annoy the be-ſieged) had ſecret conference with ſome Moores of the towne, and layed a plot, That they ſhould make a ſallie vpon Abderramens armie, the which they would faueur in ſuch K ſort, as moſt of his beſt men and hee himſelfe ſhould either bee taken or ſlaine; and hauing inſtructed them where they ſhould charge, and of the ſituation of the kings lodging (which was vpon the ſide of a hill, called Seneſta, two leagues from Grenado) they held themſelues readie, attending the alarme; the which being giuen verie hot, and at a fit time to ſtrike terrour, they joyned with the Grenadines, where they made a great ſlaughter of Abderramens men, he himſelfe being in like manner ſlaine, and the reſt of the armie diſperſed and put to flight, abandoning their Engines of batterie, and all their baggage, the which was ſpoyled, and carried into Grenado, with great joy. This treaſon was practiſed by theſe two captaines through enuie, together with a diſtruſt of king Abderramens good ſucceſſe; wherefore after this goodly exploit, they reſolued to ſend part of the bootie, with manie heads of the chiefe of the Moores, ſlaine in this ſurpriſe, to L king Cacin, in ſigne of triumph; the which was verie pleaſing to this king, who was then at Cordoua, and making vſe of this good fortune, he went to field, to reduce vnder his obedience manie townes and forts which had reuolted to king Abderramen, when as hee was aduaunced to that dignitie; the which he did to manie; but he wanted force and time to finiſh it: for hauing raigned ſcarce three yeares, he died in the yeare 1007. The Moores of Barbarie, which had for a time followed the partie of the kings of Cordoua, were then in great authoritie in the citie, and therefore had the meanes and credit to chuſe Hiaya, the ſonne of Mahumet, for king: the which did much diſcontent the aun-cient Moores borne in the countrey, who ſought ſome good opportunitie to be rid of M theſe Berberuzes (as the Spaniards called them) by killing or chaſing them out of the towne, to the end that the gouernment thereof might returne into their hands, as before. A fit occaſion was offered: for the new king Hiaya, who before his election to be king was reſident at Malaga, hauing a deſire to haue that towne at his deuotion, for that it had not obeyed the precedent kings of Cordoua, ſince their troubles and ſedi-tions,

A tions, went forth of Cordoua, leading with him great troupes of ſouldiours, eſpecially of that race of Moores which came out of Barbarie. Comming to Malaga, he was receiued without any contradiction: but whileſt hee was buſie there, the inhabitants of Cordoua, who had intelligence with Buz of Grenado, drew certaine troupes, which hee had ſent, into their towne, being led by two of his captaines, Hayran and Mogid, by whoſe helpe they cut the throats of aboue a thouſand African Moores, who were left for the gard of the citie. At this bruite, king Hiayas lieutenant was ſo amazed, as he got out of the towne, with all the miniſters of juſtice, and fled to Malaga, to carrie theſe troubleſome newes to the king his maſter; who within few dayes was ſlaine by a Moore, Hiaya 14 king of the Moores at Cordoua.

B called Iſmael, hauing raigned onely three moneths and ſome dayes. Abderramen the fourth of that name was aduaunced in his place: he was king but a moneth and ſeuenteene dayes, and we doe not read, whither he died, or were expelled his kingdome. After him followed Mahumet, great Miralmumin of Cordoua, who raigned not long, for that being rich in treaſure, by his good husbandrie, before he came to be king, it was a cauſe to ſhorten his life, by the trecherie of his houſehold ſeruants, who conſpired to murther him for his treaſure, wherefore they poyſoned him, hauing held the kingdome a yeare and foure moneths: He died in the yeare one thouſand and nine, and of the Arabians raigne three hundred ninetie two. He left this place to Hizen the third of that name, who liued long at Seuile, being deſirous to raigne, the which he now obtained. In the meane

C time a Moore, who called himſelfe king of Ceuta, paſſing the ſtrait, came to Malaga, where he tooke the fort of the towne. He was called Eſdriz, and brought with him a great number of the Moores of Africke: with whom Buz, who tearmed himſelfe king of Grenado, joyned at Malaga, and called himſelfe his vaſſall, doing him homage. Being thus fortified with the Moores of Spaine, he came to Carmona, the which he tooke: then paſſing on by Alcaladel Rio, he burnt the ſuburbes of Triana, and ſeized vpon Seuile. Many other tyrants did riſe in diuers places, ſo as all Spaine, vnder the Moores juriſdiction, was full of ſeditions, and ciuill warres, and the eſtate of Cordoua was ſpoyled by him that could get it: but the kings of Toledo made their profit more than any other, who medling not with other mens quarrells, kept themſelues quiet, and aſ-

D ſured with their owne limits. After the death of Obeidalla (as we haue ſaid) Hyran raigned, of the linage of Aben Humeia, who dying left the ſcepter to his ſonne, called Hizen, who raigned in the time of this other Hizen, king of Cordoua, and was the eight king of Toledo.

King Hizen of Cordoua was of as ſmall continuance as his late predeceſſors; for the Moores his ſubjects expelled him, in hatred of the robberies and extortions committed by his Alhabib, or Conſtable, who from a baſe place was aduaunced to that dignitie: ſo hauing held the kingdome twentie moneths and ſome dayes, he gaue place to Almondirs follie, in the yeare one thouſand and eleuen. Almondir, who was of the linage of Aben Humeya, put himſelfe forward (being deſirous to raigne) in this ſedition and popular tu-

E mult, and hauing gathered ſome of his friends and kinſfolkes together, he came vnto the caſtle of the citie, entreating them to receiue him, ſeeing they would not haue king Hizen: Whereupon being aduertiſed by ſome one well affected, that he offered himſelfe in an vnſeaſonable time, the people being in armes, and incenſed againſt a king, wherefore hee ſhould doe wiſely to retyre, and to keepe himſelfe from murthering in this tumult: but being mad with ambition, he perſiſted in his demaund, adding thereunto, that he did not care, ſo as they created him king that day, if they ſlue him the next. Which words were ſo odious vnto all that heard them, as without any further delay, or giuing him that fading contentment to ſee himſelfe king that day, they ſlew him vpon the place, preſuming by the words which he had vttered, that he would be an vnprofitable and bad king: ſuch

The furious and vnreſtrained ambition of Almondir.

F was the reward of his furious deſire to raigne. This being done, they did forbeare to kill Hizen, and being reſolued not to haue him for their king, they let him vnderſtand, That if he would ſaue his life, he ſhould quit the fort, and retyre where he pleaſed: whereunto he obeyed, and retyred himſelfe, with ſome of his friends, into another ſtrong houſe of his, joyning vnto the citie, of a contrarie humor to Almondir: but the Moores of Cordoua not thinking themſelues ſecure, he being ſo neere them, and being reſolued not to endure any more

kings of the linage of Aben Humeya, they beſieged him in this houſe, tooke him, and impriſoned him in Cordoua, from whence he eſcaped, and fled to Sarragoſſe, where he liued in a priuate eſtate. Then a Moore of great power, called Ioar of Algazur, ſeeing the citie without a king, embracing this occaſion, with the helpe of his friends which did affect him, tooke vpon him the title and royall authoritie at Cordoua: but on the other ſide, one Hali Cacin, or Aben Cacin, reſiding at Seuile, a man of a great houſe, and mightie, ſeized vpon the towne of Seuile, where he did remaine with the Moores of his faction, and enjoyed the ſoueraigntie fifteene yeares; yet taking no other title vpon him, but as Iudge and Gouernour; but he prepared the way for his ſucceſſours to make it a royall ſeat. Ioar raigned but two yeares, and Mahumet his ſonne ſucceeded him, being the twentieth and laſt king of the Moores at Cordoua, and in whom the majeſtie of the Miralmumins of Spaine (which had beene great) was extinct: from the which grew ſo many pettie kings, as there was ſcarce any good towne in Spaine but had a particular king, which made ſtrict alliances among themſelues for the preſeruation of their eſtates, and maintained themſelues vntill the comming of the Almorauides, Moores, which came out of Afiicke, as we will ſhew. This king Mahumet, deſiring rather to hold that little of the eſtate of Cordoua, which remained, than to ſeeke after that which was drawne away, enjoyed it in peace thirteene yeares; the which fell out, according to the common opinion, about the yeare 1027, and of the Arabians 415: So as the royall ſeat of the Miralmumins of Spaine (accounting from Abderramen the firſt, who did begin it) had continued in the citie of Cordoua 269 yeares. The Moores affaires in Spaine being in this confuſion, the Chriſtians neglected this fit opportunitie, to recouer all Spaine, and to root out the ſect of Mahumet: but they had their infirmities in like manner. D. Sancho king of Nauarre made ſome attempts, but as it ſeemes ill purſued, being not mentioned in the Hiſtories.

A little before his death, he had receiued into his countrey the children of D. Bela of Nagera, a knight who as we haue ſaid, had beene chaſed out of Caſtille, by the Earle D. Fernand Gonſales: which were D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo Bela, who would neuer be reconciled vnto D. Sancho Earle of Caſtille, their Lord: wherefore hauing liued a wandring and vagabond life for a time among the Moores, and elſewhere, in the end they came into Leon, whereas the king D. Alphonſo receiued them, honoured them, and gaue them lands and reuenues, in the quarter of Somocas.

D. Alphonſo 5 king of Leon, a louer of iuſtice.

This Prince was carefull to adminiſter juſtice to his ſubjects; and therefore did reuiew and reſtore the ancient lawes of the Gothes, and did correct and moderat them with new decrees fit for the time, and all by the aduiſe of the generall eſtates, aſſembled at Ouiedo, in the yeare 1003. He repaired the ruines of the Citie of Leon, and there built a Church to Saint Iohn Baptiſt, whither he cauſed the body of D. Bermond his father, and many others, to be brought, and there interred. In his time liued Athilan, Biſhop of Leon, and Florian, a great Preacher in Gallicia, both held for Saints in Spaine. They write, that Florian meaning to trie if his Sermons were pleaſing to God, put burning coales into his mouth, and had no harme.

Nauarre.

D. Sancho Emperor of Spaine.

As for D. Sancho fourth king of Nauarre, he was ſurnamed the Great, chiefly for his great dominions, and for his great exploits, both in peace and warre; by reaſon whereof he intitled himſelfe king of Spaine, the which the Gothes with all their greatneſſe and power durſt not doe. He married D. Nugna, eldeſt daughter to D. Sancho Garcia, Earle of Caſtille; yet the Hiſtories of Arragon call her otherwiſe, & ſay the king had a former wife, which was, D. Caya, Ladie of Ayuar, the which was rather a concubine, than a lawfull wife, of whom D. Ramir, firſt king of Arragon was borne. By this Ladie D. Nugna, he did inherit the Earledome of Caſtille, and by her had D. Garcia king of Nauarre, after him D. Fernand, firſt king of Caſtille, and D. Gonſalo king of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorſa. He was either in perſon, or ſent to all the warres betwixt the Chriſtians, and the Moores, whoſe eſtate was much ſhaken in his time, by reaſon of the diuiſions of that mutinous nation; and this king was more fortunate abroad, than in his owne houſe.

The

A The Hiſtories which treat of his deedes, ſay, That being abſent in ſome warre againſt the Moores, his ſonne D. Garcia demanded a goodly horſe of his mother, out of the kings ſtable, the which he loued aboue all the reſt, and had ſtraitly commanded his wife not to ſuffer any one to ride him: yet ſhee deſiring to pleaſe her eldeſt ſonne, graunted him; but being afterwards diſſuaded by a knight, called, Pedro de Seſe, or as ſome write Fernand of Ordognana, maſter of the kings horſe, ſhee would haue auoided it, conſidering the charge the king had giuen her: whereat D. Garcia being too much incenſed for a matter of no moment, began to imagine that there was ſome diſhoneſt familiaritie betwixt this Maſter of the Horſe and his mother; whither that he belieued it, or did malicioufly inuent it, forgetting God, and all fili-

B all reſpect, he reſolued to accuſe them of adulterie: and hauing conferred this deſigne with his brother D. Fernand (who was of a better diſpoſition) he would haue forced him to ſerue as a witneſſe, or aſſiſtant in this wickedneſſe, the which he refuſed, and did often diſſuade D. Garcia from ſo vile an enterpriſe, but it was in vaine. In the end D. Fernands youth was vanquiſhed by the importunitie, or rather feare of his elder brother promiſing not to reueale the fraud and lye, which he had diſcouered vnto him. The king being returned to his caſtle of Nagera, this peruerſe ſonne D. Garcia failed not to accuſe his mother: whereat the king was wonderfully amazed, for that he had neuer ſeene any cauſe to ſuſpect his wife of any diſhoneſtie, neither would he lightly belieue that which his ſonne had ſaid, but examining this buſineſſe careſully, he ſought by all means to diſcouer the truth: yet he cauſed the Queene to

C be put in priſon in the caſtle of Nagera; then taking D. Fernand his ſecond ſonne apart, he examined him vpon this fact, who anſwered the king doubtfully, the which increaſed his ſuſpition more than before: wherefore the king called an aſſemblie of noblemen, and of his Councell, to whom he propounded this pitifull caſe, demanding their aduice. They anſwered that the Queene muſt purge her ſelfe by contrary prooſes, according vnto the Lawes, or according to the cuſtome which was then in vſe, ſhee ſhould finde a knight to defend her cauſe by armes, elſe ſhe muſt ſuffer the puniſhment due to ſuch an offence, which was to be burnt. The poore Ladie attending this ſentence, made her continuall prayers vnto God, to make her innocencie knowne, who heard her prayers: for after ſome daies, no man daring to preſent himſelfe to defend this princeſſe honor, D. Ramir the kings baſtard ſon offred himſelfe to

D enter combate for the Queene, againſt any that would maintaine the accuſation which was layed againſt her. As they prepared themſelues to the combat, there was a religious man of good fame, and much reſpected in Nauarre, who doubting of this fraude, or otherwiſe aduertiſed by the prouidence of God, came vnto D. Garcia and D. Fernand the kings ſons, whom he perſuaded with ſuch liuelie reaſons, as they were toucht in conſcience, and began to apprehend the fouleneſſe of their offence, to haue ſought her death who was the cauſe of their being, againſt all truth, and for a matter of ſo ſmall moment; wherefore caſting themſelues at this holy mans feet, they confeſt their fault, demanding pardon of God, and intreating him to finde ſome meanes that this purſute might ceaſe, the Queenes innocencie knowne, and that they might be reſtored to the kings fauour. The religious man hauing comforted

E them, went vnto the king, to whom he declared what he had done, and what he vnderſtood from his ſonnes, intreating him to pardon their offence, whom youth and choler had thus tranſported. The king being joyfull of the innocencie of his wife, deliuered her out of priſon, and meaning that the fauour which they pretended to recouer, ſhould depend wholly of their mother, he ſent them vnto her: but ſhe ſhewing her ſelfe a true mother, did forget the cauſe ſhe had to diſlike her ill aduiſed ſonnes, and pardoning them with a motherlie affection, ſhee reſtored them to the kings fauour: In this action, D. Ramir ſhewed himſelfe both vertuous and valiant, wherein hee purchaſed the more honour, by this circumſtance, That hee being ſonne of an other woman, would defend the reputation of his mother in law againſt her owne children: in recompence whereof, the king D. Sancho, aſſigning portions for his

F children in his life time, gaue after his death the Earledome of Arragon to D. Ramir with the title of king. By this diuiſion of portions made by the king D. Sancho, and D. Nugna, D. Fernand was alſo graced with a royall title, in the ſucceſſion of Caſtille, which fell vnto her by the violent death of her brother D. Garcia, as we will ſhew: Nauarre remayning to D. Garcia the elder brother, and the ancient realme of Sobrarbre to D. Gonſalo; meaning to to honour all his children with the names and titles of Kings, which was the cauſe of great diuiſions among theſe brethren, which haply had ceaſed, if one of them had beene made ſoueraigne King ouer the reſt, the which had maintained the Chriſtians eſtate in Spaine better vnited, and of more force to repulſe the Moores. The time of this action of adulterie is vncertaine. G

Religious deeds of D. Sancho the great.

The king D. Sancho was a very deuout and religious Prince, after the manner of thoſe times: for beſides the confirmation of gifts which he and his wife gaue to S. Emylian, of the towne of Ventoſe (annexed to this place by D. Garcia his father and others) he made a vow, to giue vnto the Couent of S. Saluator of Leyre, the tenth of bread and wine, and the herbage of ſuch places as he ſhould take from the Moores: and with this hope, in the yeare 1015, he raiſed an armie to inuade the Infidels by the frontier of Funes: at which place of Funes he gaue to the ſame Monaſterie a field of Vines which he had of the inhabitants, for that he had ſlaine tenne Moores in the time of peace, for the which they ought a thouſand ſolz, for a fine, which were ſo many crownes, or thereabouts. More, in Falſes he gaue a poſſeſſion, houſe, vine, and other appurtenances: and in Nagera, the houſes, vines, and fields of king Antrayo, but what he was, we haue no certaine knowledge. Theſe things he gaue to the Church of S. Saluator of Leyre. It is not knowne what was the ſucceſſe of D. Sanchoes warre againſt the Moores, but that by conjecture it was good, for that in that time there is a confirmation made by him, of nobilitie, and exemptions graunted by his predeceſſors to the inhabitants of Roncal. H Councels in Nauarre.

The zeale of this religious Prince was ſuch, as he called a Councell at S. Saluator de Leyre, in the yeare 1022, but the chiefe decree was, a confirmation of priuiledges graunted to this Monaſterie by his grandfather D. Sancho, and D. Vrraca his grandmother, and D. Garcia and D. Ximena his father and mother; which confirmation was ſigned by the king and all his children. The yeare after 1023, there was another Councell held in Pampelone, where the Biſhoprick was transferred to S. Saluator of Leyre, where it continued ſome time. There enquirie was made of the auncient limits of the juriſdiction of the Biſhopricke of Pampelone. This was the ſubject of Councels in thoſe dayes. Then was D. Sancho the elder (who had beene ſchoolemaſter to the king) Biſhop of Pampelone, and Abbot of S. Saluator, but he could not ſee this alteration, for that he died this yeare: but his ſucceſſor carrying the ſame name, ſurnamed the younger, ſaw it in the yeare 1026, being the ſeuenth Biſhop of that Church, being vncertaine to what Archbiſhop it was then ſubject. In our time it is to that of Sarragoſſe. I

Caſtille.

This yeare 1026 was borne that great captaine, a Caſtillan, called Roderigo Dias of Biuar, who was afterwards called Cid Ruy Dias, the Camper, of whom mention ſhall be made. In the yeare 1028 they hold (and it is verified by titles and auncient records) That D. Sancho Garcia Earle of Caſtille died, hauing ruled nine and thirtie yeares, and was buried in the Monaſterie of S. Saluator of Ogna, founded by him. He was an vnfortunate Prince in his houſe, by reaſon of the miſerable death of his mother; otherwiſe he was wiſe and valiant, and a great louer of his nobilitie, to whom he gaue great priuiledges and exemptions, yea, he diſpenſed with them from going to the warre without pay and entertainment, and that they ſhould not be taxed for any impoſition which ſhould be leuied vpon the publike. And as he was verie deuout, after the manner of thoſe times, he made manie reparations and orders, to make the wayes more eaſie for them that went in pilgrimage to S. Iaques of Compoſtella: for in the beginning, the ordinarie and moſt vſuall way was by the Prouinces of Guipuſcoa and Biſcaye to the mountaine countrey, then to the Aſturies of Sentillana, then to Ouiedo, from whence they entred into Gallicia; and ſince the way being mountainous, although it were ſhort, being left, by reaſon of the difficult and hard paſſages, they came from France by Nauarre into Alaua, and then through the Aſturies; a longer, but a farre more eaſie voyage than the other: but the Earle D. Sancho cauſed a way to be made euen, from Nauarre by Rioje and Bureua, to the citie of Burgos, the which is frequented at this day, to the great eaſe of ſuch as make this voyage to S. Iaques. They call this the French way. This Earle gaue Quintanilla to the Monaſterie of S. Emylian, and did many other works for the redemption of his ſoule, as appeares by the letters and titles of that age. K L M

D. Bermond, third of that name, 23. King of Leon.

Leon.

26 DON Bermond, ſonne to D. Alphonſo ſucceeded his father in the Realme of Leon, in the yeare 1028. beeing but a young Prince at his firſt entry to the Crown, he began to follow the religious ſteps of his father, cauſing churches, monaſteries, & other buildings which had bene ruined by the Arabians in the former wars, to be repaired. And moreouer, was very carefull to maintaine good orders among his ſubiects, and to do them iuſtice, puniſhing the diſordered with great ſeuerity. An argument that he had good and vertuous men in his Court, and of his Councell, who honored both themſelues and their Prince, in the due execution of their charges, and diſcharging of their conſciences: ſo as it followed, that all the ſubiects gouerned thẽſelues by their kings example: yea the Noblemen and Knights of his Court. The beginning of which raigne could not but be held moſt happie. Hee married with D. Thereſa, ſecond daughter to D. Sancho, laſt earle of Caſtile, by whom he had one ſon, called D. Alphonſo by his grandfathers name, who died before his father.

A religious king and louer of iuſtice.

27 By the ſame treatie of marriage with the yongeſt daughter of Caſtile, after the deceaſe of D. Sancho Earle of Caſtile, by the aduice of the country, there was a marriage propounded, betwixt D. Garcia ſucceſſor to the ſayd earle, and D. Sancha ſiſter to the K. D. Bermond. Both parties being agreed, D. Garcia went to Leon, to conſumate this mariage, being accompanied by D. Sancho k. of Nauarre his brother-in-law, who had married D. Nugna the eldeſt daughter of Caſtile. The Court being full of Noblemen and Ladies to honor this marriage, which ſhould be performed with ſtate, and the Earle D. Garcia hauing no other thoughts but to court his miſtris; there came vnto him the 3 brethren of Bela aboue-mentioned, who were baniſhed out of Caſtile, & fled into Leõ: D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo, who making a ſhew to deſire the Earles fauor, came to kiſſe his hand, offering him all ſeruice & homage, as his naturall vaſſals, craũing pardon for that was paſt: to whom D. Garcia being courteous, gaue good reception; and preſuming they had nothing hidden in their hearts, but what their countenances ſhewed, and their tongs vttered, he aſſured himſelfe of them, going without any guard, like a priuate man that had no quarrell: ſo as theſe traitours found oportunitie to murther him, in reuenge that the Earle his father had baniſhed them out of Caſtile, and confiſcated their goods: ſo the innocent ſuffered for the offendor, if we may call it an offence to do iuſtice vpon rebels. He that gaue him the firſt blow with his ſword, was D. Ruys or Roderigo his god-father. Such exceſſes did the Chriſtians then commit. The murtherers did then eſcape, but afterwards they fell into the hands of D. Sancho King of Nauarre, who tooke a worthy reuenge. There was great heauineſſe in Court for this wretched murther: but D. Sancha lamented more than all the reſt, to ſee her ſelfe a widow before ſhe was a wife: who ſeeing her ſpouſe interred at S. Iohn Baptiſt in Leon, intreated them that they would burne her aliue with him. By the death of D. Garcia, the Earledome of Caſtile fell to the k. of Nauarre D. Sancho, who had maried D. Nugna the eldeſt ſiſter of D. Garcia, and tooke peaceable poſſeſſion thereof in the ſame yeare 1028.

D. Berenger his ſon gouerned this principality, as proprietarie, vnder the Soueraigntie of France, being the ſixt in number, and was ſurnamed Borel, as his father, but of a contrary diſpoſition to his father: for by his idlenes, he gaue entry to all vices into his Court: war and all exerciſes of chiualrie were contemned by him, which bred him great troubles. We find that this Earle had three ſonnes, the firſt called D. Raymond Berenger ſucceeded him: the ſecond, D. Guillen or Guillaume Berenger, was Earle of Manreſe, and the third ſonne, Don Sancho Berenger Prior of the Monaſterie of ſome Noblemen, and good Councellers, theſe two Princes were reconciled and concluded a peace; by the which there was a marriage contracted betwixt D. Fernand, ſecond ſonne to the king of Nauarre, and D. Sancha ſiſter to the king D. Bermond, who had beene promiſed to D. Garcia, Earle of Caſtile. By this Treatie the lands which the King of Nauarre had taken from the King of Leon, ſhould bee giuen to Fernand: and it was ſayd, that the Earledome of Caſtile aſſigned to him, ſhould haue the title of a D

D. Fernand, 2. of that name, firſt king of Caſtile, and 24. of Leon.

1 D. Fernand had raigned 2. yeares in Caſtile, when as the quarrell grew betwixt him, and D. Bermond king of Leon, whereof followed the defeate of Llantada, and the death of the king D. Bermond: after which the two breethren, D. Garcia king of B Nauarre, and D. Fernand of Caſtille, led their victorious armie before the city of Leon, where the remainders were that had eſcaped from the battaile. The Leonois would haue made ſome reſiſtance againſt D. Fernand heire to the Crowne: but fearing they ſhould not be able to hold out long, they receiued him: and beeing crowned in Saint Mary de la Regle, the Cathedral church of Leon, in the yeare 1037. he raigned in peace. 1037. Thus theſe two Eſtates of Leon and Caſtile were vnited, about an hundred yeares after they had beene diuided, in the time of D. Fernand Gonçales: and they came into the maſculine line of the houſe of Nauarre, in D. Fernand, the ſecond ſonne, by the hereditarie right of women: that is, Caſtile by his mother D. Nugna, and Leon, in the right of his wife D. Sancha, for want of heires males of the direct line in theſe two houſes. Be- C fore he came to theſe great ſucceſſions, during the life of the king D. Sancho his father, he had had by his wife D. Sancha, preſumptiue heire of Leon, one daughter called D. Vrraca, then a ſonne D. Sancho, and after him another daughter named D. Elustra, beeing King of Caſtile, ſhe bare him D. Alphonſo, in the yeare, 1035. and for the laſt of all their children D. Garcia: All which were well inſtructed and bred vp like kings children according to their ſexe.

Caſtile.

Succeſſion of the Eſtates of Caſtile and Leon by women.

The firſt royall act which D. Fernand did, was to diſpoſe of Iuſtice, fortifying by his authoritie the ancient lawes of the Goths, with ſome neceſſarie additions or reformations: he was much renowned, not onely for that reſpect, but alſo for his Religion, and valour in warre, whereof he ſhewed good proofe againſt the Moores, who inuaded D his dominions in the yeare 1038, by the frontiers of Gallicia, and the countrey which is properly called Extremadura, the which lyes vpon the bankes of Durio, whence it takes the name, not that which they thinke at this day lyes betwixt Tayo and Guadiana where the good woad growes. D. Fernand did not onely repulſe them, but alſo purſued them vnto Merida and Badajos, then entring into the countrey, which is now called Portugall, hee tooke from them the townes of Cea, Gana, Viſeo, Lamego, the caſtle of Saint Martin, Tarança, and in the end after a long and difficult ſeege, the city of Coimbra, where his armie was in great diſtreſſe for victuals; whereof they were releeued (as the Spaniſh Hiſtories ſay) by certaine religious men of that countrie, who had ſecretly gathered together (if it be credible) great ſtore of victuals, wherewith they E did furniſh the campe. The Spaniſh Authors write, that the king D. Fernand had (at the taking of Viſeo) gotten the Moore, which had ſlaine the king D. Alphonſo his father in law, whoſe eyes he cauſed to be put out, and both his hands, and one of his feet to be cut off, wherein he rather ſhewed a baſe, then a generous diſpoſition. In that war he layed the bounds of his country beyond the riuer of Mondego, which is in the middeſt of Portugall: and leauing for Gouernour of Coimbra, (beeing the greateſt towne in all the countrey) a Knight called D. Siſenand: hee returned into his countrey, and went to viſit S. Iaques Sepulcher, offering part of the ſpoiles which hee had taken in the warre, as to the Patron and Protector of Spaine, according to the manner of the Religion in his time. After which he continued eight yeares without any warres againſt F the Moores, who hauing diſmembred their monarchie of Cordoua, which had ſo long maintained the name and glorie of the Arabians in Spaine, to the great ruine of the Chriſtians, did now buſie themſelues to make pettie Royalties: whereof the moſt famous in thoſe times were Seuile and Toledo; that of Seuile extended his Iuriſdictions vnto the countrey called Algarbe, beyond Guadiana.

Which is the countrey of Extremadura.

Reuenge worthy of a royal mind.

Cattelogne. 2 Other Moores neighbours to Cattelogne, hauing entred the Contie of Barce- A lone, in the time of D. Berenger Borel, were ſtayed by his ſon and ſucceſſor D. Raimond Berenger, whom they called the Elder, for that he had a ſonne of the ſame name, who ſucceeded him. This Earle was of a ſmall ſtature; but in this little bodie there lodged a great courage, vnlike therein vnto his father, hauing no delight but in action and arms. By his iudgement and valour, the Moores were diſpoſſeſſed of the Caſtell of Manreſa, of the Townes of Ceruera, Segarra, Tagarra, Verdun, Tous, Lacuença of Odena, and of many other places: and ſubiected ſome of the Moores vnto him, and made them Tributaries. With this Warlike vertue, he was wiſe for the well gouerning of a quiet eſtate, louing Iuſtice, beeing religious, honourable, and liberall to his Nobility, the dignitie of which Eſtate he did much augment. Hee was twice married: his firſt B Genealogie of Cattelogne. wife, called Radalmurs, brought him two ſonnes, the one called D. Pedro Raymond, who was much hated of his father, for ſome reaſons which we will hereafter ſhew: The ſeconds name was D. Berenger Raymond, who ſlue his brother; and for that hee was exceeding proud, he loſt his Eſtate. To his ſecond wife he had D. Almodia, or Almadis, a wiſe Ladie and vertuous, by whome he had D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle after him, ſurnamed (for that his haire was white and thicke) flaxen haire.

D. Ramir, firſt King of Arragon.

Arragon. 3. THe Arragonois their neighbours, began at that time to haue Kings, the coun- C trie hauing that title giuen it, in fauour of D. Ramir, a Baſtard of Nauarre, in the yeare, 1304, the Countrey hauing continued with the title of an Earledome about 250. yeares, by which meanes it was diuided from Nauarre. This title of a King was confirmed to D. Ramir, by Pope Benedict the ninth, and the Armes of theſe firſt Kings of Arragon, weare a Croſſe argent in a field azure. D. Ramir did ſoone after ſeaze (I know not by what right) of the Realme of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorça, by the death of Sobrarbre and Ribagorſa vnited to the Crowne of Arragon. D. Gonçalo his brother, who had beene made King by the will of D. Sancho their father, he beeing ſlaine paſſing the bridge of Montclus, by a houſhold ſeruant of his, called Raymonet, and left no children. This ſucceſſion did more rightly belong to D. Garcia, the lawfull ſonne of D. Sancho, and brother by father and mother to D. Gonçalo. What- D ſoeuer they ſay, that D. Ramir was a Prince indowed with great vertues, yet would hee haue diſpoſſeſſed his brother D. Garcia, who was at Rome, of the kingdome of Nauarre, where their father died. For the effecting whereof, hee demaunded ſuccours from the Moores, which held Tudella, Saragoſſe, and Hueſca, and beſeeged the towne of Tafalla, but D. Garcia arriuing at that inſtant, had meanes to make D. Ramir to raiſe his ſiege with diſhonour and loſſe. He had to wife D. Ermiſende, daughter to the Earle of Genealogie of Arragon. Bigorre, by whom he had D. Sancho Ramires, who was King of Arragon after him, D. Garcia, Biſhop of Iacca, D. Sancha Counteſſe of Tholouſa, D. Thereſa Counteſſe of Prouence, wife to the Earle Guillen Bertrand, and one Baſtard ſonne, called D. Sancho, Lord of Ayuar and Xauierre. The time of this Kings Raigne, or the maner of his death, E whether it were in warre, or by ſickneſſe, is doubtfull amongſt Authors, the common opinion is, that he died about the yeare 1063. being at the ſeege of the Caſtell of Grados, or Iraos, of a wound which he receiued, beeing in armes againſt the Moores of the Country: for that leauing the protection of Arragon, they had put themſelues vnder that of Caſtille, and that he is interred at S. Iohn de la Pegna.

D. Garcia

D. Garcia Sanches 6. of that name, and 14. King of Nauarre.

4. AS for D. Gracia heire of the Realme of Nauarre, he came to the crowne as his other brethren in the yeere 1034. the Queene D. Nugna his mother, yet lyuing: he was ſurnamed Sanches of Nagera, for that he was bred vp there, & made his ordinary reſidence there vntil hee died, and was buried there. The portions giuen by D. Sancho the Great, their father, were very preiudicial vnto him, for that as the elder, the ſoueraignty of all thoſe Eſtates did belong vnto him, of all which D. Garcia had nothing but the crowne of Nauarre, the country which is from Bureua and Ogna, running from the country of Frias, conteyning ſeuen iuriſdictions, in ancient time called Caſtillia the old, and moreouer Alaua, Nagera and a part of Biſcay. In the beginning D. Garcia was in reaſonable good termes with his brother D. Fernand King of Caſtille, and did aſſiſt him as we haue ſayd, in the warres he had againſt D. Bermond, to ſettle him in the Realme of Leon: but afterward there grew diuiſions betwixt them, as alſo betwixt him and D. Ramir, ſo as during his life they were neuer reconciled. Hee was married whileſt hee was Infant of Nauarre, to a French Lady called Eſtiennette, of the houſe of Foix, as the Spaniards ſay, yet is it doubtfull, for there is no mention in thoſe times of any Earles of Foix, it may bee ſhee was of the houſe of Carcaſſone, or Beziers, from whence the Earles of Foix did afterwards deſcend. By this wife hee had foure ſonnes: D. Sancho Garcia, who was King after his father: D. Ramier Lord of Calaorra, Torreſilla, de los Cameros, Riuafreſca, Lea, Villoria, Trebejan and others: D. Fernand the third Lord of Iubera, Lagienilla and other places, and D. Raymond the fourth Lord of Murillo, Agon and Agoncillo, and foure daughters, D. Ermeſilda or Ermiſenda, who was Lady of Villa Mediana and Matres: D. Ximena Lady of Corcerous and Hornos. The third D. Mayor of Ianguas, & D. Vrraca, or according vnto ſome Oguenda, Lady of Aluerite, Lardero & Mucrones, ſuch was the iſſue of D. Garcia Sanches of Nagera: During whoſe raigne the Spaniards ſet vp the inuention of the image of the Virgin Mary of the royal Monaſtery, in the towne of Nagera; in honour of whom, D. Garcia, and his wife D. Eſtaphana, or Eſtiennette cauſed the Conuent of the order of Saint Benet to be built: and moreouer the King did inſtitute the order of the knights of the Lilly, for that in the ſame picture there was a pot of white Lillies, and would haue the Knights carry vpon their cloakes, Lillies imbroidred with the needle. This was the deuiſe of the Knights of the order of Nauarre, wherewith the Kings children, and many Knights of Nauarre and ſtrangers were honoured, the which continued in this houſe of Nauarre.

Knights of the Lilly in Nauarre.

The King D. Garcia did greatly honour his nobility, and did confirme in the yeere 1043. the preuiledges of the gentlemen in the Valley of Roncal, in teſtimony of their perpetuall fidelity to the Kings of Nauarre their Princes, who had done him great ſeruices againſt the Moores his neighbors. He tooke Calaorra from them, in the yeere 1044. a more fortunate warre, out of doubt, then that which hee had againſt D. Fernand King of Caſtille his brother, a fatall man to all his kinſfolkes and allies. Enuy which torments man, by reaſon of an others proſperity, bread a hatred in D. Garcia, againſt his brother D. Fernand, the which was augmented by ſome diſpute that was betwixt them for the town of Nagera in Rioje, whereas D. Garcia kept his Court, and the Lands of Bureua, which D. Fernand maintayned did belong vnto the crowne of Caſtille. The firſt and moſt vnworthy effect, whereby this hatred was diſcouered, was a treaſon plotted againſt D. Fernand in the towne of Nagera; for being come in brotherly loue to viſit D. Garcia, who was ſicke in bed, hee was aduertiſed that by his commandement they ment to ſtay him, and in truth hee had beene put in priſon if hee had not eſcaped: this did ſo incenſe them one againſt an other, as falling to armes, it was one of their deaths.

An. 1044.

Quarrels betwixt the Kings of Caſtille and Nauarre.

D. Garcias practiſe againſt his brother.

This treacherous part was long diſſembled by D. Fernand, attending ſome oportunity nity of reuenge, notwithſtanding any excuſe D. Garcia could make, ſeeing his deſigne had failed. Thus the King of Nauarre liued in continuall hatred with his brethren. D. Ramir, and D. Fernand, as hee had purchaſed by his bad diſpoſition, the diſlike of his father and mother: a Prince in truth vnworthie to make warre againſt the Moores, for the aduancement of the Chriſtian religion: againſt whom (notwithſtanding that hee was in bad termes with his brethren) hee ſent an army, and tooke from them the towne of Funes, in the yeere of our Lord 1045. For the recouery of his health, hee had ſent meſſengers to all the famous Biſhops and Abbots of Spaine, that by their praiers to God hee might bee cured: with this deuotion hee cauſed himſelfe to bee carried to the Monaſtery of Saint Sauueur of Leyre, where hee did beleeue that by the praiers of thoſe religious men, his health was reſtored; in recompence where- B of, he gaue to that houſe the Conuent of Centurifontes, and many other things: all this did nothing abate the ſpleene hee had againſt his brother D. Fernand, who would not be ſurprized.

Caſtille. Being returned into his country, diſſembling the wrong which had beene done him, he made warre againſt the Moores, vpon the fronters of Caſtille, where he tooke the townes of Goruas, Vado del Rey, Aquilera, Berlanga, and other places, paſſing vnto Tarraſſone and then hee returned by Medina Celi, ruining the forts, and watch-towers which the Moores had built in thoſe countries; the which he did with leſſe difficulty, for that the Moores eſtate was in great confuſion, by reaſon of the ſeditions and tiranies An. 1047. which were practiſed amongſt them. They write that this Prince did alſo that yeere (which was 1047) chaſe the Moores out of the mountaines, of Ora and Ouan. Some- C time after, continuing the warre againſt the Mahumetiſts, hee paſt the mountaines with his army into the realme of Toledo, he ſpoiled the country about Talamanca and Vzeda, whereas the riuer of Henares paſſeth to Alcala, and Guadalajara: he entred the territory of Madrid, and made ſuch a general ſpoile of townes and people, as the King of Toledo, a Moore called Aly Maymon, was aduiſed to pacifie him by preſents, yea to promiſe him tribute: the which hee did, ſending home D. Fernand rich with gold and ſiluer, and of all other ſpoiles, into his countries of Leon and Caſtille.

Moores. This King Aly Maymon was the ninth of thoſe which had rained at Toledo of the royall race of Aben Humeya, ſonne to King Hizen, and grand-child to Hayran. Hee had one ſonne amongſt others, carrying his grand-fathers name Hizen, and one daughter D called Caſilda, who was a Chriſtian, as you ſhall heare. At that time there dwelt many Muſarabes in Toledo, whō God left not vnfurniſhed of Paſtors, among the which Ar- Arts floriſhed among the Arabians in Spaine. chiques the Arch-deacon is famous, who incouraged the Chriſtians of that city, and inſtructed them in the grounds of their faith: arts and liberal ſciences were in like manner maintained and honored among the Arabians, and in thoſe daies their liued many learned men of that nation, whereof the moſt renouned were Haly Albuacem, and Aly Aben Ragel, very learned in Aſtrology. The occaſion which drew the Princeſſe Caſſide to the Chriſtian religion, is thus related by the authors of the Spaniſh Hiſtory. She fel (ſay they) very ſicke of a bloudy flix, for whoſe recouery her father had in vaine im- ployed the skill of all the Arabian Phiſitians, and others that were expert in that facul- E ty: but in the end ſhee had a reuelation, that if ſhee did waſh her ſelfe in the waters of Saint Vincents Lake, which is in the territory of Bureua, nere vnto Biruieſca, ſhe ſhould Caſſide a Princeſſe of the Moores baptized. be cured: the which ſhee preſently declared to the King her father, who was very well pleaſed: and hauing written to the King D. Fernand, hee ſent this Virgin well attended vnto him, and preſently ſet many Chriſtian ſlaues, at liberty, vpon this occaſion D. Fernand entertained her with great honor, & cauſed her to bee furniſhed with al things neceſſary. Being bathed in thoſe waters ſhe recouered her health, wherevpon the Spaniards ſay, ſhe would returne no more to Toledo, but cauſed her ſelfe to be baptized and built an Oratory with a little chamber vpon the Lake, where ſhee made her aboad, and there ſpent the remainder of her daies, in praiers and other religious exercies, and was there buried after her deceaſe. F

But the ſame author ſaid, that being at Toleda, before ſhe came into Caſtille ſhe was full of charity and compaſſion to Chriſtian captiues, to whom ſhe gaue great almes,

which

A which was a ſigne that there were in her ſome good ſeeds of better inſtruction, the which by the recouery of her health was confirmed. There was alſo an other Prince of the Moores called Alay Maymon (not he which was King of Toledo) againſt whom D.Garcia King of Nauarre had a ſharpe incounter, at Ricorbaſeſca, where the Moore was vanquiſhed and ſlaine.

Nauarre.

Theſe Chriſtian Kings, ambitious and treacherous one againſt an other, not ſparing their owne bloud, thought to expiate all their offences, in building of Churches, and indowing them with great reuenues, in enuy one of an other, with this opinion, D.Garcia gaue many guifts, and granted many preuiledges to the Church of Saint Mary the Royal of Nagera, which hee had cauſed to be built, for his funerall: declaring that theſe

B guifts were for the health of his ſoule, of his fathers, of the Queene his wiues, and of his children, with the approbation of the chiefe noblemen of his Realme: which donations and preuiledges, hee ment ſhould continue vnto the end of the world, vpon a penaltie, to him that ſhould breake them, of a thouſand tallents, to bee applied to the Monaſterie. In theſe termes they are expreſt in the letters which are found in the ſayd Monaſterie, dated in the yeere of our Lord 1052. and ſeene by Garibay.

Caſtille.

By the like perſwaſion, D.Fernand King of Caſtille built the Church of Saint Iſidore in the city of Leon. And to make that place of more authority, hee reſolued to get his body, which hee thought was yet in the city of Seuile, where he had beene Biſhop, Exploits of D. Fernand and againſt the Moores.

C for this cauſe hee proclaimed warre, againſt Almuncamus, called by others Benabet, Aben Amet, who at that time was King there, waſting and ſpoyling his country, on this ſide the riuer of Guadiana, towards Portugal, where hee tooke the towne of Montmaior, and purſuing his enemy, he forſt him to the like conditions, as hee had done Aly Maymon, King of Toledo, and beſides hee made him to deliuer Saint Iſidores bodie, or ſome-thing in ſteed thereof, the which was receiued by D. Auito Biſhop of Leon, and D.Ordogno Biſhop of Aſtorga, which relicke hee cauſed to bee carried to Leon. This King D.Fernand at the ſute of his ſubiects of the Kingdome of Leon, cauſed the towne of Zamora to bee new built, which had remayned a heape of ſtones, ſince the raigne of D.Ramir the third. D.Garcia King of Nauarre did in like manner build the towne of

And to returne to the hatred which continued betwixt theſe two brethren, it burſt forth in the yeere 1054. ſo as the King D. Fernand beeing falne ſicke at Burgos, he requited D. Garcia in the like manner: for D.Garcia being come vnto him, to viſit him, and to take from him all ſuſpition that hee had attempted againſt him, he was ſeazed on and caried priſoner vnto Cea.

Nauarre.

D.Garcia, wrought in ſuch ſort with good words and money, as his gard ſuffred him to eſcape, and ſo being full of wrath and indignation, he returned into Nauarre, where hee leuied a mighty army of his ſubiects, of Gaſcons and of Moores, allies or mercenaries, the which he led by the mountaines of Oca, vnto Atapuerca within foure leagues of Burgos: whereof the King D.Fernand being aduertiſed, he had rayſed great troupes

Yet before they came to ioyne in battaile, hee did ſollicit the King D.Garcia, by many meſſengers to retire, intreating him to forget all things paſt, and that from thenceforth hee would remaine his good brother and friend: but D.Garcia was ſo incenſed, as he would not giue eare to any good counſell, wherefore both armies aduancing, there was a furious battaile, in the which there was much Chriſtian bloud ſpilt: but D. Garcia was ſo vnfortunate as he was incountred in the charge, by two Knights of Nauarre, who being diſcontented with him, had retired to D. Fernands army; theſe two ranne vpon him and ſlue him; whereupon the Nauarrois army was ſoone put to reute, and defeated. The King D. Fernand did greeue at D.Garcias death, and deliuered his bodie to his people to bury it, leauing to purſue a-

His bodie was interred at Saint Mary the royal in Nagera. Hee intitled himſelfe King of Pampelone, Nagera, Alaua, Oca, Bureua, of Caſtille the Old, and of Biſcay, where intruth he held moſt part of the country.

In witneſſe whereof there are letters found, conteyning, that in the yeere 1053. D. Nugno Sanches Earle of Durango, and D. Legunтia his wife, indowed a church of Saint Auguſtine, the which is now called Saint Auguſtine of Echauarri, nere vnto the place whereas long after the towne of Helorrio was built, which letters were confirmed by the King D. Garcia, as raigning in that country. Caſtille.

After this victory the King D. Fernand ſeized vpon all Caſtille the Old, of the territory of Bureua, of Mont Oca, and of part of Rioje, vnto the waters of the floud Oja, which fall from the mountaine of Eucimi, where now ſtands Saint Dominique de la Calçada, and fals into Ebro at the towne Haro. In confirmation of the Monkes good husbandry, mention is made, of a controuerſie betwixt the deceaſed King D. Garcia King of Nauarre and Saint Dominique, called of Silos, who was a religious man, borne at Cagnas, in Rioje, and of a ſheapherd became a Monke; hee was bred vp in the Monaſtery of Saint Emylian of Cogolla, where hee tooke the habit of the order of Saint Benet, and liued there ſo religiouſly as he was made Abbot: but for that he was a ſtout protector of the rights of the Abbay, and of their exemptions, he fell in diſgrace with the King, who expelled him out of all his dominions: the which hee aftewardes repented. B

Vſurpations of the King of Caſtille vpon Nauarre.

This good father went into Caſtille, where D. Fernand receiued him courteouſly, and gaue him commiſſion for the reſtoring of the Monaſtery of Saint Sebaſtian of Silos, in the valley of Toblatello, the which had beene deſtroied by the Moores. In thoſe times there beganne to bee great fame of the valour of D. Roderigo Diaz, called by the Arabians, Cid Ruis Diaz, againſt whom he made long and ſharpe warres, beeing a new knight deſirous of honour, and ready for all vertuous exerciſes. After that D. Fernand had ſubiected vnder his obedience, the territories of Rioje and Mont Oca, which had beene held by the Kings of Nauarre, the Moores made many roades thether, being their neighbours, and did daylie carry away great ſpoiles, whereof they were often ſtript by Cid Ruis Diaz; and amongſt others mention is made of a route which he gaue them vpon Mont Oca, where he tooke fiue of their commanders or petty Kings, the which hee afterwards deliuered vpon ranſome, and promiſe of a yeerely tribute. This Cid Ruis had a quarrel with D. Gomes Lord of Gormes, the which had beene conquered by D. Fernand from the Moores, few yeeres before, ſo as entring into Combate, D. Gomes was ſlaine; hee left one daughter called D. Ximena Gomes, who made great and continual complaints for the death of her father: but ſoone after ſhee her ſelfe intreated the King, to make a marriage betwixt her and Cid, the which he did, and ſo this Lady was comforted. Hee purchaſed this name of Cid, which in the Arabian tongue ſignifies Lord, in the towne of Zamore, when as the meſſengers of theſe fiue petty Kings, aboue mentioned, bringing the tribute contracted with them, preſented it in the preſence of the King D. Ferdnand, they called him Cid Ruis Diaz: wherefore the King would haue this braue Knight carry this title ſtill, who by his right name was called Roderigo Diaz de Biuar. C D

D. Roderigo Diaz of Biuar a valiant knight.

Cid a title giuen to Roderigo Diaz.

The towne of Calaorra beeing taken by the Moores, and recouered againe by the King D. Fernand, there grew ſome controuerſie betwixt him and D. Ramir King of Arragon, for that place; for the deciding whereof either ſhould bring a knight to the combate, vpon condition that the victor ſhould purchaſe the right to his party. For D. Ferdnand Cid Ruis Diaz was armed, and for the King of Arragon came a knight called Martin Gomez, the author (as they ſay) of the houſe and family of Luna in Arragon; Who beeing vanquiſhed and ſlaine vpon the place, Calaorre remained in the iuriſdiction of Caſtille. The race of this knight D. Roderigo Diaz, deſcended of Flauin, whom others call Layn Caluo, Iudge of Caſtille, ſonne in law to Nugno Nugnes Raſura, who had by his daughter D Eluira Nugnes Bella, or Thereſa Bella, as ſome ſay, foure ſonnes, Fernand, Bermond, Layn and Diego, ſurnamed Laynes. Of Fernand the eldeſt was borne, Layn Fernandes, of him Nugno Laynes, who begat Diego Laynes, father to Cid Ruis Diaz: whoſe mother was called D. Thereſa Nugnes, daughter to D. Roderigo, Aluares Earle and Gouernor of the Aſturies, by others called D. Nugna Aluares, d' Amaya. Of Cid Ruis, and of D. Ximena Gomes aboue named was borne D. Diego E F

D. Sancho Garcia the fifth of that name, and the fifteenth King of Nauarre.

B 5. D. Sancho Garcia, ſucceeded D. Garcia Sanches his father in the realme of Nauarre, who could not ſtoppe the courſe of D. Fernands conqueſts, hauing after the battaile of Atapuerca, taken from him a good part of the country which his father enioyed: wherefore he made a league with his vncle D. Ramir King of Arragon, againſt D. Fernand King of Caſtille. By this alliance the Spaniſh authors ſay, that theſe Kings gaue diuers townes and forts in pawne one to an other, and that the King of Nauarre did quit to him of Arragon, and to his for euer, the townes of Sangueſſa, Lerda and Ondues. This King had to wife a Ladie called D. Plaiſance, by whom hee had children, but there is no certaine mention made of them. Hee was of little valour, and therefore D. Fernand of Caſtille his vncle, had meanes to reſtraine him in his Realme of Nauarre, at his pleaſure, were it either right or Nauarre.

C wrong.

In the meane time the King D. Fernand, to purge and expiat theſe outrages, gaue bountifully to the Cathedral churches, colledges, pariſhes and monaſteries of his realme, and to others without it; for they ſay hee gaue euery yeere to the Abbay of Clugny, a thouſand peeces of gold, out his treaſury and infinite almes deeds to the poore in particular. The tribute which hee demaunded of the King of Toledo, was denied him a little before his death: but hee went in perſon againſt him, forced him to acknowledge him for his Lord, and to doe him homage, and in like manner the other Moores, who after his example had rebelled: and they hold that hee alſo led his army along the riuer of Ebro, by the confines of Cattelogne to Valence, where D hauing taken great ſpoiles from the Moores, which raigned in thoſe Marches, hee returned victorious into his country. His reſidence was for the moſt part at Leon, for certaine reaſons. Caſtille. The almes deeds of the King of Caſtille.

And although that homebred examples did warne him to keepe his Eſtates vnited in one bodie, to haue the more power and authority, to withſtand the attempts of all enemies, yet hee was reſolued to aſſigne his children their portions in his life time: To D. Sancho hee appointed the realme of Caſtille, vnto the riuer of Piſuerga, towards Leon; and towards Nauarre limited by the riuer of Ebro, as hee had augmented it on that ſide, with the preiudice of his Nephew D. Sancho Garcia: To D. Alphonſo his ſecond ſonne, he aſſigned the Kingdome of Leon in the Aſturies, and E Tramſiera, vnto the riuer Deua, which paſſeth by Ouiedo: and moreouer hee gaue him part of Campos, and the towne of Aſtorga, and other lands in Galicia with the towne of Zebrero: To D. Garcia the youngeſt the realme of Galicia, withall that hee had conquered in Portugall. Hee did alſo indowe his two daughters, aſſigning to D. Vrraca the eldeſt the city of Zamora, and to D. Eluira the yongeſt, the city of Toro: but this diuiſion was not allowed, nor kept by his ſonne D. Sancho, after his death, the which many ſay, was in the yeere of our Lord 1059. D. Fernand King of Caſtille aſſigneth portions to his children.

A remarkable yeere by the credit which was giuen to the Cardinals of Rome, by the dilligence of Pope Nicholas the ſecond, a Sauoyard borne, who hauing called a councell at Saint Iean de Latran in Rome, prouided that from thence forth the Pope ſhould not be choſen but by the ſuffrages of the Cardinalls, grounding this decree vp- F on the corruptions, troubles and ſeditions, which grew ordinarily vpon the election of Popes; holding it leſſe dangerous to haue theſe indirect courſes practiſed by few, then by the whole Clergy, or the people of Rome. This Decree is inſerted in the three and twenty diſtinction, and begins. In nomine domini &c. An. 1059. Election of the Pope by the Cardinalls at Rome.

The

The writers of the Spaniſh Hiſtory are not very certaine of the time of D. Fernands death; for thoſe which ſeeme moſt exact, prolong his life vnto the yeere of our Lord 1067. The place where he died is alſo very doubtfull: but all agree that he was interred at Saint Iſidore of Leon, dying ſo full of contrition and repentance for his ſinnes, as they hold his body for a holy relike, in the Kings chappel in that church. By this computation he ſhould haue raigned two and thirty yeeres in Caſtille, and thirty or thereabours in Leon. Wee finde no other thing touching the affaires of this King with foraine Princes, but only a contention betwixt his Ambaſſadors, and thoſe of the Emperor Henry, at the councell of Florence, vnder Victor the ſecond, the Emperor pretending that the Kings of Spaine ſhould acknowledge his Maieſty and doe him homage as to their ſouergaine: but this queſtion was decided by the councell, where it was ſayd, that ſeeing the Kings of Spaine had defended and conquered their Realmes by armes, without any aide from the Emperors, they were free and exempt from al acknowledgment or ſubiection to the Empire: whereof wee may read the gloſſe, vpon the Chap. Adrianus Papa, Diſtinc. 63. the like preuiledge haue the Kings of France, the State of Venice, the Kings of England, and ſome others.

The Kings of Spaine doe not acknowledge the Empire.

Cattelogne.

D. Raymond Berenger the elder, Earle of Barcelone, a wiſe and valiant Knight, of whom we haue made mention, defended his country by his armes and wiſdome, and inlarged his limits to the preiudice of the Moores, by the fauour of the other Chriſtian Potentates of Spaine, which maée warre againſt them, and the diuiſions which were among theſe Arabian Mahumetiſts. At that time was Seneſhall in Cattelogne (which was a dignity equal to that of the Conſtable or Mareſhals in France) one called Raymond Myron. In his time D. Guillen the fat was Earle of Beſalu, ſonne to Bernard Briſefer, who dying in the yeere 1052. D. Bernard Guillen his ſecond ſonne ſucceeded him: at the ſame time was Earle of Cerdagne, D Guillen Raymond, ſon to Cont Raymond Geoffry, who held it long, and had two ſonnes, D. Guillen Iordain, who was Earle after him, and D. Bernard Guillen, who was alſo Earle of Cerdagne: and to make cleere the alliances of this houſe of Cattelogne, we finde that D. Almodis, wife to Count Raymond Berenger, was iſſued from the houſe of the Earles of Carcaſſone, beeing ſtrongly allied, eſpecially with the Lords of Bearne and Narbone, and the Earles of Tolouſe, Bigorre and other great houſes of France. From the ſame houſe of Carcaſſone, was iſſued Emengarde, married to the Vicont of Beſiers, both which in the yeere of our Lord 1068. yeelded vnto Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelone, all the intereſt and right which they might pretend vnto the Earldomes of Carcaſſone, Tolouſe, Cominges, Rodes and Minerue: by meanes whereof, this houſe of Barcelone, had great Siegneuries, and pretenſions in France, and from that time did enioy the towne of Carcaſſone: about which time the towne of Perpignan was built.

D. Sancho Fernandes the ſecond of that name, and the ſecond King of Caſtille.

Caſtille. An. 1067.

6. IN the yeere of our redemption 1067. the realmes of Caſtille, Leon and Galicia, were diuided betwixt the children of D. Ferdnand deceaſed, and Caſtille fell to D. Sancho Fernandes, ſurnamed the valiant. Leon to Alphonſo Fernandes the ſecond, whom they called the Braue: and Galicia to D. Garcia, with that which hee had conquered in Portugal. Adding vnto theſe D. Sancho Garcia, who held the Kingdome of Nauarre, and D. Sancho Ramires, raigning in Arragon, wee finde that at one inſtant there were raigning in Spaine, fiue grand-children to D. Sancho the Great, King of Nauarre. The Kings of Nauarre and Arragon laſt named, made a league againſt D. Sancho King of Caſtille, but their quarrels and exploits are obſcure and vncertaine, at the leaſt they did him no great harme. Whileſt that D. Sancha, the mother of D. Fernands three children liued, they continued in reaſonable good termes, for ſhee remained at Leon her owne inheritance, ſo as Sancho durſt not attempt any thing againſt D. Alphonſo;

A Alphonso, to whom it was assigned, shee beeing dead, which was the second yeere of D. Sancho Fernandez King of Castille, they sought all occasions to spoile one an other. D Garcia King of Galicia began first, taking from his sister D. Vrraca, Lady of Zamora, a part of her territorie, the which hee vsurped. D. Sancho King of Castille, who demanded no better subiect, imbraced his sisters quarrel, and for her cause resolued to make warre in Galicia; but the Noblemen and Knights of his councel, were not of opinion, that hee should goe to armes, for a matter which might bee reconciled by some milder course. Amongst those which did contradict the Kings ambitious desire, were D. Garcia de Cabra, and Cid Ruis Diaz, saying, that if, contrary to their aduice, hee were resolued to inuade Galicia, hee should first prouide to bee in good termes VVarre betwixt the three brethren sonnes to D. Fernand, King of Castille.

B with D. Alphonso King of Leon, that hee might haue free passage for his army through his country, and to conduct his victuals and munition from Castille into Galicia. To this end the two Kings had two enteruewes at Sahagun, where in the beginning D. Alphonso seemed vntractable: yet in the end hee yeelded to giue his brother. D. Sancho passage, and whatsoeuer hee demaunded: wherefore in the yeere 1071. warre was begunne against the King D. Garcia who had recourse vnto his brother. D. Alphonso of Leon, to bee aided by him; but hee excused himselfe, saying that hee would remaine indifferent, and not deale, for the one nor the other: so as D. Sancho entring Galicia with great forces, after many incounters hee became master thereof, dispossest his brother of all his country, and tooke him prisoner. So the raigne of this King ended the

D. Garcia King of Galicia dispossest.

C fourth yeere after his comming to it: yet some authors say, that this was done, after D. Sancho had dispossest his brother D. Alphonso of the Kingdome of Leon, and forced him to become a Monke, and to take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: the which they report after this manner: D. Sancho beeing discontented with the diuision of portions which D. Fernand had made betwixt him and his brethren, thinking that they had done him wrong to take from him the soueraignty of these Kingdomes, being the eldest. As soone as D. Sancha, their mother was dead, hee set vpon his brother D. Alphonso King of Leon, and at his first entry wonne a battaile at a place called Plantaca: but the Leonois rallied againe together, they gaue an other battaile to D. Sancho, and defeated him vpon the riuer of Carrion neere to Gulpejora, whereas the King D. Al-

D phonso commanded that they should not pursue the Castillans.

Then was Cid Ruis Diaz, in D Sanchos army, as his vassall, who excusing this losse with good reasons, and comforting his King, hee reuiued his courage: so as hauing gathered his troupes together, he came and charged the Leonois the morning following, beeing heauy with sleepe, hauing made good cheere for their victory gotten the day before, and not doubting any enemy, putting them all in disorder, and to a shamefull flight, hauing slaine and taken many; then hee pursued this aduantage in such manner, as hee besieged the King D. Alphonso in Saint Maries Church of Carrion, where he thought to saue himselfe, and carried him away prisoner to Burgos.

D. Alphonso King of Leon, dispossest by his brother.

A while after at the sute and instance of D. Vrraca, sister to these Kings, and of

E D. Pedro Ansures, hee was set at liberty vpon condition: that hee should goe into the Monasterie of Sahagun, and take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: but hee staied not long there, beeing forced to enter into it: for by the aduice of the same D. Pedro Ansures, hee left Sahagun, and went to Toledo, to King Almenon or Almeon, a Moore, who receiued him verie courteously, and intreated him honourably, whilest hee remained with him, hauing taking an oth of fidelitie of him.

Hospitality of King Almenon a Moore.

Hee lodged him in a faire great house, neere vnto his Palace, which they imagine was in that place where as now the Monasterie of religious women of the conception doth stand, to the end that hee might there enioy the company of the Chri-

F stian Musarabes, which dwelt in that city.

Thether came three Knights, sent from his sister Vrraca, to keepe him company. D. Pedro, D. Gonçal and D. Fernand Ansures, brethren, of the country of Leon, who brought with them many other Christians, the which were entertained by the King Almenon: During this exile D. Alphonso gaue himselfe to hunting and country ſports: and taking great delight in a certaine place of the territory of Toledo, A where there were the ruines of old buildings, the King D.Almenon to gratefie him, gaue him leaue to build them vp againe, and to plant it with Chriſtians, the which is at this day called Brihuega, yet D. Alphonſo grew to bee ſuſpected of the Moores, who feared that hee ſought meanes to ſeize vpon the citie of Toledo, wherevpon Almenon was perſwaded to kill him, notwithſtanding hee would not violate the lawes of Hoſpitality, although hee were a Mahumetiſte, but was content onely to take a new oth of him.

Whileſt that the King D.Alphonſo paſt his time thus in exile, D. Sancho his brother, made himſelfe maiſter of the citie, and of all the Kingdome of Leon, where hee cauſ- B ed himſelfe to bee crowned King. Hee beeing thus diſpoſſeſt, they ſay hee went againſt D. Garcia King of Galicia, to intreat him after the ſame manner. The diuiſion which was then in Galicia, betwixt the King and a great part of his Nobility, made the enterpriſe more eaſie; for D.Garcia beeing growne a tyrant, ſpoyling and intreating his ſubiects vnworthely, hee gouerned himſelfe after the appetit of a ſlaue more then was fit. This woman (who ſome ſay, was a ſlaue infranchiſed) put the Nobilitie and gentrie, in fauour or diſgrace with the King (moſt commonly by falſe reportes) as ſhee pleaſed, which was the cauſe of many inconueniences: So as in the end growing inſupportable, certaine knights ſlue her in the Kings preſence.

Vpon this occaſion the Nobilitie was diuided, and the Realme full of troubles and C factions, ſome following the Kings party who would reuenge this murther, and others ſupporting the murtherers. The affaires beeing in this Eſtate, the King D. Sancho entered Galicia with a mighty army, againſt whom D. Garcia finding himſelfe too weake, hee abandoned his country, and had recourſe vnto the Moores, demaunding aide of them for the recouery thereof, promiſing to make them ſharers of that which hee ſhould get from D.Sancho his brother: but the Moores anſwered him wiſely, that hee who had not the heart to defend his owne, ſhould not bee able to inuade an other: yet the Moore beeing liberall and courteous, gaue him rich preſents, and ſent him backe, refuzing to ingage himſelfe in that action. D. Garcia hauing gathered ſome men together, but not ſufficient to effect any matter of importance, doubtfull what D courſe to take, hee fell to ſpoile his owne country, and making his retreat into Portugal, where hee had recouered ſome places, hee did mightily anoy D.Sanchos garriſons, but it continued not long: for D.Sancho hauing raiſed an army, came againſt D. Garcia, fought with him, defeated him, and tooke him priſoner, neere vnto Saint Iren, and ſent him to the caſtle of Lune, with a good gard, from whence hee departed not vntill his death, the which happened in the time of D. Alphonſo his Nephew about the yeere of our Lord 1081. who commanded hee ſhould bee buried with irons on his feete, at Leon, in the Church of Saint Iſidore: by this meanes the King D. Sancho remained Lord and Maiſter of all Galicia, and other lands of that partage. By this it appeeres there is difference in the time, and in the meanes of their diſpoſſeſſing. All E this did not ſatisfie D. Sanchos ambition, for hee would in like manner ſtrippe his ſiſters, D.Vrraca and D. Eluira, of the lands and places which they held, by their fathers will, and laied ſiege to the towne of Zamore.

D. Garcia King of Galicia made a prey to his enemy, by reaſon of his tyranies.

The inhabitants much affected to their Princeſſe, doing their indeauors for the defending of her rights, had with her conſent choſen for their captaine a knight, called D. Arias Gonçales who had nouriſhed her, vnder whoſe conduct they made many gallant ſallies vpon the beſiegers, with loſſe of either ſide. Whileſt that D. Sancho was buſie at this vaine attempt, a deſperat knight of Caſtille, called Vellides Ataulphe, or Delphos, went out of the city with a reſolution to kill the King, and found ſuch an oportunity, as hee ſtrooke him dead with a boarſpeare, without any let, and F then retired himſelfe to the place from whence hee came, notwithſtanding that hee was purſued by Cid Ruis Diaz and others. Thus the valour and conqueſts of D.Sancho Fernandes King of Caſtille (which could not bee reſtrained by two great Kings) were made vaine, when as hee would attempt againſt a woman: an argument of the vanity

D. Sanchos ambition ſtayed by the iudgment of God.

A vanity of humaine enterpriſes, and that there is a greater power which controules them. This death happened in the yeere of our Lord 1073. hauing raigned in Caſtille about ſixe yeeres and nine monthes: by reaſon whereof the army disbanded, euery one returning to his home, except the Caſtillans, who would needes continue the ſiege before Zamora for a time. The Kings body was carried to the Monaſtery of Saint Saluador of Ogna. The inſcription which is in that Monaſtery ſhewes that hee died fiue yeeres later, but there is an error, for that Garibay affirmes, that hee had ſeene ancient writings, witneſſing that D. Alphonſo his brother raigned then in Caſtille. An. 1073.

If the Caſtillan brethren were at diſcord, they of Nauarre had as little charity amongſt them: for betwixt D. Sancho Garcia, and D. Raymond, there was enuy and ſe- Nauarre. The Brothers of Nauarre at diſcord.
B creat hatred, the which burſt out in time: for D. Raymond holding ſome ſtrong places, and ſome in his brothers gouernment, and hauing by his bounty drawne many vnto him, who were diſcontented with the preſent Eſtate of the realme, he rebelled, meaning to defend theſe places hee held: but the King D. Sancho, and the Nobility of Nauarre did eaſily expell him. But there fell out a new trouble for the Nauarrois, to demaund reaſon of the Kings of Caſtille, who detained from him the territory of Bureua, Caſtille the old, and other places.

D. Raymond beeing thus expelled, had no recourſe to any Chriſtian Princes his neighbours, who (as hee doubted) would deteſt his attempts, but hee fled vnto the Moores, the enemies of our faith, and making warre with them againſt his brother, D. Sancho King of Nauar ſlaine.
C there was a battaile giuen neere to Rueda, or Penalen, in the which D. Sancho was ſlaine: this was about the yeere of our Lord 1076. hauing raigned two and twenty yeeres: he had by his wife D. Plaiſance, amongſt other children, D. Ramir Sanches, and two D. Garcias: D. Ramir being very young, vpon the newes of his fathers death, put himſelfe vnder the protection of D. Sancho Ramires, King of Arragon, whom alſo the Noblemen and Knights of Nauarre called to raigne ouer them, by reaſon of the minority of their King to oppoſe him againſt the enterpriſes of the bad. D. Raymond, who purſued his deſeigne to make himſelfe King of Nauarre, and had already ſeized vpon Pampelone, and vſurped the title of King there, but hee was vertuouſly repulſt, ſo as beeing deceiued of his ambitious hopes, not knowing what to reſolue, hee retired to the King An. 1076.

called Marquiſe, wife to Aznar Lopes, a Knight, who made a donation of Saint Maria Maior, to the Collegiall Church of Sarragoſſe, in the time of D. Alphonſo King of Nauarre, called the Warrior: the two Garcias bretheren, ſonnes to the deceaſed King of Nauarre, fled into Caſtille, to the King D. Alphonſo, the mightieſt Prince at that time in Spaine.

E D. Sancho Ramires the ſecond King of Arragon, and choſen ſixteenth King of Nauarre.

7. D. Sancho Ramires had raigned ſome yeeres in Arragon, when as hee was called to the crowne of Nauarre. Hee had married a Lady, daughter to the Earle Arragon and Nauarre vnited.
of Vrgel, called D. Felicia, by whom he had three ſonnes. D. Pedro who ſucceeded in his Kingdomes. D. Alphonſo who raigned after his brother, and D. Ramir, a religious man in the Monaſtery of Saint Ponce of Tomeres, neere to Beſiers, and afterwards King by the deceaſe of his brother D. Alphonſo, who left no children. He had alſo one baſtard, Genealogie of Arragon and Nauarre.
called D. Garcia who was biſhop of Iacca. In this Prince the two realms of Nauarre and F Arragon were vnited, 42. yeeres after the ſeparation thereof: he was war-like and politique, and withall very zelous in the Romaine religion: for hee changed the ceremonies of the Gothes, which the Chriſtians vſed, and brought in thoſe of the Romiſh church, it may be by the councel held at Iacca, vnder this King, when as the Biſhoprike of Arragon was firſt eſtabliſhed there: to inrich which ſeat, beſides the tithes, there A were certaine portions appointed out of the conqueſts which they ſhould get from the Moores of Sarragoſſe and Tudele: and in ſteed of the ciuill Lawes of the Gothes, hee brought in the common law of the Empire into his iuriſdiction. There is a volume extant of particular lawes, giuen by this King to them of Iacca, which is inſerted amongſt the cuſtomes of Nauarre at this daie: but the chiefe acts of religion done by him, and other Princes in his time, were to indow churches; for the Monaſteries, Colledges and Biſhoprickes of Spaine, haue thouſands of preuiledges, donations and exemptions granted vnto them.

Cattelogne. There is mention made of a councell aſſembled in the towne of Parcelone at the purſute of D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, and at the requeſt of D. Almodia his wife, B whereas Cardinal Hugues, Legatto Pope Alexander the ſecond, or Gregory the ſeuenth did præcede, for the certaine time is not ſet down, but it is only ſaid, that it was celebrated about the yeere 1071. there it was decreed that Clergy men ſhould liue chaſtly, for that (as the Hiſtory ſaies) many of them were married, according to the introduction of King Vitiza the Goth: and after the example of the Arragonois, the ſeruice of the Muſarabes was left, and the Romaine of Saint Gregory receiued in Cattalogne. In the ſame councel they treated of ſecular affaires, as of the gouernment of the country of Cattelogne, of the Earles houſe, of the Eſtate of the Nobles, of their names and titles, diſtinguiſhed by this Earle, into Viconts, Barons and Vauaſſeurs: and ſuch like.

Raymond Berenger, poiſoned D. Almodia his mother in law, fearing that ſhee ſhould labour to depriue him of his fathers ſucceſſion to aduance her owne children: whereupon hee was iuſtly diſinherited: thus the wicked reaped what hee feared. In the ſame country died D. Armingol Earle of Vrgel, in the yeere of our Lord 1075. to whom his ſonne ſucceeded, carrying the ſame name: and the yeere following 1076. died the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, hauing gouerned in the county of Barcellone longer then any of his Predeceſſors, that is one and fortie yeeres. Hee diuided his Earledome betwixt his two ſonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, and D. Berenger Raymond, to the great hindrance of the commonweale, giuing moreouer vnto D. Raymond Berenger the Earldome of Carcaſſone. By this Earle D. Raymond the cuſtomary lawes were ordained, taken out of the volume of the old Gothique lawes, amended and reformed. D

Arabians. 8. The diuiſions of the Moores in Spaine, aboue mentioned, doe admoniſh vs to ſpeake ſome-thing of the turbulent Eſtate of the Arabians in the Eaſt, and in like manner of them of Maroc, which was the cauſe of a great alteration in Spaine. Returning then to the Caliphe Maruan, who was in armes againſt Salin, the ſonne of Aſmulin, who had ſeized vpon the Regions of Perſia and Syria: wee ſay that by the deſeat of Maruan, and his death, Egipt was alſo conquered by Salin: ſo as all that which the Arabians held in the Eaſt, did obey Aſmulin and Cataban his companion and councellor.

Seditions, reuolts and vſurpations among the Arabian Princes.

They beeing dead, Abubalan ſurnamed Muamat, was Caliphe of Perſia and Syria, E and Salin the ſonne of Aſmulin kept Egypt to himſelfe, and gaue the beginning to a ſoueraigne ſeat in that country, the which hee eſtabliſhed at Caire, cauſing himſelfe to bee called Caliphe. Againſt Abubalan, did riſe many enemies in Syria and Arabia, of the faction of Maruan, whom they did beleeue was yet liuing, ſo as there died great numbers of that nation, in diuers incounters.

After the death of Abubalan, his brother Abdala ſucceeded in the Eaſterne Empire of Sarrazins or Arabians, but an other of the ſame name aſpiring to that dignity, ſlue him, and held the throne about the yeere 756. at which time there were great troups of Turkes beganne to diſperſe themſelues ouer all Armenia, the which did ouerrunne and ſpoile the Sarrazins country, who incountred them in diuers ſharpe and bloudie battailes. After this Abdala, who raigned about ſome twentie yeeres, his F ſonne Madi Amadi was Caliphe, who held the Royall ſeate nine yeeres, and Moyſe his ſonne ſucceeded him, who liued but two yeeres, and left the place and dignitie

to

A to Aaron Caliphe, who they write was very iuſt and charitable to Chriſtians, and had ſought the friendſhip of Charles the Great, King of France, of Alphonſo the Chaſt raigning in Spaine, and of other Chriſtian Princes of his time, to whom hee ſent Ambaſſadors and preſents, and they to him.

Hauing raigned three and twenty yeers, he left, after his death, the dignity of Caliphe in queſtion betwixt his two children, Muamat and Abdala, who after great effuſion of bloud, agreed to raigne with equall title and authority. Muamat tranſported the ſeat of his Empire to Bagadat, a towne built by him, neere vnto old Babylon, and would reſide no more at Damas. At that time the Empire of the Arrabians and Sarrazins was diuided into foure great Potentats, wherof that of the Eaſt and of Baga- Foure great Potentats of Mahumets ſect in Aſia and Affrike.

B dat, retained the title of Caliphe, which ſignifies King or ruler. That of Egipt called himſelfe Sultan, which is as much to ſay, as Emperour. At Cairon, a great and mighty towne, built within the country of Affricke, in the time of Ozmen, ſome fiue and twenty leagues diſtant from Tunis, raigned an other Caliphe, and at Maroc (which Eſtate was come to them of the family of Aben Alabeci) raigned a Miralmumin, from which great Potentats did afterwards grow, the Kingdomes of Fez, Alger, Tunes and others. After Mahumad raigned Imprael, who lett the Empire of the Eaſt to his ſonne Mamum, who held it with great reputation: but after him the Sarrazins power began to decline in the Eaſt, by their continuall ſeditions and ciuill diſſentions, whereby the Turkes had meanes to ſettle a Monarchie, the which beganne about the yeere

C of Chriſt one thouſand, being called by Mahumet Prince or Gouernor of Perſia, who made warre againſt the Caliphe of Bagadat, in which they ſerued him: but falling afterwards to quarrel with him, they defeated him, and ſeized vpon Perſia, where they did chooſe for their firſt King, their General Tangrolipix, and ſence partly by force, and and partly by an accord, they delt ſo with the Sarrazins, as their power declyning, the name and Empire of the Turkes hath continued to firme and mighry, vnto our daies. The Miralmumins of Maroc, being farre from theſe tempeſts of the Eaſt, maintained their dignity in their race and nation, but not without the like furies and inraged appetites of rule; ſo as hauing beene held many yeeres by them of the linage of Aben Alabeci, they were ſet vpon and ſubdued by an other race of Princes Moores, called

D Almorauides, whereof Ioſeph Aben-Teſin was the chiefe, who made himſelfe Monarke in Affrike, ouer all the Kings and Potentats which did raigne there, about the yeere 1068. and extended his power into Spaine, as we will ſhew.

D. Alphonſo the ſixth of that name, the third King of Caſtille, and fiue and twentith of Leon.

9. D. Sancho Fernandes, King of Caſtille, being ſlaine as we haue ſayd, by the treaſon of Vellides Dolphos, or Ataulphe: D. Vrraca did preſently aduertiſe her brother D. Alphonſo, who remained at Toledo vnder the protection of King Almenon. This Moore hauing many ſpies amongſt the Chriſtians, had already intelligence of the murther, and obſeruing the actions of D. Alphonſo, hee was reſolued to ſtay him, if hee ſhould offer to depart without his priuity and leaue. D. Alphonſo was wonderfully perſwaded by D. Pedro d' Anſures (who walking about the towne had by chance met the meſſenger which brought him the newes of the death of the King his brother) to depart as ſecretly as he could, fearing ſome trechery in the Mooriſh King, but D. Al- Caſtille and Leon.

F phonſo did otherwiſe, wherein he wrought wiſely for himſelfe, for he doubted that the King Almenon hauing aduice of what had paſt, did watch him at the paſſage: wherefore comming freely vnto him, hee read D. Vrracas letters in his preſence, demanding his aduice, leaue and aide, to goe and take poſſeſſion of the Realme of Caſtille. King Almenon was much pleaſed, in that hee did not diſtruſt him, imbraſed him verie louingly, reioyced with him at the change of his eſtate, ſuffered him to depart at his pleaſure, and furniſhed him with money and other things neceſſary to honour his voiage, and to aſſure his affaires, telling him freely what his intent was, to ſtay him priſoner if hee had ſhewed himſelfe ſo ingrate, as to diſtruſt him who had honored him, and entertained him ſo louingly during his exile: and before his departure hee cauſed him to renue the oth, neuer to bee contrary to him, nor to his ſonne Hizen. Whileſt that D. Alphonſo prepared himſelfe to come into Caſtille, to enioy his new Kingdome, the ſiege of Zamora continued: for the Knights of Caſtille and the Prelats, hauing performed the funerals of the deceaſed King, in the Monaſtery of Ogna, were returned before the city, vnder the conduct of D. Diego Ordognes, Earle of Lara, beeing much incenſt, that the murtherer of the King had ſaued himſelf within their walles: wherefore they were reſolued to batter it all they could.

The Law of defying a towne.

They write that D. Diego Ordognes defied the citie, according to the Lawes of duels or combats, amongſt the which it was decreed, that any knight that would defie a chiefe towne, was bound to fight againſt fiue knights, one after an other, changing euery time his armes and horſe, and taking (if hee pleaſed) bread dipped thrice in wine or water: wherefore D. Diego ſubmitting himſelfe to the rigour of this Lawe, offered to fight againſt fiue knights, whereof hee ſlue three, the which were ſonnes to D. Arias Gonçales: D. Pedro, D. Diego and D. Roderigo Arias; and that then the Iudges appointed, made the combate to ceaſe, not declaring who was victor, notwithſtanding that the Earle D. Ordognes, offered to end it, and to fight againſt thoſe two which remained: ſome ſay, that D. Roderigo beeing wounded to the death, ſtrooke at his aduerſarie with all his force, thinking to part him in two, but the ſword falling vpon the horſe-necke cut the reines, and hurt him verie ſoore, wherewith the horſe beeing mooued, carried the knight out of the liſts, the which was not lawfull for him that would haue the honour of the combate. Heerevpon the King D. Alphonſo came to the campe before Zamora, where hee was receiued without any contradiction for King of Caſtille, Leon, the Aſturies and Galicia, and of thoſe Lands which the King D. Fernand his father had taken from the crowne of Nauarre. They ſay that the Caſtillans, before they would acknowledge him for their King, would haue him purge himſelfe by oth, that hee was not acquainted, nor conſenting vnto the death of D. Sancho his brother: which oth was required of him by Cid Ruis Diaz, onely, amongſt all the Caſtillans, in the churches of Saint Gadee of Burgos, a place appointed for that buſineſſe.

Ancient and religious caſtomes to purge themſelues by oth.

This manner of purging themſelues by oth, of grieuous crimes impoſed, but not prooued, was vſuall in Spaine in thoſe times, with great ceremonies, and religious terror in many churches and places conſecrated, where there were great aſſemblies of people of all ſorts, whereof did follow many horrible Iudgements of God, of thoſe that were periured, the contempt of Religion, how impure ſoeuer, being deteſtable and abominable before God. The King D. Alphonſo was about thirtie yeeres old, when he beganne to raigne, and was ſurnamed the Braue, for that he was valiant, and did effect great enterpriſes.

Genealogie of Caſtille and Leon.

Wee finde that hee married ſixe wiues, and had the companie of two friends, nobly deſcended, by whom hee had many children. The firſt of his wiues was called Ines a Spaniard: The ſecond was D. Conſtance: The third D. Maria, daughter to the King of Seuille, called Almuncamuz or Benabet, Aben Amet, a Moore: whom hee married after that hee had taken the citie of Toledo, and was before called Caida or Zaida, of whom was borne the Infant D. Sancho, whom the Moores ſlue in the war. Of D. Conſtance was borne D. Vrraca, heire to the King her father: the which was twice married, once to Count Raymond of the houſe of Bourgongne, and of the bloud royall of France: brother to Guy Archbiſhop of Vienne, and afterwards Pope, called Calixtus, from whom iſſued D. Sancho, and D. Alphonſo Raymond, who was King of Caſtille. And for her ſecond husband ſhee married D. Alphonſo, King of Nauarre and Arragon: The fourth wife of D. Alphonſo the Braue, was D. Bertha of Tuſcane: The fifth D. Iſabella, a Spaniard, of whom was borne D. Sancha, wife to D. Roderigo, and

A and D.Eluira maried to Roger firſt King of Naples and Sicilie. And the ſixth and laſt wife was D. Beatrix, a French woman: Beſides all theſe lawfull wiues hee had the companie of D.Ximena Nugnes de Guſman, by whom he had two daughters: the firſt whereof D. Eluira was married to an Earle of Tholouſa and S. Giles, called Raymond, who had by her three ſonnes, D. Bertrand, D. Willyam, and D. Alphonſo Iordain, who were all Earles of Tholouſa. The ſecond called D. Thereſa, who had to husband D. Henry, of the Bloud of the Princes of Lorraine, borne at Beſançon, the ſtemme of the Kings of Portugall. For of this marriage iſſued D. Alphonſo Henriquez, firſt king of Portugal. Theſe three Knights, Raymond of Tholouſa, Raymond of Bourgongne, and Henry of Lorraine, did ſerue the King D. Alphonſo the Braue, happily and valiantly in his warres

B againſt the Moores: in requitall whereof, hee gaue them Eſtates, honours, and his daughters in marriage. Wee find that he had another friend alſo of a Noble Houſe, whoſe name is buried in forgetfulneſſe. Of all this generation and allyance there ſhalbe often mention made in the diſcourſe of this Hiſtorie. This king D. Alphonſo was a worthie Prince, vertuous, a louer of iuſtice, and of his people, religious and zealous to the Sea of Rome, after the manner of his anceſtors, ſo as he was moſt eſteemed of all the Chriſtian Princes of his time.

Diſpoſition of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtile and Leon.

He ſhewed himſelfe a friend and thankefull to king Almenon of Toledo the Moore, whoſe countrey was inuaded by them that held the towne of Cordoua: for hee ledde a great armie to his ayde: yet this Moore ſeeing what great forces D. Alphonſo had with

Moores.

C him, and ſeeing him lodged at Olias, two leagues from the Towne, grew iealous that he would breake the league, but he ſhewed by the effects that he was of a noble and generous diſpoſition: for with him he purſued them of Cordoua, and plagued them in ſuch ſort, as for a long time they would not aduenture to make warre againſt Toledo.

9 The Moores of Seuille and Cordoua, Tributaries to the king of Caſtile, by a Treatie made with the king D. Fernand, did protract the time to ſend the tribute. Whereupon the king D. Alphonſo ſent D. Roderigo Diaz, called Cid, who being come into Andalouſia, found all in armes and combuſtion: the Mores of Grenado, and their turbulent king Almundafar, hauing begun warre againſt Almuncamuz, King of Seuille, with the helpe and fauour of ſome Chriſtians, whereof Fortun Sanches, whome they

D held to be ſonne-in-law to D. Garcia king of Nauarre, and D. Lopes Sanches his brother, with D Garcia Ordognez, and a knight of Caſtile, whoſe name was D. Diego Perez, were the chiefe: to whom Cid ſent to let them vnderſtand, that Almuncamuz king of Seuile was vaſſall to his king, and therfore intreated them to forbeare, and not to preſſe him by armes, but they did not regard it: wherefore Cid imbraced the quarrell in ſuch ſort, as with the troupes he had brought out of Caſtile, and the Moores which hee had found fit to carrie armes, he gaue a great and bloudie defeate to the Granadins, and their allyes, and tooke D. Garcia Ordogno, D Lopes Sanches, and D. Diego Perez, aboue-mentioned priſoners, whom notwithſtanding he deliuered within three dayes after vpon this conſideration: the king of Seuile hauing much honored and thanked Cid Ruis

E Diaz: he payed him what he ought vnto the king of Caſtile, quit him the whole prey, and moreouer preſented him with great gifts. Here did Cid purchaſe the name of Campeador. But for that all the Moores, which ought tribute in Andalouſia, had not payed, the king D. Alphonſo went in perſon to force them, leauing Cid in Caſtile ſicke: In the meane time the Moores of Medina Zelin, or Celi, began to ouer-run the lands of Saint Stephen of Gormas, where they did much harme; againſt whom Cid, who was ſomwhat recouered, aſſembled the forces of Caſtile, and chaſed them out of the confines: and as he was of a great courage, and an irreconciliable enemie to the Moores, not reſpecting which of them he annoyed, hee paſt on, and entred the countrie neere vnto Toledo, where he put all to fire and ſword, and led away aboue 7000. priſoners of all ſexes and

F ages. This action did ſo diſcontent the king D. Alphonſo, by reaſon of the league he had with king Almenon, as without reſpect of this knights valour, nor the great ſeruices which he had done vnto the crowne of Caſtile, thruſt on moreouer by the counſell of ſome which enuied the others vertue, and did aggrauate his offence, gaue him commandement to depart his countrie within few dayes: Wherupon Cid departed, hauing left left his wife and children at Saint Peter of Cardegna: but he was followed by aboue A 300. horſe, and a great number of foot, who loued him in particular: and with this troupe began to make violent warres againſt the Moores. He entred their countrie by Atiença, and wonne Caſtreion by an ambuſh which hee layd for the Moores, whileſt that Aluaro Ianes Minaya his couſin, did ouer-runne the countrie vnto Alcala of Henares, from whence he returned to Caſtrejon with great ſpoiles. And for that Caſtrejon was vpon the frontiers of king D. Alphonſo, and for ſome other reſpects, Cid abandoned it, and went vnto Hariza, Cetiua, and Alcocer, and ſtriking great terror in all the countrey of Calatajub, Teruil and Tierar, hee ſurpriſed Alcocer in Arragon.

At that time the towne of Valencia did belong to the king of Toledo, and was go- B uerned for king Almenon by a More, called Abubacar, to whom the Inhabitants of Calatajub, and the countrey thereabouts, made their daily complaints of the wrongs and loſſes they receiued by Cid, demanding ayde from him: whereupon Abubacar ſent them two Captaines, called Faris and Galue with good troupes; but that could not defend them: for Cid ioyning with them, defeated them, and put them to a ſhamefull flight, carrying great ſpoyles to Alcocer, which was his retreate; from whence he ſent to king D. Alphonſo, by his couſin D. Aluaro Ianes Minaya, thirty horſes, with as many ſwordes tyed to the ſaddles. This did ſomewhat pacifie the King, who did willingly ſee Aluaro Ianes, but for all this he did not call Cid from baniſhment: yet he ſuffered all men freely to go to the warres with Cid againſt the Moores, except Toledo. Cid deſirous to C make warre, and wanting meanes, hee tooke money vpon the caſtle of Alcocer, and croſſing to Xalon and Monreal, he ſtayed there ſome dayes.

Barcelone. 11 About this time D. Raymond Berenger the elder, Earle of Barcelone, being de-

The ſame yeare dyed Almuncamuz king of Seuile, leauing his Realme to his ſonne of the ſame name, who raigned alſo at Cordoua, and in a manner ouer all Andaluſia: ſo the diſcord betwixt theſe Arabians made Cordoua (which had beene lately Princeſſe ouer other citties) to be ſubiect and ſlaue to Seuile. Cid hauing taken ſome good order D for his affaires, and aſſembled good troupes of ſouldiers, hee began to torment the Mores of the ſtreight of Sarragoſſe, & preſſed them in ſuch ſort, as Almundafar king of Sarragoſſe, made a treatie with him greatly to his honor, and receiued him into his cittie, by whoſe meanes he drew many Chriſtian Knights, which did willingly receiue pay of theſe Moores, when they were in armes one againſt another, that they might helpe to defeate them. Thither D. Aluaro Ianes came vnto him with a good number of ſouldiers, beeing deſirous to march vnder the command of ſo valiant a Captaine as Cid was; who vnderſtanding of the good reception which the king had made vnto D. Aluaro, and how he had receiued his preſents, was wonderfull glad. Caſtile. 12 During theſe things, the king D. Alphonſo (diſcontented, that the Nauarrois had called D. Sancho Ramires, king of Arragon to raigne ouer them, rather then him, who had a better title, beeing couſin germaine to the king D. Sancho Garcia deceaſed, by the lawfull line, whereas the king of Arragon deſcended from a baſtard:) ſeized vpon the towne of Nagera, and of all that iuriſdiction, which was in the Prouince of Rioje, of F which he made Gouernor D. Garcia de Cabra, called Creſpo de Granon, and intitled himſelfe king of Nagera. The people of Guipuſcoa, Biſcay, and Alaua, who were neighbors vnto it, hearing of this exploit, and conſidering the greatneſſe of D. Alphonſo, they thought good to leane vnto him, and to leaue the kings of Nauarre, who were of leſſe

Nauarre and Arragon.

D. Sancho Ramires king of Arragon, hauing no good title to the Realme of Nauarre, for that D. Ramir Sanches, ſonne to the deceaſed king was yet liuing: and by the ſame reaſon the king D. Alphonſo hauing no good reaſon to pretend it, they agreed together, to the preiudice of the pupill: by which accord Pampelone, with all the appurtenances (except Nagera and the other countrie whereof D. Alphonſo was ſeazed) remained to the king of Arragon, but vpon condition, that he ſhould acknowledge himſelf

B vaſſall in that reſpect to the king of Caſtile. This king had made warre againſt the Moores, whileſt he was king of Arragon onely, and before he had obtained the kingdome of Nauarre, he had chaſed them out of the mountaines of Arragon, Sobrarbre and Ribagorça, and moreouer had made warre againſt Abderramen King of Hueſca, and taken the towne of Barbaſtro, at which ſeege Armingo Earle of Vrgel his father in law dyed. Hauing made his profit of the Realme of Nauarre, and in good termes with D. Alphonſo, he continued his enterpriſes and conqueſts againſt that ſect, and tooke from them the caſtell of Mugnones about Secaſtilla in Ribagorça: then hee ſeazed of Cobin and Pitilla, and had a great and cruell battaile neere vnto Sarragoſſa, and tooke from them Bolea, a place of great ſtrength: to ſupply the charges of which warre, this

On the other ſide, a Moore of Andaluſia, called Almofalas, tooke from Adofir, another Moore, the caſtell of Grados, for the recouerie whereof, the king D. Alphonſo went to armes, and beſeeged Grados:

Grados: but beeing preſt vpon other affaires, he returned into his countrie, and called Cid from baniſhment, granting at his requeſt, vnto the Knights and Gentlemen of Caſtile, which ſhould be baniſhed for any miſdemeanors, in ſtead of nine dayes reſpite appointed them to depart the countrie, that they ſhould haue thirty. Cid continuing the ſeege of Grados, tooke it by famine, and ſent Almophalas priſoner to the king of Caſtile, whom he puniſhed, for that by treaſon, and againſt the lawes of the peace, hee had ſubtilly ſurprized his neighbours houſe. From thence Cid returned to Sarragoſſa, and not able to liue without making warre, he led an armie into Arragon, in the company of king Zuleima, where they waſted the countrie, and carried away great ſpoiles, and bending towards the territorie of Denia, they did as much as they had done in Arragon, and moreouer Cid began to build a fort in the territorie of Morella, called Alcala; to hinder which fortification Aben-Alfaye demanded ſuccors from the king of Arragon, who came with a great army: but the king of Arragon loſt a battell, and according to the opinion of ſome, was himſelfe taken there: but the Hiſtories of Arragon do not confeſſe it. After which exploites Cid Ruis Diaz returned into Caſtile, where as D. Alphonſo the king receiued him gratiouſly, and gaue him Birbieſca, Berlanga, Arzejon, and other places, and employed him in the conqueſt of Toledo, which hee went to beſeege ſoone after, for ſome reaſons which follow.

Caſtile and Moores.

13 King Hizien beeing dead, within the yeare that hee began to raigne, (a good Prince, who had ſincerely intertained the allyance and league contracted by his father Almenon, with the king D. Alphonſo) Hiaja Alcadurbile came to raigne at Toledo, a trecherous, cruell and vicious man, ſo as he was equally hated of the Moores and Muſarabes, who cryed out for aide to the king of Caſtile, and other kings, againſt this barbarous tyrant: beeing forced thereunto by his baſneſſe, and for that they did ſee themſelues abandoned of the Captaines and Noblemen, which had ſerued his father and brother: for beeing exceedingly giuen to luſt, he ſhut himſelfe vp in his pallace with his concubines, where he had no other thoughts, but to glut his filthie and diſhoneſt pleaſures. Wherefore Abubacar Gouernor of Valencia rebelled, and kept the gouernement for himſelfe. The Moores ſollicited the king of Badajos, to take vpon him to diſpoſſeſſe Hiaja, and the Chriſtian Muſarabes made the like offer to D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile. The king of Badajos meaning to preuent him, entred firſt into Toledo, in deſpight of king Hiaja, whileſt that the armie of Caſtile was preparing: which D. Alphonſo vnderſtanding, he was incenſed, and entring in hoſtill manner into the territorie of Toledo, he ſpoyled the countrie: which made the king of Badajos (for that hee would not remaine betwixt two enemies) to leaue Hiaja in his kingdome, and to returne home. D. Alphonſo left not for all this to purſue this good occaſion, but went to beſeege Toledo, not ſtreightly, but ſpoyling the country, and cutting off their victuals, thereby to force the Inhabitants to yeeld through famin; the which it ſeemes he had reſolued with himſelfe long before, to execute when time ſhould ſerue. D. Alphonſo's armie holding the fields in this manner about Toledo, Aben-Alfaye king of Denia, came ſuddenly vpon him, yet ioyning his forces together as ſpeedily as he could, there was a battell fought about Conſuegra, where the Moore was defeated, and forced to retire into the caſtell of Conſuegra. In this battaile D. Roderigues de Biuar, ſonne to Cid, was ſlaine: whoſe bodie was buried at S. Peter of Cardegna.

Rebellions of Toledo draw the king of Caſtile to beſeege the citty.

Moores twiſe defeated.

Aben-Alfaye deſirous to reuenge this loſſe, leuied all the Moores he could, and inuaded the Chriſtians countrie, paſſing the mountaines towards Medina del campo, where they were againe incountred and defeated by Aluaro Banes de Mimaya, couſin to Cid, whileſt that the King D. Alphonſo did ouer-runne the territories of Toledo, whereas Hiaja Alcadurbile the King kept himſelfe ſtrong, continuing notwithſtanding in his filthie and diſhoneſt life, and in his cruelties, whereby he made himſelfe odious to all his ſubiects, as well of his ſect, as Chriſtians Muſarabes; ſo as they told him plainly, that if he tooke no order for the neceſſities which preſt them, they would prouide for themſelues. This mad-man made no account of all theſe things: wherefore the Muſarabes did ſolicit D. Alphonſo, more then before, to approch neere the Towne, and to beſeege it cloſe.

This

A This ſeege ſeemed exceeding difficult, as well for the greatneſſe of the cittie, which was better peopled then any one in Spaine, as alſo for the naturall ſtrength of the ſituation, and the rampars and fortifications, made about it by art. So as to attempt a thing of ſo great labour and ſuch conſequence, D. Alphonſo drew out of his countries all that were fit to beare armes, and not content therewith, he had the forces of all his other neighbour-friends, and allies of Spaine, namely, of D. Sancho Ramires, king of Nauarre and Arragon, who was there as his vaſſall, for the Realme of Nauarre, and beſides there came vnto him many Noblemen of France, Germany, and Italy, mooued with religion, and hoping to winne Paradiſe, in helping to ſubdue ſo great a fort, held by the Mahumetiſts in Spaine.

D. Sancho king of Arragon at the ſeege of Toledo as vaſſall to him of Caſtile.

B Thus this great citty was beſeeged and battered with all violence, according to the manner of thoſe times, on the ſide of Vega: there were ſeene many valiant exploites of armes on either ſide; the Moores making diuers furious ſallyes vpon the Chriſtians, ſeconded oftentimes by troupes of ſtrange Moores which arriued on the ſudden, and greatly employed themſelues for the preſeruation of that cittie, knowing that the loſſe thereof would be the ruine of the Moores eſtate in Spain. On the other ſide the Chriſtians of diuers nations there aſſembled, mooued with diuers paſſions; ſome with religion, ſome with deſire to winne honor, ſome with an inueterate hatred againſt the Moores, but moſt part fighting reſolutely for ſpoyle, forgetting nothing which art, iudgement, and valour do giue to reſolute men. Opinions are diuers touching the

C length of this ſeege, it is moſt certaine that the ſpoyling of all that countrie continued ſome yeares, which the Chriſtian armies did continually ouer-runne, hindring the tillage, and cutting off the victuals which came from other places: but being once ſtreightly beſeeged, the warre continued not many weekes: for the beſeeged wanting victualles, and preſſed with hunger, without hope of any ſuccors, by reaſon of the great forces which did beſeege them, they yeelded vnto the King D. Alphonſo, vpon theſe conditions:

Toledo yeelded to king D. Alphonſo the 6.

The conditions

1 That he ſhould repaire the ruines of the caſtell, ports and bridges of the cittie, with the Kings gardens which are vpon the riuer of Tayo, and neare vnto the cittie.

2 That king Hiaya Alcadurbite might retire freely into the citty of Valencia, or

D where he pleaſed, and that king D. Alphonſo ſhould aide him to recouer it: and that hee might conduct with him what number of Moores he pleaſed.

3 The Moores which would remaine in Toledo, ſhould be maintained in the ſame priuiledges, exemptions and liberties, that they were vnder their Kings Moores, and not be charged with taxes and impoſitions, more then of cuſtome.

4 That the great Meſquite of the cittie of Toledo, which at this preſent is the principall church, ſhould remaine for the ſayd Moores.

Theſe conditions granted and ſworne by the king D. Alphonſo, hee entred the cittie in great triumph, the 25. of May, 1083. the tenth yeare of his raigne, which they accounted 1121. of the Æra of Cæſar, and of the foundation of the ſayd cittie, as ſome

The taking of this great and mightie cittie, did generally amaze all the petty Kings of the Moores in Spaine, and did ſo animate the Chriſtians, as they had euer after great aduantages. Their ambitious diſcord was the cauſe of their declining, hauing eſtranged them from the Miralmumins of Africke, and then banded them among themſelues. So that as many townes and forts as were held by the Moores, ſo many pettie Kings were there of them in Spaine. At this time their eſtate had the greateſt checke, that euer it had ſince they entred: and it did not onely augment the lands and Seigneuries of the king D. Alphonſo, but it alſo wonne him great honor and reputation, as well in Spaine, as with all other nations, Chriſtians, and Mahumetiſts. the great Moſquee for the exerciſe of their ſuperſtition. By the conqueſt of this great Townes yelded to D. Alphonſo. cittie, there came into the King of Caſtiles power, without any reſiſtance, the townes of Magueda, Eſcalona, Illeſcas, Canales, Olmos, Talauera, Coria Conſuegra, Mora, Buytrago, Hita Medina Celi, Atiença, Berlanga, Guadalajara; and by this meanes were alſo aſſured the townes of Salamanca, Auila, Segobia, Oſma, Sepulueda, Coca, Cuellar, Roa and Olmedo, the cittie of Toledo ſeruing as a rampar and fort, to all that lies betwixt it, Atiença, and Medina Celi, and by conſequence to Palença, Coria, and citty Roderigues: ſo as all that was within that circuit began to bee repaired and re-edified, the inhabitants beeing freed from their great feare of the Moores.

Gouernor put into Toledo. The firſt worke which the king D. Alphonſo did after the taking of Toledo, was to re- B payre the caſtell, forts, and bridges, giuing the gouernement thereof to Cid Ruis Diaz, with a garriſon of a thouſand Gentlemen Caſtillans. The houſe and family of them of Toledo, which is famous in Spaine, is deriued from a Grecian knight, called Peter Paleologue, who came to ſerue D. Alphonſo, at the ſeege of this city: but there are apparent arguments, that the name of the family of Toledo is more ancient: for there is a tombe to be ſeene in the royall Monaſterie of Ogna, of a knight called D. Gutiere Roderigues of Toledo, who had beene Chamberlaine to D. Sancho Earle of Caſtile, who died in the yeare 990. of this D. Peter, they ſay, iſſued a ſonne called D. Illian Peres, of him D. Peter Illian; of D. Peter, D. Eſteuan Illian, whoſe image is to be ſeene on horſbacke in the church of that cittie. Don Eſteuan begat Don Iean Eſteuanez, from whom C iſſued Don Gonçalo Iaime of Toledo, who lyes buried in Saint Romaines church, built in the higheſt part of the cittie, by D. Eſteuan Illian. D. Vrraca, the King D. Alphonſos ſiſter beeing deceaſed this yeare 1083. Zamora whereof ſhe was Ladie, was re-united to the crowne of Caſtile.

Riches of the church of Toledo. As king D. Alphonſo deſired nothing more, then to order things belonging to religion, and the ſeruice of God: in a great aſſembly of Noblemen and Prelates, made to that end, reſtored the Primacie and Archiepiſcopall ſeate of Spaine, to the church of Toledo, as it had beene in the time of the Kings of the Gothes: and there was choſen for Archbiſhop, a reuerent religious man, of the Order of S. Bennet called Friar Bernard, a French-man borne, who had beene ſent ſome yeares before into Spaine, by Hugo Abbot of Clugny, at the requeſt of D. Alphonſo, for the reformation of the Monaſterie of Sahagun, which at that time was the chiefe of all the Monaſteries of Spaine: this Friar Bernard was found ſo ſufficient for his learning and integritie of life, as he was held worthy to be preferred before all the Biſhops and Abbots of the countrie, to the primacie of Spaine; which ſea beginning by this King D. Alphonſo, was ſo inriched by all the kings and chiefe Noble-men of Spaine, as beſides the primacie and head Chancerie of Caſtile which it hath gotten, we may now ſay, that next vnto the Pope, hee is the richeſt Prelate in Chriſtendome. Since that time the church of Toledo hath beene Debate for the primacie of Spaine. in great credit and authoritie among all thoſe of Europe, and is ſerued with an incredible number of Clerkes: for beſides the Archbiſhop, 14. dignities, 40. Chanoins with E
Prebends, and 50. Portioniſts, and other extraordinarie Chanoins, there are ſo many Prieſts, Chaplaines, Clerkes, Chantres, and other Officers that haue fee, as they exceed 600. beeing very rich moreouer in Iewels and plate. The firſt Arch-biſhop of Toledo is called Eugenius the Martyr; from whom to Friar Bartholomew Carrança of Miranda, who was in our time, they number 76. The Archbiſhops of Tarragone and Braga, contend with him of Toledo for the primacie, neither will the Archbiſhops of S. Iaques & Sarragoſſa, acknowledge him for primate; which quarrell I leaue vnto thẽſelues.

Moores. To returne to our Hiſtorie, after that king Hiaja Alcadurbile had loſt Toledo, he went into the territorie of Valencia, the which was held by Abubacar, terming himſelfe king of that place, being but Gouernor ſome yeares before, vnder the kings of Toledo. This F Abubacar was diſcreet and wiſe, and had gouerned that towne vprightly many yeares: who to aſſure his vſurped eſtate, had giuen his daughter in mariage to Amet Aben-Hut king of Sarragoſſa, ſucceſſor to Zuleima. About the taking of Toledo or ſoone after, he died, leauing two of his ſons for ſucceſſors; who fell to ſo great diſcord, and by reaſon of

A them, the people, as Aboça Aben-Lope Captaine of the fort, fore-ſeeing the ruine of theſe two young Princes, & fearing that theſe diuiſions would make them fall into the hands of the kings of Caſtile, was readie to abandon the place, and to retire to Moruiedro, and other lands in that quarter, which were his: but beeing better aduiſed by a Secretarie a Moore, called Mahomad Aben-Hay, hee ſtayed ſtill to ſee what would bee the end of theſe factions of Valencia: ſome were of opinion rather then to yeeld vnto their aduerſaries, to giue themſelues vnto the king of Sarragoſſa; others to him that had beene king of Toledo, to whoſe father Almenon they had beene ſubiect. Theſe troubles made work for Hiaja Alcadurbile, who loſt neither time nor oportunitie, but came before Valencia with ſuch Mores as he could keep together, with whom ſoone after thoſe Seditions and trecheries among the Moores of Spaine.

B ioyned which king D. Alphonſo ſent him, according to the treatie, vnder the conduct of Aluaro Ianes Minaya. Being thus camped, and rather ſolliciting the towne by good words and promiſes, then attempting it by armes, in the end they were receiued, and King Hiaja acknowledged for their lawfull Prince, to whom Aboeça Aben-Lope, the captaine of the Fort, yeelded vp the keyes, and purchaſing by that preſent the Kings fauour, and aſſured his eſtate and life: for king Hiaja hated him, for that he had beene alwaies of the faction of Abubacar his rebell: notwithſtanding knowing him to bee wiſe, and a man of good ſeruice, hauing alſo performed ſo good an office, as to yeeld him vp the fort, he receiued him into grace, and honored him, leauing him in the ſame charge. At the ſame time Hamet Aben Hut, king of Sarragoſſa died, to whom ſucceeded Ioſeph

C Aben-Hut. King Hiaja liued in ſuch continuall diſtruſt, as he would neuer giue leaue to Aluaro Ianes Minaya and his ſouldiers to returne home into Caſtile: for the intertaining wherof, this king was forced to ouer-charge his ſubiects with inſupportable taxations. There was a Captaine of the Moores in the towne of Xatiua, called Aben Maçor, who would not preſent himſelfe before King Hiaja, being notwithſtanding in all other things obedient vnto him, but the king not ſatisfied therewith, would haue him: wherfore he led an army of Moores and Caſtillans before Xatiua, and battered it in vaine: for beſides that the beſeeged defended themſelues valiantly, they called vnto their ſuccours the king of Denia their neighbor, who ſeazed vpon the place, and kept it in deſpite of king Hiaja, who was forced to retire, hauing loſt, by ouer-preſſing it, that which

D he might haue enioyed with a litle patience.

Whilſt that D. Alphonſo diſpoſed of the affairs of his new conqueſt, & that the Mores more diuided then euer, not able to diſcerne the miſeries which purſued them, continued their ſpoiles; and to ſtir vp new trobles among themſelues, D. Sancho Ramires king of Nauarre and Arragon, being loth to liue idle, and to let ſlip ſuch good occaſions to inlarge his dominions, and to aduance the Chriſtians power in Spaine. Hee won a battell of the Moores, nere vnto a place called Pietra Piſada, took from them the towne of Arguedas, and defeated them in another battell neere to Tudele: and fought with them the third time about Morella; which incounters fell out happily for the Chriſtians, in Nauarre and Arragon.

E the yeare 1084. And the yere after, ſeing that he had made great conqueſts in the champion countrie, he gaue to his eldeſt ſon the realm of Sobrarbre and Ribagorça, with the title of King, and a while after the Queene D. Felicia died, who was intetred at S. Iean de la Pegna.

The eſtate of Barcelone, after the death of Cont Raymond Berenger the elder, was in great combuſtion by the emulation of his two ſons D. Berenger Raymond, and D. Raymond Berenger, called Flaxen head, wherof the eldeſt held a part of the country of Cattelogne: but D. Raymond Berenger the yonger commanded the greateſt part. So as the Moores were not moleſted in their eſtates by them; but D. Raymond Berenger followed the partie of the Moriſh king of Denia, againſt him of Sarragoſſa, who enuied the others eſtate, as we haue ſayd. Yet ſome hold opinion, that it was D. Raymond Berenger the elder, their father, who carried armes againſt the K. of Sarragoſſa: and that on the Barcelone.

F other ſide, D. Raymond Flaxen head, was his friend and ally. Only Armingol Earle of Vrgel, did vertuouſly make war againſt the Mores, vppon the frontiers of Cattelogne. D. Raymond Flaxen head had married a moſt vertuous Lady, called D. Almodia, daughter to Robert Guichard duke of Pouillia, by whom hee had D. Raymond Arnould which ſucceeded him.

The Spaniſh Authors ſhew a great argument of this Ladies holineſſe and religion, A for that in her husbands life time, ſhe built the Monaſterie of Valde Mary, of the Order of Saint Benet, in the Vicountie of Cabrera, and another of Saint Daniel, of the ſame Order neare vnto Girone, where ſhe profeſſed her ſelfe, and liued a Nunne, after the deceaſe of the king, her husband: in whoſe life time, ſome people of the County of Cerdagne, reuiued the Arrian hereſie; for the preuention whereof D. Guillen Iordain, Earle of that place, was much troubled. The ambition of raigne was ſuch betwixt the two Earles of Barcelone, as the eldeſt ſlue the youngeſt by treaſon, watching him as he went from Oſtarlit to Girone: this D. Raymond Flaxen-head, hauing raigned onely ſix yeares; a religious, mild, courteous, and bountifull Prince, and of a goodly preſence, and therefore lamented of all men. This fratricide ſeeking to diſſemble his treaſon, did B weep much before the world, but he could not ſo well diſguiſe his offence, but the truth was knowne.

Parricide betwixt the Princes of Cattelogne.

Wherefore the Cattelans reiected him, and in the yeare 1082. choſe Don Raymond Arnoould, the ſon of the deceaſed, for their Earle, chaſing away D. Berenger Raymond, who thinking by trecherie to take away another mans, loſt his own patrimonie: and beeing poore and diſhonored, and moreouer, by a iuſt iudgement of God, hauing loſt his ſpeech, he died in Ieruſalem, whither he went in pilgrimage. During the infancie of this young Count Raymond Alnoould, ſome tyrants of Prouence & Languedoc did inuade the territories of Carcaſſone, giuing the Earle of Barcelone to vnderſtand, that they wold hold it in fee of him, and do him homage, and reſtore it vnto him, when hee ſhould come of age. This Earle Raymond Arnould was a great perſonage, C as wee ſhall heare hereafter.

Caſtile.

Returning to Toledo, after that the king D. Alphonſo had giuen order for all things that were neceſſarie for the gard of that cittie, he returned to Leon, leauing Cid Ruiz Diaz for Gouernor: and for the eccleſiaſticall and ciuill gouernement, Queene Conſtance his wife, falſely called by ſome Beatrix, with the Archbiſhop D. Bernard and others: during the kings abſence, this Prelate beeing very zealous in his religion, and diſcontented that the Moores remaining in Toledo, did enioy the Moſqueé maior, a rare and ſtately building, among all them of Spaine, layed a plot with the Queene to depriue them of it, and without any reſpect to the promiſe and oath made by the king, he ſeazed theron, and forbad the Moores the vſe and entrie into this temple, the which D he did conſecrate the Cathedrall church the fifth of October, 1086. All this was done

An. 1086.

ſuddenly, and without the kings priuitie: the Queene and Archbiſhop knowing well, that it would much diſpleaſe him, but their hope was, that what had beene done would not be eaſily vndone, by reaſon of the reſpect the king carried to Prelates, and to the Chriſtian religion; for the honouring whereof they had vndertaken it, the which ſucceeded according to their conceits: for the king beeing returned, and ſeing that of force they would make him periured, being ſomewhat diſcontented with the Queene and D. Bernard, in the end he was pacified with ſuch perſwaſions, that it was an vnworthie thing, that in an Archiepiſcopall cittie, and the firſt in dignitie in Spaine, that infidels ſhould enioy the greateſt and moſt ſtately Temple, there to exerciſe their impieties E and blaſphemies, to the great diſhonour of the king, and the name of Chriſtians: and the griefe of paſtors and holy Miniſters of the Church. Wherefore it was expedient he ſhould aduow the fact; the which was not done raſhly, but with great zeale, and by diuine inſpiration. Herunto, they ſay, were added the ſupplications of the Moores, That it would pleaſe the king to ſuffer things as they were, and not to diſcontent the people: and that for their parts they would willingly exerciſe their religion in a place of leſſe ſhew. For the Moores ſpake an Alfagui of their lawe, whoſe image is to bee ſeene cut in ſtone, in the great chappell of that church.

Gothique ſeruice changed in Spaine.

The ſeruice called Gothique or Iſidorian, for that Iſidorus had brought it in, and afterwards called Muſarabic, for the Chriſtians liuing among the Moores had maintained it, was in vſe, vntill that time as well at Toledo, as in Caſtile and Leon: but the F
King Don Alphonſo deſiring to ſhew himſelfe in all things an affectionate ſonne to the Romiſh ſea, would haue it changed, and in ſtead thereof the Gregorian Seruice receiued,

A receiued, ſo called of the author Gregory; for which effect hee cauſed a Bull to be ſent from the Pope then raigning, commanding that the ſeruice of Rome ſhould be from thenceforth celebrated in all the Churches of Spaine, as they did in France, by reaſon whereof, it is called by ſome Spaniards, Gallican. This done, the Archbiſhop new choſen, went to Rome, where he entred, when as Vrban the 2. entred his Popedome, and there tooke his oath, receiued the Archbiſhops cloake, and was confirmed Primate of Spaine; and not onely of Spaine, but of Gotique France, as the limits of the Primacie of Toledo had beene in the time of the king of the Gothes: in witneſſe whereof the Spaniards write, that (to ſhew his rights and prerogatiues) at his returne from Rome, he called a Councell at Tholouſa, where the Archbiſhop of Narbone did aſſiſt, with B other biſhops of thoſe countries, ſuffragans, and ſubiect to the Iuriſdiction of the Prelates of Toledo.

The Metropolitane of Languedoc vnder the Primate of Toledo.

Councell at Tholouſa.

During his abſence, Richard Abbot of Saint Victor of Marſeilles, was Legate in Spaine (being ſent ſome yeares before by Gregory the 7. Predeceſſour to Vrban the 2.) who tooke great paines to bring in the new Gregorian or Romiſh ſeruice, and to aboliſh the Muſarabic: for which conſideration, and to put in execution that which had beene decreed, the Arch-biſhop Bernard, at his returne called a nationall Councell at Toledo, whereas the Clergie, Knights, and people of Toledo, Caſtile, Leon, Aſturia, Galicia, and Portugall were aſſembled, or their Deputies in great numbers. D. Bernard preſiding the King beeing preſent, there grew great controuerſies among them, C the Spaniards refuſing to leaue their ancient manner, to receiue a new ſeruice, ſo as not able to be ſatisfied by any allegations and reaſons, they came to a furious and brutiſh manner of triall, by combate, which was much vſed in thoſe times: there were two knights brought to field, the one for the king, and others who deſired alteration of the ſeruice, the other for the knights and commons, which would keepe the Muſarabic: for theſe came Ioan Ruiz, of the family of Matanza, who vanquiſhed him which fought for the Romane ſeruice, whoſe name is vnknown. Yet the importunitie of the King, queen, Archbiſhop, and others of that partie was ſuch, as the buſineſſe was referred to another kind of triall, which was by fire: wherefore hauing brought two bookes, the one containing the ſeruice after the Romane vſe; the other, the ancient and Muſarabic, they D were both caſt into a great fire; whereof the Romane booke leapt preſently out (as they ſay) and the other lay ſtill, and was nothing burnt.

Controuerſies for Eccleſiaſticall matters decided by armes.

Triall by fire in Clergie matters.

Wherfore they did coniecture, that either of them was pleaſing vnto God: and for this cauſe it was ordained, That they ſhould retaine the ancient manner of ſeruice in ſixe pariſhes of Toledo, and that in the great Cathedral church and others the new Gregorian ſeruice was brought in, and likewiſe in all the reſt of Don Alphonſo's Kingdome, the which was granted more by force, to pleaſe the king, and to obey the Pope, (who confirmed and allowed it,) then for any good will. Yet the Muſarabic Office continued long after, in many Monaſteries of Spaine: and in the ſame great church of Toledo, euen at this day they ſing Maſſe all after the Muſarabic, euery E day in a Chappell called Corpus Domini.

The ſixe Pariſhes of that Cittie, where as this ſeruice was maintained, had beene held by the Chriſtians Muſarabes, whileſt that the Moores did raigne there, which are Saint Iuſt, Saint Luke, Saint Antolin, Saint Marke, Saint Eulalia, and Saint Sebaſtian. That the Muſarabic ſeruice aunciently vſed were that which they hold at this day, and that it was not reformed and corrected, I will not doubt: for in matters of Religion, it is moſt certaine, that all things haue beene fitted to the time, and to the diſpoſitions of thoſe which liued from age to age, eſpecially in that which concerned the eccleſiaſticall diſcipline. The day of the reception of this Romiſh ſeruice, is quoted by the Spaniards the one and twentith of May, in the yeare 1091, at the third hower.

F Matters concerning Religion beeing ordered at Toledo, Don Alphonſo gaue many honourable titles, dignities, and priuiledges to the Cittie, to their great aduantage. For firſt of all by reaſon of this conqueſt intitling himſelfe Emperour of Spaine, hee would haue Toledo called and denominated the Imperiall and Monarchicke city, a name which hath remained and continued vnto this day. And to giue the Chriſtians

Toledo called the Imperiall city.

he granted rights and priuiledges to the cittizens, as follow, beeing drawne out of the letters which are in their Regiſters.

Priuiledges granted to the citty of Toledo.

1 Firſt he ordained for a priuiledge to that cittie, that all controuerſies amongſt the cittizens ſhould be iudged there,according to the lawes and ordonances written in the booke called Of Iudges, appointing a Councell of ſixe of the moſt ſufficient men amongſt them, to aſſiſt the Iudge: all which together ſhould take knowledge of the peoples cauſes, exempting the Caſtilians, who might decline from that ſeate, and de-ſire to be ſent before their ordinarie Iudges. According to which booke of Iudges, all the inhabitants of Toledo, and that iuriſdiction ſhould be iudged in matters of crime:
expreſly exempting the wiues and children of offenders,(not culpable) from the pains, B and fines due for all offences,namely,for high treaſon,or practiſes againſt the citty.

2 That the inhabitants of Toledo might appeale from all other Iudges, & demand to be ſent to the Iuſtice of Toledo,declaring all decrees againſt it to be voide.

3 That the Inhabitants of Toledo ſhould not be apprehended, nor put in priſon for murther,vnleſſe it werewilful,if they put in caution,or that the truth were apparent: and whereas they could not giue caution,they ſhould not be put in any other priſon, then the Dalfada.

4 All controuerſies betwixt Chriſtians and Iewes,or Moores,ſhould be decided by the Chriſtian lawes, and before a Chriſtian Iudge.

5 Exemptions,granted vnto Church-men ſeruing God, of the tenth peny in all C their inheritances.

6 Exemption of all taxes granted to ſouldiers, and to all ſuch as had beene priſo-ners amongſt the Moores.

7 All inhabitants of Toledo,as well Chriſtians as Muſarabes, ſhould equally enioy all royall grants.

8 The widowes of ſoldiers deceaſed, ſhold enioy the honors,and priuiledges of their husbands,and the children of their fathers,yea the ſons ſhold haue their arms & horſes.

9 The laborers and trimmers of vines ſhould pay vnto the king for all tribute and ſeruice,the tenth peny,or portion of their corne and wine, and not bound to any other charges either in peace or war,except it were to ſuccor the city of Toledo,beeing aſſai- D led by foes,in which caſe they ſhould be bound to aſſiſt it with all their meanes.

10 The like exemptions were granted to the inhabitants of Toledo, for all lands, which they ſhould hold in any other iuriſdiction of the kings of Caſtile.

11 Liberty granted to the inhabitants of the ſaid citty,to build milles vpon the ri-uer of Tajo,againſt their lands and poſſeſſions, and to ſell them, exchange them, and otherwiſe diſpoſe of them at their pleaſures.

12 No Iew nor Moore ſhould haue commandement ouer Chriſtians in the citty of Toledo.

13 That the citty of Toledo might neuer be alienated from the Crowne,nor giuen vpon any title whatſoeuer, to man,woman,or child. E

14 No man,that had not his ordinarie reſidence in the ſayd citty, might enioy any inheritance within the wals thereof;which inhabitants might enter into their lands and poſſeſſions, from whence they had beene chaſed by the Moores, in ſuch townes and places as ſhould be recouered from them.

15 The common treaſure of the city ſhold be employed,eſpecially,in the building and reparations of the wals,and the fortifications thereof.

Theſe were the priuiledges granted by the king D. Alphonſo the 6.to the city of To-

A anciẽt Gothique characters, inuented (as they ſay) by Vlfilas their Biſhop, otherwiſe called Toledains: but thoſe letters which are now vſed in Caſtile, were at that time not put in practiſe. About that time died D. Thereſa, the kings ſiſter, wife to the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra, and ſoone after Queene Beatrix the 2. wife of D. Alphonſo beeing deceaſed, he took to wife a Princeſſe Moore, daughter to Almuntamuz Aben-Amet, king of Seuile, called Caida, or Zaida, the which was chriſtened and called Mary. He receiued for her dourie the townes of Cuença, Huete, Ocagna, Vcles, Mora, Volera, Conſuegra, Alarcos, Caracuel, and other places. By her the king had one ſon, named D. Sancho, who died before the father, and the mother liued not long after him.

But it is fit to vnderſtand, firſt what theſe Almorauides were: Wherefore leauing a little the affaires of Spaine, we will returne to that which we haue handled of the ſucceſſion of Mahumet. The which (as we haue ſayd) beeing fallen to two of his daughters Mahumets ſucceſſion.

Theſe two races were in perpetuall diſſention for the Soueraigntie of the Arabians, both in Aſia, Affricke, and Europe, whereupon grew many alterations: ſo as in the end the Arabians of Affricke being diuided from them of Aſia, the Crowne of Affrick continued in the race of Aben Albecy, for the ſpace of 310. yeres: but as this nation was neuer faithfull within it ſelfe, and could not ſubſiſt without tumult and treaſons: about the year 1068. there roſe vp a noble family among them, called the Almorauides, or Lumptunas, which deſcended not from Mahumet; the which took the ſcepter from the race of Aben Alabecy, and ſeazed vpon the ſoueraigntie, and regall power ouer the Moores in Affricke: 450. yeares after that Mahumet had made himſelfe

D Lord and Emperour ouer that nation. The firſt of this race which was choſen and declared king, and great Miralmumin, was Abu Texifien, to whom Ioſeph Aben Teſin aboue-named his ſonne ſucceeded, who forced the others to quit the Scepter, and transferred it into his family, where it continued 79. yeares: the ſecond yeare of his raigne, Ambaſſadors came vnto him from king D. Alphonſo, for the cauſe aboue-mentioned: ſo as within three yeares after, all the Moores of Spaine were vnited to them of Affricke, *Moores of Affricke drawne into Spaine by D. F of Spaine, were then broken: and moreouer, this new king of the Moores, thought to recouer the countries which had bin held by the Moores, namely thoſe, which D. Alphonſo had had in dowry with Q. Caida his laſt wife: ſo as the king D. Alphonſo thinking to enioy an aſſured peace, hee found himſelfe ſodenly ingaged in great and dangerous warres: for Ali entring into the Realme of Toledo, he ſpoyled the countrie at his plea- A ſure, hauing gotten two great victories, and put two mightie armies of D. Alphonſos to bloudie routes: ſo as the lands of D. Caidas dowrie, with others, came into his powers; the which was the more eaſie to effect, for that they were in a maner all inhabited by Moores. Yet in a third expedition, whereas D. Alphonſo went in perſon with all the flower of his kingdomes, the conquerors furie was ſtayed, ſo as he was forced for feare (ſeeing this great preparation made againſt him) to keepe himſelfe within Cordoua, and to abandon his countrie to the ſpoile, not daring to defend it, and in the end came to a compoſition and treaty of peace with D. Alphonſo, by the which he made himſelfe his vaſſall and tributarie, giuing him rich preſents, and great ſums of mony, wherewith the King and his armie beeing inriched, they returned victoriouſly into Caſtile. From B thence king D. Alphonſo hauing gotten new courage, led his armie to ſubdue Sarragoſſa, and did ſo preſſe it, as the Inhabitants did offer to hold it in fee of him, and to do him homage, the which he refuſed, demanding the city: but whileſt he was buſie at this enterpriſe, behold there arriues in Spaine a great cloude of African Moores, which ſtrucke a greater terror in Spaine then had beene in many ages. It was Ioſeph Aben Tefin the Miralmumin, who incenſed at the trecherie of Ali, was come out of Africke with a greater armie of Moores, then had bin ſeene in long time, to take reuenge of his trecherie.

16 The preſence of this king ſtayed the ſeege of Sarragoſſa, brake the accord made betwixt Alphonſo and Ali, and was the cauſe of many great alterations. Hee beſeeged and forced Ali in the city of Seuile, and as a traytour, cut off his head: he ſeazed vppon C
Cordoua, in the which was a ſonne of Abencamus, and in a ſhort time hee brought all Andalouſia vnder his obedience, and in a manner all the Noblemen and townes which the Moores held in Spaine: he drew vnto his ſeruice ſome Earles and Noblemen Chri-

One of theſe Earles was called D. Ordognes de Lara: So the Mores of Spaine ioyned with them of Africke, vnder one Miralnumin in the yeare, 1089. hauing beene diuided 334. yeares, they of Affricke beeing ſubiect to the race of Aben Alabecy, vnto this king, and theſe of Spaine obeying the family of Aben Humaia from Abderramen the firſt. This king ſtayed ſome time in Spaine, to diſpoſe of his new conqueſts, not reſpecting any more the friendſhip of king D. Alphonſo, who firſt had inui- D ted him to come into Spaine, and then he returned into Affricke, where hee had ſetled his imperiall ſeate at Maroc or Marrox. Then began there a difficult war betwixt theſe two Potentates in Spaine: by reaſon whereof King D. Alphonſo ſought the friendſhip and ſuccors of other Chriſtian Princes: vpon which occaſion there came many valiant Knights into Spaine, to winne honor by armes, and mooued alſo with zeale of religion; among the which were three Princes, whereof mention hath beene made in the beginning of this raigne: that is, Raymond ſon to William, brother to the Earle of Bourgongne: Henry of Lorraine or of Beſançon, and his vnkle or couſin Raymond of Thouſa, and of S. Giles: with theſe and other braue ſouldiers, as well Spaniards, as of other nations, D. Alphonſo made head againſt this Arabian king: ſo as he ſtopt his courſe, and E ouer-run his country newly conquered, taking great ſpoiles, and carrying away many priſoners, without any oppoſition.

Portugall.

17 At that time D. Alphonſo (for the good ſeruices hee had receiued from theſe three perſonages, and to bind them the more to defend the Chriſtians eſtate in Spaine) gaue them his daughters in marriage: to Henry of Lorraine, whom ſome call Earle of Limbourg, D. Thereſa his baſtard, to whom bearing a priuate affection, hee gaue the

This was the beginning of the Siegneury of Portugal, and of the royall poſterity of the poſſeſſors of that country. To Raymond Earle of Tolouſe and Saint Gyles, King D. Alphonſo gaue D. Eluira an other of his baſtards, and to Cont Raymond of Bourgongne D. Vrraca his lawfull daughter, with the Gouernment of Galicia, & the title of an Earl, which was the ordinary title of great dignities in Spaine, in thoſe times.

Nauarre and Arragon.

D. Sancho Ramires, King of Nauarre and Arragon, did all hee could to anoy the Moores, vpon his borders: from whom hee tooke about the yeere of our Lord 1089. the towne of Montçon, yet with great difficulty, by reaſon of the fort, and the obſti-
B nate defence of the garriſon. The ſame yeere the preuiledges of Nobility, with all exemptions, were confirmed to them of the valley of Roncal, as a teſtimony that they had beene alwaies valiant and faithfull to their Kings.

An. 1091.

In the yeere 1091. hee forced Abderramen the Moore, King of Hueſca, to pay him tribut: he ſent ſuccors to his couſin D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, in the warre which hee made vpon the marches of Toledo; and hauing a deſeigne to beſiege Sarragoſſa in time, hee beganne a fort neere to the riuer of Ebro, fiue leagues from Sarragoſſe, the which he called Caſtellar: he wonne afterwards from the Moores, Olalla, Almena-ra and Naual, and he peopled Luna, from whence is deſcended the family of Luna: and to coope vp the King of Hueſca, hee fortefied the caſtles of Marcuello, Loarre and C Algueçar, vpon the Marches of Sobrarbre, and ſubiected all that is betwixt it and Montarragon, within a league of Hueſca: wherefore King Abderramen ſeeing himſelfe reſtrained daily more and more, hee had recourſe vnto D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, offring to pay him a greater tribute, then he did to him of Nauarre, if hee would take him into his protection: whereunto D. Alphonſo gaue eare, beeing glad to make himſelfe great by what meanes ſoeuer, of ſuch power is ambition in the hearts of men, who ſparing not the King D. Sancho his couſin, he had wreſted from him the Siegneury of Guipuſcoa, which had euer beene vnited to the crowne of Nauarre, and had made Earle and Gouernor, in his name, D. Lopes Dias of Haro, Lord of Biſcay. This manner of proceeding did much diſpleaſe D. Sancho Ramires, who for this cauſe hauing

D ſent ſome troupes of ſoldiers, to the fronters of Alaua, to entertaine the Caſtillans, he went to the ſiege of Hueſca, being reſolued to take it at what price ſoeuer: hee was accompanied by his ſonnes D. Pedro, King of Sobrarbre, and D. Alphonſo, with the forces of Nauarre and Arragon: but as he proceeded in this ſeege, with to great vehemency, it happened that going to vew the weakeſt places, with his captaines, he was ſhot with a Mooriſh arrow vnder the arme hole, as he lifted vp his arme, to ſhew ſome one that was neere him, a place where he thought fit to make his battery. The blow was mortall, the which D. Sancho feeling he retired to his tent, diſſembling his paine as much as hee could: being there, hee cauſed D. Pedro and D. Alphonſo his children to ſweare, not to depart from the ſiege, vntill they had taken the towne, and ſoone after hee died, as E they drew the arrowe out of the wound. Hee was a valiant Prince, and had happely inlarged his dominions by conqueſts againſt the Moores, but his neighbors Chriſtians were not very faithfull, euen D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille. Hee loued iuſtice and Gouernment: the towne of Eſtella was begunne by him, the which at this day is one of the three cities of Nauarre, and the ſecond in dignity. He affected religion much, according to the practiſe of that age; for beſides many donations made by him to churches and monaſteries, and the re-edyfying of them that were ruined, hee made D. Ramir his youngeſt ſonne a religious man of the order of Saint Benet, in the monaſtery of Saint Ponce of Tomerres. D. Pedro his eldeſt ſonne ſucceeded him, in the realme of Nauarre and Arragon, in the yeere of our Lord 1094. about this time many monaſteries of France, obtained exemption from the iuriſdiction of Biſhops, the Monkes beeing deſirous to enioy greater liberty, & their Abbots to adorne themſelues with croſ-

F ſes and miters like Biſhops.

An. 1094. Portugal.

About that time D. Thereſa, counteſſe of Portugal, had a ſonne by Henry of Lorraine, or of Beſançon at a place called Guymaranes: his name was D. Alphonſo, as the

King

King his grand-father by the mothers ſide, and by ſurname Henriques, who was firſt A King of Portugal, and that ſtemme of all the Kings which haue held that Kingdome vnto this day, whoſe birth is ſtrangly written by the Spaniſh authors, ſaying that hee had his feete ioyned together behinde, the which were ſet at liberty the fift yeere of his age, by the praiers and vowes of his parents: in remembrance whereof, Cont
Henry and his wife finiſhed a church, begunne long before at Carquere, neere vnto the riuer of Duero, dedicated vnto the Virgin Mary, the which at this day is a receptacle for Ieſuites, within two leagues of Lamego. The firſt lands which lie betwixt Duero and Minio, Porto, Braga and Guymaranes, and then Coimbra, Viſco and Lamego, with the iuriſdiction of Vera. It is to be preſumed that he was a wiſe and valiant Knight, and of a great houſe, ſeeing that D. Alphonſo gaue him his daughter in marriage, with B ſo great a dowry, and that hee did ſo confidently commit vnto him the fronter of his realmes on that ſide. There is nothing written certaine of his father and mother, but that being of the houſe of the Dukes of Lorraine, and Nephew to the Earls of Tolouſe, we may hold him to be deſcended from the houſe of France, and moreouer nobly allied to the families of Germany. Beſides the Prince D. Alphonſo Henriques, hee had two daughters by D. Thereſa his wife: D. Thereſa Henriques, who was married to D. Fernand Paez, of Tranſtamara, and D. Sancha Henriques, who maried D. Fernand Mendes.

Moores.

To returne to the King D. Alphonſo, and to this new warre which he had againſt the forces of Affrike, beeing ioyned vnto the Moores of Spaine, the which hee himſelfe had drawne vpon him, D. Roderigo Diaz de Biuar, called Cid, hauing the gard of Toledo, and of al that fronter, finding himſelfe, ſomewhat eaſed, by the departure of King Ioſeph A- C ben-Teſin, who was returned into Affrike, he propounded to attempt Sarragoſſe, from the ſeege whereof D. Alphonſo had beene diuerted, by the comming of the Moores Al-moranides. He choſe a fit occaſion, for the Sarragoſſans & their King Ioſeph Aben-Hut, Cid Ruis Diaz receiued into Sarragoſſe as Protector.

being terrified with the forts which the King of Nauarre had built about them, by the which they did ſee themſelues daily reſtrained & anoied, they did willingly receiue Cid, as their protector. King Aben-Hut was an enemy to the King of Valencia, and ſo was the King of Denia, either of them ſeeking to ſeize vpon his Eſtate: but Cid carried him-ſelfe ſo wiſely, as hee preſerued the realm for King Hiaja, who was a friend to the King of Caſtille his Lord, hee repulſt the King of Denia, and forced the Earle of Parcelone (who at the perſwaſion of the King of Sarragoſſe, had beſeeged Valence) to retire; not- D withſtanding the Earl hauing receiued great ſomes of money from the King of Denia, to ſupport him againſt Cid, continuing to forrage and ſpoile the country of Valence, he was vanquiſhed by Cid in an incoũter, to whom afterwards he became a great friend, as we wil ſhew: and the happineſſe of this captaine was ſuch, as the King of Denia bee-ing dead at the ſame time, his ſon & ſucceſſor, did ſo honour his vertue and wiſdome, as he made himſelfe his vaſſal, and was ſo beloued of him, as hauing reconciled him with King Hiaja, he wrought ſo; as he conuerſed familiarly with him, and in ſo great fauor, as he gouerned both the King and the Eſtate of Valence, as if himſelf had bin Lord. Aben-Hut King of Sarragoſſe died alſo about that time, leauing one ſon called Almizaren, heire of his Kingdome, at whoſe aduancement, the Eſtate beeing ſomewhat troubled, E Cid was intreated to come to Sarragoſſe, the which he did. In the meane time there fell out great garboiles in the Court of Valence, by the enuy & emulation of two Moores whereof the one was a captaine vnder Cid, called Aben-Alfaras, and the other a certaine prouoſt called Aben-Iaf. This Prouoſt was ſo tranſported with hatred, as hee called the Almorauides, & by their means made himſelf Maſter of the town, forcing King Hiaja to flie, whom he purſued, hauing intelligence that hee had carried away many rich Iewels, tooke him, and ſlue him miſerably, giuing him a vilde & vnworthy ſepulcher. Such was the end of Hiaja King of Valence, who had raigned the laſt of the Moores at Toledo. A-ben Iaf hauing by this means gotten ſo goodly an eſtate, kept a great gard about him, as ſuch doe commonly as will rule by tirany, beeing in the meane time vnder the ſoueraignty of the Almorauides: but he did not long enioy the fruits of his wickedneſſe, for F Cid being aduertiſed of this baſe treaſon, parted from Sarragoſſe, with ſuch forces as he had, and came before Valence, to ſee if the hatred of the tyrant would moue the inhabitants to reuolt.

There

A There came many Noblemen Moores of the country thether to him, among which were Aboeca, Aben-Lopes, and Aben Ratin, who ioyned with him, mooued thereunto by his vertue and valour: then was the city fiercely aſſaulted, ſo as the inhabitants, and their commander Aben Iaf, receiuing no ſuccors from the Almorauides, as they attended, beeing vnwilling to giue eare to the ſecret practiſes of the King of Sarragoſſe, who perſwaded them vnder hand to giue themſelues vnto him, the which was well knowne to Cid, whoſe vigilancy was great, they were forced to yeeld, vpon condition, that the garriſon of Almorauides ſhould bee thruſt out, and that Aben Iaf ſhould hold the towne of Valencia of Cid, and ſhould pay him tribute: yet could not the Valentians agree well with Aben Iaf, the murtherer of their King, but rayſing daylie new troubles
B and ſeditions againſt him, hee fortefied himſelfe in a great quarter of the towne, and callad Cid, giuing him entrance on that ſide. Whereat the Valentians beeing much mooued they fell to open rebellion, and intrenching on their ſide, they put themſelues vertuouſly in defence, and called backe the Almorauides to their ſuccors; but the city beeing beſeeged of all ſides by Cids army, and all the paſſages ſtopped, they could not enter into the towne, but returned without fighting: wherefore the beſeeged were forced to ſubiect themſelues vnder the obedience of Aben Iaf: who ſhewing himſelfe trecherous, and breaking his promiſe with Cid, hee gaue him occaſion ſoone after to returne to Valencia, and to ſubdue it for himſelfe, the which hee did by a ſeege of ten monthes, reducing the towne, and the inhabitants to ſuch extremity, for want of victu-
C als, and by continual aſſaults, as they yeelded to his mercy, hauing all the places and forts already in his deuotion. Beeing maiſter of the city, hee put Aben Iaf to death by iuſtice, and ſent a way the Moores which were ſuſpect vnto him, the which ſoone after brought a great army of Almorauides out of Andalouſia, and other countries which they held in Spaine, againſt Cid, and his new conqueſts: but hee repulſt them valiantly, and ſo ſetled himſelfe, as during his life, it returned not vnder the Moores ſubiection: theſe things were effected by Cid Ruis Diaz of Biuar, after the returne into Affrike of King Ioſeph Aben Tefin, the chiefe of the family of the Almorauides Arabians.

Valence taken by Cid Ruis Diaz.

About the yeere of our Lord 1096. beganne that famous expedition of Chriſtian Princes to the holy Land, decreed by Pope Vrbain the ſecond, at the councell of Cler-
D mont; in the which there went infinit numbers out of France, England, Italy and Germany, vnder the conduct of diuers Princes and Noblemen. Few made this voyage out of Spaine, by reaſon of the warres, which they had againſt the African Moores, by whom they were greatly anoyed: Onely D. Raymond Earle of Toloufe and Saint Gyles, ioyned in theſe Leuant warres leading with him ſome ſmall number of Spaniſh Knights, and was followed by D. Eluira his wife, who was brought in bed, in the Eaſt countries of a ſonne, who was baptized in the water of Iordain, and for that cauſe was named Alphonſo Iordain. D. Bernard Archbiſhop of Toledo, beeing deſirous to goe, was croſt, and went into the Eaſt, recommending his charge to certaine regular Chanoins of Saint Auguſtine, who after his departure choſe an E other Archbiſhop, whereof D. Bernard aduertiſed, beeing not yet gone out of Spaine, hee returned ſodainely, and paſſing by the Monaſtery of Sahagun, he tooke with him certaine Monkes, with the which he went to Toledo, where hee puniſhed the Chapter for their inconſtancy, depoſed the new Archbiſhop, and placed the Monkes of the Order of Saint Benet in his church, the which continued there many yeeres.

Expedition into Syria, or the Holy warre.

This done, beeing deſirous to ſee the world, hee continued his courſe and came to Rome, to receiue the Holy fathers bleſſing, meaning to proceed in his voiage; but they ſay the Pope would not ſuffer him, but ſent him backe into Spaine, knowing him to be fit for the affaires of the Romiſh Catholike church: ſo D. Bernard returned, beeing abſolued of his vow.

F He paſt through France, from whence hee carried with him many men of fame, amongſt others one named Girard, borne at Moyſi, whom hee made Chantre of his church, afterwards he was Archbiſhop of Braga, and canonized for a Saint: one Peter borne in Berry, whom he made Arch-deacon, and was afterwards Biſhop of Oſma, put alſo in the numbers of Saints: Bernard of Agen the ſecond Chantre, and after Biſhop of

of Siguença and in the end Biſhop of Saint Iaques: Peter alſo of Agen, ſecond Arch- A deacon of Toledo, and ſince biſhop of Segobia: Raymond of Agen, who ſucceeded in the Biſhoprike of Oſma, and in the end to the ſame D. Bernard in his dignity of Toledo: an other Peter who was Biſhop of Palence, and Ieroſme of Perigueux, whom hee made Biſhop of Valencia, arriuing in that city ſoone after that D. Roderigo Diaz de Biuar had conquered it; to whom he was an aſſiſtant to order clergy matters. Hee carried with him alſo one Bernard, who was biſhop of Zamora: and beſides a Limoſin called Bourdin, who was Arch-deacon of Toledo, and afterwards Biſhop of Coimbra, and ſucceſſiuely Arch-biſhop of Braga: but this Bourdin became a Iudas to the church of Rome, and would haue made himſelfe Pope, againſt Calixtus the ſecond, which cau- B ſed a great ſciſme.

All this ſeed the Archbiſhop of Toledo brought out of France into Spaine, at his returne from Rome, & furniſhed Spaine with theſe Prelats, in recompence of the vow which he did not performe to goe to the holy war: and moreouer he re-built churches and other apparent places in the towne of Tarragone, with the money which was prepared for his voiage, and there eſtabliſhed Berenger Archbiſhop, hauing beene Biſhop of Vic d' Auſone, leauing the temporalty of that towne to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone.

Barcelone. This Prince was left young at the death of his father, who had beene cruelly murthered by his owne brother, deſirous to rule alone in Cattelogne. He was much troub- C led with diuiſions and factions betwixt the Noblemen of the country, and was ſpoiled of Carcaſſone and other Lands which he had in France, by tirants, as it happens often during the minority of the Prince or Lord. His mother the Conteſſe Almodia, a widow, gaue ouer al gouernment, and profeſſed herſelfe a Nunne in the conuent of Saint Daniel of Girone: ſo as hee remained in the hands of Armingol Earle of Vrgel, the Earle of Cerdagne, and ſome other of his bloud, who beeing imploied againſt the Moores, got for themſelues, and did not much attend the good of their pupil, yet did he grow both in vertue and valour. Cont Armingol died in the yeere of our Lord 1092. and D. Guillen Iordain of Cerdagne, went to the warres of Syria with Godefrey of Bouillon, where beeing dead and ſoone after his brother D. Bernard Guillen his ſucceſ- D.

So he not onely recouered that which they had taken from him, but alſo augmented his Eſtates and Siegneuries with the towne of Tarragone, and the county of Cerdagne. We haue ſayd before, that he was in a certaine incounter againſt Cid Ruis Diaz, during the warres betwixt Valencia and Denia, and that hee was repulſed and vanquiſhed by him: but became afterwards good friends, after that Cid had taken Valencia about the yeere of our Lord 1096.

Caſtille. To returne to which conqueſt, we will ſay that Cid did preſently ſend to King D. Al- E phonſo his Lord, a hundred goodly horſes richly furniſhed, with other great preſents, who being in Palenza, receiued them with great contentment. He ſent other preſents to D. Ximena his wife, whom with his two daughters, D. Eluira, and D. Sol, he cauſed to come to Valencia with the leaue of King D. Alphonſo. The Almorauides of Affrike ſtaied not long before they paſt the ſeas, to defend their new conqueſt in Spaine, and came into the country of Valencia with a great power, but they were repulſed by Cid with great loſſe and diſhonour; of the ſpoiles of which victories Cid ſent two hundred horſes vnto his King, richly furniſhed, and at euery ſaddle did hang a ſword of great value. The King D. Alphonſo was at that time at Vailledolit in Caſtille, who receiued

Cid, with D. Diego and D. Fernand Gonçales, ſonnes to D. Gonçalo Lord of Carrion, for the effecting whereof, the King, Cid and the parties came to Requegna, whether the King brought the two young Noblemen, to whom Cid promiſed his daughters; and afterwards the marriages were celebrated at Valencia with great pompe. But in the end

A end of this feaſt there happened an accident, which did much trouble theſe two houſes, ſo inconſtant and ſhort are humaine pleaſures; and the councels and iudgements of God inſcrutable. There was a Lyon bred vp in Cids houſe, the which by the negligence of the Gouernor, or otherwiſe, getting looſe, came into the hall, where there was a great aſſembly of Noblemen and Ladies, with the married coples, and ſtrooke a great terror among them, where as aboue all others the two Gonçales, newly married ſhewed themſelues faint-hearted cowards, whereat they were aſhamed, ſeeing themſelues leſſe eſteemed, both by their father in law, and by the other knights there preſent. From that time they conceiued a mortal hatred againſt Cid, thinking that this Lyon had beene let looſe by his commandment, to try them and feare them, ſo as they reſol-
B ued to be reuenged vpon the firſt occaſion. This was no vaine argument of their baſeneſſe, ſeeing a Lyon vpon the ſodaine (although that an vnexpected accident, might amaze the moſt hardy, being an ordinary thing in nature to be moued at ſodaine things) for ſoone after they gaue a more ample teſtimony of their want of courage, in a battaile againſt the Moores, who were come againſt Valencia, where they carried themſelues baſely, yet by the wiſdome and valour of Cid theſe Infidels were vanquiſhed. After al this, theſe two baſe Knights would carry their wiues home to their houſes, but hauing their hearts full of poiſon, and fearing they ſhould not be able to hurt their father in law, they reuenged themſelues inhumainly vpon their innocent wiues, and intreated them ſo il before they came to Carrion, as they left them for dead vpon the way, at a
C place called Robledos de Corpes, neere to Berlanga, where theſe poore Ladies beeing cheriſhed by the good people of the country, they had meanes to aduertiſe Cid their father of their miſery. The meſſenger whom they ſent, was incountred by Cids men, going to the King D. Alphonſo with foure ſcore horſes, and other rich preſents, of the ſpoiles of the laſt victory obtained againſt the Moores. Complaint was made by them vnto the King, of this villanous act committed by the ſonnes of the Lord of Carrion againſt their wiues: whereupon the King aſſembled the Noblemen and Knights of the country of Toledo, and kept a court (whereas Cid appeered, hauing retired his daughters to Valencia) and Iudges were appointed to doe right vnto the parties, vpon ſo great a controuerſie, among the which D. Raymond of Bourgongne, the Kings ſonne in D law was one: Their ſentence was that their queſtion ſhould bee decided by armes, betwixt Knights choſen of either part: ſuch was the Iuſtice in thoſe daies among Nobles, a cuſtome which is not loſt amongſt Chriſtians at this day. The campe where they ſhould fight was choſen in the towne of Carrion, whereas there appered Pedro Bermudes, Martin Antolines and Nugno Guſtos, Knights for Cid, who vanquiſhed, the two ſonnes of Carrion, with their vncle a partiſã of their villany, called Suero Gonçales who were proclaimed infamous and traitors, and degraded of al honor and title of nobility. Theſe two Ladies were afterwards happely married into the houſe of Nauarre, that is D. Eluira to D. Ramires, ſonne to the King D. Sancho Garcia; and D. Sol, to the ſonne of D. Pedro, then raigning in Nauarre and Arragon, called alſo D. Pedro, who died before
E his father. After theſe laſt marriages, Cid growne old, did nothing that was memorable. He ſetled the Eſtate of Valencia as well as he could, with the aide of the Princes of Nauarre and Arragon his allyes. And the better to aſſure it, he chaſed away diuers families of the Moores, which were ſuſpected vnto him. A captaine of the Moores, who was alſo a Doctor of the law of Mahumet, called Alfaraxi, a great friend to Cid, tooke vpon him the Chriſtian religion, being held a man of great valour and Iudgement. The authors place the death of Cid Ruis Dias of Biuar in the yeere 1098. the towne of Valencia beeing anoyed by the Moores, which held their campe about it: yet notwithſtanding they ſay that the widow accõpanied with D. Ieroſme the Biſhop, went out of the towne, conducting her husbands body, to bury it at Saint Pedro de Cerdegna, where it was laied: the Monkes of that place at this day ſhew many iewells and other things
F which they ſay had beene giuen by that great captaine to their Monaſtery. After his death, the Chriſtians which were at Valencia fearing they ſhould not bee able to reſiſt the forces of the Moores Almorauides, abandoned the towne, which came into the Infidels power againe, and ſo continued 140. yeeres.

Nauarre and Arragon.

19. IN the meane time by the deceaſe of D. Sancho Ramires, the crowne of Nauarre and Arragon was come to D. Pedro the firſt of that name in the yeere 1094. who had raigned nine yeeres in Sobrarbre and Ribagorça. At his comming hee ſwore to maintaine the lawes & preuiledges of the country, and intitled himſelfe King of Pampelone and Arragon. He continued the ſeege of Hueſca, the which was long and difficult, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place, and the reſiſtance of the Inhabitants, aſſiſted by Almocaben King of Sarragoſſe and other Moores, and alſo by ſome Chriſtians, of which number were D. Garcia Earle of Cabra, and D. Gonçales, vaſſals to the King of Caſtille. Theſe beeing come to ſuccor Hueſca with a mighty army, in the yeere 1096. thinking to raiſe the ſeege, had a battaile in the fields called Alcoraz, with the Nauarrois and Arragonois, who wonne it, killing aboue 30000. Moores, the reſt were wholy put to rout and flight, ſo as the towne deſpayring of al ſuccors, yeelded to D. Pedro King of Nauarre and Arragon. Here they forge the ancient armes of Arragon, vpon a viſion which the Spaniſh writers ſay had appeered to many Arragonois during the combat: that is, Saint George on horſe-backe with a ſhield of ſteele and a croſſe gueules, fighting for the Chriſtians: and that after the defeat there were foure heads of the chiefe Princes of the Moores found: wherevpon they ſay that D. Pedro the King tooke for the armes of Arragon a croſſe gueuls in a field argent, betwixt foure Moores heads of the ſame collour.

A great defeat of Moores, and the taking of Hueſca.

The armes of Arragon.

In this battaile of Alcoraz, were renouned for their vertue and proweſſe, Gaſton Biel, the ſtemme of the family of Cornels, Federic Atrocillo, Lopes Ferencio de Luna, Gomes de Luna, Fortun Maza, Simon Aznar Oteicia, & Sancho Pegna, Knights of Arragon. Hueſca being taken, the great Moſquee was preſently dedicated for a Cathedral church, and the Epiſcopal Sea of Iacca was tranſlated thether, as it had beene in times paſt. There were Chriſtians Muſarabes found within the towne, who had liued there during the Moores Empire, alwaies in liberty of their religion, ſaying their ſeruice in Saint Peters church. The King D. Pedro indowed this Cathedrall church of Hueſca with great reuenues, and inuited by great preuiledges men to come from al parts to inhabit it.

This D. Pedro during the life time of D. Sancho his father, was married to an Italian Lady, called by ſome Bertha, by others Ygnes, ſo as it is vncertaine whether hee had one wife, to whom theſe names are attributed, or that he were twice married. Hee had by his wife one ſonne called alſo D. Pedro, and a daughter, named D. Iſabel, both which died before the father. The Infant D. Pedro was married to D. Sol, the ſecond daughter of Cid Ruis Diaz. As for D. Eluira the other daughter of Cid, ſhee had by her husband D. Ramir Sanches, ſonne to the King D. Sancho Garcia, one ſonne called D. Garcia Ramires, who was Lord of Corrada, and one daughter D. Eluira Ramires, the which was married in Caſtille, to D. Rodrigo Gomes, ſonne to D. Gomes Earle of Candeſpina and Gormas. By theſe alliances, the houſe of Nauarre and Arragon beeing fauorable to Cid Ruis Diaz, who held Valencia, he had often aide and ſupport againſt the Moores, both of men and money, from the Princes thereof. After the taking of Hueſca, the King D. Pedro put in garriſon there D. Fortun Garces de Biel, D. Ferris de Liçana and D. Pedro de Vergas, hee tooke a ſtrong caſtle nere to Bolea, called Calaſanzo, and he with the other Chriſtian Princes had done greater exploits, if there had beene more faith and better correſpondency amongſt them, yea more zeale, and good religion, but euery one ſeeking to make his houſe great, and to that end croſſing one an other, the Moores power increaſed, by the vnion which they had made of Spaine and Affrike.

Genealogy of Nauarre.

It was at that time when as the warres in the Eaſt were moſt hot, and that all the Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen which bare armes in France, Germany, Italy and England, yea and in Spaine, burned with deſire to goe this voyage. Forgetting their countries, countries, affaires, and families, to ingage themſelues in this enterpriſe. So as it is no wonder, if the Moores Eſtate beeing in a manner troden vnder foote in the Weſt, by their ſeditions and factions, hauing found ſupport of the Myralmumins of Affrike, at ſuch time when as euery man did runne to the conqueſt of the Eaſt, were reſtored by the Almorauides.

Tithes granted to laymen.

At this time the ſecular Lords or Lay men, fitted themſelues with the reuenues of the church and with titles throughout all Europe, Pope Vrbain hauing granted his Bulles to Chriſtian Princes and Potentats, according vnto thoſe of Pope Gregory the 7. giuen at Saint Iean de Latran, in the yeere 1073. who did not grant it but vnto Kings, in thoſe Lands where they ſhould build churches: But Pope Vrbain granted it to all Kings, Princes, Noblemen and gentlemen, not onely in places of their foundations, but in all other places, yea in thoſe countries which they ſhould conquer from the Moores; whereof the Noble houſes of Spaine, as well as in other places, haue made their profit, yea in high Nauarre and Biſcay. All theſe permiſions and faculties, to enioy (as they cal them) the ſpirituall goods of the church, the Pope granted to incourage men to make warre againſt the Infidels, not ſo much for to make them deſirous to become Chriſtians, as to ſtay them, and repulſe them, fearing they ſhould come and trouble the commodities of the Romane church, which were great in thoſe daies, and ſince.

Caſtille.

D. Alphonſo the Braue, Emperor of Spaine, as hee is intitled, in the inſtrumental letters, giuing about that time faculty to the Abbot Fortun to build a towne about the Monaſtery of Saint Dominike of Silos, for the great wonders which Chriſt did vnto the Chriſtians, which implored the aide of this Saint: ſuch be the words of the letters cited by Garibay, in the yeere 1095. This towne in our time is come into the poſſeſſion of the Duke of Frias, Conſtable of Caſtille. The ſame King re-edefied nere vnto Toledo, and to the caſtle of Saint Seruant, the monaſtery of Saint Seruant, and Saint Germain, of the order of Saint Benet, which had bin a houſe belonging to the ſame order, & indowed it with great reuenues. The name of the Biſhop of S. Iames, called vntil that time Irienſes, was changed, & they were called of Compoſtella, by Buls from Pope Vrbain the 2. The firſt Biſhop which caried this title, was Dalmichius, a religious man of the order of Clugny: it was alſo granted to that church that from thence-forth they ſhould bee no more vnder the Archbiſhop of Braga, as that of Iria had bin, but ſhould immediatly acknowledge the holy Apoſtolike Sea of Rome. The Epiſcopal ſeat of Oca, was changed by the ſame Pope Vrbain to Bourgos, the chiefe city of Caſtille, with the ſame preuiledge and exemption, not to acknowledge any but the Sea of Rome immediatly: yet ſome ſay it had bin done long before, and that it was only a confirmation which Pope Vrbain the 2. made. D. Pedro King of Nauar, did for his part giue bountifully vnto churches. The writers of the Spaniſh hiſtory make mention of a holy man called Leſmes, a Frenchman borne, dwelling at Bourgos, but they make no particular relation of his Holineſſe. The country of Nauarre being ſpoiled by graſhopers and caterpillers, the Nauarrois had recourſe to the holy father at Rome, bewayling their calamities, and intreating him to be a meanes to pacefie the wrath of God. The Pope by the aduice of the Conſiſtory of Cardinals, ſent the Biſhop of Oſtia, called Gregory, who let them vnderſtand that it was for their ſins, the which it may bee D. Pedro de Roda, biſhop of Pampelone, and their other paſtors had not told them, or elſe could not perſwade them, that it was the cauſe of their affliction. This Biſhop of Oſtia was beleeued, and therefore after ſome amendment amongſt the people of Nauarre, this ſcourge of graſ-hoppers and caterpillers ceaſed. Herevpon this Gregory of Oſtia was held a Saint by them, and is at this day the patron and protector of Vignes and fruites, againſt caterpillers, and other ſuch vermine, in Spaine. Saint Dominike, called de la Calçada, was his diſciple, who liued long in the country neere vnto Nauarre, foure leagues from Nagera, receiuing ſtrang pilgrimes which came from diuers partes of Europe to viſit the ſepulcher of Saint Iames. This Saint Gregory died afterwards at Logrogno, and is buried at Beruela in Nauarre, where (as the hiſtory ſaies) the Chriſtians which recommended themſelues vnto him, are cured of many infirmities. In the ſame ſeaſon 1098. was inſtituted the order of Ciſteaux in the Dioceſe of Chalon in Bourgongne, by one named Robert.

Beginning of the towne of Saint Dominike of Silos.

Biſhop of Saint Iaques exempt from all ſubiection but of the Pope.

Bourgos made a Biſhopriſe.

Nauarre.

Gregory Biſhop of Oſtia, made the protector of vignes and fruits in Spaine.

This order was augmented ſince by Saint Bernard, who entring into it about the two and twentith yeere of his age, did ſo well, as in leſſe then 36. yeeres, hee erected 16. Abbaies of his Order. Theſe were the exerciſes of religion in thoſe daies, to the which the great deuotion of Princes and people, did mooue all Kingdomes, States, Prouinces, Townes and in a manner all priuate families. A

Caſtille. In the yeere 1100. died D. Raymond of Bourgongne, Earle of Galicia, ſonne in law
An. 1100. to King D. Alphonſo the Braue, leauing one ſonne by D. Vrraca his wife, called D. Alphonſo Raymond, who was bred vp by the Earle D. Pedro Traua, and came afterwards to raigne in Caſtille and Leon.

Moores. 20. The ſame yeere their died at Maroc, Ioſeph Aben-Tefin, or Texifien, Miralmumin, B or Emperor of the Arabians in Affrike and Spaine, hauing raigned 32. yeeres; to whom Ali Aben-Tefin, his ſon ſucceeded. This new King Ali, deſirous to win honor by armes paſt, ſoon after his comming to the crowne, into Spaine, with a great power of Almorauides Affricans, and hauing made ſome ſtay in Andaluſia, to ioyne the Moores of Spaine vnto his army, hee entred the territory of Toledo, where the King D. Alphonſo made then his reſidence, being old & ful of infirmities, & therefore vnfit to make head againſt this Barbarian, who was yong and full of ambition to inlarge the country conquered by his father, yet hauing called his Nobility together in time, if they had beene well led, he commanded D. Sancho his ſonne to ſally forth againſt this army of Moores, being a Prince of a great courage and too deſirous to fight, beeing accompanied by D. Garcia de Cabra, and other Earles and Noblemen of Caſtille, who hauing incountred C Chriſtians defeated by the Moores and D. Sancho heire of Caſtille ſlaine. the enemy nere vnto Voles, they gaue them battaile, but they were defeated, and put all to rout. The Infant D. Sancho, the Earle D. Garcia, and other great perſonages were ſlaine vpon the place, ſo as the Moores had meanes to ouer-run and ſpoile the country at their pleaſures: they tooke many places and forts, which the King could not preuent, nor make any reſiſtance; who was exceeding heauy and ſorrowfull for the loſſe of this battaile, but eſpecially for the death of his ſonne and onely heire. Hee did much blame many captaines which had eſcaped that day, for that they had ſo raſhly ioyned in battaile; but this was no meanes to cure the diſeaſe. This route was the more vnſeaſonable, for that his ſonne in law Raymond of Tolouſe and Saint Gyles, a valiant D
Commander in the warre, by whom hee might haue beene much eaſed was then abſent in Syria, where hee died a while after leauing three ſonnes, Bertrand, William and Alphonſo Iordain, which were all Earles of Tolouſe; although with great difficulties and troubles. The heat and furie of theſe Arabian Almorauides, was cooled and ſtaied by ſome other good ſucceſſe of the Nauarrois, Arragonois, and Cattelans, againſt the Moores their neighbours, which gaue the Caſtillans ſome time to breath, and to recouer new forces.

Nauarre. D. Pedro King of Nauarre after the taking of Hueſca, had made continuall warres againſt the Infidels which lay neere vnto him, and had taken Pertuſa from them. After An. 1101. which he went to beſeege the city of Barbaſtro, which after a long conteſtation of either ſide, was yeelded, with the caſtle of Vililla, and other forts of that country in the E yeere 1101. He preſently reſtored the Epiſcopal Sea to that city, as it had beene, whereof D. Ponce was Biſhop, who was of Rode.

Barcelone. On the other ſide the Earle of Barcelone, growne both in courage and poſſeſſions, hauing with him the Earle of Vrgel his couſin, made an enterpriſe vpon the Iſland of Majorca, which was held by the Moores. Being aſſiſted by ſome gallies of Piſa and Genoua, they paſt their army into the Iſland, and beganne to batter the forts, and to aſ-Majorca taken by the Cattelans. ſault the Moores which inhabited it. D. Armingol Earle of Vrgel was ſlaine there in a ſally, leauing a ſon of his owne name to be his ſucceſſor, yet Cid Raymond did batter and aſſault the city of Majorca with ſuch fury, as it was taken in the yeere 1102. and for that hee had newes that the Moores, to diuert the conqueſt of thoſe Iſlands were come to F beſeege Barcelone, hee returned into Cattelogne, leauing the Iſland to the Geneuois, Infamous cometouſneſſe of the Geneuois. to reduce the reſt vnder the power of the Chriſtians, but mooued (as the Cattelans ſay) with a trecherous & villanous couetouſneſſe, they ſold both the town and the whole Iſland to the Moores, for a ſum of money, whereof, they ſay, grew the irreconciliable hatred

A hatred betwixt the Cattelans and Geneuois. The Moores which had beſeeged Barcelona, were forced to abandon it with ſhame and great loſſe of their men. Some authors of the Spaniſh Hiſtory write, that this Earle D. Raymond Arnould, went into Germany in a diſguiſed habit, and did fight a combat for the Empreſſe Mathilda, wife to Henry accuſed of adultery, and that hauing vanquiſhed her accuſer, and deliuered the Lady, hee returned to Barcelona, without diſcouering himſelfe: yet this fact beeing knowne and verified, the Emperor rewarded him with the county of Prouence, which did then belong to the Empire. About that time, which was in the yeere 1102. died in Caſtille the wife of Cid Ruis Diaz, daughter to D. Gomes, Earle of Gormas, who was buried with her husband, at Saint Peter of Cardegna, neere vnto Burgos. The King of B Caſtille in the meane time made head againſt the Moores without hazarding of much, ſo as after great ſpoiles of either ſide, that realme had ſome reſt.

Prouence giuen to the houſe of Barcelone by the Emperor Henry the fifth.

Caſtille.

The affaires ſtanding vpon theſe termes, D. Henry Earle of Portugal, ſon in law to the King D. Alphonſo, had a deſire to goe into the Leuant, to ſee the Land where our Sauiour and ſo many holy Prophets and Apoſtels had liued, and thruſt on alſo with an emulation of the fame of his couſin or vncle D. Raymond of Toloufe and Saint Gyles, and of ſo many Noble men and Barons of France and Germany, which had run to that warre. He parted in the yeere 1103. hauing with the helpe and aduice of D. Bernard Archbiſhop of Toledo, reſtored the cities of Coimbra, Braga, Viſeo, Lamego and Porto, to their Epiſcopal Seas, of which townes Coimbra was the chiefe for the tempo-
C ral, and for the ſpirituall Braga was made Metropolitaine; as it had beene in the Gothes time. His way was by Germany and Hongary, with many other Noblemen of France and Germany, whoſe voyage was long and painful. There is nothing ſpoken of him, but that he returned with many relikes, and among others an arme of Saint Luke the Euangeliſt, as they did beleeue: whereof Alexis Comnen Emperor of Conſtantinople (a ſecret enemy to the Weſterne Princes, and to al their enterpriſes, & who mocked at all their deuotions) made him a worthy preſent; which relike Cont Henry carried into Portugal, and placed it with great reuerence in the chiefe church at Braga. It was at ſuch time as the Knights of the Temple of Ieruſalem were firſt inſtituted, by D one Hugues de Paganis, and Ieoffrey of Saint Adelman, hauing vowed to keepe the waies ſafe from the port of Iaffa (in old time called Ioppa) vnto the Temple: to whom and to their companions (which ſoone increaſed to a good number) was a place aſſigned for their dwelling nere the Temple, whereof they tooke the name of Templers; afterwards mingling Knight-hood with Monacal rules, they inſtituted an order, the which which confirmed by the Pope; they tooke vpon them a white habit, with a red croſſe, and in ſucceſſion of time got ſo great poſſeſſions throughout all Chriſtendome, as Kings and Popes themſelues did enuy them: ſo as vnder the collour of many crimes, whether true or falſe, they were condemned and rooted out at the councell of Vienne, by Pope Clement the fifth, their order hauing continued 200. yeeres. Whoſe ſpoiles were diuided betwixt the Pope, King Philip of France, the Hoſpitaliers of Saint John E of Ieruſalem and others. Theſe Templers were the beginning of al the millitary orders, which haue beene ſince made in Chriſtendome.

Returning to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille his ſubiects ſeeing, him without any heires male, by the death of D. Sancho, & that he was now old and broken, they tooke councell to perſwad him to marry the Counteſſe D. Vrraca, widow to Raymond Earle of Bourgonge to D. Gomes Earle of Campdeſpina, the greateſt Nobleman next vnto the King in Caſtille, for the effecting whereof, the Noblemen of Caſtille aſſembled at Magan, a Bourough of Toledo, or according vnto others at Maſquereque: the difficulty was that knowing the King to bee of a high and great ſpirit, there was not any one that durſt preſume to deliuer the meſſage; wherefore they reſolued to giue this charge to a phyſition which was a Iewe, called Cidello, who was very familiar with the F King, the which (beeing a raſh man) hee accepted, to his owne ruine: for hauing found a fit opportunitie as hee thought, to ſpeake vnto the King of this marriage, hee had no ſooner touched that ſubiect, but he was repulſed with bitter words, and chaſed out of the Court, with charge neuer to returne againe vpon paine of death, yet this made the King to thinke, that it was fit to marry his daughter, and therefore hee A made choiſe of D. Alphonſo Infant of Nauarre and Arragon brother to the King D. Pedro for his ſonne in law, the which hee did by the aduice of D. Bernard Archbiſhop of Toledo, which marriage was accompliſhed according vnto ſome, in the life time of the King D. Pedro, others ſay it was after his deceaſe, D. Alphonſo hauing already ſucceeded him to the crowne of Nauarre and Arragon, in the yeere 1104. for that the King D. Pedros ſonne, of the ſame name, was dead without children, and D. Iſabel his daughter was alſo dead a virgin. This King D. Pedro and his children were buried at S. Iean de la Pegna, the laſt of the Kings which were interred there. He had raigned in Nauarre and Arragon ten yeeres and three monthes.

D. Vraca heire of Caſtille and Leon married to D. Alphonſo of Nauarre.

An. 1104.

As for King D. Alphonſo, he liued vnto the yeere 1108. being afflicted with great in- B firmities, with the which he languiſhed to the age of 73. whereof hee raigned foure and thirty yeeres and eight monthes, after the deceaſe of his brother D. Sancho, his body is interred in the Monaſtery of Sahagun, D. Alphonſo his ſon in law ſucceeded him, in the right of D. Vraca (the only lawfull daughter of the deceaſed) in all his realmes of Caſtille, Leon, Toledo and other Siegneuries. A little before his death, one Moyſe a Iew, very learned in the tongues, in Philoſophy and the holy Scriptures, was baptized, and the King D. Alphonſo was his god-father, wherefore hee was called Pedro Alphonſo. His conuerſion was profitable to many Iewes and Moores, whom by diſputing and writing hee brought to leaue their ſects, and to imbrace the name and profeſſion of Chriſtians. At the ſame time floriſhed Dominike de la Calçada, whoſe practiſe was to retire the pilgrimes which went to Saint Iaques, and to direct them in their way. At C the place of whoſe aboade there was ſince a city built of that name: he cauſed a Chappel to bee built there in honour of the Virgin Mary, and a little from thence, fiue yeeres before his death, he made his ſepulcher: for at that time they buried not any in holie ground. Now it is a Cathedral Church.

PORTVGAL.

D. Alphonſo Henriques. 2. Earle, and the firſt which tooke vpon him the title of King.

D. Alphonſo the eighteenth King of Nauarre. Emperor of Spaine.

Nauarre, Arragon, Leon and Caſtille. An. 1108.

1. ALL the Chriſtian Kingdomes of Spaine were vnited in one D body, in the yeere 1108. by the ſucceſſion of Leon, Caſtille, Toledo and other conqueſts, fallne to D. Vrraca, wife to D. Alphonſo King of Nauarre and Arragon, intitled Emperor of Spaine by a better right then his Predeceſſors: notwithſtanding that ſome Chronicles will not haue him put in the ranke and number of the Kings of Caſtille and Leon, for that it was D. Vrraca his wife, and not hee which was heire of the ſayd Realmes D. Pedro Anſures during the Kings abſence, who was in Nauarre and Arragon, gouerned, and was Viceroy in Caſtille; in which time the Moores went to E field, and did great harme vnto the Chriſtians, taking the towne of Coria, with other places. D. Alphonſo King of Nauarre, entred with an army into Caſtille, leading with him D. Vrraca his wife, but there needed not any force, for all obeyed him, both the townes, forts and Noblemen of the country, whom hee gouerned with all mildneſſe, humanity and iuſtice, and repulſed the inuaſions of the Moores on the fronters of his wiues dominions: but hee made ſharper warre againſt them vpon the confines of Nauarre and Arragon: in Caſtille hee repaired Vilhorade; in Rioje Berlanga; and vpon the riuer of Duero, Almaſan and Soria. The ſurname of warrior was giuen him by reaſon of his deeds of armes, and the battailes wherein he was during his raigne: The Hiſtories report that he did fight 29. times in a pitcht field, & was victor in them al, except in the two laſt battailes, which were fought nere vnto Fraga. Hauing gotten foot- F ing in Caſtille, he began to forecaſt what might happen, if his wife ſhould die without children by him; wherefore he put gouernors and captaines of his countries of Nauar & Arragon in al the ſtrong places of Caſtille, that if he were forced to quit theſe realms of Caſtille, Leon, Toledo & their depẽdances, he might keep thoſe people in ſome awe,

D. Alphonſo ſeeks to aſſure himſelfe of Caſtille.

A and leaue it with his honor and aduantage: the which did ſomewhat eſtrange the Noblemen of Caſtile. He knew alſo, that his wife D. Vrraca was proud, ingrate, inconſtant, and not very continent, and therefore with good aduice he armed himſelfe for all euents. This woman vpon a light occaſion, conceiued a great hatred againſt the Earle D. Pedro Anſures, Lord of Vailledolit, who had nouriſhed her, and had kept her Eſtates after the death of the king her father, onely for that in his letters written to the king her husband, & her, aduiſing them to come and take poſſeſſion of her inheritance, he had intitled her husband King of Caſtile. Whereupon ſhe ſought to take Vailledolit, and other lands from him, but the King did preſently reſtore them: and to the end he ſhould be the more ſecure, againſt the rage of this woman, hee ſent him into Arra-
B gon, with D. Elo his wife, giuing him the gouernement of the young Earle of Vrgel his Couſin.

The bad qualities of D Vrraca Queene of Caſtile.

The firſt expedition which he made againſt the Moores, was about the yeare, 1110. vppon the frontiers of Nauarre and Arragon, where he tooke from them the towne of Exea, in which warre he was aſſiſted by many voluntarie Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, beeing deſirous to winne honor by bearing armes againſt the Mahumetiſts. Running along the riuer of Ebro, he tooke Tihauſt, Borja, Magallon, and other places of thoſe marches: ſo as the happy ſucceſſe of this enterpriſe gaue him courage to effect that which his predeceſſors Kings of Nauarre had long before deſeigned; which was, to reduce the cittie of Sarragoſſa vnder his obedience, the which as he made ſhew
C to beſeege, ſpoiling the countrie round about it King Abuçaleh came with a great power, and preſented him battaile, neare vnto Valtierra, where the Moore was vanquiſhed, and ſlaine vpon the place. By meanes of this victorie, King D. Alphonſo took Morella, and reſolued to beſeege Sarragoſſa, wherefore he put a ſtrong garriſon into the fort of Caſtella, of old ſouldiers, called at that time in Spaine Almogarabes, who were continually entertained vpon the Moores frontiers. This ſeege was long and dangerous, for the Moores defended this cittie courragiouſly, beeing great, full of men, and well fortified.

Expedition againſt the Mahumetiſts. An. 1110.

Moores defeated by D. Alphonſo.

Sarragoſſa beſeeged.

In the armie of king D. Alphonſo, there were many Noblemen of France, which had vowed to carrie armes againſt the Infidels, among the which were Gaſton Lord of D Berne, the Earle of Cominges, and Rotron Earle of Perche, by whom the Towne of Tudele, ſeated vpon Ebro, betwixt Sarragoſſa and Calaorra, was taken by ſurprize. The Moores which were there in garriſon, did much annoy the campe; for that they ſpoiled their victuallers and merchants, and cut off their victuals: whereupon D. Alphonſo ſent Cont Rotron with good troupes of foot, and ſixe hundred horſe. The Earle kept himſelfe cloſe in certaine valleys, couered with woods, neere vnto the towne, and ſent foorth ſome men into the open plaines, to get ſome ſpoile, and to driue away their cattell; who being diſcouered by the Moores of the fort, they ſallyed foorth with all their forces, to the end that not any one of theſe runners ſhould eſcape. Whileſt they were in skirmiſh, the Earle came out of his ambuſh, and cut off their retreate to E the towne, the which he found ill garded, ſo as he ſeazed thereon without any difficultie. The king D. Alphonſo to reward the Earle of Perche for this prize, which was of ſo great importance, for that ſeege where he was, gaue him this place of Tudele, the which was afterwards annexed to the crowne of Nauarre. The Moores amazed at this loſſe, began to faint in many places: ſo as Moncajo, and other neighbour townes, were made ſubiect to D. Alphonſo within few dayes. The Sarragoſſans were much aſſiſted by the Moores, which commanded at Lerida and Fraga, as well for the danger which did threaten them, as for their conformity in Religion.

Tudele taken by the Earle of Perche.

During this ſeege, the king D. Alphonſo beeing in the cittie of Barbaſtro, there came vnto his Court Count Bertrand of Tholouſa, ſonne to Count Raymond, and D. Eluira
F baſtard daughter to the deceaſed King D. Alphonſo the 6. This young Prince had bin diſpoſſeſſed of all his Eſtate by the Earle of Poictiers, who beeing gratiouſly intertayned and honored by king D. Alphonſo, to the end he might bee ayded by him, to recouer his Eſtate, he made himſelfe his vaſſall, acknowledging him for his Soueraigne Lord of all he did, or ſhould poſſeſſe (according to the Spaniſh Hiſtories.) The King receiued receiued him into his protection,& gaue him good hope,it was about the yeare 1116. A yet this did little auaile Cont Bertrand: for the continuall warre which D.Alphonſo had againſt the Moores, would not ſuffer him to attend the affaires of Tholouſa, beſides William Earle of Poictiers was the kings friend,and came himſelfe in perſon to the war againſt the Moores in Spaine,and was at the ſeege of Sarragoſſa, with the Earles of Perche, Cominges and Bigorre, the Lord of Bearn, the Vicount of Lauedan, Biſhop of Eſcar, and many other Noblemen and Knights of France, whereas alſo were all the Noblemen of Nauarre and Arragon,both Eccleſiaſticall and ſecular;among the which thoſe of greateſt marke, were Diego Lope Ladron, Ximen Fortunes de Leet, Simon Fortunes de mont Caſtel, Pedro Momeſio, Lope Ximenes Torelia, Lope Sancho of Ogabre, Pedro Ximenes Iuſtice of Arragon, Iean Galindio d'Antilia, Lope Fortunes of Albero, Pedro B Almudebar taken from the Moores. Myr Entenza, Raymond Peres d'Erillo, N. of Almorauid, and with them many of Caſtile and other places of Spaine. About the yeare 1118. Almudebar,a ſtrong place and well furniſhed, was taken by the French; the which ſtrucke ſuch a terror into the Mores thereabouts,as they abandoned Sarrignena, Salce, Robres, Zeura, and Gurrea, the which were ſeazed on by the Arragonois, whileſt that the French with the other forces did batter Sarragoſſa, with all violence, the which the Moores defended valiantly, the king D.Alphonſo beeing then gone into Caſtile. The Spaniards write, that the French ſeeing this ſeege to grow tedious, and beeing out of hope to take the cittie, they retired in a manner all home to their houſes, except the chiefe Commanders, to whome

D.Alphonſo brought new ſupplies, about Iuly this yeare 1118. The beſeeged beginning to doubt that they ſhould not be able to keepe the cittie long, they employed all their money, meanes,and credit, intreating the Moores that were neere and farre off, to ſuccour them in their great neceſſitie. Who ſending a captaine vnto them called Temin, with men and victuals: he was incountred and defeated neere vnto Daroca, by Sarragoſſa taken. the king D. Alphonſo, and the Earle of Prouence, who (according vnto Surites, the Writer of the Hiſtorie of Arragon,) was there with ſixe hundred horſe; contrarie to that which the Spaniards ſay: ſo as the Moores deſpayring of all ſuccours, beganne to parle, and to treate of conditions to yeeld. Some notwithſtauding to do more honor to the Clergie of thoſe times, ſay, that D. William Gaſton, Biſhop of Pampelone, generall of the ſouldiers of Nauarre, behaued himſelfe ſo in his quarter, as hauing made a great and ſpacious breach, he entred the towne by force, the Moores making wonderfull reſiſtance, with their king Almocauen, who was ſlaine among the ruines. This great cittie was taken in December, in the aforeſayd yeare 1118. where the king D.Al-

Epiſcopal ſeate reſtored to Sarragoſſa. phonſo entring,he lodged in the pallace of the kings of the Moores, called Açuda,nere vnto the Port of Toledo, beginning to ſettle the eſtate thereof, to make it the Capitall cittie of all the Realmes which he enioyed,or that he might conquer hereafter, intituling himſelfe king of Sarragoſſa. His chiefe care was to ſettle the Clergie, and to inrich that Order, which had ſerued him much in the ſeege of the towne: wherefore the Moſque Maior was then conſecrated for a cathedrall Church, vnder the name of S.
Sauueur, and one Pedro de Libana, was choſen Biſhop, confirmed by Pope Gelaſius then raigning. They found many Chriſtians Muſarabes in Sarragoſſa, who had liued there among the Arabians, with great liberty of their Religion, the which they did exercile in a very ancient church, called Noſtre Dame del Pilar:we reade in the Hiſtories of Arragon, and in the writings of Ierom Surita, that the Lords of Bearne,and the earls of Perche did long enioy very great priuiledges in the cittie of Sarragoſſa, by the grant of D. Alphonſo. This king and Emperour of Spaine granted great liberties and priuiledges to this cittie, to prouoke ſtrangers to come and dwell there, namely, the priuiledge of gentrie, and the lawes and Iuſtice of Arragon: and in time of factions and ſeditions to chuſe for their Councell certaine Syndics,Protectors of the people.

Dignitie of chiefe Iuſtice in Arragon. As for the dignitie called Iuſtice of Arragon, which was vſed in the time of D. Pedro F Ximenes, it is a Magiſtrate,the gardien and protector of the publike libertie,againſt the violence of great men, yea to ſuppreſſe the exceſſe and tyrannyes of Kings, with ſouereigne iuriſdiction,inſtituted in the infancie and beginning of principalities and Chriſtian Eſtates in Spaine, after the inuaſion of the Moores, when as the kings, not by ſucceſſion

A ſucceſſion of bloud and birth, but by their valour and vertues were choſen, to be ready and faithfull Gouernors of the affaires, as well of warre, as of Iuſtice, according vnto certaine ſimple lawes, and as then militarie, propounded vnder the title of the court or law of Sobrarbre. This Magiſtrate was firſt called Iuſtice maior, entertained and augmented both in dignitie and authoritie from time to time by good kings. There were great gifts and fees giuen alſo by this great king vnto the Earle of Bigorre, in recompence of the good offices he had done him in this warre. Theſe things thus done, hee went and layed ſeege before Tarraſſone; the which made no great reſiſtance, ſeeing that the neighbour places were come into the power of the Chriſtians. Beeing yelded, it receiued the ancient Epiſcopall ſeate, and one D. Michel was choſen Biſhop. Tarraſſone taken from the Moores.

B This towne which in former times had belonged to the Crowne of Nauarre, by this laſt conqueſt was annexed to that of Arragon.

D. Alphonſo continuing his conqueſts, tooke the places and forts which were along the riuer of Xalon, and in the end tooke the towne of Calatajub, into the which he put a great garriſon, as a place which frontred vpon the Moores on the mountaines of Cuenca, Molina, Valencia, and Caſtile, he cleanſed that which remained of the Mooriſh faction vpon the riuer of Xiloca vnto Daroca: he repayred and peopled Montreal, whereas this deuout king inſtituted an Order of Knights in imitation of the Templers of Ieruſalem, which was called S. Saluator, aſſigning them rents and reuenues, to the end they ſhould employ themſelues couragiouſly to roote out the Infidels in Spaine, Order of knights at S. Saluiour.

C as he had propounded. King D. Alphonſo did theſe great exploites vnto the yeare, 1120 at which time the Moores were diſpoſſeſſed of all which doth now belong to Arragon.

But in Cattelogne there yet remained the king of Lerida and Fraga called Aben Gama, whoſe forces were not to be contemned: and the which were as a thorne in the foot of the Eſtates of Arragon, but more to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, who was a good and a valiant Knight, and who had receiued no ſmall bleſſings from God: hauing by vnexpected meanes recouered the lands which were vſurped from him during his minoritie, and augmented his Eſtates by new ſucceſſions of the Earledome of Cerdagne, of the towne of Tarragone, and euen newly of the County of Beſalu, by the deceaſe of D. Bernand Guillen, by reaſon of which proſperities he intitled himſelfe Cattelogne or Barcelone.

D Marquis of Spaineu, Earle of Cerdagne, Beſal, and afterwards of Prouence and Aimillan, by the death of Gilibert his father-in law, who had no other heire then D. Doulce, wife to D. Raymond. It is likely, that by this meanes he got the Countie of Prouence, whereof (as a fee of the Empire) he was inueſted by the Emperour Henry the 5. as we haue ſayd. As for thoſe lands which he held in Languedoc, as Carcaſſone and others: ſome Authors write, that the vicious Bernard of Aton, hauing vſurped them, vnder a counterfeit promiſe to hold them of him, and to do him homage, hee afterwards made this acknowledgement to William Earle of Poictiers, vſurper of the Contie of Tholouſa: but D. Raymond forced him by armes to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him.

E valiantly, and had gouerned with all iuſtice and honor, vnder the ſoueraignetie of the King, or Emperour Don Alphonſo, vntill the yeare 1112. that he died in Galicia, in the D. Alphonſo Henriques 2. Earle of Portugal.

towne of Aſtorga, and was interred at Braga in S. Maries church, leauing for heire D. Alphonſo Henriques his eldeſt ſonne, about eighteene yeares old. D. Thereſa the Counteſſe widow, to whom the Earledome of Portugall did belong in proprietie, ſhewing her indiſcretion, married ſoone after to a knight of a noble houſe, called Don Bermond Paez de Tranſtamara, with whom hauing liued ſome time, by a diſordered appetite, or ſome other damnable occaſion, ſhe left him, and married againe with a The deteſtable marriage of the Counteſſe of Portugall.

brother of his called D. Fernando Paez of Tranſtamara; D. Bermond beeing thus forſaken, and as it were ſtriuing with his wife who ſhould be moſt inceſtuous, hee married her eldeſt daughter, and ſiſter to D. Alphonſo Henriques, called D. Thereſa Henriques.

F Theſe goodly exploites were done among Chriſtians, in the houſe of Portugal, which was but now growing: for expiation whereof, they ſay, that Fernando Paez, who had taken away his liuing brothers wife, built a Monaſterie at Sobrado in Galicia, nine leagues from Saint Iaques, a pennance and ſatisfaction taught by the paſtors of thoſe times, times, to miſerable contemners of Gods lawes and ordonances. The young Earle A Don Alphonſo beeing much troubled with theſe exceſſes, and moreouer ſeeing himſelfe contemned, and out of all credit and fauour, for that the adulterous and inceſtuous D. Fernando intitled himſelfe Earle of Portugal, in the right of his wife, he went to armes againſt him, the euent you ſhall heare hereafter.

Nauarre, Caſtile, Arragon, &c.

If this Counteſſe were vnchaſt in her ſeuerall marriages, her ſiſter D. Vrraca ſhewed her ſelfe as looſe and diſloyall to her husband King Don Alphonſo: ſo as this Prince who was endowed with great vertue and wiſedome, was forced to reſtraine her in the fort of Caſtellar, neere vnto Sarragoſſa, from whence ſhee ſought by all meanes to eſcape; as ſhee did, with the helpe of ſome diſcontented Noblemen of Caſtile, with whome ſhee retired into her Inheritance, where ſhee tooke councell to bee diuorced B from the King her husband, making her pretext, that ſhee had beene married againſt her will, and by conſtraint; and moreouer, that ſhee was his couſin germaine remooued, and therfore the marriage could not be lawful, without diſpenſation frō the church of Rome, the which in thoſe dayes was not much vſed. Of this Councel were the Archbiſhop of Toledo, the Biſhops of Bourgos, Leon, Palence and others, who were al diſpoſſeſt, chaſed away, and baniſhed by D. Alphonſo, and with them the Abbot of S. Facunds, whoſe Abbey was giuen to D. Ramir the kings brother. Wherefore the Nobilitie and Eſtates of Caſtile, conſidering what troubles and miſeries would enſue, if this deſſeigne were put in execution againſt the king D. Alphonſo, they would not giue their conſents, but took their Queene with all reſpect, and conducted her into Arragon, to her husband; who diſſembled the wrongs ſhe had done him, receiued her into fauor: but C as ſhe continued her leud life, forgetting more and more the honor of her ſelf & houſe, which ſhould haue bin more deare vnto ſuch a Princeſſe, then her life, the king in the end cauſed her to be conducted to the towne of Soria, chaſed her from his company for euer: notwithſtanding he kept ſtill many ſtrong places in Caſtile, not caring much for the gouernment of the Realme.

D. Vrraca chaſed away by the king D. Alphonſo her husband.

Without doubt this king was of a great courage, and gaue good prooſes, that he did more eſteeme vertue and his honor, then all worldly goods, diſpoſſeſſing himſelfe of ſo great iuriſdictions, as thoſe of Caſtile, Leon, Toledo, and others, which D. Vrraca had brought him; who being ſetled in her countries, began to ſhew ſome tokens of amendment, gouerning her ſelfe by the aduice and counſell of D. Pedro Anſures, and other D knights of greateſt wiſdome and fame among the Nobility of Caſtile. Hauing then aſſembled her eſtates, ſhe complained that many forts were kept from her, demaunding their aduice and ayde to recouer them: Thoſe which were kept by Captains and gouernors Caſtillans, were preſently yeelded vnto her, without attending any commaundement from the king D. Alphonſo, in hatred that he had chaſed away the Queene. Among others D. Pedro Anſures, preſently after the reſtitution of ſome places by him, went to the king, who was at Caſtellar; where coming before him, beeing mounted vppon a white horſe, and clad all in ſcarlet, hee lighted, and holding a halter in his hand, hee ſayed vnto him, That hee had done vnto his Queene (the naturall and ſoueraigne E Princeſſe of Caſtile) the dutie of a faithfull vaſſall: yet hauing failed vnto the king, to whome hee had ſworne fealtie and homage, hee had brought vnto him both hand and mouth, the inſtruments of the oath which hee had made vnto him, to the end that his Maieſtie might diſpoſe of them, and of his whole bodie at his Highneſſe pleaſure and command. King Don Alphonſo (alwaies like himſelfe) although (vppon ſufficient grounds) he were diſcontented with the yeelding vp of theſe forts, ſhewing no good countenance vnto the Earle, yet vppon his firſt ſpeech hee pardoned him, yeelding to the counſell of the wiſe, who commended much the loyaltie and integritie of this knight, the which ſhould ſerue as a Preſident to poſteritie: wherefore he was ſent backe with honor into Caſtile.

After this, D. Vrraca did nothing of merit: for falling to her old deſſeigne of diuorce F ſhe obtained it by the authoritie of Pope Paſcal. Of whoſe commandement and Bulls, Don Diego Gelmirio, Biſhop of Compoſtella, was miniſter and executioner. Thus finding her ſelfe without reſtraint in her luſt & luxurioufneſſe, ſhe exceeded ſtrangely.

Shee

A She had familiar and diſhoneſt conuerſation with D. Gomes, Earle of Candeſpina, who had in former times pretended to be her husband, who was ſecretly deliuered of a ſonne, gotten by him, and was for that cauſe called D. Fernand Hurtado, from whome as they ſay, is deſcended the houſe of Hurtados, a noble family of Spaine. Although that ſome doubt hereof, yet it is moſt certaine, that the Earle D. Gomes, had in a ſhort time the whole gouernement of the Realme, and diſpoſed of all the affaires, both of warre and peace at his pleaſure, conuerſing as familiarly with the Queene, as if ſhe had beene his wife: and yet another Knight called D. Pedro de Lara, ſonne to Don Ordogno, Earle of Lara, who entred combat at the ſeege of Zamora, againſt the three ſonnes of Aria Gonçalo, after the deceaſe of the king D. Sancho, did inſinuate himſelfe in the B Queenes fauour, and was in a ſhort time one of her greateſt minions, whereof the earle D. Gomes was very iealous. The diſſolute and vnchaſt life of D. Vrraca was ſo publikely knowne to all the world, as king D. Alphonſo (mooued with a iuſt diſdaine, both for it, and for the aboue-mentioned diuorce) reſolued to enter into Caſtile with an armie, putting all to fire and ſword, beeing much incenſed as well at the diſſolute life of the Queene, as at the Caſtillans baſeneſſe, who obeyed her, bearing them alſo a ſpleene, for that they had deliuered her thoſe places which he had giuen them in gard.

Nauarre, Caſtille, Arragon, &c.

Queene D. Vrraca vnchaſt.

There went againſt him to field the Queenes two fauorites, D. Gomes, and D. Pedro, with the forces of Caſtile and Leon, who hauing incountred the kings armie, conſiſting of Nauarrois and Arragonois, they came to fight neare vnto Candeſpina, and C not farre from Sepulueda. D. Pedro who led the foreward, was firſt charged, who abandoned his men baſely vpon the firſt incounter, and retired to Bourgos, where the Queene, was carrying newes of the route which he had no leyſure to ſee. The army of Caſtile was defeated and put to flight, and many good Knights ſlain and others taken, namely, D. Gomes Earle of Candeſpina, with a brother of his called Diagomes died vpon the place. The valour of one of the houſe of Olea was great, which carried the Standard of the Earle D. Gomes, who beeing ouerthrowne from his horſe, and both his hands cut off, he held his Standard faſt in his armes whileſt hee liued, crying out with a loud voyce, Olea, Olea. After this victorie, D. Alphonſo paſt vnto Leon, by the territo- D rie of Campos, making a cruell ſpoyle and murther, wherſoeuer his armie went, vpon D. Pedro's faction. And for that his treaſure failed him, the ſouldiers abandoning themſelues to the ſpoyle, committed infinit thefts and ſacriledges, ſparing nothing, were it holy or prophane.

D. Vrraca chaſed away by the King D. Alphonſo her husband.

Caſtile ſeparated.

King D. Alphonſo hauing paſt into Galicia with the like diſorder, the Nobilitie of thoſe countries, aſſembled all that were fit to carrie armes, and came to meet with this furious enemy, bringing in the armie young D. Alphonſo Raymond, the ſonne of D. Vrraca, and of Cont Raymond of Bourgongne her firſt husband. There king D. Alphonſo had another battaile, neere vnto a place called Carrera of Anguas, betwixt the townes of Leon and Aſtorga, where the Nauarrois and Arragonois had the victorie. E So as hauing ſlaine a great number of Leonois, put the reſt of the army to flight, and taken D. Pedro de Trauzs priſoner, D. Alphonſo Raymond was forced to ſaue himſelfe in Portugall. King D. Alphonſo paſt no farther, but returned with his victorious armie, ruining all thoſe which followed D. Pedro de Lara's partie: who with their Queene ſhut themſelues vp in a place neere vnto Palenza, called Mençon, which was the retreate of them that had fled: and ſo returned into his owne country, with many priſoners, and great ſpoiles.

Loyaltie and integritie of D. Pedro Anſures.

6 The Queene beeing freed from ſo great a danger, continued her luſtfull and vnchaſt life, with her minion D. Pedro, with as little ſhame and reſpect, as ſhee had beene accuſtomed; who playing the king, yea the very tyrant, incenſed the Nobility in ſuch ſort, as many of them conſpired to abandon the Queene, and to call vnto the gouern- F ment, D. Alphonſo Raymond her ſonne, who by hereditarie ſucceſſion ought to haue ſucceeded her. The chiefe of theſe conſpirators were D. Gutiere, Fernandes de Caſtro, and D. Gomes de Moncanedo, who with their confederates (hoping that the infant D. Alphonſo ſhould draw great ayde from his vncle Pope Calixtus, who then gouerned the Church of Rome) they cauſed D. Alphonſo to come vnto their aſſembly; and in deſpite of of the Queene his mother, and her Minion D. Pedro, made him king of Caſtile and Leon, in the yeare 1122. D. Alphonſo King of Nauarre hauing raigned in thoſe realms, almoſt 14. yeares, in continuall troubles and care. A

This Pope Calixtus of whom we haue ſpoken, was before called Guy, brother to Cont Raymond, and Cont William of Bourgogne, who being Archb. of Vienna, had bin aduanced to the ſea of Rome, after the deceaſe of Gelaſius the 2. in the yeare 1120. in the Abbey of Clugny, where Gelaſius died, flying the fury of the Emperor Henry the 5. This Calixtus was to contend againſt Maurice Archb. of Braga, a Limoſin, called Bourdin, who had bene choſen Pope by the Emperours faction, againſt the election of Gelaſius, and cauſed himſelfe to be called Gregory the 8. Hee had bin brought into Spaine by D. Bernard, Archb. and Primate of Toledo, with a great opinion of his holines and wiſedome, and therefore he made him biſhop of Coimbra, and afterwards Archb. of Braga: but he ſought to make him a bad requitall, perſwading Pope Paſcall, who was Predeceſſor to Gelaſius, to depriue D. Bernard of his dignity, and to chooſe him in his place, offering him a good ſumme of mony. The Pope who was exceeding couetous, took his mony, and put him in hope, but he did not any thing. Wherefore there growing great diſſention betwixt the Pope and the Emperor Henry, for the nomination of Prelates, Bourdin, who had changed his name, & taken that of Maurice, to his promotion to Braga, ioyned with the Emperor, and ceaſed not till he was made Pope of Rome, whileſt Gelaſius liued, who ſoone after died, leauing this quarrell to bee decided by Calixtus. B C

The Papacie diſputed by armes.

Then might you haue ſeene Chriſts Vicars command armies, place guards, giue the word, be in battels armed, giue the bodies and goods of miſerable Chriſtians in prey, and to countenance the moſt horrible inſolencies which warre could produce. Gregory the 8. going from Sutri, where he had aſſembled his forces, preſt Rome by al acts of hoſtility, ſpoyling pilgrims which went to get pardons, according to the Romane doctrine. On the other ſide, Calixtus ſending many ſouldiers out of Bourgongne, vnder the conduct of Iohn de Crema, Cardinall of S. Chriſogone, he himſelfe followed after in perſon, with other troupes, ſo as he entred Rome with great effuſion of bloud, and there ſuppreſſed Gregorie; where making him a ridiculous ſpectacle vnto the people, mounted vpon a Camell, with his face backward, holding the tayle in his hand, for a bridle, he put him in perpetuall priſon, where hauing renounced his Popedome, he ended his dayes. Thus were Eccleſiaſticall charges executed among Chriſtians in thoſe dayes. Pope Calixtus hauing preuailed ouer his aduerſarie about the time that D. Alphonſo Raymond his nephew was choſen in Caſtile to raigne in ſtead of his vnchaſt mother, it was likely this election ſhould be confirmed and ſupported by the authority of Rome, againſt all that ſhould contradict it. D

Portugal.

The eſtate of Portugall was troubled with the like diſorder, and D. Alphonſo Henriques, and the Portugals were preſt with the like difficulties, by the diſordered appetites of their Counteſſe, D. Thereſa his mother, who was then enioyed by D. Fernand Paez: againſt whom D. Alphonſo armed, purſuing him as a Tyrant and inceſtuous adulterer, their armies ioyned neere vnto Guymaranes, where D. Alphonſo was vanquiſhed, being too haſtie to fight, and would not attend ſome ſupplies, which D. Egas Nugnes (who had bred him vp, and gouerned him in his infancie) brought vnto him: by whome hee was then ſharply blamed for his raſhneſſe, proceeding from want of experience and heat of youth. Hauing recouered new forces, there was a ſecond battaile fought, whereas D. Alphonſo had the better: for D. Ferdinands armie was put to route, and himſelfe with the Counteſſe put in a ſafe priſon, from whence D. Fernand was afterwards deliuered at her intreatie, with promiſe neuer more to ſtile himſelfe Earle of Portugall, but to be a perpetuall ſubiect and vaſſall vnto D. Alphonſo Henriques, who by this meanes remayned a peaceable Earle in Portugall. Theſe fruites did the two vnchaſt and laſciuious ſiſters reape, beeing Daughters to king Alphonſo the ſixth, and in a manner at the ſame time. E F

D. Alphonſo the 7. left raigning in Caſtile, where he had ſome places at his deuotion, held by a Nauarrois gariſon: during whoſe raign dyed S. Dominike of Calçada in Rioje,

A who was reputed a Saint: hee was buried in the tombe which hee had made in his life time. He had beene a Monke of the Order of Saint Benet, at Valbanera, and after in the Monaſterie of Saint AEmylian, where they did not much eſteeme him: wherefore he gaue himſelfe to a ſolitarie life, and to follow the doctrine of Gregorie biſhop of Oſtia: for he was a man without any learning. At the place of his Sepulcher, there is at this preſent a towne built with a Cathedrall church, and Epiſcopall ſea, carrying his name, vnited at this preſent to that of Calaorra. He was much honoured in his life time, and after his death his memorie was reuerenced: Monkes beeing then admired, which gaue themſelues to a monaſticke and ſolitarie life. At that time there was giuen by the king D. Alphonſo, to the Monaſterie of Saint Mary of Valbanera, the church of Leuador, to
B that of Saint Saluadour of Leyre, halfe the towne of Araſcues: in imitation of whome other Noblemen gaue gifts vnto Churches, where they had ſpeciall deuotion, euery one chooſing for his Patron, Aduocate, and Protector, that Saint of whom the churches and Monaſteries were named. This was the ordinarie doctrine of that age to win Paradiſe.

In the meane time the Biſhops intruded themſelues into the Councels of Kings, to mannage affayres of State, and to maintaine their Eccleſiaſticall priuiledges, rights, and reuenues, they led armies, and were many times too forward to fight, as wee reade of D. Pedro of Roda, Biſhop of Pampelone, who about the yeare 1115. medling with the quarrels of ſome ſouldiers in the Towne of Tholouſa, receiued a blow on the head
C with a ſtone, whereof he died a Martyr, as the Spaniards ſay: an aduertiſement for the reſt to containe themſelues in their vocations. D. Mayor Garcia, daughter to the Earle D. Diego Ordognes, and of D. Vrraca Garcia, daughter to the king D. Garcia, gaue vnto the Monaſterie of Nagera about that time, certaine poſſeſſions which ſhe had in Calaorra. D. Fortun Velez a knight, at that time one of the moſt renowned in the Kingdome of Nauarre, gaue vnto the ſame Monaſterie, the place of Aleçon, to furniſh lights at the Altar of the Virgin Mary: ſo great and ſo conſtant was the opinion of men in that age, that by gifts vnto the Clergie, they might redeeme their ſoules from eternall damnation, as they did not ſpare the principall townes of their Eſtates: D. Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, at the ſame time, gaue vnto D. Alderic the Archbiſhop,
D the cittie it ſelfe of Tarragone, which the Archbiſhops did enioy in full proprietie, for the ſpace of foure and thirtie yeares. The foundation of the Hoſpitall vppon the Pyrenee mountaines, at the paſſage of Ronceual, ſeemes to be a godly worke, the which was done by D. Sancho de Roſas Biſhop of Pampelone, about the yeare 1122. but it was onely for Pilgrimes, going out of France to Saint Iames, wherein King D. Alphonſo aſſiſted him with money. This Hoſpitall was built neare vnto the place which was called Charlemagnes Chappell, a place which was much ſubiect to winds, and continuall ſtormes: whereupon it was afterwards built lower in Ronceuall where it is now.

The exerciſe of Biſhops of that age.

The citty of Tarragone giuen in propriety to the Archbiſhop of that place.

As ſoone as D. Alphonſo Raymond was crowned King of Caſtile and Leon, by the meanes and direction of D. Pedro de Trauas, a Nobleman, who was allyed in Catte-
E logne, to the Earles of Vrgel, and had bred and gouerned that Prince, hee beganne to purſue his mother, and D. Pedro de Lara her minion. D. Vrraca fortified her ſelfe in the tower of Leon, where he beſeeged her: but by the mediation of ſome Noblemen, who were al of the new Kings partie, a peace was made vpon condition, that ſhe ſhould giue ouer all gouernement of affaires, and be content to liue a priuate life, hauing a penſion fit for her eſtate and calling. As for D. Pedro de Lara, after that hee had wandred long vp and downe, in the end he left the countrie, and beeing as coldly entertayned in Nauarre and Arragon, as in Caſtile, he made his retreate into Barcelone.

Accord betwixt the king of Caſtile and his mother.

F

D. Alphonſo the 8. of that name, and the 27. King of Leon, and the fifth of Caſtille.

An. 1122. Caſtile and Leon.

7. D. Vrraca beeing thus diſpoſſeſſed, D. Alphonſo Raymond carryed himſelfe for king of Caſtile and Leon. After which he thought vpon the recouerie of the forts of Caſtille, which his father-in-law, D. Alphonſo King of Nauarre detayned from him, wherefore he rayſed a mightie armie to vſe it, if hee might not recouer that which hee pretended without armes: with theſe forces he marched towards Nauarre and Arragon, which were not vnprouided: for the King had alſo taken armes to croſſe him, if he ſhould proue inſolent, and was alreadie entred into Caſtile by Rioje, when as the Prelates of both kingdomes, foreſeeing the great miſeries which would inſue, if theſe two great Princes ſhould once enter into warre, they laboured to make a peace and vnitie betwixt them: and they preuayled ſo, as they perſwaded the new king of Caſtile, to make requeſt vnto the king of Nauarre and Arragon, to reſtore him his townes and forts; the which was of ſuch force, as without any difficulty, King D. Alphonſo beeing glad that he had taken ſo modeſt a courſe, did louingly reſtore vnto him all that he held in Caſtile, retayning onely the countrie which is from Villorado to Calaorra: for that (ſayd he) thoſe lands were of the ancient patrimonie of Nauarre, vſurped by king D. Alphonſo his father-in-law, ſince the deceaſe of Don Sancho Garcia king of Nauarre, and by the ſame reaſon, the Prouinces of Guipuſcoa and Alaua remained to the crown of Nauarre. Thus they layed downe armes of either ſide, and retired into their countries: Alphonſo Raymond King of Caſtile, ſeeing himſelfe ſetled in peace, he beganne to make warre againſt the Moores, his firſt enterpriſe was vpon Coria; which towne had beene ſurprized, during the inter-regne or abſence of the king of Nauarre and Arragon after the deceaſe of King D. Alphonſo the Braue, his grandfather. This was a worke of few dayes, for he eaſily recouered it, but not content herewith, hee paſt on into the countries of Extremadura and Portugal, held by the Moores, the which he waſted, and brought away the ſpoyles, not any Moore appearing to make head againſt him. This good ſucceſſe of his affaires, gaue him courage to greater attempts, and were as a ſpur to the naturall vertue and bountie wherewith God had endowed him, as much as any Prince of his time: for he was actiue, hardy and valiant, and withall wiſe, mild, capable, and very deuout.

Modeſtie of greater force than armes.

Exploits of K. D. Alphonſo the 8. againſt the Moores.

The vertues of King D. Alphonſo the 8.

In his time flouriſhed the Order of Ciſteaux, and the religion of S. Bernard, of the which he was carefull, and a great benefactor, ſo as they attribute to him the building of moſt part of the Monaſteries of that habit which are in Spaine: and hee was no leſſe carefull to repayre the ruines of many townes, and caſtels, which had beene deſtroyed by the continuall courſes of the Arabians; he built and peopled new, and made many good lawes and ordonances, for the adminiſtration of iuſtice, and gouernement of townes: ſo as for theſe excellent vertues he was fauoured of God, beloued and reſpected of his ſubiects, and greatly feared of his enemies. It was about his comming to the Crowne, that his vncle Calixtus erected an Epiſcopall ſea at Zamora: whereof D. Bernard, Arch-deacon of Toledo was the firſt Biſhop, whereas now the Sepulcher of Ylleſonce, Arch-biſhop of Toledo, is worthipped with diuine honours, found (as the Hiſtories ſay) by a ſhepheard, a teſtimonie worthie of the inuention. At the ſame time (which was about the yeare 1125.) the church of S. Iames in Galicia, was made a Metrapolitan, by the ſame Pope Calixtus, in fauour of his nephew, king D. Alphonſo, who ſhewed great deuotion to this Saint, for that he had had his breeding, and paſt moſt of his youth in Galicia. The firſt Archb. of that place was Don Diego Gelmirio, aboue-named, borne in the ſame Dioceſſe; vnder which Archb. were appointed 12. Biſhops, Salamanca, Auila, Plaiſance, Zamora, Badajos, Cite Roderigo, Coria, Lugo, Aſtorga, Orence, Mondognedo and Tuy. Then began the Abbey of S. Dominike of Calçado to increaſe, to the which was giuen by Don Alphonſo the Warriour, king of Nauarre, the place called Zamora made a biſhopricke.

An. 1125. S. Iames of Compoſtella made an Archbiſhopricke.

A called Olgabarte, or otherwiſe Iubarte, with great freedomes and exemptions. This Church was made ſubiect to the Biſhop of Calaorra, and at that time there was an Abbot and Monkes there, whereas ſince there were Chanoins placed, and in the end it was made a Cathedrall church, the which is now a towne ſeated betwixt Nagera and Vilhorado, and in the beginning was but a ſmall borough, called Malburguete, the which is now by corruption called Margubette, and is ioyned to the Cathedrall Church of that place, the which at this preſent is called the Bourg of Saint Dominicke of Calçada.

King D. Alphonſo the warriour had giuen ſome reſpite vnto the Moores, vnto the yeare 1125. when as he led his armie againſt them of Denia and Valencia, and ſpoyled Nauarre and Arragon.
B the countries: then paſſing into Murcia and the marches of Carthagena, hee attempted Alcaras, but could not take it: wherefore purſuing his good fortune, hee ouer-run the territories of Granado, then turning by Cordoua, as he prepared to beſeege it, he was diuerted by an armie of Moores Almorauides, to whome hee gaue Battaile and defeated them. Yet he did not thinke it fit to ſtay then at this ſeege, but returned laden with ſpoyles into his countrie, whither he led many Chriſtians Muſarabes, retired out of the tyrannie of the Moores, to whom he gaue dwellings and lands, with exemptions and titles of Nobilitie for them and theirs.

In Portugal, Count D. Alphonſo Henriques did in like manner annoy the Moores v- Portugal.
C pon his frontier, from whome he tooke Leyra, in the yeare 1127. the which hee gaue An. 1127. to the Monaſterie of Saint Croix, in the towne of Coimbra, built by him, as the firſt fruites of his victories. Hee tooke in like manner the towne of Torreſnouas. The contrarie happened in Cattelogne, whereas the Moores (whileſt that the king of Nauarre and Arragon did ouer-runne their weſterne countrie) were furiouſly entred, and committed infinite ſpoyles, the which might well bee one of the reaſons which made the ſeege of Cordoua to ceaſe, and cauſed the king of Nauarre and Arragon to retire to come and ſuccor D. Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone.

In theſe warres D. Alphonſo king of Nauarre, had great ayde and aſſiſtance of many Nauarre and Arragon.
Knights and Noblemen of France, that were neighbours to the Pyrenees, to whome
D a great part of the victories obtained by him againſt the Moores are attributed by the teſtimonie of the Spaniſh Authors themſelues. In this voyage of Cattelogne, hee led with him the infant D. Garcia, ſonne and heire to D Ramir Sanches, to whom by right of ſucceſſion the kingdome of Nauarre did belong, for that he was iſſued from the direct and lawfull line of the king D. Sancho Garcia his grandfather. This young Prince was left D. Garcia right heire of Nauarre.
by his dying father in the gouernement of D. Sol widow to the infant D. Pedro, daughter to Cid, his Aunt by the mothers ſide, by whome he was bred vp in his youth, in all vertue and religion, and they called him the Lord of Monçon. After this expedition the king peopled the new Bourg of Pampelone, which he had cauſed to be built neere vnto the old towne, and was called at that time Iruna, that is to ſay, good towne: hee
E placed French Inhabitants there, taken out of the ſouldiers which had followed him in the warres againſt the Moores, whom he would reward for their good ſeruices, in lodging them in this new increaſe, which he had made of the towne of Pampelone, giuing them the priuiledges and exemptions of the towne of Iaca. Some thinke they came from Cahors in Quercy: he alſo gaue priuiledges to the Inhabitants of Maragnon.

During theſe things, the Counteſſe of Portugall, who was a priſoner, beeing too Caſtile.
hardly intreated by D. Alphonſo Henriques her ſonne, had meanes to acquaint D. Alphonſo Raymond, king of Caſtile her nephew, with her afflictions, and to intreate him to imbrace her cauſe, and to free her from that hard priſon, wherein ſhee was detained: in recompence whereof ſhe offered to make him her heire of the Earledome of Portugal. D. Alphonſo deſirous to ioyne this peece to his demaynes, came in perſon with a great
F armie, to deliuer this woman, forgetting that the Earle had aſſiſted him in the warre, which he had againſt his mother D. Vrraca Queene of Caſtile and Leon, but hee had a ſharpe incounter in the fields of Valdues, along the bankes of the riuer of Limia, where beeing vanquiſhed by the armie of D. Alphonſo Henriques, his couſin, hee ſaued himſelfe, beeing hurt in the foote, in the territorie of Leon.

Beeing cured, and hauing rayſed another army, he entred againe into Portugal, being deſirous to recouer his honour, and to force the Portugals to acknowledge him, and to do him the homage which they ought him, as King of Leon. Beeing arriued at Guymaranes, where the Earle was, he beſeeged it, and did all hee could to take the place: but D. Egas Nugnes the Earles Gouernor going foorth with a ſafe-conduct; they ſo treated, as vpon a promiſe which Don Egas made vnto the King, that the Earle of Portugall ſhould take an oath of fealtie, as to his Soueraigne, he returned ſatisfied into his Countrey, without doing any other exploit: but the Earle D. Alphonſo Henriques would not performe that which his Gouernor had promiſed: wherefore D. Egas went to the King beeing at Toledo, and there preſenting himſelfe at his feete, with a halter about his necke, he craued pardon, for that which he had promiſed, and could not performe; which was, that the Earle ſhould do him homage for his Earledome of Portugall, whom the King pardoned, beeing duly informed that hee had done his beſt indeauour to effect his promiſe. Theſe wars (which were the firſt the Caſtillans had againſt the Portugals, written by the Hiſtorians of Portugall, wherof notwithſtanding others make no mention) paſt about the yeare 1127. D. Thereſa for that time had no eaſe, Her ſiſter D. Vrraca made her reſidence in Saint Vincents church, beeing ſtreightly garded: yet they ſay, that going one day to Saint Iſidores church in Leon, to take the treaſure which her father and grandfather had giuen vnto that place, as ſhe was carrying this prey, hauing one foote within, and another without the doore, ſhee burſt in the middeſt, a worthie and condigne puniſhment due for the adulteries which ſhee had committed, and the murthers which enſued not long after, to the preiudice and diſhonour of the Kings houſe, and of all the Chriſtian Eſtate in Spaine, as alſo for the ſacriledge. Others ſay, that ſhee dyed in the Caſtell of Saldagne, beeing brought in bed of a child by ſtealth. So Don Alphonſo Raymond remayned deſtitute and without a mother.

Death prodigious to D. Vrraca of Caſtile.

About that time the king of Caſtile, prouoked by the Moores, who were entred into the Territories of Toledo, marched farre into their countrey, and tooke from them by a long and painefull ſeege, the towne of Calatraua, the which he gaue to the Archbiſhop of Toledo, beeing a great fauourer of the Church and Clergie, into the which he put a good garriſon, the which ſome beleeue were Templers; who were wonderfully increaſed, and growne exceeding rich, euen in Spaine. After which D. Alphonſo Raymond tooke from the Infidels, Alarcos, Caracuel, Almodouar del campo, and other places, whereof he fortified ſome, and razed others. At that time there raigned ouer the Moores in Spaine and Affricke, Hali Aben-Teſin, the third Miralmumin, and laſt of the Almorauides, vpon whom the King of Caſtile extended his limits vnto the Mountaines called Sierra Morena, where he fortified Pedroche: then he paſt into Andalouſia with a great army, and layd ſeege vnto the towne of Iaen, but it was in vaine: for being valiantly defended by the Moores, he was forced to retire, and returned with his army into Caſtile.

Calatraua taken from the Moores.

Cattelogne.

This King D. Alphonſo had married D. Berenguela, daughter to Don Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, who dyed in the yeare 1131. hauing held the Earledome eight and forty yeares. A little before his death, he made himſelfe of the Order of Saint Iohn of Hieruſalem, called the Hoſpitaliers. The Earledome of Prouence was fallen vnto him in the right of his wife D. Doulce, and of other lands in France, whereof hee cauſed himſelfe to be called Marquis: by which Lady he had two ſonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, who ſucceeded him in the principalitie of Cattelogne, and afterward came by marriage to the Crowne of Arragon, and D. Berenger Raymond, who was Earle or Marquis of Prouence, thus ordered by his will. Of D. Doulce was alſo borne D. Berenguela Queene of Caſtille, and two other daughters, who were married into France. The Earledome of Prouence had beene in queſtion betwixt D. Raymond Arnould, and the Earle of Tholouſa and Saint Giles, but their ſute, after many delayes, was ended by accord: which was, That the lands of Prouence lying betwixt the riuers of Durance and Iſera, making at this day a part of Daulphiné, ſhould belong vnto the Earle of Tholouſa, with the Caſtell of Beaucaire, the Lands of Argence, Caſtell of Bolobrege, Genealogie of Cattelogne.

A brege, and the moitie of the cittie of Auignon, and of Pont de Sorge, the reſt ſhould remaine to the Earle of Barcelone. According vnto this diuiſion, D. Berenger Raymond did inherit Prouence, and there was added, that if any of the parties dyed without lawfull heires, the other ſhould ſucceede. Among other Articles of D. Raymond Arnoulds teſtament, he ordained, that if his heires dyed without lawfull children, his daughter Berenguela, Queene of Caſtile and Leon, and D. Ximena, wife to Roger Earle of Foix ſhould ſucceed.

Genealogie of Caſtile.

By this noble and vertuous Queene D. Berenguela, D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile, had foure children: D. Sancho who was king of Caſtile, hee was bred vp in his youth and gouerned by D. Guitiere Fernandes de Caſtro. The ſecond, D. Fernand, who did inherite B the Realmes of Leon and Gallicia: and two daughters, D. Iſabella, called by ſome D. Conſtance, wife to the French King, Lewis the young, the ſeuenth of that name, he that did put away Elenor, Counteſſe of Poictiers, heire of Guienne, daughter to Count William, who after this diuorce married with Henry Duke of Aniou and Normandie: who beeing heire to the Crowne of England, had long and cruell warres againſt the French, by reaſon of this Ladies patrimonie, the which continued aboue three hundred yeares, vnto King Charles the ſeuenth. The ſecond daughter which D. Alphonſo had by D. Berenguela, was called D. Sancha, or by others D. Beacia, who was Queene of Nauarre, hauing married the king D. Sancho ſurnamed the Wiſe, or the Valiant, as others write. There is to be ſeene among the tombes which are in the great Chappell C of the Monaſterie of Ogna, an inſcription of D. Garcia, who they imagine was ſonne to the ſayd D. Alphonſo, who had a ſecond wife, daughter to Vladiſlaus Duke of Polonia, called D. Rica, by whome he had one daughter called D. Sancha, who was married to D. Alphonſo, the ſixt king of Arragon, the ſecond of that name. He had familiar acquaintance with two Gentlewomen, whereof the one, which was called D. Maria, brought him a daughter, called D. Stephana, or Eſtienette: the other which was called D. Gontrude, bare him D. Vrraca, who was firſt married to D. Garcia Ramires King of Nauarre: and for her ſecond husband, ſhe married a wiſe and valiant Knight, called D. Aluaro Rodrigues, without any reſpect of her degree, falling from a Queene to be the wife of a ſimple Knight: it may be the Ladies of thoſe times had no ſuch haughtie ſpiD rits as they haue at this day, or elſe could not diſtinguiſh betwixt vertue and fortune. D. Stephana her ſiſter was married to another Knight, of the houſe of Caſtro, whome they called D. Fernand Rodrigues the Caſtillan, from whom iſſued a ſonne, called D. Pedro Fernandes de Caſtro. This was the poſteritie of King D. Alphonſo of Caſtile. About the yeare 1132. he made his eldeſt ſonne D. Sancho a Knight, on Saint Mathias day, vpon the which he alſo gaue the towne of Vra, to the Monaſterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos.

Nauarre and Arragon.

It was about this time that Don Alphonſo the Warriour, King of Nauarre, who alwayes called himſelfe Emperour of Spaine, had certaine quarrels with them that dwelt on this ſide the Pyrenees, towards France, in the Duchie of Guienne, the occaſion beeE ing concealed by the Authors, is not knowne to vs, but that wee may coniecture hee would fauour Don Alphonſo Earle of Tholouſa and Saint Giles, from whome William Earle of Poictiers detained his liuing: but whatſoeuer mooued him, hee beſeeged Bayonne, the which hee tooke with little danger and difficulty, extending his limits much on that ſide.

Bayonne taken.

During this ſeege he made his laſt will and teſtament, and as hee was alwaies enuironed with Biſhops, who forgot not themſelues in ſuch oportunities, beeing alſo very deuout, and ſeaſoned with an opinion, that ſinnes are wiped away, and puniſhments redeemed by gifts and foundations of rents and reuenues to Churches: Hee gaue vnto the great Church of Pampelona, and to the Monaſterie of Leyre, the towne and Caſtell of Eſtella, to enioy the moytie thereof, with all the rights, profites, and comF modities. To the Monaſteries of Saint Mary of Nagera, and of Saint Æmilian of Cogolla, he gaue the towne of Nagera and Tubie with the caſtels. To the Monaſterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos, hee gaue the Towne of Sangueſſa, together with the caſtell, and the two boroughs, the old and new. To that of Saint Saluadour of Ogna, the towne and territorie of Villorado. To the Monaſteries of Iean de la Pegna, and of Saint Peter of Ceresa, and to the Cathedrall churches of Saint Iames in Galicia, and of Saint Sauiour of Ouiedo, he gaue many Legacies of great conſequence, but the moſt important was, that which he gaue to the religious of the holy Sepulcher, and to the knights of the Temple, and the hoſpitaliers of Ieruſalem, of both his Realmes of Nauarre, and Arragon, and whatſoeuer elſe he ſhould conquer from the Moores, ordaining in particular, that his armes and horſe ſhould be ſent to the Knights of the Temple. A

A prodigious clauſe in D. Alphonſos teſtament.

The King gaue all theſe prodigious Legacies, vpon a wonderfull ſuperſtition, together with a hatred which he bare to them of his bloud, finding himſelfe old, and without any heires of his bodie: but there were but few put in execution, beeing ſo preiudiciall to the Chriſtians eſtate in Spaine, and would haue beene the ſeed of diuiſion and wars betwixt the Princes: yet his teſtament was made with all ſolemnities, and fortified with the paines and threates which were in vſe in that age. Beeing returned into his countries, he ordained a ſeueral court or iuriſdiction for the Inhabitants of Calatajub, granting them many priuiledges and immunities, and ordaining that the reuenues of the Clergie ſhould be hereditarie, to the end that the inhabitants, and ſuch as were borne there, might onely enioy them, as in our time in Caſtile, thoſe do which are of the Biſhoprickes of Calaorra, Calçada, Bourgos, and Plaiſance, and in many places of the Biſhopricke of Pampelone. B

An. 1133. Aſſembly at Sarragoſſa.

In the beginning of the yeare 1133. this King and Emperour of Spaine, called an aſſembly of the Biſhops and Noblemen of his country at Sarragoſſa, to reſolue vpon the warre againſt the Moores. Among thoſe which were there preſent, they name the infant D. Garcia Ramires, Lord of Monçon, the right heire of Nauarre: Rotron Earle of Perche, Lord of Tudele, D. Sancho de Roſes, biſhop of Pampelone, another D. Sancho Biſhop of Calaorra, D. Garcia Guerra Biſhop of Sarragoſſa, D. Michel of Tarraſſone, and D. Arnould of Hueſca, with many other great perſonages, both Clergie and Secular. There they concluded to make warre againſt the Infidels, enemies to the Chriſtians, vſurpers of the countrie of Spaine; and withall, order was giuen for all things neceſſarie for ſo great an enterpriſe: leuies of ſouldiers were made, and Commiſſaries ſent out for victuals, carriages, boates and other things neceſſarie for the conduct of munition, victuals, inſtruments and engines of batterie, with great prouiſion of arms, and all that was needfull for ſo great an army. C Expedition againſt the Moores vnfortunate.

The King D. Alphonſo the warriour hauing reſolued to root out the Moores, hee began on this ſide Ebro to aſſayle them of Lerida and Fraga, from whome hee tooke the towne of Mequinença by compoſition, being at that time exceeding ſtrong, and valiantly defended by the Moores: from thence he came before Fraga, a towne well fortified, and ſtrong by nature, ſeated vpon the riuer of Cinca, the which he began to preſſe about Auguſt, and there made a long and fruitleſſe ſtay: ſo as winter approching, hee was forced to raiſe his ſeege, hauing an intent to returne in the Spring: the which hee did in Februarie, 1134. If the place were ſtrong before, the Moores had ſo fortified it during the winter, as they had made it impregnable: when as they retired, the beſeeged taking courage, as wel by the retreat of the Chriſtians, as by ſome ſuccors which they had from about Lerida, they went to field, and charged the rereward of the Nauarrois army, whom they forced to turne head, and to fight with all his forces. There was the king D. Alphonſo vanquiſhed, the which was ſtrange, and of hard digeſtion to him, who hauing beene accuſtomed to beate his enemies, euer ſince he commaunded an armie. Wherefore he retired wonderfully perplexed, hauing loſt that day many Chriſtians, and among others many valiant Knights, and great perſonages of his Realmes of Nauarre and Arragon.

Alphonſo king of Nauarre vanquiſhed by the Moores.

The Moores growne proud with this victorie, and that they had chaſed the king out of their limits, entred into his countrie, putting all to fire and ſword, which they could not carrie away with them, and came as farre as Monçon: wherewith the king being incenſed, he thruſt himſelfe into a calamitie vnworthie of ſo great and wiſe a Captaine as he had alwaies ſhewed himſelfe. Bnt we ſtriue in vaine againſt the will of heauen, and worldly man doth in vaine call backe good fortune, which hath once turned her face from

A from him, for his ſinnes, which hee doth not vouchſafe to acknowledge. His troupes being diſperſed, and euery one retired to his houſe, after this route he called thoſe that were neereſt vnto him, and attending a conuenient number to attend his perſon, hee went in all haſt, beeing old and broken, with foure hundred horſe to purſue theſe Moores, who carried away a great prey, and an infinit number of Chriſtians priſoners, hauing ouertaken them neere vnto their fort of Fraga, hee found his owne error, and would gladly haue retired, but it was to late; for the Moores deſcouering the ſmall number which purſued them, turned head, and hauing ſtretched forth their bands, they enuironed the King and his whole troupe, and put them in a manner all to the ſword, where amongſt the reſt the King was ſlaine. This happened in September, in the B yeere 1134. Such was the end of King D. Alphonſo the warrior, a very worthy and a fortunat Prince, if home-bred calamities, the hatred of his owne bloud, and his ouer great ſuperſtition, had not vndermined and weakned the vigour of his ſpirit, the which was much decaied in his latter daies. They ſay his body was taken vp and buried in the Monaſtery of Ieſus of Nazareth in Montarragon: yet many hold that it was not found, beeing (it may bee) ſcattered in this defeat from his company, and ſo ſwallowed vp in ſome bogge or riuer, or loſt by ſome other accident, as hath happened to other Princes, in the like incounters. The brute was among the common people, that he was eſcaped in the charge, and that ſeeing himſelfe twice vanquiſhed, wherevnto he had not beene accuſtomed, he was ſo greeued as he durſt not ſhew himſelfe to his ſub-
C iects any more, but went to Ieruſalem, from whence he neuer returned. He had raigned about thirty yeeres. At his deceaſe, the Eſtates of Nauarre and Arragon were much perplexed, both for that their King had left no heire of his body, as alſo for the deſperate will which he had made. Theſe difficulties were augmented by the factions of the Nobility, who could not agree vpon the election of a new King.

Deſeat and death of King D. Alphonſo the warrior.

9. Whileſt they contended among themſelues, D. Alphonſo Raymond King of Caſtille, being aduertiſed of the deceaſe of his father in law, by the aduice and perſwaſion of his councell, hee reuiued his pretenſions to the Eſtates of Nauarre and Arragon, as great grand-child to D. Sancho the great, who was King of Nauarre and Earle of Ar-
D ragon; wherevpon hee ſeized vpon the Lands of the riuer of Oija, of Villorodo, Granon, Nagera, Logrogno, Arnedó, Biguerra, and many other places vnto Calaorra, which were thence cut off from the body of Nauarre: ſo as the iuriſdiction of that Kingdome was then lymited towards Caſtille, by the riuer of Ebro. D. Alphonſo continuing his conqueſts, whileſt that no man made head againſt him, hauing attempted the towne of Victoria in vaine, he ouer-runne the country of Alaua, and tooke the towne of Maragnon and other forts: ſtriking ſuch a terror into the Nauarrois and Arragonois, as if they had not feared to looſe their exemptions and preuiledges, and to bee ill intreated by King D. Alphonſo, they would haue willingly yeelded all vnto him.

Vſurpation of ſome places in Nauarre by by the King of Caſtille.

Amongſt the chiefe which did councell and accompany the King in this ſpoile, were E the Biſhops, D. Bernard of Siguença, D. Sancho of Nagera, & D. Bertrand of Oſma; and of Noblemen D. Lope, and D. Sancho Diaz, D. Garcia Fortuniones, D. Roderigo Gonçales, the Earles D. Pedro Lopes, D. Gomes Nugnes, D. Guttiere Peres de Lorca, Diego Nugnes, Garcia Garces, Almerigo ſtandard bearer to the King, D. Lopes Lord Steward of the Kings houſe, Melendo Boſino, Ordogno Peres, Rodrigo Gonçales of Olea, Guttiere Fernandes, Rodrigo Fernandes, and Rodrigo Nugnes de Guſman. King D. Alphonſo ſpoyling all along the riuer of Oija, beeing admoniſhed not to forget to make expiation for his exceſſe, he gaue many goodly things to the Monaſtery of Saint Emilian, the which are found written and receiued by Berenger Arch-deacon of Toledo. Beeing afterwards entred in Arragon, hee committed the like ſpoiles as in Nauarre. The Nauarrois and Arragonois ſeeing themſelues preſt by the King of Caſtille, they made haſt to preuent
F theſe miſchieſes, wherevnto they were ſubiect for want of a head: wherefore beeing aſſembled at a place called Borja, a towne belonging to D. Pedro de Atares, a knight of the bloud royall, who ſome thinke was ſonne to D. Garcia, the ſonne of D. Sancho, Baſtard to D. Ramir firſt King of Arragon, and of D. Thereſa Caxal his wife, a great number number of them were of aduice, that they ſhould chooſe him for King of Nauarre and A Arragon, for that they had obſerued in him many royall qualities, and did know that the deceaſed King had much eſteemed him, and had giuen him that towne in reward of his ſeruices, with many other guifts. Notwithſtanding this perſonage (otherwiſe endowed with great vertues) was graue and exceeding ſeuere; which made him to bee the leſſe beloued by the Nobility of Nauarre: of whom ſome held themſelues wronged in their particular, for that offring ſome-times to viſit him, they haue refuſed them

tance, but they vnderſtood afterwards that the great affaires which had made D. Pedro

ouer-weening and his vnſeaſonable grauitie, did him then harme, ſo as hee was not B that the chiefe vertues, requiſite in Kings, wanted in D. Pedro which were clemency and affability, in ſteed of which hee was full of Arrogancy and inſupportable preſumption.

" By their perſwaſions, the Noblemen and men of State aſſembled at Borja, inclined effected with more order, and leſſe difficulty, they reſolued to change the place of their aſſembly, and goe to Monçon. D

D. Garcia Ramires the ſeuenth of that name and the ninteenth King of Nauarre.

10. IN this diſlodging, the Nauarrois grew to bee of an other opinion, conſidering that D. Ramir hauing beene bread vp amongſt Monkes, for the ſpace of forty naſticke and ſollitary life, then to gouerne a Kingdome, beſides they grew iealous, that the Arragonois chooſing a King of the bloud royall of Arragon, they would by this meanes aſpire to the chiefe places of fauour and honour in Court: wherefore theſe things being propounded in priuate aſſemblies, by D. Sancho de Roſas, Biſhop of Pampelone, Ladron de Gueuara, ſonne to Ygnes; chiefe of the houſe of Gueuara in Alaua, William Aznares of Oteyça, Fortunion Ynigues of Leete, Ximen Aznares of Torres and others, it was concluded, that in ſteed of going to the generall aſſembly at Monçon, the Eſtates of Nauarre ſhould aſſemble at Pampelone, the which hauing performed with great diligence, they did chooſe D. Garcia Ramires, Lord of Monçon for King of Nauarre, who was ſonne to the infant D Ramir grandchild to D. Sancho Garcia, & great grand-child, to D. Garcia the 6. who was ſon vnto the F king D. Sancho the great. D. Garcia was at Monçon at the time of this election, with the Arragonois, aſſiſting at their aſſembly, for the election of a future King, hauing no thought to aſpire to that degree, when as Willi. Aznares of Oteyça, & Ximen Aznares of Torres,

A Torres, beeing ſent by the aſſembly of Pampelone, came to aduertiſe him of that which had paſt, and led him ſecretly away to Pampelone. So D. Garcia Ramires was eſtabliſhed King of Nauarre, in October, 1134. being about forty yeeres old.

D. Ramir the ſecond of that name, and fifth King of Arragon.

B 11. VVHen as the Arragonois vnderſtood that there was a King in Nauarre, they ſodainely made choiſe of D. Frere Ramir for their King, who had beene Monke at Tomires, appointed to bee Biſhop of Roda and Barbaſtro, hauing beene before of Bourgos and Pampelone, and in like manner had beene choſen Abbot of Sahagun in Caſtille, and was a prieſt, as D. Rodrigo Ximenes the Archbiſhop doth write. To his election was added a diſpenſation from Pope Ancletus, then raigning. By this meanes the Realmes of Nauarre and Arragon, which had beene vnited eight and fifty yeeres, ſince the King D. Sancho Ramires, were ſeperated in theſe two Kings. Arragon.

D. Frere Ramir, the new King of Arragon, had need of a more quiet eſtate, in reſpect of his breeding vp in Saint Benets order, for thinking to raigne in Arragon, hee found C a rough aduerſary in D. Alphonſo Raymond King of Caſtille, wherefore hee retired himſelfe into the mountaines of Sobrarbre, hauing neither force nor courage to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him: ſo as to ſettle and to aſſure himſelfe, he was forced to vſe milder meanes then armes, and come to prayers and intreaties, imploying mediators which were fit to treat, and pleaſing to his enemy. Amongſt others which labored to make a peace betwixt theſe two Princes, were, D. Oldegaire Archbiſhop of Tarragone; but both he and the reſt loſt their labours, for the King of Caſtille beeing come neere vnto Sarragoſſa, the chiefe city of that Eſtate, hee was receiued, and commanded there as King, hauing in his company D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelone, his wiues brother, and Roger Earle of Foix who had married the other ſiſter of Queene D. Berenguela, D. Alphonſo Iordain Earle of Tolouſe, Armingol Earle of Vrgel, Myr Earle of Pallars, Berenger Arch deacon of Toledo, and many other Knights of Caſtille, Arragon, Cattelogne, yea and of France. Saragoſſa ſeized on by the king of Caſtille.

Hauing with this company diſpoſed of the affaires of Arragon, he returned to Leon, whereas he made an aſſembly of Prelats, and other chiefe men of his Eſtates, whereas hee cauſed himſelfe to bee crowned Emperor of Spaine in the Cathedral church, with the ſolemnities and ceremonies requiſit in ſo great an act, receiuing the holy vnction and the crowne from D. Raymond, Archbiſhop of Toledo, which title was afterwards confirmed (as ſome Spaniards write) by Pope Innocent the ſecond, although that the E Kings his Predeceſſors (who had vſurped the like title, for that they were ſoueraigne Lords in their countries, without acknowledging any other ſecular power) had not affected the like confirmation. Some ſay this coronation was at Toledo: it may bee it was a reiteration of that pompe and ceremony in Caſtille and the territory of Toledo, which were diſtinct Kingdomes, and different from that of Leon, or it may bee a ſecond coronation, as the cuſtome is in the Empire of Germany. Caſtille. Alphonſo Raymond King of Caſtille crowned Emperor of Spaine.

They adde moreouer that the name of Imperiall was confirmed to that city, by King D. Alphonſo the eight, and armes giuen it, the which it carries at this day, which are, an Emperor in a roab of gold, ſitting in a throne, holding a globe in his left hand, and in his right a ſword. In this pompe the church of Toledo had by guiſt from the Emperor D. Alphonſo, the towne of Alcala the old, in the yeere 1135. It was a fort built by F the Moores, and ruined in the former warres: wherefore they hold that D. Raymond the Archbiſhop did afterwards build the towne of Alcala de Henares, whereas it is at this day, and whereas in old time the towne of Complutum ſtood. Toledo the Imperial towne. An. 1135.

mongſt his children, making them Kings, being ill aduiſed by bad councel: to D. Sancho the eldeſt he gaue Caſtille and Toledo; and to D. Fernand Leon and Galicia. To D. Sancho hee extended the ancient lymits of Caſtille towards Leon, vnto the towne of Sahagun, by Moral de la Roine, Tordehumes Vregna and Cauillas. To the ſecond he aſigned the Lands of Leon and Galicia, with that part of the Aſturies, which lies from the riuer of Oua vnto Galicia. A

Theſe ſeeds of warre and diſcord, were laied by the bad councel of the Earles D. Almeric de Lara, otherwiſe called Manriques, ſonne to D. Pedro de Lara, and D. Fernand of Tranſtamara, great Noblemen, who thought to maintaine the greatneſſe and reputation of their houſes the better, by theſe partages, and from the troubles which might enſue, then if there were but one Monarke in Spaine, an ordinary practiſe in great Chriſtian Eſtates: this done D. Alphonſo returned into Arragon. B

Nauarre.

D. Garcia Ramires King of Nauarre, ſeeing the ſucceſſe of the King of Caſtille, in the countries of Nauarre and Arragon, doubting hee ſhould not be able to reſiſt the great power of this new Emperor D. Alphonſo, eſpecially if hee made himſelfe maiſter of D. Ramirs Kingdome, as hee was very likely, hee reſolued to purchaſe a peace and his friendſhip, by ſome ſubmiſſion vnto him for his realme of Nauarre. D. Alphonſo then being returned into Arragon, after the ceremonies of his coronation, theſe two Princes had an enterview at Pradilla, with great ſhewes of loue, where their accord and league was confirmed.

Nauarre vaſſalto Caſtille.

Arragon.

King D. Ramir, who could not obtaine his realme of Arragon, pretended to recouer that of Nauarre from D. Garcia Ramires, ſaying, that it belonged vnto him, as beeing brother, and lawfull ſucceſſor to the deceaſed King D. Alphonſo the warrior; notwithſtanding that D. Garcia had more intereſt then hee, or his Predeceſſors Kings of Arragon, being ſonne to the Infant D. Ramir Sanches, and grand-child to the King D Sancho Garcia, ſlaine by his brother D. Raymond through deſire of raigne, after which Parricide, the Nauarrois called in D. Sancho of Arragon, father to the Kings D. Pedro, D. Alphonſo, and of this Monke, to raigne ouer them, by reaſon of the minority of the children of their deceaſed King, and with the forces of Arragon to repulſe the murtherer D. Raymond, and his faction: and to keepe him from raigning in Nauarre: yea D. Garcia Ramires had a better title to Arragon, then D. Alphonſo Raymond King of Caſtille, for that he was deſcended from the King D. Garcia Sanches, the eldeſt ſonne of D. Sancho the great, but where force raignes, right muſt giue place. Notwithſtanding all theſe reaſons, D. Frere Ramir would make warre in Nauarre, and being in armes, hee forced D. Garcia to arme alſo, who to auoide the danger which did threaten him, if D. Ramir ſhould make an agreement with the King of Caſtille, hee made haſt to doe the homage, whereof wee haue ſpoken, but it continued not long: for ſoone after the Kingdome of Nauarre recouered the ancient and hereditary ſoueraignty. D Ramir, who kept at Monclus in the mountaines of Sobrarbe, ſtaied not long to ſubmit himſelfe alſo to the King of Caſtille, and to doe him homage for his realme of Arragon: wherefore D. Alphonſo reſtored him all his lands exeept Sarragoſſa, and ſome other places, which he kept, to make vſe of them againſt the Moores. C D E

VVar betwixt Nauarre and Arragon.

In the meane time there were cruell warres vpon the fronters of Nauarre and Arragon: but the Prelats deſirous to ſee this warre ended, laboured to reconcile the two Kings. D. Sancho de Roſas, biſhop of Pampelone, an Arragonois borne, delt ſo in this treaty of peace, as hee gaue the King D. Garcia occaſion to ſuſpect him to be falſe vnto him, for the which he chaſed him out of his countries, whereupon he was taxed of two great ſeuerity; and for that he had banded himſelfe againſt a prelat, he was in a manner compared to D. Pedro d' Athares, who by reaſon of his ſterne and ſower diſpoſition, had beene reiected from the royall dignity, ſo dangerous it was to touch theſe ſacred perſons, were they good or bad. F

The Prelats who had vndertaken to make this appointment, neuer ceaſed vntil they had brought it vnto theſe termes, that they ſhould chooſe ſixe knights: three of either realme, by whoſe iudgement all quarrels ſhould bee ended: for Nauarre were choſen Ladron de Gueuara, William Aznares of Oteyça, and Ximen Aznares of Torres. for

A Arragon they did chooſe D.Pedro d' Athares, D.Caxal, and D.Ferris of Hueſca. Theſe ſix being aſſembled at Vadoluengo; after many counſels and conferences, in the end they concluded that either party ſhould lay downe armes, and the two Kings ſhould continue good friends; and for an order betwixt them, they aſſigned vnto D. Garcia Ramires, the ſuperiority ouer the Nobility, who ſhould haue the conduct of armies as Generall of both realmes: and that D. Ramir ſhould haue commandment ouer the reſt of the people, and adminiſter iuſtice, the which ſhould take place in regard of their perſons onely, and during their liues: with which ſentence the Kings were not well contented. Yet D. Ramir beeing willing to ſatisfie D. Garcia, came to Pampelone, where hee was receiued with great honour procuring at his firſt comming the reſtitu-
B tion of D. Sancho the Biſhop, whom hee reſtored into fauour with the King D. Garcia. There they conſulted for the ſetting downe of certaine and apparent lymits, betwixt the two realmes of Nauarre and Arragon. The ſeperation was drawne by a direct line, from Saint Encratia, to Biosal, the valley of Roncall remayning to Arragon. Then paſſing the riuer of Sarazas, vnto the place whereas it falls into that of Yda, and to Pont Saint Martin, and from thence to the place whereas as Yda falls into the riuer of Arragon, and that of Arragon into Arga, and that of Arga into Ebro, and along Ebro, into Tudele.

Treaty of peace betwixt Nauarre and Arragon.

Ancient lymits betwixt Nauarre and Arragon.

This diuiſion beeing made, it ſeemed there ſhould not remaine any cauſe of hatred betwixt theſe two Kings, and that D. Garcia Ramires, ſhould reuerence D. Ramir, as
C his father; and D. Ramir imbrace D. Garcia as his ſonne, to whom moreouer hee granted, during his life, out of his portion, Valtierra. Quadrita, and that which lies betwixt Roncal, and Biſoal, the which he ſhould hold in fee of the crowne of Arragon, to bee reunited againe after his death. Yet D. Garcia was not ſatisfied with this accord; perſwading himſelfe ſtill, that D. Ramir ought not to raigne in Arragon, for that hee had beene a profeſſed Monke, and had taken all orders: ſo as vpon the purſute which he made to bee freed from the homage which hee had done vnto D. Ramir, for thoſe places aboue mentioned, he attempted to ſtay him in Pampelone, giuing the charge thereof to ſome of his followers, but they could not put it in execution; for the King of Arragon was aduertiſed by a Knight, called Ynigo d' Ayuar, ſo as hauing conferred D with D. Pedro d' Athares, and other knights of Arragon, he went out of the towne vnknowne, with foure more with him, poſting away with all ſpeed vntill he came to Saint Sauiour of Leyre, where hee ſtaied three daies for his traine, who came vnto him, according to his directions, and from thence he retired in ſafety to Hueſca. So it happened to the King D. Sancho Ramires, as to his great Grand father. D. Garcia Sanches, when as he would haue taken King Fernand the firſt King of Caſtille, his yonger brother, priſoner, in the towne of Nagera.

Nauarre.

Fraude of the King of Nauarre ill executed.

Herevpon D. Ramir began to leauy men for the future warre of Nauarre, whereof the King D. Garcia was aſſured, and therefore hee made many prouiſions for his defence and ſafety: the beſt and moſt worthy to bee imitated, was, that hee made
E choiſe of twelue of the chiefeſt families of his country, whom hee bound vnto him by honours and preferments, making them as it were heads of all the reſt of the Nobility and gentry of Nauarre. Which were the houſes of Gueuara, Almorauit, Baçtan, Aybar, Leet, Subica, Rada, Bidaurre, Montagut, Vrox, Caſcant and Mauleon.

Orders for the Nobility of Nauarre.

He made one Commander ouer theſe noble houſes, which ſhould bee reſpected of them next to the Kings perſon: this was D. Ladron of Gueuara to whom he gaue the title of Earle, and was the firſt which called himſelfe Earle of Nauarre: this he did, for that there were ſome gentlemen of his country beganne to abandon him, to follow the partie of Arragon, retyring to D. Ramir, who entertained them, and aſſigned them lands in Arragon. Of which number was D. Caxal, a man of great quality in thoſe daies, hauing lands in both realmes, ſo as hee quit them in Na-
F uarre to ſerue the King of Arragon, but as hee carried himſelfe verie paſſionately in theſe quarrells, hee fell ſoone after into a great daunger; for beeing ſent by D. Ramir, to the Emperour D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, to confirme a peace with him, that hee might with more liberty attend the affaires of Nauarre, as hee

paſt vnaduiſedly neere vnto the lands of D. Garcia, beeing aduertiſed thereof, he cauſed him to be taken, at a place called Cares, a little Bourg, the which is now become a towne, named Pont de la Roine, vpon the riuer of Arga, about the which growes the beſt wine of all the countrie of Nauarre. D. Caxal was put in a ſtreight priſon, where he continued long: but the Abbot of Saint Saluador of Leyre, who was his kinſman and friend, gaue vnto the king all the Iewels and treaſure of his Abbey to redeeme him: wherefore after his deliuerie he ſhewed himſelfe very thankeful to this Monaſterie, and gaue vnto it all the lands he had in Tudele. A

Arragon. All matters betwixt the Kings of Caſtile and Arragon were reconciled, and there was an interview of theſe two Princes at Alagon, whereas D. Ramir did acknowledge to hold his Realme in fee, and did homage to D. Alphonſo, which ſubmiſſion continued ſome yeares. Such was the dexteritie of the King of Caſtile, hauing reduced theſe two Kings vnder his Soueraignetie, and as it were feudataries of his Empire, that although they had a great deſire to inuade one another, yet he kept them from all open hoſtility, as well by his authoritie, as by other meanes: ſometimes reſtrayning them by promiſes, ſometimes by threates, preſuming, that if they continued in that eſtate, he ſhould haue them more at his commandement, then if one increaſing with the ruine of another, he would grow ſo great, as he might rebell, and deny him the homage which hee had ſworne. B

Dexterity of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille.

King D. Ramir preſently after he had left the Monaſterie, married (with a diſpenſation from the Pope, for that he had ſung Maſſe) to a French Ladie, called D. Ignes or Agnes, daughter to William Earle of Poictiers, and Duke of Guienne, who dyed in the yeare 1136. going in pilgrimage to Saint Iames, for elſe his ſiſter, as ſome hold, by whom he had the Infanta D. Petronilla, who was afterwards married to the Earle of Barcelone: he did not long enioy his wife, after whoſe death, deſiring to quit the affaires of the world, he ſent his onely daughter to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtile, to be bred vp in his Court with the Queene D. Berenguela: notwithſtanding that the Noblemen of Arragon, brought her backe againe, ſaying, that ſhee did not find her ſelfe well in Caſtile. C

Arragon and Catelogne vnited by marriage. About that time there was a knight retired into Arragon, called D. William Raymond of Moncada, Seneſhal of Cattelogne, who had fled, for certaine outrages which he had committed. By him there was a treaty of marriage begun, betwixt the Infanta D. Petronilla, heire of Artagon, and D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelone his Lord, the which was afterwards accompliſhed, and in recompence of ſo great a ſeruice, the Seneſhall obtained his pardon, and his dignity, which was to bee chiefe and captaine of the horſemen. It is not certaine when this marriage was effected, but it is probable, that it was neere the end of King D. Ramir, for that the Infanta Petronille, was onely two or three yeeres old, when as the King left the gouernment of the Realme, to returne to his religious order, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1137. three yeeres after his election and promotion to the crowne, at which time the authors write that this marriage was concluded by words, De futuro: the conditions amongſt others, were. That the Earle ſhould not take vpon him the title of King, but ſhould onely call himſelfe Prince of Arragon, and Earle of Barcelone, but that the children which ſhould deſcend of this marriage, ſhould bee called Kings of Arragon. That the Earle ſhould carry in chiefe, the firſt and moſt ancient armes of Arragon, which was a croſſe argent in a field azure, in all actions of warre, but hee might carry thoſe of Barcelone in his ſhield and enſignes, hauing foure bends gueules, or a field or: yet the enſigne bearers ſhould bee of Arragon; that the Arragonois ſhould take the deuiſe of Saint George. D

An. 1137.

Conditions of the treaty. E

This treaty beeing made and concluded in Barbaſtro, by the King, beeing aſſiſted by the Noblemen of Arragon, and the Earle of Barcelone, hee was receiued in quality of Regent of the Realme of Arragon, with the which Cattelogne remained vnited a hundred and three yeeres, after that Arragon was made a realme, and two hundred fifty and three yeeres after that there had beene hereditary Earles in Cattelogne. This done, King D. Ramir giuing ouer all adminiſtration and gouernment, as in a royall F

Eſtate

A eſtate and habit, hee had alwaies carried a Monkes heart, hee retired into a Monaſtery which hee had built, in the Pariſh of Saint Peter the olde at Hueſca, there to ſpend the remainder of his daies religiouſly, with the Chaplins.

Cruelty of the King D. Ramir.

This Prince is taxed of cowardiſe and great cruelty, being tranſported with continual iealouſies, his deeds doe witneſſe it, for that by the councel of the Abbot of Saint Ponce of Tomeres in Languedoc, he cut off the heads of Lope Ferencio, Rodrigo Ximenes, Pedro Martines, and Fernand Gomes, all of the houſe of Lara: Federic Liſane, Pedro Verga, Gyles Atroſil, Pedro Carnel, Garzia Pigna, Raymond de Foſſes, Pedro Lueſia, Michel Azlario and Sancho Fontana, all noble men of great houſes, onely vpon a conceit that hee was contemned by them. This execution was done at Hueſca. They

B hold that this yeere 1137. the towne of Lerida, held by the Moores, was attempted, but not taken, by the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, who ſeeing himſelfe aduanced in dignity, greatneſſe and forces, beeing Prince of Arragon and Earle of Barcelone, would alſo inlarge his eſtates, and ioyne vnto it the realme of Nauarre, reuiuing the pretended title of his father in law D. Frere Ramir, for the effecting whereof hee had many treaties with the Emperour D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, whom hee found alwaies fauourable, by the mediation of the Queene D. Berenguela his ſiſter, ſo as beeing prouoked by the Earle, and no leſſe by his owne ambition, hee led an army againſt D. Sancho Ramires, whom hee found well attended to make head againſt him betwixt Cortes and Gallur, where it pleaſed God to ſtay theſe armies from fighting, by the meanes of ſome good

C men, who did mediate ſome kinde of accord for that time.

League betwixt the King of Caſtille and Prince of Aragon againſt the King of Nauarre.

Notwithſtanding Count Raymond (deſirous to imbarke the Emperour D. Alphonſo, his brother in law in this warre) came vnto him to Carrion, where hee renewed the oth of fealty, doing him homage for the country of Arragon; where he did inſinuate ſo well into his fauour, as hee got out of his hands the townes of Sarragoſſe, Taraſſone, Calatajub and Daroca, which were held by the Caſtillans. Afterwards D. Raymond Berenger returned againe to D. Alphonſos court at Carrion, whereas the conditions and Articles were concluded and ſet downe, concerning the warre which they ſhould make in common, againſt D. Garcia King of Nauarre.

D Amongſt the which they diuided the Beares skinne before hee was taken, agreeing, that of all the country of Nauarre which they ſhould conquer, the Emperour D. Alphonſo ſhould haue a third part, and the other two ſhould belong vnto D. Raymond, Prince of Arragon, vpon condition to hold them in fee of the realme of Caſtille. At this treaty there were preſent the Biſhops D. Berenger of Salamanca, and D. Pedro of Burgos, with other Noblemen both Clergy and Secular. From Carrion they went to Soria, where after they had held a councell of prophane things, they had a great care of religion, that is to ſay, of the temporall reuenues of the Church, wherefore the King and Queene did giue vnto the Monaſtery of Saint Mary of Valbanera, a houſe in Canegoſa, with certaine immunities, to the end that if

E any thing were attempted vniuſtly, to the ruine of an other, this ſinne might by that meanes be purged.

Nauarre.

The army of Caſtille beeing ready to march, the Emperour D. Alphonſo paſt vnto the frontier of Nauarre, by the riuer of Ebro, marching along the which, hee came to Calaorra, where hee was met by D. Sancho Biſhop of Calaorra, D. Stephen Prior of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, D. Michel Biſhop of Taraſſone, with the Earle D. Ladron of Gueuara, and others, who imployed themſelues happely to appeaſe the ambition of this Prince, and to conuert the warre into a good peace, the which was concluded by an enterview of the two Kings of Caſtille and Nauarre, betwixt Calaorra and Alfaro: to confirme the which, there was a marriage concluded betwixt the Infant D. Sancho, the eldeſt ſonne of Caſtille, and D. Blanche, daugh-

Arragon and Cattelogne or Barcelone.

14. This was a ſecond croſſe to the deſignes of the new Prince of Arragon, who was at the ſame time in quarrel with the knights of the Temple, and the Hoſpitaliers of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, which pretended the ſucceſſion of the realme of Arragon, by vertue of the Teſtament of the deceaſed King D. Alphonſo the Warrior, by the which they were made heires. Raymond Maiſter of the hoſpitaliers was come into Spaine to that end, who ſeeing it very difficult to challendge their right by armes, and that to purſue it by Iuſtice, beſides the tediouſneſſe, the euent would be vncertaine, and the execution very hard, hee ſought to make an accord, and compounded with D. Raymond Berenger, quitting vnto him that part which did belong vnto the Hoſpital, vpon condition, that if he died without children lawfully begotten, it ſhould returne to the ſame religion. A B

Beſides hee receiued many benifices and charitable guifts for the ſayd religion, in thoſe places which the Earle did then enioy, with promiſe of a large portion of all which hee ſhould conquer from the Moores. According to this accord the Templers ſurceaſed their action: ſo as after that time thoſe two Orders got great reuenues in Arragon, Cattelogne, and Valencia. In the tranſaction which was made betwixt D. Raymond Berenger and the Templers, for the Prince there aſſiſted, the Biſhops of Saragoſſe, and Hueſca, with the Archbiſhop of Tarragone: and moreouer Arnauld Earle of Pallars, Bernard of Comminges, Peter of Bigorre, and other Noblemen and knights of Arragon, Cattelogne and others: and for the Templers, Euerard Oſtan of Saint Ordogno, Hugo Borrato Pedro Anticho and Bernard Reginol. This accord was confirmed by Pope Adrian the fourth. C

Nauarre.

D. Garcia Ramires King of Nauarre, beeing (by meanes of a peace made with D. Alphonſo Emperor of Spaine) freed from a great danger, he ſtood very carefully vpon his gard, in reſpect of D. Raymond Berenger, who preſt him towards Arragon, finding himſelfe ſtrong ynough to reſiſt him: for notwithſtanding that the Earle was a wiſe and valiant knight, yet the King D. Garcia was nothing inferiour vnto him in vertue, greatneſſe of courrage, knowledge and diſcipline in warre, and was alſo well aſſiſted with good and wiſe Knights, amongſt the which hee was faithfully ſerued by D. Sancho de Roſas Biſhop of Pampelone, newly reconciled, the Earle D. Ladron of Gueuara Lord in Ayauar, William Aznares Lord in Sangueſſe, Ximen Aznares, Lord in Tafalle, Ramir Garcia, Lord in the towne of Saint Mary of Vxue, Martin de Leet, Lord of Gallipiençó, & Peralta, Peter Tizon, Lord in Cadreyta, Rodrigo of Açagra, Lord in Eſtella, Roderigo Abarco, Lord in Funes and Valtiera, Iean Dia, Lord in Caſcant, Ramir Sanches, Lord in Maragnon (they were Gouernors or Captaines in theſe places) & many others, as well of his owne country, as of France. Hee kept in fronter places well manded, like a prouident Prince, as the fort of Tudele, which came vnto him by marriage, as we will ſhew, Bureta and Sos. D

Hee had put a valiant captaine into the fort of Malon, called Gerard the Diuell, into that of Freſcano an other captaine, a ſtranger, called Robert of Matalon, and ſo in the reſt which frontered vpon Arragon. Moreouer hee had practiſed a league with France, firſt with Lewis the ſixth, ſurnamed the Groſſe and then with Lewis the ſeuenth, called the young, who aſſiſted him with their forces, and fortified his army, when as the Emperour D. Alphonſo preſented himſelfe firſt betwixt Cortes and Galur, and then in the ſecond expedition of Calaorra, where the peace was concluded and confirmed by the marriage of D. Sancho Infant of Caſtille, with D. Blanche, Infanta of Nauarre, whom the King D. Garcia had had by D. Marguerite his wife, daughter to Rotron Earle of Perche, who had brought vnto him the towne of Tudele for her dourie, the which Count Rotron had obtained from King D. Alphonſo the warrior, for his valour and good deſerts. The King D. Garcia Ramires had many other children by this Ladie: D. Sancho who was King after him, D. Alphonſo Ramires, Lord of Caſtro Vieijo, D. Marguerite, who was Queene of Naples and Sicile, married to William, ſonne to Roger, father and mother to an other William, King of Naples and Sicile. Queene Marguerite dyed about the yeere 1141. after which the King D. Garcia married againe with D. Vrraca, baſtard daughter to the Emperor D. Alphonſo, which he had by a gentle- E F

Genealogy of Nauarre.

A gentlewoman, called D. Gontrude, ſiſter to one Diego Abregon, or Apricio. The King had one daughter by this ſecond wife, called D. Sancha, who was married firſt to Gaſton Earle of Bearne, and afterwards to D. Pedro de Molina, from whom iſſued D. Almerigo, or Manrique, who was vicont of Narbonne, by ſucceſſion from D. Ormeſind, his grand-mother by the fathers ſide: ſome ſay, that the ſecond wife of there King D. Garcia, was not D. Vrraca, baſtard daughter to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, but the daughter of D. Lope Dias de Haro, Lord of Biſcay the third of that name, and the firſt which intitled himſelfe de Haro, the which was called D. Geiffrey, who ſiſter D. Vrraca Lopes, was wife to D. Fernand King of Leon, the ſecond of that name, ſonne to the Emperour D. Alphonſo then raigning. Theſe two Ladies had alſo one brother, called D. B Diego Lopes de Haro, ſurnamed the good, who was a braue a valiant Knight. Yet the firſt opinion taken out of D. Rodrigo Ximenes, Archbiſhop of Toledo, a Nauarrois, is more approoued by the Spaniards, touching the marriages of the King D. Garcia. Family of Haro Lords of Biſcay.

There is mention made in the Hiſtories of Spaine, of a Lady of this houſe of Biſcay, called D. Maria Lopes, verie deuout and bountifull to the Clergy, who gaue Saint Michel de Barbadilla, Saint Mary de Lor, Saint Mary a Eſtiualis, Aperreguri and Magnariette, with other lands which are in the Prouince of Alaua, where ſhe dwelt, to the Monaſterie of Nagera. The deuotion of Princes and Noblemen in thoſe daies was great, ſtriuing who ſhould giue moſt vnto the Church, beeing inſtructed by the Cler- C gie, that the onely meanes to redeeme their ſoules from eternall damnation, was to doe good to religious men, who praied to God for them, whileſt they abandoned themſelues to all voluptuoſneſſe, and pleaſures in their ſecular eſtates, ſpoyling oftentimes their neighbours, or ſubiects of their patrimonies to inrich (that is to ſay, to ruine) the Church, making Biſhops, Abbots, Prieſts and Monkes partakers of their rapines and ſpoiles. Donations vnto churches.

During the troubles of Caſtille, Arragon and Nauarre, there grew great contenti- Caſtille. on betwixt D. Simeon Biſhop of Burgos, and D. Sancho de Funes, Biſhop of Calaorra, for the church & ſepulture of Saint Dominike of Calſada, either of them maintayning that it was of his Dioceſe and iuriſdiction. Therein (in my opinion) they did not ſtriue D who ſhould haue the greateſt flock, and feed the beſt for their ſoules health, but they rather ſought their owne reputations, and particular profits, for that the opinion of the holineſſe of this dead man, did euery day increaſe, in which place they built a towne, and moreouer that the Kings then raigning in Spaine were very deuout, and great benefactors; namely the Emperor D. Alphonſo Raymond, and his wife D. Berenguela, who had a little before indowed this church with great poſſeſſions. The cauſe was argued before Iudges appointed by the Emperour, yet named by the two Biſhops which contended: for him of Calaorra there was choſen Pedro de Granon, Arch-deacon of Calaerra, and for the Biſhop of Burgos, the Arch-deacon of Birbieſca, called alſo Peter, a dignity of Burgos; theſe two hauing made diligent inquiry, examined ancient and cre- E dible witneſſes, and viſited the confines of both Dioceſes, they gaue ſentence for the Biſhop of Calaorra, the which in the yeere 1137. many notable perſonages aſſiſting at the Iudgement ſigned. Debate among Biſhops to enlarge their Dioceſes.

In the yeere 1141. the Emperor D. Alphonſo, to incourrage men to people the town An. 1141. which they began to build about the church of Saint Dominike, granted to the Inhabitants thereof, the vſe of the woods, forreſts, mountaines and paſtures thereabouts like vnto the other townes their neighbours, and moreouer the waters which fell from the mount of Fayola, with other commodities, which did helpe to plant this Bourg, which beganne then to bee built, and ſince is growne a good towne, and a Cathedrall church, as we ſee it. The towne was vnder the iuriſdiction of the church, for a time, for ſome occaſions, there was a Court rayoll eſtabliſhed, in the time of Ferdinand the F third, as we will note hereafter.

D. Alphonſo Henriques the firſt King of Portugal.

Portugal.

THe affaires of Portugal during theſe actions aboue mentioned, remaine obſcure, by the error and negligence of authors; for there is no memory found of the deeds of D. Alphonſo Henriques, ſince the conqueſt of Leyra and of Torreſnauas, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1127. vnto the yeere 1139. when as hee paſt the riuer of Tayo, and led an army againſt a King of the Moores, called Iſmar or Iſmael. In this B voyage died D. Egas Nugnes who had beene Gouernor to the Earle in his youth, and his faithfull councellor; hee was interred at the Monaſtery of Sonſa, neere vnto the towne of Porto. Hee had founded, according to the opinion of ſome, the Monaſtery of Saint Martin of Cucuayes, in the country of Saint Mary. Iſmar came out of his country, againſt D. Alphonſo Henriques, beeing accompanied by foure other pettie Kings Moores: the two armies were in view one of an other, in the fields of Obrigue; the Earles was about Caſtroverde, which at that time was called Cabeças de Reys, that is to ſay, heads of Kings: and as the Chriſtians were much inferiour to the Infidels in number, ſo their opinions were diuers, moſt inclyning to a retreat without fighting: but the Earle who was of a Noble courage, and generous reſolution, perſwaded his people with ſuch forcible reaſons, as they reſolued to all hazards, and for C a happie preſage of a future victory, the ſouldiars turning themſelues to God, were moued to ſalute their Earle, with a royal name and title, crying all with one voice, Portugal, Portugal, for the King D Alphonſo Henriques.

Roial title of the houſe of Portugal.

Beeing thus incourraged, and all in good order, they charged the Moores ſquadrons, and made a horrible ſlaughter of them, ſo as hauing put them all to flight, they remained Maiſters of the field; they tooke fiue royal Standards of the Moores, and all their baggage.

Victory of Obrique.

The Portugals celebrate this memorable victory, called of Obrique, vnto this day: the honour whereof is due to them which dwell betwixt Tayo and Duero, and betwixt Duero and Minio, for the Inhabitants beyond Tayo were at that time ſubiect to D the Moores, who held alſo a great part of the country on this ſide. After this battaile D. Alphonſo Henriques tooke vpon him the title of King of Portugal, and left by ſucceſſion to his deſcendants this title obtained by a millitary prerogatiue, before the battaile. Then beganne the armes of that royall houſe, this King taking (in memorie of ſo great a victory which God had giuen him) fiue little ſhields Azure, repreſenting the Standards of thoſe fiue kings which he had vanquiiſhed, in a great ſcutchon argent, placing the ſmall ſcutchions like a croſſe, through deuotion, in ſigne of our Sauiours fiue wounds vpon the croſſe, adding moreouer to euery one of them fiue deniers argent, which make in all 25. the which with the fiue ſcutchons made the number of thirty repreſenting in ſome ſort the thirty pence which Iudas receiued to E betray his Maſter, our Lord and Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt (it is the allegory and ſpirituall interpretation of the armes of Portugal) to the which was ſince added a border gueules charged with caſtles, or, in the time of D. Sancho the ſecond of that name King of Portugal, for ſome cauſes which we will hereafter ſpecefie. After the defeat of theſe fiue Arabian Kings, who, you muſt vnderſtand were vaſſals to Alboali, Aben-Tefin, the great Miralmumin of Affrike King D. Alphonſo returned with his victorious and rich army, to Coimbra, being then the chiefe city of his Eſtate.

Practiſes of the Counteſſe of Portugal againſt her ſon.

In this happie ſucceſſe of his affaires, D. Thereſa his mother, beeing a priſoner, ſought to croſſe him, treating with D. Alphonſo King or Emperour of Caſtille, for her deliuery and reſtitution: and moreouer by her inſtruments ſhee made great com- F plaintes at Rome, to Pope Innocent the third, accuſing her ſon of cruelty and impiety: ſo as the Pope ſent the Biſhop of Coimbra into Portugal, beeing then at Rome, with charge to enioyne the King by the Apoſtolike authority, and in his name to

ſet

A ſet the Counteſſe at liberty: which the ſonne refuſing to obay, the Biſhop did interdict the citty of Coimbra, and returned to Rome, ſtealing away ſecretly in the morning, without the Kings priuity, wherewith beeing incenſed, hee would haue forced the Chapter to proceed to the Election of a new Biſhop, wherein hee was not obayed, ſo as hee committed many outrages: wherepon the Pope ſent a Caradinall Legat vnto him, to correct him, but hee loſt his time; for the Counteſſe continued ſtill in priſon, beeing very expedient and neceſſary for the good and quiet of the country. For this the Cardinal did interdict all Portugal, and then tooke his way towards Rome: but hee was purſued by the King, who did greatly feare theſe interdictions: and hauing ouertaken him betwixt Coimbra and Vera, neere vnto the
B Comanderie of Poyares, hee forced him to diſanul this interdiction, and moreouer to grant him whatſoeuer hee deſired, partly by force and threats, and partly by perſwaſions.

Whileſt hee was in this debate with the Church, Iſmael or Iſmar, who had beene vanquiſhed, came vpon the towne of Leyra, belonging to the Monkes of Saint Croix of Coimbra (the which for that it was ill garded by a Knight called Payo Guttieres, who was there in garriſon for the Pior) fell againe into the Moores power; whereof the Abbot being aduertiſed, leauing his frocke and monkes weed, hee went to horſe-backe with a good troupe of ſouldiars, where hauing ſpoiled the Moores country, hee ſeized
C vpon Ronches: ſoone after King D. Alphonſo Henriques came and laied ſiege to Leyra, and tooke it, ſince which time he depriued the Monkes of the Temporalty of this place and of Ronches alſo, leauing them only the preffits of the ſpiritualty.

Leyra taken by the Moores.

The warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon was hot at this time: but D. Raymond Prince of Arragon found himſelfe troubled, not only againſt the Moores, which were neighbors to Arragon and Cattelogne, from whom hee tooke Chalamera and Alcolea, vpon the riuer of Cinca, in the yeere 1143. but alſo againſt ſome knights of Prouince, which were enemies to D. Berenger Raymond his brother, hauing ſeized vpon
D ſome places, and beene the cauſe of great troubles, ſo as hee was forced to goe himſelfe in perſon: wherefore his country was much anoyed by the Nauarrois, who finding all aſſured towards Caſtille, did what they liſted: yet at his returne hee had ſome ſmal reuenge and tooke the fort of Sos. The peace betwixt the Caſtillans and Nauarre, being ſetled and entertained, it was againe fortified by the marriage of the King D. Garcia Ramires with D. Vrraca, baſtard daughter to the Emperour D. Alphonſo, by whom hee had the Infanta D. Sancha aboue mentioned: and wee muſt not doubt but that which ſome haue left written of this Kings third marriage with the daughter of D. Lope Dias de Haro, is a mere fiction. It is likely the towne of Haro was built at that time, whereof the Lords of Biſcay, and there ſucceſſors, carried the name, from whence are deſcended many worthy knights, and great perſonages in Caſtille and Leon. The realme of Nauarre at that time had larger bounds then it had ſince, hauing no means
E to augment them vpon the Moores, for that the realmes of Arragon and Caſtille lay betwixt both; ſo as the Arragonois, Caſtillans and Cattelans were to make warre againſt them, as frontering vpon Valencia, and other their lands and Siegneuries. Yet the Kings of Nauar, which haue bin ſince, were ſo far from extending of their lymits, as they haue beene often reſtrained by the violence and too great power of the Kings of Caſtille.

Nauarre.

An. 1143.

Confirmation of the peace betwixt Nauarre and Caſtille.

About the yeere 1146. D. Alphonſo Emperour of Spaine reſolued to make warre with all violence againſt the Moores of Andaluſia, by reaſon of the ſeditions and reuolts which were in Affrike, againſt the Almorauides, whoſe Hiſtory it is needfull to relate.

An. 1146.

16. Alboali, Aben-Teſin (whom ſome will haue to bee Auicenne the great Phy-
F loſopher, whoſe workes wee read, but without any ground) raigning ouer the Moores of Affrike and Spaine, the third King or Miralmumin of the race of the Almorauides; a Moore of Affrike, called Aben-Thumert, very learned in Aſtrology, tould a certaine young-man called Abdelmon, that he found by the ſtarres, he ſhould get the crowne of the Arabians: and therefore hee aduiſed him to meete with theſe heauenly influences, and to prepare himſelfe to receiue this great good which they had promiſed him. A

Moores.

Troubles in the Moores eſtate in Affrike by Imperfections dyuinations.

This man although hee were of a baſe and vile condition, whoſe father got his lyuing by making of pots, and other earthen veſſel, yet hee was neither faint-hearted, nor without ambition, wherefore hee gaue ſuch credit to that which the Aſtrologer had deliuered vnto him, as leauing his houſe and trade, hee acquainted himſelfe with a certaine religious Moore, a Doctor in the law of Mahumet, and withall eloquent in the Arabian tongue, and therefore much eſteemed amongſt all the Affrican Moores, to whom hee imparted the prognoſtication of Aben Thumert, intreating him to councell him, and to aſſiſt him in a matter of ſo great importance, aſſuring him that if hee attained to that which hee aſpired, hee would make him the chiefe man amongſt the Arabians, next vnto himſelfe. B

This Doctor who was called Almohadi, tickled with the hope of greatneſſe, could finde no better, nor more expedient meanes, then to bring in new ſects, and to make ſome change in religion, knowing that nothing doth more alter and tranſport the hearts of men, then perſwaſion of religion: wherefore he imployed his knowledge and eloquence to interpret Mahumets Alcaron, after a ſtrange maner, and neuer heard of among the Arabians, nor any other nations that were his ſectaries: fitting it ſo well to the humors and diſpoſitions of the people, as in a ſhort time hee was followed by the greateſt part of the Affrican Moores, a nation eaſily miſled with ſuperſtition: ſo as if before they tooke Almohadi for a holy man, now they held him for a Prophet, ſent vndoubtedly from God. Hee ſeeing this buſineſſe ſucceed ſo well as hee was wellcome throughout all Affrike, and admired of all men, hee beganne to put forth this youngman Abdelmon, giuing the people to vnderſtand, that he was of the true and lawfull royall race of their great Prophet Mahumet, and that hee was a man ſent of God, endowed with ſuch vertue, as hee ſhould ſubiect all the world to the Law of Mahumet; that thoſe great matters had beene diuinely fore-told him, and ſignifyed by the ſtarres and heauenly motions: ſo as by his perſwaſions his fictions were receiued and beleeued of all men. And proceeding farther, he preſumed to ſpeake ſomething againſt King Alboali, and the preſent Eſtate and Gouernment of the Almorauides, and ſo by little and little to taxe him openly, declaring with great aſſurance, that Alboali was a tyrant, whoſe race had by force and violence expelled out of the royal throne of the Arabians in Affrike the lawfull Princes deſcended from Aben-Alabecy, and that the will of God, reuealed and knowne vnto him by many ſignes from heauen, was that Abdelmon ſhould bee aduanced and choſen for King: hee who was ſent of God, and deſcended from the royall bloud of their great Prophet Mahumet. This Impoſtor did ſo preach vnto them, concurrning with the diuell to bewitch theſe credulous men, giuen to the damnable art of dyuining, as many Noblemen and Knights, with an infynit number of the Affrican people, deſirous of Innouations, according to the mutinous nature of that nation, tooke armes againſt King Alboali, beeing accompanied, aſſiſted and councelled by Abdelmon, Aben-Thumert and Almohadi. Whereof the King aduertiſed, meaning to ſuppreſſe theſe great alterations, hee rayſed his forces, and had diuers incounters againſt this new ſect, which carried the name of Almohades, by reaſon of their Preacher Almohadi. C D E

A new ſect among the Arabians of Affrike.

Auicenna and other learned Arabians.

Wee haue ſayd that ſome were of opinion, that the King Albo-Ali Aben Tefin, was hee whom we call Auicenna or Auicenni, ſaying that the goodly workes which are amongſt vs at this daie, were compiled and written by his commandement, by the foure and twenty great Philoſophers, and publiſhed vnder the name of Auicenna. For my part I rather beleeue them which haue written that Auicenne or Auicenna, called alſo Albo Hali, was an excellent man, learned in Philoſophy and Phyſicke, as his rare workes written in the Arabicke tongue doe witneſſe, beeing tranſlated ſince into Latin, who liued in thoſe daies at Cordoua in Spaine, where it ſeemes the Moores had alwaies entertained an vniuerſity of all ſorts of ſciences, with a great concourſe of learned men of their nation; the which had beene alwaies well furniſhed, the Affricans beeing people giuen to contemplation, and of a ſubtill ſpirit: wherefore they haue made Aſtrology famous, and aduanced a ſect of Phyſicke diuerſe from F

that

A that of the Grecians, giuen wonderfully to diuination and coniuring, very ſuperſtitious in matters of religion, and reaſonably eloquent either in verſe or proſe. Aben Rois whom wee call Auerrois liued and frequented with him, a great Commentator of Ariſtotle, who through enuy poyſoned Auicenna, who finding it before it had wrought his full effect, cauſed the poyſoner to be ſlain, as Meſua and Zoar report: for hee was a man of great authority, and of a Princes houſe.

Then alſo liued Aben-Zoar, and other great and learned Arabians, which haue written many goodly workes in their owne language, in naturall Phyloſophy, Metaphiſicke, Phyſicke and Aſtrologie, whereof part haue beene preſerued and kept vnto our daies, and ſome loſt. If theſe were Moores borne in Spaine, it
B redoundes to the honour of the countrie: but it is doubtfull whether they came out of Affrike.

Caſtile.

The Moores Eſtate beeing thus troubled in Affrike, it mooued the Chriſtian Princes to make ſome gallant attempt vpon them of Spaine: wherefore the Emperour D. Alphonſo beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1146. to raiſe a great army of his ſubiects of Caſtille, Toledo, Leon and other countries, and to make the Chriſtians armes of greater force, hee laboured to make a peace betwixt the King of Nauarre, and D. Raymond Prince of Arragon, for the effecting wherof hee called them to Saint Stephano de Gormas, whither beeing come, hee could not obtaine any thing of them,
C but a truce for ſome few daies. There notwithſtanding they treated of the warre againſt the Moores, in the which theſe two Princes ayded the Emperour: the King of Nauarre by land, and the Earle of Barcelone by ſea, who hauing armed ſome ſhips, and giuen the charge thereof to D. Galceran great Admiral of Cattelogne, and to the Earle of Vrgel, hee cauſed them to ioyne with the Geneuois, who either for pay, or voluntarily in hope of ſome gaine, came to this warre, and there did great ſeruice. The land army was great and well furniſhed with good and valiant Knights, the Emperour D. Alphonſo, and the King D. Garcia Ramires beeing there in perſon, their entrie into Andaluſia was ſo fearefull, as approching and comming neere vnto Cordoua, with a ſhew to beſiege it, that great and well
D peopled cittie, which had beene the Queene of Spaine for ſo many yeares, was yeelded vnto him by the Gouernour Aben Gami, who preſented him the keyes with great humilitie, not attending either aſſault or batterie; into the which the Chriſtian Princes entred in armes, but very peaceably, in the yeare 1147. Yet the Spaniards write, that for that the towne was of too great a guard, and wonderfully peopled, it was left in fee to Aben-Gami himſelfe, who did homage to the King of Caſtile, the which is very doubtfull, conſidering the importance of the place, and the conſequence thereof. We may beleeue that the Emperour aſſured himſelfe after another manner, and with better caution then the faith of this Mooore, who (they ſay) ſware vpon their Alchoran, to bee his faithfull vaſſall: from thence the armie marched towards Baeça, the which beeing
E inueſted, they had newes that the Moores came to ſuccour it: wherefore the Emperor going to meet them, he fought with them, and had the victorie, and afterwards tooke the towne by compoſition; where leauing a ſufficient garriſon to aſſure the countrey behind his armie, he marched on to Almerie, a towne vpon the Mediterranean ſea, which at this day belongs to Granado, much frequented of Merchants of diuers nations. There he found the ſea armie of Count Raymond, and the galleys of Genoua, which had alreadie attempted it, vnder the command of Anſaldo Doria, Vbert Torre, and other captaines of that common-weale. This place was ſo furiouſly battered both by ſea and land, as it was taken by force: yet the Moores beeing retired into a part of the cittie of good ſtrength, they were taken to ranſome, from whom they drew great ſums of mony.

Cordoua yeelded to the king of Caſtile.

Almerie taken by force.

F They ſay, that at this prize, that great and ineſtimable Emeraud without peere, was taken, the which is at this day at Genoua, and was giuen vnto them for their part of the bootie, and in recompence of the great ſeruice they had done there. Yet many beleeue, that the Geneuois brought it out of Paleſtina, from the towne of Ceſarea, at which ſeege they were employed. The ſpoyle & ſacke of this place was diuided betwixt the Emeraud of ineſtimable price.

the Caſtillans, Nauarrois, Geneuois, and the ſubiects of the Earle D. Raymond. This is all which was done in that voyage, from whence euery one retired into his countrey rich, ſome by land, ſome by ſea. The King Don Garcia Ramires accompanied his father-in-law into Caſtile, where he remayned, with great tranquilitie and content, the reſt of that yeare. A Councell at Rheims.

If the Chriſtian affaires in Spaine ſucceeded well againſt the Moores, thoſe in Syria declined much: wherupon a Councell was held at Rheims, vnder Pope Eugenius the 3. to reſolue vpon ſome meanes, to ſupport the eſtate of the Kings of Ieruſalem, by ſome ayde from the Princes of Europe. Thither went D. Raymond, Archbiſhop of Toledo, as Primate of Spaine: who paſſing by Saint Denis in France, obſerued in a chappell an Inſcription of this tenour: Here lyes Saint Eugenius the Martyr, the firſt Archbiſhop of Toledo. B

Beeing returned, he reported vnto the Church what he had found, whereof the Emperor Don Alphonſo, and the Kings children were aduertiſed, who together with all the people were exceeding glad: for ſince the death of this holy man, they could not learne where his body lay. Beeing thus found, they of Toledo procured means to haue one of his armes, from king Lewis the young. It was a remarkable act of Religion in the Archbiſhop Don Raymond in his voyage to Rheims: In our time King Philippe obtayned from Charles the ninth, the French King, and from Charles Cardinall of Lorraine, and Abbot of Saint Denis, the reſt of the bodie (as they ſay) of this Martyr, the which was brought to his Church of Toledo, where he had gouerned, Domitian beeing then Emperour at Rome: for they did not know him much in France, neither did it ſerue to any purpoſe, amidſt the ciuill, or rather vnciuill warres, growne for matter of Religion. C

Arragon and Barcelone.

D. Raymond Berenger beeing returned into Cattelogne, hauing the Geneuois army ready, and at his commandement, he employed it againſt the towne of Tortoſe which was held by the Moores, the which he beſeeged both by ſea and land: at which ſeege the Earle left D. William Raymond of Moncada, Seneſhall of Cattelogne, for his Lieutenant generall, whileſt that he made a voyage to Barcelone, to pacifie ſome ſeditions which were riſen in that cittie. Such was the diligence of the Seneſhall and Geneuois, as by the 30. day of the ſeege, after many ſharpe aſſaults giuen and valiantly defended, the towne was taken, and ſoone after D. Pedro de Semenate arriuing with freſh ſupplies, the caſtell was alſo taken: the Geneuois had their part of the ſpoyle, for the good ſeruices they had done vnto the Earle. And the Authours of the Arragon Hiſtorie write, that a third part of the towne was giuen in fee to the Seneſhall D. William Raymond of Moncado, and another third part to the common-weale of Genoua, which portion was afterwards redeemed by the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, for 16000. Marauidis Maroquins, a kind of mony which was then currant, leauing vnto the Geneuois the Iland of Saint Laurence, and granting vnto all the Inhabitants of the citty of Genoua, and of the iuriſdiction (the which was limited by Porto venere towards the Eaſt, and by Monaco, vppon the Weſt, along the ſea ſhore) exemption of all Impoſts and cuſtomes, Henrico Guercio, Marin Moro, William Luſio, and others, beeing then Gouernours of the Common weale. Warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon.

Whileſt the Earle was buſie at this warre, the King of Nauarre brake the truce made at Saint Eſtienne de Gormas: for that the King Don Garcia hauing cauſed the Emperour Don Alphonſo, and other Noblemen and Prelates, to perſwade and adiſe the Earle, to relinquiſh the pretenſions, which hee vaunted to haue to the Realme of Nauarre, hee would not do it, but threatened to pourſue it, when oportunitie ſerued: wherefore the Nauarrois did ouer-runne the Countrey of Arragon, and tooke the Towns of Thauſte and Fayos, where they put good Garriſons, to ſerue as a frontier againſt the Arragonois. F

Portugal.

It is no wonder, if in all theſe attempts of the Chriſtian Princes in Spaine, againſt the Moores, the new King of Portugall did not ioyne with the reſt: for that hee was in diſgrace and out of fauour with the Emperour D. Alphonſo, who held him as an vſurper of the Eſtate of D. Thereſa his mother: and moreouer, of the title of a king, in a

Prouince

A Prouince which was ſubiect to the Soueraigntie of Leon. King D. Alphonſo Henriques hauing liued now 52. yeares without a wife, he married in the yeare 1146. D. Malfada Manrique de Lara, daughter to the Earle D. Manrique, Lord of Molina, a great Noble-man of Caſtile, by whom he had one ſonne named D. Sancho, who ſucceeded him in the Realme of Portugall, and the Infanta D. Vrraca, who was married firſt to D. Fernand the 2. of that name, King of Leon and Gallicia, and from them iſſued D. Alphonſo king of the ſame Realmes, father to the king D. Fernand the 3. of Caſtile and Leon: a marriage notwithſtanding which was broken, by reaſon of their proximitie of bloud, and for that they were married without a diſpenſation. King D. Alphonſo Henriques had another daughter by D. Malfada, called D. Thereſa, maried to Philip Earle of Flanders, B the firſt of that name, and one called Malfada, as the mother. Beſides theſe lawfull children, the King of Portugall had one baſtard before he was married, whom they called D. Pedro Alphonſo of Portugall. Soone after his marriage, beeing importuned by the continuall complaints of his ſubiects, for the ſpoyles which the Moores of Saint Iren committed in his countrie, he reſolued to beſeege that place, but he preuailed more by policie, then happily he ſhould haue done by open force: for marching thither in the night, after that he had made a vow (paſſing by that place where as now ſtands the royall monaſterie of Alcouaça) to build a Monaſterie there if his enterpriſe ſucceeded well: it fell out according to his deſire, for he put his men ſecretly into the towne, beeing ill guarded, without diſcouerie, and tooke it in the yeare 1147. on Saint Michaels day, put- C ting all that reſiſted to the ſword, and taking many priſoners. Beeing returned to Coimbra, and hauing giuen thankes vnto God for the fauour which he had done him, hee performed his vow, and built the Monaſterie of Alcouaça, where he placed Monkes of the Order of Ciſteaux, for the loue of Saint Bernard, who liued in thoſe times. After this conqueſt, ſeeing that the Miralmumin of Affricke and Spaine, was much troubled to defend himſelfe againſt the faction of the Almohades, he followed his good fortune, and tooke from the Moores the caſtell of Mafra, where he placed D. Fernand of Montezo for Gouernor, who in ſucceſſion of time was great Maſter of the Order of Auis, of the profeſſion of S. Benet, which had its beginning during the life of this king of Portugall. Hee tooke alſo from them the caſtell of Sintra, and from thence came to lay D ſeege to Lisbone, where he was aſſiſted by many knights of France, England, & Flanders, which came by ſea, and landed at Caſcais, then came they & camped where as the Monaſterie of S. Francis was ſince built, the Kings armie beeing lodged where as Saint Vincent now ſtands: which places were then without the circuit of the citty wals. The cittie was ſo preſt by theſe forces, as after many dangerous aſſaults, it was taken, the Chriſtians entring by the port of Alfama, the 25. of October 1147. the ſeege hauing continued fiue whole moneths. Many Knights and other ſtrangers, which were come to this warre, deſirous to employ themſelues continually againſt the Infidels, enemies of our faith, vowed neuer to returne into their countries, but to remaine in Portugall; who by the kings permiſſion inhabited there, and peopled Almada, Villeuerda, Arruda, E Zambuja, Caſtagrera, Lourinhan, Ville franche, and other places. This cittie of Liſbone, which ſince hath beene the chiefe of Portugall, and the ornament of Spaine, was purged by the biſhops from the impieties of Mahumet, and their great Moſquee made a Cathedrall church, where as one Gilbert a ſtranger, but of a holy life, was made biſhop: and the king cauſed the Monaſterie of S Vincent to be built in the ſame place where he had camped. By means of this important conqueſt, the king took alſo from the Mores, Alanguer, Obidos, Torreſuedras, and many other places, ſo as he diſpoſſeſt them in this warre, of all the countrie which is called Extremadura, and paſſing Tayo, he extended his limits, conquering Acaçar de Sal, Ebora, Yelbes, Moura, Serpa, & vnto Veja, where he put the Moores which defended it to the ſword, for that during this ſeege, other Moores hauing taken the towne of Troncoſo, had vnpeopled it, and chaſed away all F the Chriſtians that were within it.

King D. Alphonſo Henriques did theſe goodly exploits, whilſt that the Arabians were at war among themſelues, by reaſon of the factions of the Almorauides and Almohades, the which was continued with ſuch animoſitie, as after many routes of either part

55. in Spaine. The troubles of Affricke, not preſently pacified, did ſo buſie the new king Abdelmon, as he had no meanes to prouide for the affaires of Spaine, vntill the yeare 1150. during which time the Chriſtian kings had leyſure to do theſe exploytes.

D. Raymond Berenger changed the Biſhoprickes of Roda and Barbaſtro to Lerida, with the Popes approbation, the firſt Prelat was D. William Pedro de Rayeta. This Prince of Cattelogne beeing no leſſe deuout to Monkes then others of his time, gaue vnto the Monaſterie of Eſcala Dei, the towne of Alma in perpetuitie, whereas the Monaſterie of Oliue was built. Hee intitled himſelfe then Prince of Arragon, Earle of Barcelone, and Marquis of Tortoſe. C

Nauarre.

An. 1150.

In the yeare 1150. D. Garcia king of Nauarre died, a Prince endowed with royal vertues. Beeing prouoked by the daily mutinies of the Inhabitants of Pampelone, to ſuppreſſe and puniſh them, he went thitherward from Eſtelle, and by the way ſtayed ſome little time at Lorca to hunt: as he galloped through the woods and mountaines, his horſe ſtumbling, fell with him in a narrow ſtonie place, ſo as the king brake his leg, and withall was ſo bruſed, as he dyed (paſt all cure) vpon the place, hauing raigned ſixteene yeares and ſome dayes. His body was carried to Pampelone, and interred in the Cathedrall Church with a royall pompe, beeing the firſt of the kings of Nauarre, which had bin buried there: D. Sancho his ſon ſucceeded him, the ſeuenth of that name, ſurnamed the Wiſe. D

Arragon and Barcelone.

This yeare D. Raymond Berenger continued to annoy the reſt of the Moores, whom he chaſed quite out of all the countrie which lyes betwixt Lerida and Sarragoſſe, hauing diſpoſſeſt them of the forts of Aytona Seros, and Mechinenſa: this was when the Almohades began to ſhew themſelues in Spaine.

Caſtile.

The marriage betwixt Lewis the French King, called the young, and Don Iſabella, daughter to the Emperour D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, and of D. Berenguela, ſiſter to the Earle D. Raymond, was then treated of. Beeing concluded, ſome put a conceipt in the Kings head, that D. Iſabella was a baſtard: wherefore he came in perſon into Spaine, vnder colour to go to Saint Iames, but it was in truth to informe himſelfe of the birth of D. Iſabella, and to ſee her, where he found that ſhe was the lawfull daughter of D. E Alphonſo Raymond, and of D. Berenguela his wife. In this voyage king Lewis was receiued in the cittie of Burgos, the royall ſeate of Caſtille, with all the honors fit for ſuch a king, who in his returne came to Toledo, where as he found the King or Emperour D. Alphonſo, and with him the Earle of Barcelone, accompanied with a good number of his Knights of Cattelogne to honour theſe kings. It was this king Lewis, who had put away Elenor Dutcheſſe of Guienne, and Counteſſe of Poictiers, who married with Henry king of England, which was the cauſe of long warres in France.

Arragon and Barcelone.

The yeare following 1151. for as much as the towne of Tarragone was not wel peopled, it may be, for that it did belong vnto the Archbiſhop and the Clergie, and that feare of the Moores which were neere, kept the people in thoſe places which were com- F manded by martiall men. The Archbiſhop D. Bernard Cord, made ceſſion againe of the ſayd Towne vnto the Earle D. Raymond, reſigning it into his hands, with the permiſſion of Pope Eugenius the third, and with the conſent of the Chapter and Biſhops Suffragans ganes of the Church. Don Raymond put it inſtantly into the hands of a Knight called Robert, and did inueſt him with a title of Principalitie. The ſame yeare his wife D. Petronille, Queene of Arragon, was brought in bed of her ſonne Don Raymond, whoſe name, after the deceaſe of his father, was changed to Don Alphonſo, and hee inherited the Realme of Arragon, and Principalitie of Cattelogne. This deliuerie was ſo dangerous, as the Queene reſoluing to dye, made her will, and inſtituted her after-birth for her heire, and the Earle his father for Gouernour of his Eſtates: but God deliuered her, and ſent her health, after which ſhee had Don Sancho, who was Earle of Rouſſillon and of Cerdagne: and two daughters, D. Aldonça the eldeſt, married to Sancho the firſt of that name, and ſecond King of Portugall, the other was wife to Don Armingol, Earle of Vrgel. After Queene Petronilles lying in, Don Raymond cleanſing the reſt of the Countrie which lyes betwixt Sarragoſſa and Tortoſa of Moores, hee tooke from them the Caſtell of Mirauet. A little before D. Berenguela Queene of Caſtile was deceaſed, who deſired to be interred at Saint Iames, for the great opinion ſhe had of the Apoſtles interceſſion, as ſhe had beene inſtructed by her Prelates.

Genealogie of Arragon.

D. Sancho the ſeuenth of that name, the 20. King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

18 D. Sancho, ſurnamed the Wiſe, ſonne to D. Garcia, beeing come to the Crowne of Nauarre, hee made an Aſſembly and enteruiew of Princes at Tudele, neere vnto Aigues-chaudes, whither came the Emperour D. Alphonſo, and his ſonne Don Sancho King of Caſtile, and D. Raymond Berenger Prince of Arragon: where they conſpired againſt the new King of Nauarre, and ſet downe many Articles concerning the warre, as the Emperour and Earle had done ſome yeare before. Among others they agreed, That the Realme of Nauarre ſhould be conquered at their common charge, and diuided equally betwixt them, except the forts which the Nauarrois held, belonging to the Crowne of Arragon, the which ſhould be re-united. As for the towne of Tudele, the Iuriſdiction ſhould be diuided, the moitie thereof entring into that portion of the lands which lye from Ebro to Montcajo: and that for one halfe of the Realme of Nauarre, which the Earle ſhould enioy, he ſhould, as Gouernour of Arragon, do homage to the King of Caſtille. That by Saint Michels day next enſuing, the Infant Don Sancho ſhould take vnto him D. Blanche the Infanta of Nauarre, to marry her, or (if he thought good) to leaue her. Theſe and ſuch other like conditions were concluded betwixt theſe Princes, to the ruine of the young King D. Sancho of Nauarre, and of his Eſtates, if God had not preſerued him. With this reſolution the Caſtillan and Arragonois parted from Tudele, and went euery one into his Countrie, to giue order for that which was needfull for the warres, thinking that their enemie, who was but a child, could not defend himſelfe againſt ſo great forces: but God had otherwiſe decreed, and confounded all their practiſes. Soone after D. Pedro a' Athares dyed, who had fayled to bee King of Nauarre and Arragon, the founder of the Monaſterie of S. Mary of Veruela, where he was interred.

The Nauarrois doubting ſome practiſe againſt their Prince, in this Aſſembly of Tudele, were very carefull to fortifie their frontier places, and to renew the allyances of the houſe of Nauarre, with the French king, and other Noblemen of that nation. The young king D. Sancho was crowned after the death of his father, in the Church of Pampelone, where he ſware to obſerue the lawes and ſtatutes of the Countrie, which were the ſame which they call at this day the lawe of Arragon, according to the which Nauarre, Guipuſcoa, and the places ioyning to Nauarre, were then gouerned. Saint Sebaſtian, which was at that time a place of great trafficke, had priuiledges granted by him, and ſo had the Towne of Durando in Biſcaye. They ſurnamed this king the Sage, for that in truth he was a wiſe and a diſcreet Prince, and for his valour and courage hee was called by ſome, Valiant. Hee had ſome knowledge of learning, honored learned A men, and was ſtudious of the Scriptures, as the vſe was in thoſe times, and ſhewed himſelfe a great Iuſticer: for all which vertues he was much eſteemed by other Princes, and was honoured, feared, and loued of his ſubiects. The armies of the league made at Tudele, beganne to annoy him at his firſt entrance, and did him ſome harme vppon his fronters, yet he did not looſe any place of importance: for although hee were very young, yet he was of an actiue ſpirit, and a noble courage, and was well and faithfully aſſiſted by his allies, and ſerued by the Nauarrois. The warre was hotteſt in the valley of Roncall; but there is no mention, that either in that yeare, or in the others following, there was any memorable exployt done, and they hold that Lewis the French king, B who had beene a great friend to Don Garcia his deceaſed father, did wonderfully croſſe French king fauours the king of Nauarre. the enterpriſes of the League, and hindred them all he could, beeing either vppon his treatie of marriage, or elſe newly married to Dona Iſabella Infanta of Caſtile, in fauour of which allyance the Emperour D. Alphonſo did deſiſt from that warre, or did neglect it, and Don Sancho his ſonne, King of Caſtile, (who had his choice to marrie Genealogie of Caſtile. D. Blanche, or to leaue her) married her, and had a ſonne by her at the end of the yeare called D. Alphonſo, who was king of Caſtile and Toledo, after the father. Some hold that the marriage of king Lewis with D. Iſabella, was after all this, in the yeare 1154. and that the King of Nauarre came to Burgos, to the celebration thereof, the which was admired by the French, for the exceeding pompe.

The Countrie of Nagera was then one of the chief gouernments of Caſtile, for the C Gouernour thereof was Captaine generall of the fronter towards Nauarre. The Infant Don Sancho who was called king of Caſtile, did enioy thoſe lands, and had a Lieutenant called Roderigo Pelaes, a wiſe Knight. About that time died D. Roderigo Gomes, ſonne to Don Gomes of Candeſpina, one of the greateſt Noblemen in Caſtile, whoſe Tombe is yet to be ſeene in the Cloyſter of Saint Sauiour of Ogna: and the towne of Surita was peopled with Chriſtians Muſarabes, which came out of Calatajub, Sarragoſſa, and other parts of Arragon.

Arragon. The Earle Don Raymond Berenger ſought all meanes poſſible to ſeaze vppon Nauarre, ſo deſirous he was to ioyne it vnto Arragon: importuning the Emperour Don D Alphonſo continually, to declare himſelfe an open enemie to D. Sancho, ſo as in the 1156. yeare 1156. there was a new League made betwixt them, to vndertake this warre: where among other Articles, for the better fortifying of their friendſhip, there was a future marriage concluded betwixt Don Raymond, the young Infant of Arragon, who was afterwards called Don Alphonſo, and D. Sancha daughter to the Emperour Don Alphonſo, by his ſecond wife. Dona Rica, daughter to Vladiſlaus king of Pologne, whom he had married in the yeare, 1151. yet they could neuer perſwade the Emperour Don Alphonſo to hurt the king of Nauarre, whom he loued: but rather aſſiſted him vnderhand. The ſame League was renued at Toledo, in the yeare 1157. after Don Raymonds returne out of Prouence. The occaſion of which voyage was to defend his Nephew, E heire to his Brother Don Berenger Raymond, who (beeing in a manner diſpoſſeſt of his Eſtate by the enemies of their houſe, which had ſlaine his father in an incounter) had need of his ayde. Hee repulſed the young Earles enemies, aſſured his Eſtates, and brought him into Cattelogne, there to bee brought vp. And for that in thoſe troubles of Prouence, the Knights and Commanders of Saint Iohn of Hieruſalem, (who were growne mercenarie in theſe Chriſtian warres) did intermeddle, hee gaue them large reuenues in Cattelogne. After the renewing of this League, we find no mention of any worthie act done by this earle, but that hee debaucht ſome faithleſſe and trecherous Knights, which fled out of Nauarre and Arragon; yea one of the greateſt called Garcia Almoraust, who came vnto him to Lerida, and there made himſelfe his vaſſall, F and receiued from the Earle the title of Lord of Ronceuaux, Vrros, and Obanos, which were not in his power: wherefore it is to be preſumed, that from that time hee ſought to gouerne his Eſtates peaceably, ſeeing he could not get the Crowne of Nauarre: and with this deſire he ended his dayes, after all his vaine attempts againſt this Kingdome. Soone after this laſt aſſembly at Toledo, the king of Caſtile was ingaged in warre

A warre againſt the Moores of Andaluſia, which made him perchance neglect that of Nauarre, beſides he did not greatly affect it.

19 The troubles of Affricke beeing paſt, as we haue ſayd, Abdelmon eſtabliſhed Miralmumin of the Arabians, and the Almohades in credit by the ruine of the Almorauides. The Preacher Almohadi would alſo haue the Moores of Spaine ſubmit themſelues to this yoake: wherefore leauing Aben Thumert the Aſtrologian at Maroc, hee paſt with Abdelmon into Spaine, with great numbers of ſouldiers, beeing puſt vp with pride by their late victorie againſt their enemies. They found no great reſiſtance there: for the pettie Kings and Gouernors of Prouinces and townes in Spaine, beeing preſt by the Chriſtians, and too weake to make head againſt them, ſeeing the race of the B Almorauides of Affricke extinct, from whom they might haue expected ſome ſuccors, they ſought nothing more then ſupport, to maintaine themſelues in their authoritie, and greatneſſe, which is moſt commonly the chiefe god of great men of this world, and therefore as men which regarded not Religion, but for a colour, and for their owne priuate commodities: ſo as leauing the interpretation of the Alcaron, they embraced the new doctrine of Almohadi, without any oppoſition, thinking to preſerue themſelues by that meanes. And as this Impoſtor did vomit foorth greater blaſphemies and impieties, then his Predeceſſors had done againſt the true Religion, they became violent and furious perſecutors of the Chriſtians: ſo as the poore Muſarabes, who had had ſome peace of conſcience, liuing among the Moores, and had there exerciſed their religion, without any violence done vnto them for many yeares, were in great perplexi- C tie, beeing now perſecuted by theſe new Sectaries of Almohadi, both in their perſons and goods, with all kind of rigor: for that they would not yeeld to their ſuperſtitions: ſo as either by the reuolts, or by death, or by the continuall flying away of theſe poore people, all the townes of Spaine which were held by the Moores, were vnpeopled of Chriſtians, who for aboue 400. yeares had preſerued themſelues, inuoking (though with little knowledge) the name of Ieſus Chriſt. The gouernement of the Almohades in Spaine, continued in Abdelmon and his ſucceſſors 52. yeares, vntill that notable battle in the fields of Tholouſa, called by another name of the mountaines of Muradal, or of Vbeda. Abdelmon hauing aſpired to that which he pretended, held his royall ſeate in D the cittie of Maroc, and ſhewed himſelf a profitable Prince, and pleaſing to the Mores, notwithſtanding that he was a Potters ſonne, and for his chiefe Councellors, the Aſtrologian Aben Thumert, and the Preacher Almohadi, who dying within few months after this conqueſt, was by the commandement of King Abdelmon, buried with pompe and royall honours in a ſumptuous Tombe, neare vnto the cittie of Maroc, whereas ſince the fooliſh multitude, holding him to be ſome great Prophet, and a meſſenger of God, made prayers and vowes in all their neceſſities: as amongſt the Chriſtians they had recourſe vpon all occaſions, to the ſepulchers (either true or fained) of Apoſtles, holy Confeſſors and Martyrs of the name of Ieſus Chriſt. This paſſage of the Almohades, bred a great alteration in Spaine, whereas many Moores which held their coun- E tries in fee and homage of Chriſtian Princes reuolted.

Change of Religion among the Arabians in Spaine.

Chriſtians perſecuted by the Moores in Spaine.

The Emperour D. Alphonſo led firſt an armie of Chriſtians againſt this new Eſtate, in the yeare 1157. beeing accompanied by his two ſons, D. Sancho, and D. Fernand, who had the titles of Kings: in Andaluſia he recouered the towne of Baeça, which had beene loſt, and tooke Queſada and Arcdujar. But he did not long enioy this victorie with his ſubiects, for bringing backe his armie towards Toledo, hee fell ſuddenly ſicke, the which (as he paſt the mountaine or ſtreight of Muradal) did ſo increaſe, as hee was forced to light at a place called Freſnedas, where he dyed in the armes of D. Iohn Archbiſhop of Toledo, and of his ſonne D. Fernand: D. Sancho remayning behind to guard thoſe places which he had newly conquered. Hee was a worthie Prince, but too ambi- F tious, a great fauourer and benefactor of the Clergie, a friend to the people, and a ſeuere puniſher of the inſolencies of great men: of whom the Spaniards write this Hiſtorie. That a certaine Gentleman called D. Fernand in Gallicia, hauing taken away a poore labourers goods, for which wrong he could haue no iuſtice from the ordinarie Magiſtrate of the country, ſo as he came to the Emperor beeing at Toledo, where ha-

Caſtile. Death of the Emperor D. Alphonſo.

uing watched his oportunitie, he caſt himſelfe at his feet, making knowne vnto him the violence which had beene done him by D. Fernand, and demanded Iuſtice: The Emperour did not diſdaine this poore man, but beeing duly informed of the fact, he ſent vnto the Gouernour, and Merino Maior of Gallicia, commanding them to cauſe reſtitution to be made preſently vnto the Labourer, of all that he ſhould find had beene taken from him, but the Gentleman would not obey any commaund, neither durſt the Iudge force him, either fearing to diſpleaſe him, or elſe wanting meanes to conſtraine him: whereof the Emperor beeing aduertiſed, hee parted from Toledo, to come into Gallicia, where hauing made diligent inquirie of D. Fernands fact, and of his diſobedience and contumacie, he cauſed his houſe to be enuironed; where being taken, he commanded he ſhould be hanged before his owne gate; for a warning to others to liue vprightly and in peace with their neighbors, & not to contemne Iuſtice nor their Prince. A noble act and worthie imitation. He had raigned king and emperour 35. yeares: his bodie was carried to Toledo, and interred in the royall chappell of that Church. His Eſtates were diuided after his death, as hath beene ſayd, betwixt his two ſons D. Sancho and D. Fernand.

D. Sancho the ſixth King of Caſtile.

Caſtile and Leon diuided.

20 THe Realmes of Caſtile & Toledo, were then diſ-united from Leon and Galicia, in the yeare 1157. D. Sancho being aduertiſed of his fathers death, he parted ſuddenly from Baeça, and came to Toledo to his funerall. A Prince who did nothing degenerate from the vertues of his Anceſtors, yea did rather exceed them, but he raigned little.

D. Fernand, the 28. King of Leon.

Leon.

21 HIs brother D. Fernand, neither attending his comming, nor the performance of his funerals, departed preſently, and went to take poſſeſſion of his Kingdomes of Leon and Galicia, according to the fathers will, which diuiſion was a great cauſe of ciuill warres, to the preiudice and diſhonour of the Chriſtians name in Spaine: wherefore great Monarkes ſhould be warned by theſe examples, (which are ordinarie in Hiſtories) neuer to diſmember their Monarchies, but to employ all their ſpirits and wiſedome, to continue it ſtill vnited, although they leaue many children, leauing the Soueraigne authoritie ouer the reſt, vnto him whom the lawes and cuſtomes do call.

Nauarre.

D. Fernand beeing receiued and ſetled in his Realmes of Leon and Galicia, hee began to intreate his Nobilitie ill, & among others he diſpoſſeſt one of the chiefe knights of Leon called D. Pedro Ponce de Minerua, of his lands and goods, who for this cauſe came into Caſtile, to beſeech the King D. Sancho, to mediate his reſtitution, and to bring him againe into fauour with the king his brother. But it falling out at that time, that Don Sancho the wiſe king of Nauarre, beeing aduertiſed of the death of the Emperour D. Alphonſo, had made certaine roades into Caſtile almoſt vnto Burgos, for that D. Sancho had alwaies ſigned the Leagues which the Earle of Barcelone had made againſt his father and him, with the Emperour D. Alphonſo: and moreouer, detayned from him Nagera, and the lands vpon the riuer of Oja, this knight was entertained by the king of Caſtile, who imployed him in this warre of Nauarre, and made him head of an armie, which he ſent vnto the fronters, by the riuers of Oja, which hauing incountred that of Nauarre neere to Bagnares, they came to battaile in the fields of Valpierre neere to S. Aſſentio. In the Nauarrois Armie D. Lope Dias de Haro, Earle of Biſcay, led the foreward: Count Ladron of Gueuara had charge of the rereward, with the Earle D. Sancho of Larrinacar, Inigo Ramires d'Aiuar, with other, and the king the battaile. On the other ſide, the Earle D. Pedro Ponce had ordered his men as well, and were more in number: wherefore comming to fight, although in the beginning the Nauarrois ſeemed to haue the better, yet were they defeated, and forced to ſaue themſelues in the next forts,

The

A The king D. Sancho had this route for that he was too haſtie to fight and would not attend the ſuccours of horſe and foote, which came out of France; which beeing arriued, and deſirous to wipe out this blemiſh and infamie, they charged the Caſtillans, which gaue them battaile againe in the ſame fields of Valpierre, and defeated them.

Battell of Valpierre.

Theſe things are written in ſome Hiſtories, but not allowed nor credited by other Spaniſh Authors: for that they inſert ſome things which haue ſmall probabilitie, and others that are meere fictions. Whereas they ſay, that Don Pedro Ponce de Minerua, vſed a ſtrange liberalitie to priſoners, both Nauarrois and French, ſetting them all free without any ranſome, which is not probable: and they alſo affirme, that D. Sancho king of Nauarre dyed in the firſt battayle, the which is reprooued by other Authors, and by B the letters and titles which are yet extant, witneſſing that he liued aboue 37. yeares after: by theſe reaſons, whatſoeuer is written of theſe two victories may iuſtly bee ſuſpected.

Arragon.

That which is written of the Earle Don Raymond Berenger, Prince and Gouernour of Arragon, is more authenticke: that burning with deſire to haue the Realme of Nauarre, he did ſolicite D. Sancho King of Caſtile to declare himſelfe with him, and that they two ioyning their forces together, ſhould ſet vpon the King of Nauarre: and that in the yeare 1158. D. Raymond came againe into Caſtile, accompanied with a great number of Prelates and Knights, to renue their League, yet without any effect for Caſtile, for this aſſembly and enterview paſt not without great contention, for that Don C Raymond Berenger refuſed to do homage vnto the King of Caſtille, for the townes of Sarragoſſa and Calatajub: but in the end he was forced to acknowledge himſelfe his vaſſall in that regard, with a bond to come to Court, and to aſſiſt at the coronation of the Kings of Caſtile, to carrie the royall ſword before them at thoſe ceremonies. As for the Earle D. Pedro Ponce de Minerua, and other Noblemen which were in the like perplexitie, the beſt Spaniſh Authors ſay, that the king D. Sancho tooke the paines to goe himſelfe in perſon with them into Leon, to reconcile them to the King D. Fernand his brother, who came in a peacefull manner, to meete him as farre as Sahagun, receiued him honorably, with great ſhewes of loue, and reſtored theſe Noblemen to their goods and honours; yea he augmented them by his bountie, in fauour of the King D. D Sancho, to whom he carried ſo great honour and reſpect, as he offered to acknowledge to hold of him (as his vaſſall) his Realmes of Leon and Galicia; the which D. Sancho would not accept, ſaying, God forbid, that the ſon of ſo great a Prince as the Emperor Don Alphonſo was, ſhould euer acknowledge to hold his land of any. In the end after great feaſts and ioy, theſe two Kings parted good friends.

Caſtile.

The king D. Sancho being returned to Toledo, hee had newes that the Moores were gone to field, & came with a great power to beſeege Calatraua, a fort of great importance vpon the frontier, the which did then belong vnto the knights of the temple; who amazed at the brute of this ſeege, did ſo diſtruſt their owne ſtrength to defend it, E as they deliuered it into the kings hands, to the end he ſhould ſend Captaines and ſouldiers to reſiſt the Moores. The king hauing receiued it into his protection, and meaning to prouide for it, he found himſelfe much troubled: for there was not any one that preſented himſelfe to take this charge, but they all drew backe and excuſed themſelues, fearing the great power which was ſaid the Mores had. In the end God inſpired the hearts of two religious men of the Order of Ciſteaux, who offered vnto the king, that if it pleaſed him to giue them that place in gard, they would defend it like honeſt men. One of theſe religious men was Friar Raymond, Abbot of the Monaſterie of S. Mary de Hitero, vpon the riuer of Piſuerga, in the Dioceſſe of Palence, not of Hilero in Nauarre, which was not then built: the other was one of his Monkes, called Diego Velaſco, who had caried armes long before he became a religious man of that Order. The offer was pleaſing vnto the King, but more to D. Iohn Archbiſhop of Toledo, for that the lands of his F Dioceſſe ſhould be firſt annoyed by the entry of the Moores to Calatraua: wherefore this Prelate by preaching and publike exhortations, began to commend this Abbot D. Raymond, and to incourage all men to aſſiſt him, ſo as in a ſhort time hee was followed by a great number of Nobilitie and other ſouldiers, ſome thruſt on to winne honour, ſome mooued with zeale to defend the Chriſtian Religion againſt the inuaſion of In- A fidels, and ſome with ſhame. The king, the Archbiſhop, the Nobilitie of his Court, and the Inhabitants of Toledo, euery one for his part, furniſhed money, armes, horſes, corne, and other neceſſaries for a towne which attends a ſeege; and all with ſuch willingneſſe and bountie, as the Abbot might well put himſelfe into Calatraua, beeing aſſured not to be taken for want of men, victuals, and munition of warre: but before hee diſlodged, the king to incourage him to do his duty, and to recompence the good which he had ſhowne, to employ himſelfe for the defence of the countrie, mooued alſo with ſome Religion, gaue vnto God, to the Virgin Mary his mother, to the congregation of Ciſteaux, to the Abbot D. Raymond, and to his Monkes, both preſent and B to come, the towne of Calatraua with all the confines, hilles, land, waters, meddowes, paſtures, entries and iſſues, rights, names and actions belonging thereunto, whereof he cauſed letters pattents to be drawne in the yeare, 1158. ſigned by his Secretarie Martin Peleaz: in the which are named as witneſſes, Don Sancho king of Nauarre, vaſſall to the king of Caſtile, Don Iean Archbiſhop Primate of Spaine, Don Raymond Biſhop of Palence and others.

Calatraua giuen to the Monkes of Ciſteaux.

The Abbot hauing this prouiſion, he ſet forward, and came to Calatraua, a place of great importance, as we haue ſayd, and the onely rampar for the Chriſtians on that ſide againſt the Moores: who either aduertiſed of this great preparation to defend that place, or for ſome other lets, did no great exploit worthie the great brute which had C runne of their armie, neither came they to beſeege Calatraua, whereof the King was exceeding glad, and the Abbot with his Monkes no leſſe, who by their couragious reſolution had gotten this towne, the which the Templers had baſely abandoned. Many Gentlemen which had followed the Abbot in this voyage, ſeeing him in ſuch reputation left the world, and made themſelues Monkes of Ciſteaux, yet with a decent habit, fit for the exerciſe of armes, the which they meant to follow againſt the Infidels Moores, enemies to the Chriſtian Religion.

Knights of Calatraua firſt inſtituted.

This was the beginning of the Knights of Calatraua, an Order which was famous in Spaine. The Abbot Don Raymond beeing freed from feare of ſeege, leauing a good garriſon in Calatraua, he returned to Toledo, and from thence paſt to his Monaſtery of Hitero: about the which he gathered together a great multitude of people, to the D number of twenty thouſand, as the Hiſtories report, whome with their mooueable goods and catteil, hee tranſported to Calatraua, and other places of the fronter, which was badly peopled, making it as it were a ſtrong baſtion againſt the enterpriſes of the Arabians. The king Don Sancho the deſired, liued not long after, but dyed the ſame yeare. They write, that his wife D. Blanche beeing deceaſed ſome few dayes before in child-bed, hee was ſo oppreſt with griefe, as he fell ſicke and dyed. His death was very preiudiciall to the Realme of Caſtile, and followed by many miſeries, the which he did well fore-ſee. He left the gouernement of his ſonne Don Alphonſo, who was yet very young, to a knight whoſe name was Don Guttiere Fernand Ruis de Caſtro, ordayning E that hee ſhould bee bred vp vnder his diſcipline, vntill hee came to the age of fifteene yeares complete: willing that the Knights which held any places and garriſons, ſhould keepe them vntill that time. They ſurnamed him the Deſired, by reaſon of the great vertues wherewith hee was adorned, and the hope and taſte the people had of his good and iuſt gouernement, in one yeare, or there-abouts, that hee raigned. Hee was buried at Toledo in the Cathedrall church, neere to the Empereur Don Alphonſo his father, The Queene Dona Blanche his wife lyes in the Monaſterie of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, to the which a little before her death ſhee had giuen the towne of Nectares, neare vnto Torrezillas de los Cameros.

Death of Don Sancho the Deſired.

The Earle Don Raymond Berenger Gouernour of Arragon, hauing in the meane time made warre againſt Don Sancho King of Nauarre, with his forces of Arragon F and Cattelogne, beeing not able to ingage the King of Caſtile, and taken Buereta, with ſome other pettie forts of ſmall importance, ſeeing in the end that hee ſtriued in vaine againſt an enemie which had not onely meanes to defend himſelfe, but alſo on the contrarie, to offend him: hee yeelded himſelfe tractable to the perſwaſions of

of certain good Prelates, who were much grieued to see Christians seeke the ruine one of another, for their ambition: wherefore in the yeare 1159. after many treaties of Peace, betwixt these two Princes, in the end there was an interview, and they remained good friends, making an end of all their quarrels, which had continued almost fiue and twentie yeares.

1159. Peace betwixt Navarre and Arragon.

We must not wonder, if Secular Princes were in combustion, seeking to rule one ouer another, hauing (it may be) some plausible pretext, seeing that the Prelates of Spaine were a president for them without any reason. The Primacie which hee of Toledo held ouer other Bishops, was not acknowledged of all: for the Archbishop of Braga, and he of Saint Iames refused to obey him:

but the Primate of Primates, Adrian the third, sending Cardinall Hyacinth his Legat from Rome, forced them by a sentence.

D. Alphonſo the noble the ſeuenth King of Caſtille the fourth of that name.

1. THE death of the King D. Sancho confirmed his ſurname of deſired,for that there followed dangerous combuſtions begunne betwixt two great families of Caſtille,through iealouſie and deſire of rule. The young Kings perſon(beeing then but foure yeeres old)was vnder the charge of D. Guttiere Fernando Ruis de Caſtro, according vnto the will of the deceaſed King his father,who had alſo ordained that the captaines and Gouernors of Prouinces and places ſhould continue in their charges, charges, vntill that his sonne D. Alphonso should bee fifteene yeeres old compleate. A Those of the house of Lara, being men of great account, were discontented with this decree; of which family the chiefe was the Earle D. Manrique de Lara, who had two brethren, D. Aluaro, and D. Nugno, all sonnes to D. Pedro de Lara (of whom wee haue made mention) and of D. Aba, forsaken by the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra: with these there ioyned, by reason of consanguinity, D. Garcia d' Acia, their brother by the mothers side, sonne to that Lady D. Aba, and the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra, her first husband: they were greeued to see the Kings person, and the chiefe affaires of the Realme in the hands of them of Castro, who held many places, and good gouernments in Castille and Toledo: wherefore they sought all occasions to seize vpon the authority, and to dispossesse their aduersaries: D. Guttiere Fernandes, was an ancient Knight, B wise, faithfull, and without any malice, who gaue no man occasion to complaine, but great meanes to such as enuied his honour to hurt him by his sincerity. Hee had also beene Gouernor to the King D. Sancho his father, in his youth, and was so worthy a knight, as they say hee had made and armed fiue hundred Knights, with his owne hand. Onely hee wanted the happinesse to haue children: but his brother D. Ruy Fernandes, called the Bald, had foure. D. Fernand, D. Aluar, D. Pedro and D. Guttiere, surnamed Ruys, and one daughter, called D. Sancha Ruys married to D. Aluaro Ruys de Gusman.

F

These factions declaring themselues, euery one stood vpon his gard: and for that it was not easie to dissolue that which D. Sancho had decreed by his testament, nor to wrest the authority from them of Castro by force, being in possession: the brothers of C Lara found meanes to circumuent the good knight D. Guttiere Fernandes, by goodly perswasions, saying, that for the good of the general peace, he should bee content with those honours hee had, and suffer the Earle D. Manriques to keepe the Kings person: the which should in no sort blemish his authority, but should giue great reputation vnto the Earle, who was a noble man of that quality, as hee well deserued it: all the foure brothers promising and swearing vnto him, that they would alwaies preserue and defend the honour and authority which was due to his reuerent age. D. Guttiere deceiued with these good words deliuered the King into the hands of these foure brethren, who remained with D. Garcia d' Acia, as the eldest, the rest hauing at that time no meanes to contradict it, but soone after they had an oportunity to get the King D from him: for D. Garcia, who was not cunning, nor of a bad disposition, beeing entred into some termes and difficulty, touching the entertainment of the yong Kings house, and the necessary prouisions of money for his Estate with the brothers of Lara, they wrought in such manner as hee resigned this burthensome charge vnto them, the which they willingly accepted, as a thing which they had long affected; wherein the Earle D. Garcia, did some-what wrong his honour and faile of his dutie, as well as D. Guttiere Fernandes de Castro had done; so the King came into the power of D. Manriques de Lara.

Indiscretion of D. Guttiere Fernandes.

These alterations, vnfit for the dignity of the young King, discontented D. Guttiere, and withall, those of Lara beganne to faile in that which they had promised him; E wherefore he let them vnderstand that he would haue the King D. Alphonso againe, to nourish and breed him vp according to the disposition of the King D. Sanchos will: but they mocked him, as a man which had lost his sences. Whereupon these two houses went to armes, and drew vnto them their kinsmen, friends and partisans, giuing way and meanes to all the lewd people of the country to commit a thousand insolencies, following the one or the other faction, as it is vsuall in ciuill warres.

And moreouer they made a passage for D. Fernand King of Leon, to enter into the territories of Castille, where hee committed great excesse vnder pretext to pacefie the warres betwixt these two houses of Castro and Lara: for beeing entred with an army, he seized vpon those forts, which were neerest vnto his fronters of Leon, along the ri- F uer of Duero, and passing on further, hee caused the Earle D. Manriques and his brethren to dislodge, who carried the King D. Alphonso with them to Soria. During these tumults D. Guttiere Fernandes de Castro died, and was buried in the Monastery of

Saint

A Saint Chriſtopher of Encas: after whole deceaſe the Earle D. Manriques cauſed his Nephewes D. Fernand, D. Aluaro, D. Pedro and D. Guttiere Ruis to be ſommoned to deliuer vp into his hands the places belonging vnto the crowne, the which they held, and had commanded vnto their vncles death: but they made anſwere that they were not bound to deliuer them vp, ſeeing that the will of the deceaſed King was, that they ſhould hold them vntill the King D. Alphonſo were full fifteene yeeres old. There vpon D. Manrique commanded that the body of D. Guttiere Fernandes ſhould bee vnterred, and charging him with fellony and treaſon againſt the King and crowne, hee ſought to haue him found guilty.

His foure Nephewes imbraced the cauſe, and defended both themſelues and their
B deceaſed vncle, ſaying that they neither had, nor did commit any fellony, in retayning of thoſe places, ſeeing it was according to the laſt will and teſtament of the King D. Sancho, the which they had neuer demanded of their vncle lyuing. The Lords of the councell, who were Iudges in this cauſe, gaue ſentence that there was not any fellony committed, and therefore they ordained, that the body of D. Guttiere, which had beene againſt the law of Nations inhumainely pulled out of his graue, ſhould bee laied in againe. Their contentions were ſo great, and the miſeries which enſued ſo infinit, as preſt by neceſſity, they were forced to ingage all the reuenues of Caſtille and Toledo, for twelue yeeres, vnto King Fernand; and in the end the Earle D. Manriques bound
C himſelfe to deliuer vnto the King of Leon, the perſon of young D. Alphonſo, his Lord, and to make him his vaſſal. And to performe his promiſe, he led the King D. Fernand to Soria, where hauing propounded certaine reaſons, in an aſſembly of the Noblemen of Caſtille, to perſwade them that it was expedient the Kings perſon ſhould bee put into his vncles cuſtody, they deliuered him vnto him, proteſting that they put him into his hands, being a free Prince, and therefore they intreated him to maintaine him in his liberty. The Noblemen durſt not herein contradict the King D. Fernand, being within the country and in armes. The young Infant beeing carried in a gentlemans armes, beganne to weepe and cry out, wherefore they carried him backe to the lodging to giue him an aple, or ſome ſuch like thing to pleaſe him. At that time there
D was preſent D. Pedro Nugnes Almexir, a hardy and generous knight, who beeing greeued at this trecherous act of the Earle D. Manrique, gaue order (that whileſt they dandled the child, to ſtill him) they ſhould bring him a good horſe behinde the Kings lodging, then approching neere vnto the young Prince, making ſhew to flatter him, hee tooke him in his armes, and ſlipping away by ſome ſecret paſſage well knowne to him, he carried him to his horſe, and ſo fled with him to the towne of Saint Eſtienne of Gormas: doing this act for the liberty of his King with ſuch dexterity and diligence (whileſt that the King D. Fernand attended the Infants returne) as he was gon a good way before it was diſcouered.

Treachery of D. Manriques de Lara againſt his Prince and country.

Pero Nugnes a faithful vaſſal.

This beeing knowne by the King D. Fernand hee grew into a great rage, and vſing
E threats, he commanded D. Manrique and the reſt of his faction, to giue order, that the child might bee found out and brought againe, whereſoeuer he were: wherevpon the Earle D. Manrique, and his brethren, vnder collour of ſeeking their King D. Alphonſo, had meanes to get out of Soria, where all was in Combuſtion. Being arriued at Saint Eſtienne de Gormas, that night they ſeized againe of the Kings perſon: notwithſtanding whether remorſe of ſo foule an act, altered the mindes of theſe knights of Lara, or that all the bretheren were not a like affected, as D. Manrique: D. Nugno the yongeſt of the brethren tooke king D. Alphonſo, and carried him to Atiença, not reſpecting the accord made with the King D. Fernand, who holding himſelfe deceiued by D. Manrique, ſent him word by a knight, that hee was a traytor, and that he would bee reuenged. The Earle made no other anſwer, but that it was lawful for him to doe any thing to deliuer
F his King and natural Prince from captiuity. Afterwards the Earle meeting with the King D. Fernand, who accuſed him of treachery, and demaunded Iuſtice of the Eſtates of Caſtille; he anſwered againe, that he knew not that he was a traytor, but that hee repented him not to haue done his beſt endeauor, to deliuer his King, a child of ſo tender age from ſuch vniuſt ſlauery.

The yong King D. Alphonſo giuen in garde to the Inhabitants of Auila.

After many reaſons and allegations of either ſide, the Earle D.Maurique was abſolued: but the King D.Fernand kept in a manner all the places and townes in Caſtille, except ſome of the leſſer, which continued vnder the obedience of the King D.Alphonſo, who was not in any great ſafety, vntill they had found meanes to put him into the Citie of Auila, where hee was faithfully kept, by his good ſubiects the inhabitants thereof, vntill he was twelue yeeres old, wherefore they ſay commonly in Spaine, the Loyal of Auila. Nauarre.

The tumults and confuſions of Caſtille, inuited D.Sancho King of Nauarre, ſurnamed the wiſe, to make his profit, which is the marke whereat all worldly men doe aime: yet had he ſome iuſt pretenſion to doe it, eſpecially to inuade the lands lying vpon the riuer of Oja, which the Emperour D.Alphonſo had laied hold on, during the vacancie and Interregne of Nauarre and Arragon. So as hee went to armes, entred in hoſtile manner into that Prouince, and tooke Logrogno, Entrena and Cerezo: and paſſing on, he alſo tooke Birbieſca, and in a manner all that was in his way, euen vnto Burgos: all which places he did fortefie, but yet he enioyed them not long. The King of Nauarre did all theſe things, without any reſiſtance made by them of Caſtille, beeing fauoured by the confuſion of the time, and the infancy of the young King D.Alphonſo: beſides that towards Arragon hee found himſelfe aſſured by a peace concluded with the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, the which was the better confirmed by his death, which happened in the yeere 1162. in Piedmont, in the Bourge of Saint Dalmace, neere vnto Turin. This Prince went by ſea into Italy, with his Nephew the Earle of Prouence, to conferre with the Emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa, who made warre then in the Dutchy of Milan. B C

Death of D. Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelone. 1162.

D. Alphonſo the ſecond, and the ſixth King of Arragon.

Arragon.

2. THis Earle had gouerned Cattelogne and Barcelone thirty one yeeres, and the realme of Arragon fiue and twenty. He was wiſe and valiant, but too ambitious. He left D.Raymond his ſonne, who was afterwards called D. Alphonſo, heire of both Eſtates by his teſtament: by the which hee gaue vnto D. Pedro his ſecond ſon, the Earledome of Cerdagne, with the ſame rights as Cont Bernard William had held it, and moreouer the demeins and reuenues of the lands of Carcaſſone, and rights of Narbonne, and other places in Languedoc, reſeruing the homage vnto the Earle of Barcelone and King of Arragon his eldeſt: ſubſtituting to D.Pedro his third ſon D.Sancho, in caſe hee died without children, and them two to their eldeſt brother D.Alphonſo, either of them in his Siegneuries, with his children, vnto Henry the ſecond, King of England, his ally and faithfull friend, the Queene D.Petronille his wife remayning Regent and tutreſſe of her Son, and Realme; but ſhe brought D.Alphonſo, being but 12. yeeres old, to the gouernment of the State, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Prouence, his couſin germain, the Queene giuing ouer that charge, as vnfit for women. This was the firſt King of Arragon that was Earle of Barcelone, ſince which time theſe two Eſtates haue not beene diuided. D E Diſpoſition of D. Raymond Berengers wil.

Nauarre.

Returning to D.Sancho King of Nauarre, hee gouerned his realme wiſely and iuſtly, and had about him many good and vertuous Prelats and Knights: amongſt the which were D.Vitian Biſhop of Pampelone, the Earle D. Bela Ladron Lord, that is to ſay, gouernor in Alaua, Rodrigues Martines Gouernor in Maragnon: Pedro Ruis in Eſtella, and Gallipienço; Sancho Ramires in Sangueſſa, Ximeno of Ayuar in Roncal; Ximen Aznares in Tafalla, Sancho Eſquerra in Saint Mary of Vxua, Martin de Leet in Peralta, Aznar de Rada in Falſes and in Valtierra, Peter of Araçury in Logrogno and Tudele, with diuers others. As for his domeſtike affaires, hee was married to D.Sancha Infanta of Caſtille, whom others call Beacia or Beatrix, daughter to the Emperor D.Alphonſo, by whom he had a goodly iſſue: D.Sancho, who was King after his father, D.Fernand, and D.Ramir, F

A D. Ramir, the which was Biſhop of Pampelone: for Eccleſiaſtical charges which had great reuenues, were not there giuen to Paſtors, which had care of Chriſtians manners and conſciences, but were portions for Kings children: hee was otherwiſe called D. Remy. Beſide three ſonnes, ſhe brought him three daughters, D. Berenguela, who was married to Richard King of England, ſurnamed Corde-Lion, and had for her dowry the country of Maine in France, where ſhee ſpent the remainder of her daies, like a vertuous widow, after the deceaſe of the King her husband D. Sanchos ſecond daughter was D. Thereſa, otherwiſe called Conſtance, who died a virgin: and the third was D. Blanche, married to Thibaud Earle of Champaigne and Brie, from whom the race of the Kings of Nauarre, of the houſe of Champaigne had their beginning, in D. Thibaud their ſon. Genealogy of Nauarre.

B About the yeere 1165. the ſentence of the Proceſſe betwixt the Biſhops of Pampelone and Sarragoſſe, begunne in the time of D. Lope, Predeceſſor to D. Vivian, with D. Pedro of Zarroja, for the lymits of their Dioceſes, and Iuriſdictions, which had beene iudged by the Legat Hyacinthe, Cardinal of the title of Saint Mary in Coſmedin, was confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, ſucceſſor to Adrian the fourth, beeing at Montpellier in France, who alſo by his Bull confirmed the preuiledges of the Church of Pampelone, and the order of the regular Chanoins of Saint Auguſtin, inſtituted by D. Pedro Roda, the Biſhop, as other Popes his Predeceſſors had done. An. 1165.

During theſe things, D. Alphonſo Henriques King of Portugal, hauing ſome quiet with the Moores, who were not well ſetled vnder the obedience of the Almohades, ſpent his time about the fortification of the fronter townes of his realme, vnto the C yeeres 1165. when as he went againe to field, parting from Alcaçar de Sal, and went and laied ſiege to Cezimbra, the which he carried, and in like manner Palmela hauing put the Moores of Badajos to rout, in the mountaines of Cezimbra, comming with great troupes of horſe to ſuccor theſe two places. It is a remarkable thing in this Prince, that although he were three ſcore and fiue yeeres old, yet he was continually in armes, and himſelfe in perſon, enduring the trauels and diſcomodities of the warre, as wel as the yongeſt. The troubles of Caſtile and Leon procured his peace on that ſide, where hee was to diſpute his royal title, and the acknowledgment of the lands held by him, with D. Fernand king of Leon: who giuing ſome time of breathing vnto the Caſtil- D lans, vpon whom he had made his profit, although he could not get their kings perſon, he retired into Leon, leauing them of Lara and Caſtro to end their owne quarrels. Portugal.

3 The Eſtates of Caſtille and the Gouernors of places, amideſt ſo great troubles which the King D. Fernand, hee of Nauarre, and the factions of the noblemen of the country had cauſed, maintained themſelues as well as they could, whileſt that the King D. Alphonſo was bred vp at Auila. The Order of the knights of Calatraua, which had his beginning in the time of the King D. Sancho the Deſired, was now confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, by his Breefe in the yeere 1164. directed vnto D. Garcia, firſt Maiſter of the knights of that Order. It appeeres by the Spaniſh Hiſtories, that at that time there were Abbots at Calatraua, and that D. Raymond liued yet: in E whoſe place there ſucceeded Priors, by grant from the Chapter generall of the Order of Ciſteaux. We finde alſo that at that time the houſe of Aualos (which hath beene famous ſince in Caſtille) was then great in Nauarre, from whence it is deſcended: and mention is made of many great perſonages of that family: of D. Ximen d' Aualox, Iean Martines, and Sancho Martines d' Aualos brethren, and of Garcia Nugnes d' Aualos: whereof D. Ximen, in the yeere 1162. gaue vnto the Monaſtery of Saint Emibian, certaine rights which he had in the church of Saint Felix d' Aualos, the letters whereof are yet extant in that Monaſtery. Caſtille. Confirmation of the order of Calatraua. The family of Aualos.

The King D. Alphonſo beeing eleuen yeere old; the Earles D. Manrique, D. Aluaro and D. Nugno de Lara with other Noblemen, which had the charge of him, thought it F now fit, that he ſhould goe and viſit the townes of his realme, and ſhew himſelfe to his ſubiects, who deſired to ſee him: wherefore they drew him out of Auila, with good troupes of horſe, beſides an hundred and fifty horſe which they of Auila gaue him for his gard. Some places which D. Fernand King of Leon had ſeized on in Caſtille, beganne already to reuolt; but when as King D. Alphonſo went his progreſſe, euery towne where hee paſt, obeyed him; vntil hee came to Toledo, whereas D. Fernand Ruis A Caſtro was Gouernor, ſince the raigne of the King D. Sancho, and ment to keepe it vntill the King D. Alphonſo was fifteene yeeres old, as it was decreed by the fathers will: but the Earle D. Manrique de Lara was not of that minde: for hauing ſome ſecret intelligence with a knight of Toledo, called D. Eſtienne Illian, who had built the pariſh church, and the high tower of Saint Romains, and was in ſome bad termes with D. Fernand Ruis, hee had by his practiſes meanes to ſtirre vp the people to a mutiny, hauing cauſed the King to approach to Saint Romains tower, in a diſguiſed habit, where he hung out his armes and collours, ſo as D. Fernand (feating his owne weakneſſe) abandoned the caſtle, and fortefied himſelfe in Huete.

By this meanes the city of Toledo was deliuered vnto the Earle Manrique in the B Kings name, by this knight D. Eſtienne Illian, whoſe picture armed on horſe-backe, for this goodly act, is to bee ſeene in the body of the great church of Toledo, and not for any proweſſe that is knowne to the ignorant people. In recompence whereof they gaue him the gouernment of this Citie. From thence D. Manrique led the King to Huete, againſt D. Fernand Ruis, who beeing faithfully and couragiouſly aſſiſted by the Inhabitants of Huete, ſallied forth againſt the Earle D. Manrique, where there was a cruell battaile: before the fight D. Fernand had giuen his armes and deuice vnto a Squire of his, ſetting him in the moſt remarkable place of the battaile, to the end they ſhould take him for his maſter: for hee knew they had vowed and conſpired his death, at what price ſoeuer: ſo as comming to fight, the Earle D. Manrique followed by his choiſe men, picked out this Squire, whom hee ſlue with his owne hand: C but an other of D. Fernands Squiers, reuenging his Campanions death, gaue the

D. Nugno de Lara for his brothers death, did afterwards accuſe D. Fernand of treaſon, ſaying that hee had cauſed his brother to bee trecherouſly ſlaine, but it was ended by the Prelats, by reaſon of the great ſpoiles they endured; but the hatred continued ſtill betwixt theſe two families: many forts came afterwards into the power of the yong King D. Alphonſo, without any reſiſtance.

The towne of Surita which was held by Lope d' Arenas, would not yeeld, obiecting the teſtament of the young King D. Sancho, yet notwithſtanding they would haue the D place, and hauing inueſted it, they beganne to batter it. D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, was at this ſiege well accompanied, although hee had not beene called, the Earle D. Nugno de Lara and hee beeing at ſome iarre. The taking of this place ſeeming euery day more difficult, D. Nugno, and the Earle D. Suero entred into the towne, vpon aſſurance giuen by oth, to parle, with Lope d' Arenas the Gouernor, but they were detained priſoners; Lope was ſoone after puniſhed for this fraude, God ſhewing that there is not any thing which diſpleaſes him more then falſe-hood and treachery; and in truth there is no brute beaſt more deteſtable then that man which ſeekes to circumuent by promiſes and othes.

There was in King D. Alphonſos campe, one which had ſerued, or beene bred vp in E Lope d' Arenas houſe, who preſented himſelfe vnto the King, offring to deliuer him the place, if hee would giue him meanes to liue, and that there were any one which would bee content hee ſhould wound him, that hee might haue ſome collour to flie vnto the enemy. The King promiſed to recompence him well, but as for the hurting of any one, there was ſome difficulty: yet there was one Pedro Diaz, or Pedro Ruis, as others call him, of Toledo, offred himſelfe to receiue the blow. This varlet, whoſe name was Dominguillo, drew his ſword preſently, and gaue this poore Pedro Diaz, a deadly wound, and then fled, the gard and other ſoldiars making ſhew to follow him towards the towne, where hee was receiued and knowne by his old Maſter Lope d' Arenas, who nothing ſuſpecting Dominguillo, was trecherouſly ſlaine by him; the murtherer ha- F uing meanes to ſlip downe the wall, and to recouer the campe. Vpon the Gouernors death the ſouldiars and inhabitants reſolued to yeeld the towne of Surita vnto the King. Dominguillo, who was prowd of this execution, demanded his reward of the

King:

A King: but the King by a memorable example of Iustice, whosoeuer aduised him, vsed an admirable proportion in this action: for hee first caused his eyes to bee put out, for the murther which hee had committed, hauing not made him acquainted therewith; and then hee gaue him that which was needfull for his entertainement: but hearing after that hee did glory too much in his treason, hee caused him to bee slaine. After this enterprise of Surita, the King dismissed his souldiers, who returned to their houses.

Portugal. : Howsoeuer D. Alphonso Henriques King of Portugal, ended his quarrels with D. Fernand of Leon; yet in the yeere of our Lord 1169. hee had confirmation of his royall titles from Pope Alexander, to whom he sent his Bulles, taking the King D. Alphon-
B so Henriques, his successours, Realme and subiects, into the protection of the church of Rome, paying two markes of gold for an acknowledgment or rent; the which the Archbishop of Braga, did receiue yeerely for the church of Rome, yet no man can say, that this rent was euer paied; and if D. Fernand married his daughter D. Vrraca, by whom he had one sonne called D. Alphonso, who succeeded him in his realmes of Leon and Calicia; yet this affinity did not suppresse the troubles and lamentable factions, which followed.

Leon. King D. Fernand, by the aduise of a banished Portugais, caused the city of Rodrique to be fortified, the which some hold to bee ancient Mirobrisa, and there placed a good garrison, the which did wonderfully annoy the Portugals that lay neere it, & built Ledesma, neere to Salamanca, which did much in-domage that city, as you shal heare: this King
C tooke pleasure in building, when hee was not prest with warre: and therefore they say that Granada, which is neere to Coria Valencia in the Bishoprike of Ouiedo, Villalpando, Mansilla, Majorga in the Bishoprike of Leon, and Castro in Toraphe in the Bishoprike of Zamora are his workes. Hee was diuorced from D. Vrraca, by reason of consanguinity, and tooke to his second wife D. Theresa daughter to Nugno de Lara; after whose death he had a third wife called D. Vrraca Lopes, daughter to D. Lope Diaz, Lord of Biscay; By this last wife D. Fernand had D. Sancho and D. Garcia, lawful heires to the realme of Leon, for that they were, by the Popes sentence, borne in lawful wed-locke, & not D. Alphonso: yet they raigned not; neither did they leaue any heires.

Genealogy of Leon.

D 4 The house of Biscay was then in great esteeme; out of the which was issued the third wife of the King D. Fernand: the order and continuance of which family is thus set downe by the Spanish writers. They name for the best knowne stem of this house, D. Suria, who by his mothers side was Nephew to the King of Scotland, begotten by a knight of Biscay, called D. Lope, who obtained the Siegneury of Biscay in the yeere 870. Suria in the Cantabrian tongue signifies white. He carried in his armories two wolues sables, either of them with a Lambe in his mouth, in a field Argent, which were the ancient armes of Biscay: he married to his second wife D. Dalda, daughter and heire to D. Sancho Estequis Ordognes, Lord of Tauira of Durango, by whom he had one sonne, called D. Manso
E Lopes, who was Lord of Biscay, and of Tauira of Durango: this D. Manso had by his first wife (for hee was married thrice) one sonne, called D. Inigo Esquerra, that is to say, deafe, in the Biscaine tongue, who was the third Lord of Biscay. Of him was borne D. Lopes Diaz the fourth Lord of Biscaie, who liued in the time of D. Fernand Gonçales Earle of Castille. D. Sancho Lopes was his sonne and the fifth Lord of Biscay: who although hee had two sonnes, D. Inigo and D. Garcia, surnamed Sanches, yet did neither of them succeed him in the Siegneurie of Biscay: the reason was, that the souldiars beeing in mutynie, at their returne from a certaine warre in Cubijana of Morillas, in the Prouince of Alaua, as D. Sancho Lopes came amongst their drawne swords to pacifie them, he receiued a wound for an other, and was slaine, leauing these two verie little: wherefore the Biscaines hauing neede of a Lord able to gouerne
F them, they made choise of D. Inigo Esquerra the second of that name, bastard brother to the deceased, who was the sixth Lord of Biscay: of him came D. Lope Diaz the second, who ruled in Biscay. And to make some recompence to the children of D. Sancho Lopes, D. Inigo Sancho had Lodio giuen him for a portion, and D. Garcia that of Orozco. D. Lope Diaz the seuenth Lord of Biscay, was father to D. Diego the eighth Lord of Biſcay, ſurnamed the white, and being maried to a Lady of Arragon, he begat one ſonne called D. Lope Diaz, who was afterwards the ninth Lord of Biſcay, the third of that name. It is that D. Lope which was at the ſiege of Surita, with King D.

Alphonſo, called the Noble, in whoſe raigne wee now are come, and whoſe daughter D.
Vrraca was married to Fernand the ſecond King of Leon and Gallicia: hee alſo (hauing built vp the towne of Haro, in Rioje) ſurnamed himſelfe of Haro, and left it to his poſterity. He had of D. Mencia his wife, one ſonne called D. Diego Lopes de Haro, heire of his fathers eſtates, and an other daughter called D. Gaufreda, who ſome ſay had beene Queene of Nauarre, but it is doubtfull. This D. Diego Lopes, was the tenth Lord of Biſcay, and a very good Knight: who had the honor to bee ſtandard-bearer to the King of B Caſtille, and was at al the exploits of warre, done by King D. Alphonſo the ninth. Hee had to wife D. Maria Diaz de Lara, daughter to Cont Nugno, of whom we haue made mention, and ſhe bare him D. Lopes Diaz de Haro, who was the eleuenth Lord of Biſcay. His Caſtille. Returning to King D. Alphonſo, after the taking of Surita, hauing diſmiſſed his ſouldiars, he returned to Toledo, where hee kept his court, and aſſembled the Noblemen and knights his vaſſals: where finding himſelfe in free poſſeſſion of all the country of Toledo, he came to Burgos, where hee called an other aſſembly, and kept his court, in the forts were yeeled vp vnto him, without any contradiction, according to the will of his deceaſed father, yea thoſe which were held by D. Fernand of Caſtro, who was neuer more ſeene in Caſtille, by reaſon of the quarrels he had with the houſe of Lara, but paſ-ſing to the Moores, hee ſhewed himſelfe a perpetuall enemy to his country. In the aſ-ſembly at Burgos, there was ſpeech of the exceſſe, and outrages done by Fernand King of Leon; to reuenge the which hee reſolued to proclaime warre againſt him, but it was not put in execution long after, by reaſon of D. Alphonſos youth, who was not yet capable of ſo great an enterpriſe. There they treated alſo of the Kings marriage with Elenor that day in Chriſtendome: he was ſonne to Geoffrey Duke of Aniou and Normandie. It was this Henry which had married Queene Elenor, heire of the Dutchie of Guienne, and countie of Poictou, put away by Lewis the ſeuenth the French King.

5 After theſe things, there was an enter-view of two yong Kings, D. Alphonſo of Ca-ſtille, and D. Alphonſo of Arragon, at Sahagun, with ſhewes of great loue; and from thence they went to Sarragoſſe, from whence there was an Ambaſſage ſent to effect the marriage of the King of Caſtille. The Ambaſſadors were D. Celebrun Archbiſhop of Toledo, the Biſhops of Palenza, Calaorra, Burgos and Segobia, the Earles D. Ponce and D.
Nugno, with other Noblemen; who found the court, with the Queene mother and her daughter at Burdeaux: whoſe returne the King of Caſtille attended at Sarragoſſe, E where during his aboad, the league was renewed betwixt Caſtille and Arragon, and a new made for the mutuall defence of both Kings, againſt all men, except the King of England, in the which were named all the great men belonging to either eſtate:
for aſſurance whereof, there was conſigned and laied in pawne the caſtles of Nagera, Biguerra, Clauijo, Ocon and Arueda, for the King of Caſtille; and for the King of Arragon, Hariza, Daroca, Aranda, Epila Borja: with a condition that hee which ſhould breake the league, ſhould looſe theſe places: and the conuentions were ſigned and confirmed by the two Kings, and their chiefeſt Nobles. The Ambaſſadors of Caſtille were welcome to Burdeaux, and their charge was very pleaſing to the king of England: whereupon the Princeſſe Elenor was ſent into Spaine, F beeing accompanied by Bernard Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, the Biſhoppes of Poictiers, Angouleſme, Perigueux, Xaintes, Agen, and Bazas: by Raoul de la Faye, Seneſhall of Guienne, Helie Earle of Perigort, the Vicounts of Tartax, Chaſte-

A Chastelcraud, Chastillon, Mortmar, Vendome, Angoulesme, Labrit or Albret, with very many other Noblemen and Knights. By the treaty made with the Ambassadors it was sayd, that the assurance and contract of marriage should bee made at Tarrassone, and should be sollemnly ratefied in the presence of the King of Arragon: wherefore the two Kings came to Tarrassone, where these things were celebrated and sworne with great sollemnity, in the yeere of our Lord 1170. and for accomplishment thereof at that instant D. Alphonso King of Castille, caused all the Knights of Castille, which were there present, to sweare fealtie to his future spouse: and moreouer hee gaue vnto her in fauour of the marriage, the castles and city of Burgos, Castro, Xeris, Auia, Monçon, Saldagne, Tariego, Dueregnas, Carrion, Aabeson, Medina del Aampo, Villa Escusa, A-Guifts to the new Queene of Castille in fauor of her marriage.

B guillar & Astudillo, & for her idle expences & to furnish her cabinet, he assigned particularly vnto her, Burgos, Nagera, and Castro Xeris: besides he gaue vnto her the rents of the port of Saint Emeterio, Besgo, Cabedo, Briza de Centillana, Calaorra, Logrogno, Arnedo, Biguerra, Granon, Vilhorado, Pancoruo, Monasterio, Poza, Atiença, Osma, Penafiil, Curiel, Surita, Hita, Aegna Negra and others. Moreouer hee promised to giue her the moytie of all hee should conquer from the Moores from the day of their marriage. These promises and matrimoniall conuentions were sworne in the presence of the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and other English Ambassadors, to whom in the Queenes name hee caused the forts to bee deliuered, and the homages aboue mentioned to bee done, all in the presence of the King of Arragon, as an indifferent arbi-

C trator for both parties. These things thus finished, the two Kings of Castille and Arragon, parted good friends, and the Ambassadors, with the new spouse, came with D. Alphonso the Noble, to Burgos, where the marriage was celebrated with great state and royal pompe, after which the court parting from Burgos, it came to Nagera, in the countrie of Oja, where the King gaue leaue to many which had come to attend the solemnitie of his marriage, namely to them of Auila, who had alwaies followed him, to whom for their willingnesse to serue him, hee graunted many priuiledges.

After which hee led the Queene to Toledo, where hee grew so amorous of a Iew, whom they called Hermosa, as hee forgot his new spouse, and intangled himselfe so farre in her loue, as hee almost lost his sences; whereat some Knights of Ca-

Disorderat lust of D. Alphonso king of Castile.

D stille beeing verie much greeued, they thought to doe an act pleasing vnto God, and profitable to the common-weale; to kill this Iew, the which in the beginning the King did beare verie impatiently, but in the end hee acknowledged his error, and detested it.

Vpon the confines of Arragon and Castille, there began at that time a petty estate in Albarrazin, which place was vsurped by a Knight, called D. Pedro Ruis d' Açagra, who held it of God and his sword. Hee was borne in Nauarre, and wonne the loue of the Moores of Murcia, and other neighbour places, which did fauour and succor him in his enterprises, and withall hee had newly made a league with D. Sancho King of Nauarre,

E who supported him and vsed him, to bridle Arragon and Castille, with which estates hee had or feared some Iarres. This fort which had beene in ancient time called Saint Marie of Albarrazin, was a troublesome thorne in the feete of the Kings of Castille and Arragon, into whose territories D. Pedro Ruis d' Asagra, made often roads, at his pleasure: who hauing about this yeere of our Lord 1172. taken some places in Castille, the King D. Alphonso the noble, resolued to make warre against him, and to take them from him if hee could: for this consideration hee made a priuate league with the King of Arragon, who was interessed; by the which it was concluded, that the King of Arragon should haue the fort of Albarrazin; and hee of Castille should haue the rest which D. Pedro did hold, for the obseruing of which Articles, hee of Arragon did giue in pawne to the King of Castille, the castle of Hariza, with Aranda, Boria and

F Arguedas: and the castle of Verdejo was giuen to the King of Arragon by him of castille, bynding also the townes of Agreda, Aquilar and Cerueda: which places were assurances for that which had beene contracted betwixt them, promising that if there should bee any contrauention, or fraude betwixt them, it should bee repaired within three yeeres, or the places lost for him that had committed the fraude. But theſe deſeignes went to ſmoake, the two Kings beeing at a iarre for Hariza, the which was deliuered to the King of Caſtille by Nugno Sanches a knight, without the King of Arragons expreſſe command, and before the warre of Nauarre was begunne. Then the King of Caſtille was moſt commonly accompanied by D. Celebrun Archbiſhop of Toledo, Primat of Spaine, the Biſhops D. Ioſelin of Siguença, Gonçalo of Segobia, Raymond of Palenza, Pedro of Bourgos, Sancho d' Auila, Bernard d' Oſma, with other Prelats and Church-men, of which kinde of men Kings councels did then moſt commonly conſiſt; and therefore whatſoeuer Princes committed, were it good or bad, is iuſtly to bee imputed to them, be it in religion or in matters of State. There were alſo many Noblemen of Marke in thoſe daies; amongſt the which were D. Ponce, Lord Steward, and D. Nugnes ſtandard-bearer of Caſtille D. Gonçalo Maragnon, a ſtandard-bearer alſo, and D. Roderigo Guttieres a Steward, which were the chiefe offices of the crowne: they were annual, as it ſeemes, or elſe at the Kings pleaſure. 6. By their aduice and aſſiſtance, with other Prelats, Noblemen and Knights of his realmes, D. Alphonſo entred Nauarre in the yeere 1173. with a great army, againſt his vncle D. Sancho the wiſe, moued therevnto, as wel by the ſpoiles which he had done in the territories of Rioje and Bureua, during his nonage, as alſo by the perſwaſion of the King of Arragon his couſin, whoſe countrie D. Sancho had inuaded, whileſt that the armie of Arragon was in the Realme of Valencia againſt the Moores, thinking to make his profit thereby, whileſt the King of Arragon was abſent with his forces. So breaking the accord and peace, which hee had made with the deceaſed D. Raymond, and renewed with Queene Petronilla, hee had ouerrunne his country, and forced D. Alphonſo King of Arragon, to giue ouer his praiſe-worthie enterpriſes, and to turne head againſt his enemie, whom he had repulſed into Nauarre, entring by Tudele, where hee did beſiege and take the towne of Arguedas, the which hee fortefied and manned with a good garriſon.

Nauarre inuaded by the Kings of Caſtille and Arragon. C

Theſe two Kings of Caſtille and Arragon beeing in armes, and preſſing D. Sancho in diuers places, hee found himſelfe to weake to make head againſt them, ſo as his countries endured great ſpoiles and miſeries, for his armie beeing defeated towards Caſtille, the Caſtillans did runne as farre as Pampelone: on the other ſide the King of Arragon tooke from him the towne and caſtle of Milagro, the garriſon whereof did alwaies keepe his fronters in alarme, by reaſon whereof hee razed it, but it was ſince repaired by the Nauarrois. Notwithſtanding theſe two vnited forces, yet D. Sancho defended himſelfe valiantly againſt the King of Arragon and tooke from him the caſtles of Traſmos and Caxuelos. The moſt renouned Knights which were in thoſe daies in Nauarre, as appeeres by the ancient Records of townes and Monaſteries, were Inigo Almorauid in Roncal, Sancho Ramires in Aybar, Iordain in Saint Marie in Vxue, Ximen Almorauid in Peralta, Garcia of Albero in Tudele, and Martin Ruis in Eſtella, who had the gouernment of theſe places and forts, and commanded D. Sanchos ſouldiers. 7. During theſe warres, the King of Caſtille reſolued to propound a marriage vnto D. Alphonſo King of Arragon, the which had beene treated of betwixt him and D. Sancha his aunt, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphonſo, by his ſecond wife D. Rica, and would attempt (by the charity which did guide both him and his councel) to breake the marriage which was already concluded betwixt the ſayd King of Arragon and the daughter of Manuel the firſt Emperour of Conſtantinople, and ſo farre aduanced, as ſhee was come alreadie to Montpellier, when as D. Alphonſo of Arragon forſooke her to hearken to the marriage of D. Sancho of Caſtille, to the great contempt and diſgrace of the Emperor. This other marriage was afterwards celebrated in Sarragoſſa, in the preſence of Cardinal Hiacinthe, the Popes Legat in Spaine, in the yeere 1174. in conſideration whereof, the King of Arragon gaue vnto his ſpouſe many townes in Arragon and Cattelogne, imitating the example of the King of Caſtile, who had extraordinarily aduanced the Princeſſe of England. 8 Queene Petronilla of Arragon was deceaſed the yeere before this marriage, it may bee whilſt her ſonne was in Prouence to diſpute the ſucceſſion of the Earle of

Prouence

A Prouence his couſin, who had beene ſlaine nere vnto Nice by the Niſſards: whoſe inheritance he had obtained, notwithſtanding that the Earle of Tolouſa were a great enemy vnto him. They write that this Princeſſe by her laſt wil and teſtament did ordaine, that no women ſhould ſucceed to the crowne of Arragon. Prouence returnes to the crowne of Arragon.

It was the ſame yeere 1174. that King D. Alphonſo the noble confirmed the priuiledges of the city of Toledo, the which we haue ſet downe by Articles during the life of the Emperor D. Alphonſo the ſixth: a while after the King D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, beeing at the ſiege of Cuenca, he quit vnto D. Alphonſo of Arragon the fealty and homage, and al pretenſion of ſoueraignty, which hee had to the realme of Arragon, in confirmation of their friendſhip, and in reſpect of their new contracted alliance, three and fortie B yeeres after that the Realme of Arragon had beganne to hold of the crowne of Caſtille. Caſtille. Arragon exempt for the ſoueraignty of Caſtille.

The Noblemen and Knights which had conducted Manuell the Emperors daughter to Montpellier, ſeeing themſelues and their Princeſſe thus mocked, not knowing what other courſe to take, they would haue carried her backe into Greece: But either by loue or force they married her to William Earle of Montpellier, in whoſe houſe ſhee was lodged: of which marriage iſſued a daughter, called Mary, who in time, was wife to the ſonne and heire of this D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille. This ſonnes name was D. Pedro, borne of D. Sancho of Caſtille, beſides ſhee brought the King her husband, D. Alphonſo, who was Earle of Prouence, and D. Fernand, who beeing a Monke in the royall Monaſterie of Poblette, which his father had finiſhed, Hee left it, to bee Abbot of C Montarragon. King D. Alphonſo had three daughters alſo by the Queene D. Sancha, that is D. Conſtance who was married firſt to the King of Hongarie, and afterwards to the Emperour. Frederic the ſecond, D. Elenor and D. Sancha, both Counteſſes of Tolouſa, the one married to Cont Raymond the father, and the other to Cont Raymond the ſonne. This Queene D. Sancha was verie deuout, after the manner of that age: wherefore as ſoone as ſhe was married ſhe built the Monaſtery of Sixena, of the Nuns of Saint Iean. Arragon. Genealogie of Arragon.

9 This age was (as the reſt) full of deuotions, and inuentions of new ſeruices: for Cardinall Hyacinthe beeing Legate a Latere for the Pope in Spaine, the order of D knights or men at armes, of Saint Iames, had his beginning in the realme of Galicia, by an emulation betwixt ſome knights, & Monkes of Saint Eloy, a Monaſtery in the ſame Kingdome. Theſe good religious fathers ſeeing the great concourſe of people which came from all parts of Chriſtendome to the ſepulcher of Saint Iames, they beganne to build Hoſpitals, out of their reuenues which were very great, vpon the paſſage which in Spaine they doe commonly call the French way, to lodge and feed Pilgrimes, and to ſupplie all their neceſſities, in ſickneſſe or in health: wherein they imployed themſelues honeſtly, and the firſt Hoſpitall of their foundation was that of Saint Marke the Euangeliſts, without the walles of the city of Leon: afterwards they built another vpon the paſſage of Caſtille, called de las Tiendas. In imitation of theſe Monkes, vſing ſuch courteſie to ſtrangers which went to Saint Iames, there were thirteene Knights, very deE uout to this Apoſtle, taking him for their particular Patron and aduocate, according to their inſtruction, vowed themſelues to gard and aſſure the way for pilgrimes againſt the incurſions of the Moores, and other theeues which troubled Spaine; and hauing imparted their deſeigne to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, they agreed to make one body amongſt them, and to make the patrimonie of the Monaſtery of Saint Eloy common, with that of theſe Knights, and others which ſhould ioyne with them: at that time they did enioy about twenty caſtles; which made the Monkes more willing to allow of this communion: al theſe holy ſouldiars were married from their firſt inſtitution, wherefore they did onelie vow coniugal chaſtetie, and as for pouerty it was not very great, F they onelie renounced the propertie of their goods, for the ſeruice of the order; enioying the fruites, whereof they payed tithe vnto the Monkes for the diuine ſeruice, wherein they were imployed: they did vowe obedience to their Priot and Maiſter, by ſuch an order, as the Monkes ſhould bee ſubiect to their Priors both for ſpirituall and temporall; and the Knights to the ſame Prior touching the Caſtille. Order of Saint Iames.

ſpiritualty; but in regard of the temporall they ſhould obay the maiſter of the order. A Firſt conuent of Knights of Saint Iames.

Whereof the firſt was named D. Pedro Fernandes de Puente Encalada. The firſt conuent which was built for theſe Knights, was neere vnto Saint Markes Hoſpitall, without the walles of Leon, on a peece of ground belonging to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, which they gaue; into the which they all retired, taking vpon them a modeſt kinde of habit, fit for the warre, carrying vpon a white cloake a red-croſſe, in forme of a ſword, for a marke of their order, and for an argument of humilitie they had their haire powled, which was no ſmal abaſement in thoſe times.

Their Order was vnder Saint Auguſtin, according to that of the Monkes of Saint Eloy: and all theſe things were ordred in the preſence of Cardinal Hyacinthe, the Legat, and allowed by him, hauing eſpeciall authority for it. A while after D. Pedro, the Ma- B ſter of the Order, accompanied with certaine Knights, this order beeing wonderfully increaſed, went to Rome, to preſent himſelfe to Pope Alexander, who confirmed the order in the yeare of our Lord 1175. according to the diſpoſition of Cardinal Hyacinthe his Legat, who was afterwards Pope. Many haue beleeued, and ſome haue written, that this order of Knights of Saint Iames is more ancient, grounding it vpon a certaine priuiledge which is found at Salamanca, in the Monaſterie of the Holie Ghoſt, where at this preſent the relligious women of that order are: for beſides the moderne Caſtillan Language, in the which this priuiledge is written, with the date and yeere thereof, counted from the natiuity of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, diſcouers the falſhood: for that in thoſe daies all Inſtruments, titles and letters were written in Latin, and that they did account the yeeres from the Æra of Cæſar, there is not any mention found in C Authors of the Inſtitution of this Order, nor of any exploit of the Knights thereof, before this time: beſides other markes of falſhood which may bee diſcouered in this priuiledge, as to intitle the King D. Fernand the Great Lord of Biſcay, and King of Leon, which hee was not, and by conſequence had no cauſe to grant priuiledges to that Monaſtery of the citie of Salamanca, which hath been alwaies of the iuriſdiction of Leon. Whereas in the yeere 1034. which is the date thereof, there raigned D. Bernard the third of that name, ſo as it is not without cauſe if they doubt of the truth of the priuiledges granted to churches and conuents.

Theſe Knights newly inſtituted being fallne into ſome diſlike with D. Fernand King of Leon, raigning at that time, they left their Conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, and re- D tired into Caſtille, where they were courteouſly receiued by the King D. Alphonſo, who gaue them the towne and Caſtle of Vcles, called in old time Vrceſia, where they built that renowned conuent, which is the chiefe ſeate of their religion and order: yet they ſent ſome of their brethren to dwell in their firſt conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, after the deceaſe of the King D. Fernand, vpon condition that the ſuperioritie ſhould belong to that of Vcles: but it is not obſerued, for the conuent of S. Marke doth not acknowledge that of Vcles in any thing, but doth keep their firſt reuenues, the which were ſince augmented in Eſtremadura, after the conqueſt thereof by them of Leon. In time this order did extend farre into Portugal, where it got great reuenues vnder the obedience of the conuent of Vcles, vnto the King D. Denis, who put the Knights E out of his country.

A thouſand launces of the Order of Saint Iames.

This order of the Knights of Saint Iames did ſo grow in wealth and number, by the bountie of Kings, and indulgences of Popes, as they were able to arme a thouſand launces compleat, in both conuents of Vcles and Saint Marke: and before that by the authority of Pope Adrian the ſixth, the maſters place was incorporate to the crowne of Caſtille, the Maiſters of the Order were choſen and diſplaced, if there were cauſe, by the ſuffrages of thirteene brethren, who had that authoritie and power from the whole Order, the which doth enioy more dignities, conuents, monaſteries, colle-

A Beſides one Conuent in the Cittie of Seuille, two Colledges in the Vniuerſitie of Salamanca, ſixe Monaſteries of Religious women; which were the holy Ghoſt at Salamanca, S. Foy at Toledo, Saint Croix at Vailledolit, Saint Iames at Granado, S. Olalia at Merida, and Saint Iames in Iunguera of Barcelone. They haue alſo ſiue Hoſpitals: S. Iames of Toledo, where they go to be cured which haue the poxe or French diſeaſe, and all other infirmities which depend thereon, S. Iames at Cuença, las Tiendas in Caſtile the old, the hoſpitall neere vnto the Conuent of Saint Mark at Leon, and the hoſpitall of the Conuent at Vcles. Moreouer, this Order hath many commanderies, the which are bound to ſerue in time of warre againſt the Moores, and to furniſh 368. lances: thoſe which belong to the iuriſdiction of Vcles, are, the great Commanderie of Caſtille, that of Para-

B cuellos, Monthernand, Mora, dos Barrios, Monreal, Horcajo, el Corral of Almaguer, el Campo de Critana, Alhambra, Membrilla, Montizon, Bedmar, Vacas, Segura de la Sierra, which is the beſt Commanderie of all Spaine: Yeſte, Moratallal, Carauaca, Aledo, Ricote, Biedma, Cieça, Soconos, Torres, and Cagnamares, Montiel, Socuellamos, Villamaior, Carrizoja, Vilhermoſa, Vallanoua de la Fuente, the buildings del campo de Montiel, Villa Eſcuſa de Haro, the buildings of Mancha, and the riuer of Tayo, Huelamo, Orria, Eſtremera, Saint Croix de Sarça, Villoria, Villarubia, Alpages, and the Priorie of Vcles, the Chamber of the Priuiledges of the Order, and Alorqui. Theſe bee thoſe which acknowledge Vcles. Now thoſe follow which are of the Iuriſdiction of Saint Mark of Leon, the great Commanderie Aquilarejo, Calçadilla, la Puebla de Sancho Peres,

C el Santo, Villafrancha, la Fuente del maeſtre, Almendralegio, Lobon, Montijo, Merida, Alcueſcar, Riuera, and Azebucha, Hallame, Ellotiua, Palomas, Ornachos, Reyna Hinojoſa, Medina de la Torres, Valencia del ventoſo, Monaſterio, Montemolino, Vſagre, Azuaga, Guadalcanal, Mures, Benaçuça, Eſtepa, the houſes of Corduba, the buildings in the Prouince of Leon, the Prouince of the conuent of Leon, Villauoua of Aliſdar, Vena Mexi, the Prouoſtſhip of Bienuenida. In Caſtile the old, are Pegna, Vſende, Eſtriana, Caſtrotoraua. Beſides all theſe there are the commanderies of la Torre d'Ocague, Sarça, Mirauel, Caſtelleja de la Cueſta, Barra, Caſtroverdé. And in the Realme of Valencia are the commanderies of Muſeros, Enguerra, Orcheta, Sagra, Zenet and Fradel. Beſides theſe Commanderies, this Order hath at this day aboue ſixe hundred

D Knights of the habit, aboue two hundred Clerkes breethren, which remaine in the conuents, with Vicarages and other Benefices, ſo as it is wonderfull great and rich. And although it were firſt inſtituted to make warre againſt the Infidels, yet there are few at this day which affect theſe commanderies, or the habit to that end, but only to increaſe their reuenues, or to be in greater reputation among ſouldiers, by meanes of this habit. Such was the iuriſdiction of this Order of Knights.

During the raigne of this King Don Alphonſo the Noble, the Monaſterie of religious women of Balbuena was built by Peter of Balbuena an Hermite: in like manner one Iohn of Ortega, borne at Quintana in Ortugno, in the Dioceſſe of Burgos, was ſanctified, I know not for what holines, and his bodie was buried in the yeare 1173. in the Monaſtery

E which carries his name: where the Spaniſh Authors ſay, hee did many miracles. There were infinit donations made vnto Monaſteries, Conuents, and Orders of Knights, by the King and the Nobility of Spaine, for the redemption of their ſoules, and of their kindred and friends deceaſed, as their letters report.

10 The Order of the Knights of Calatraua, whoſe beginning wee haue deſcribed in the life of the king D. Sancho the deſired, was much augmented at that time, and was only gouerned by maſters: whereof the firſt was called D. Garcia, to whom ſucceeded D. Martin Peres of Syon: and the third maſter which gouerned at that time, was D. Nugno Peres, of Quignones. The firſt Conuent of this Order was at Calatraua: but ſince the Knights

F made diuers changes, as appeares by their Hiſtories, as to Ciruelos, Buxeda, Corcoles, and caſtel of Saluatierra: and ſince the chiefe ſeate of their Order was tranſlated to the caſtell of Couo, in the time of D. Nugno Hernandes the twelfth Maſter, where it now remaines. The rents and reuenues of this holy company of Warriours haue ſo increaſed from time to time, by the bountie of the Kings of Caſtile, as they haue beene ſeene to ſerue againſt the Moores with 300 Lances well appointed, whereunto thoſe Commanderies of Valencia there are alſo other commanderies. In Caſtile are the Priories of Seuile, Granado, Iaen, Alhama, Fuencaliente, Porcuna, Sugueca, and Villatoro, beſides other dignities & eccleſiaſticall reuenues. This Order was confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, and receiued into the protection and tuition of the Apoſtolike Sea, and had vnder it, Knights of the Alcantara for a time.

Nauarre. About the yeare 1176. was founded the Monaſterie of our Ladie of Irançu, by Don
An. 1176. Pedro de Paris, biſhop of Pampelone, who notwithſtanding he called himſelfe ſo, was of Nauarre. It is very likely that the Prelates in thoſe dayes had a great deſire to build Monaſteries and ſuch like houſes, that they might leaue ſome markes and memorie after their death of their diligence in the eſtate whereunto they were called: for otherwiſe they could C leaue no ſubiect to ſpeake of them, that age beeing vnlearned, and full of ignorance, ſo as not knowing in a manner any other duties, they thought themſelues ſufficiently diſcharged, if they did build any retreate for Monkes: and withall, they had an aſſurance, that their beginning ſhould not remaine imperfect, nor vnprouided of rich reuenues, ſe-ing that the hearts of Kings, and of all men in generall, were ſeaſoned with this perſwaſion, that to enrich the Clergie, was the true meanes to wipe out all their offences, and to bee ſaued: Wherefore all their exhortations, councells, and other care, tended onely to this end, to entertaine all, eſpecially the Nobilitie in this opinion. This Biſhop, according to this kind of doctrine, built and erected this Monaſterie of Noſtra Signora of Irançu, and there placed the religious of Ciſteaux: the Abbot of which place is of D great authoritie in Nauarre, and hath a voyce in the aſſembly of the Eſtates, as a chiefe member of the Clergie.

Caſtille. 11 Returning to the ſecular affaires of Caſtile, wee finde that this yeare, Don Alphonſo, the Noble, made another roade into Nauarre, being aſſiſted by Don Cel-brun, Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and many other Biſhops, but to ſmall effect. The moſt renowned among the Knights, which ſerued him, were Don Gonçal of Maragnon, his Standard-bearer, and Don Roderigo Guttieres Lord Steward: theſe were Offices in the
An. 1177. court of Caſtile, which were held during the kings pleaſure.

Cuenca taken from the Moores. This warre was diuerted by the inuaſions which the Moores made into Caſtile and Arragon, in the yeare 1177. Whereupon the two Kings ioyning their forces together, E beſeeged Cuença. The place was ſtrong and well manned, and hard to be forced: wherefore the King of Caſtile left the king of Arragon there, who after many aſſaults tooke it.
There they placed and inſtituted an Epiſcopall ſeate, changing that of old Valeria, by a graunt from Pope Alexander the third. After which, the Moores of Alarçon, doubting they ſhould not be able to defend that place, quit it: which conqueſts remained to Ca-ſtille: and this was at the ſame time when as King Don Alphonſo the Noble, did remit the Soueraigntie and homage which the King of Arragon did owe to the Crowne of Caſtille.

An. 1179. In the yeare 1179. there was a new League made and confirmed betwixt theſe Prin-League againſt Nauarre. ces of Caſtille and Arragon, to make warre againſt the king of Nauarre, at their com- F mon charge, and equall conqueſts: according to the which Don Alphonſo the Noble did ſo preſſe the King Don Sancho alongſt the Riuer of Oja, as hee tooke from him the places which hee had ſeazed on during his infancie, and recouered Burbieſca,

Cereſo,

A Ceresо, Granon, Entrena, and Logrogno, remaining by this meanes Lord and Maſter of Rioje and Bureua, the which the kings of Nauarre could neuer after get. This loſſe was made more grieuous by the death of Donna Beacia, Queene of Nauarre, a Princeſſe of great vertue, who (as ſome write) was buried in the Cathedrall church of Pampelone.

Rioie and Bureua taken by the Caſtillans from Nauarre

12 After all this, D. Alphonſo the Noble came to Burgos, to prouide for the neceſſities of the warre, as well againſt Nauarre, as the Moores: and hauing need of great ſums of money to that end, he propounded in a generall aſſembly of the Eſtates at Burgos, to leauie a taxe vpon the people, whereunto the Nobility as well as the reſt ſhould contribute, impoſing fiue Marauidis of gold for euery perſon, the which was valued aboue fiue Ducats: this counſell was giuen him by Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, but it tooke

B no effect: for all the Gentlemen of Caſtile (beeing diſcontented that hee ſought to infringe their liberties) fell to armes, and beeing led by the Earle Don Pedro de Lara, they were reſolued to defend it, with the hazard of their liues. Wherefore D. Alphonſo changed his opinion, and let them vnderſtand, that from thenceforth hee would maintaine their immunities, and that whatſoeuer he had then propounded, was not to continue, but onely to ſupply the preſent neceſſitie of his affaires, which he would ſeeke to furniſh by ſome other meanes. For the great reſolution which D. Pedro de Lara ſhewed in this action, they ſay, that the Nobilitie of Caſtille did grant to him and to his ſucceſſors, a ſollemne break-faſt, in teſtimonie of his good indeuour in a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence: and moreouer they affirme, that thereby the Lords of Lara haue the firſt voice

Nobility of Caſtile defend their freedom

C for the Nobilitie in the Court of Caſtil. It is not from theſe 5. Marauidis of gold, that the Prouerbe is growne in Spaine, To reuenge or defend their Nobilitie for fiue hundred ſolz, for fiue Marauidis are not fiue hundred ſolz. Wherefore leauing all the fables which ſome produce to that purpoſe, you muſt vnderſtand, that according to the ancient lawes of Caſtile, the iniurie which any one did vnto a Gentleman, where there was a ciuill reparation, they payed fiue hundred ſolz for a fyne, which were worth foure hundred Marauidis of currant money at thoſe dayes, and that which was done to one which was no Gentleman, was repayred by three hundred ſolz, which were worth but two hundred and fortie Marauidis: wherefore the Prouerbe, to reuenge his Nobility, for 500. ſolz, is drawne

Whence the Prouerb comes in Spaine, to reuenge his Nobilitie for 500 ſolz.

D from theſe ciuill lawes. D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile meaning to follow the warre with all vehemencie againſt the Moores, after that he had recouered thoſe places which D. Sancho king of Nauarre had taken from him, and the quarrels betwixt him and his vncle Don Fernand king of Leon beeing ſomewhat reconciled: by the mediation of the Noblemen and Prelates of both Realmes, and by the meanes of the king of Arragon, who ſent Don Berenger Biſhop of Lerida, and D. Raymond of Moncada thither: the more to tye the holy Knights vnto him, and to haue them readie at need, he made Vcles the chiefe ſeate of the Knights of Saint Iames, to whom he gaue the Townes of Mora, Ocagne, Oreja, and other places, along the riuer of Tayo. He gaue to the Order of Calatraua, the townes of Magueda, Aceca, Cogolludo, Surita and others: hee peopled the towne of Palence in

E Vera, or rather Playſance, and there placed the auncient Epiſcopall ſea: hee fortified Toledo, and rampared Alarcos in that Dioceſſe, beeing a place of importance vpon a hill on the left hand, comming from Almodouar del Campo, to Cité reall, about Caracuel.

13 In the meane time there fell out a great quarrell, betwixt Don Fernand king of Leon, and Don Alphonſo Henriques King of Portugall, by reaſon of the fort of Cité Roderigo, whereas the King of Leon maintained a garriſon which did much annoy the Portugals: for the ſouldiers of this place did continually ſpoile the Portugals countrie, without any reſpect: wherefore D. Alphonſo Henriques, who was now very old, ſent his ſonne D. Sancho with an army againſt this garriſon of the King of Leon, and to race the place, whereof D. Fernand beeing aduertiſed, he fortified his guard there, and approching himſelfe with good troupes, he encountred the Portugals neere to a place called Arraganal,

F or Arganal, where they were defeated, and their Generall D. Sancho taken, with many Noblemen and Knights of his armie, who notwithſtanding were courteouſly ſet at libertie by the King of Leon.

D. Alphonſo Henriques wonderfully incenſed at this loſſe, being now aboue 85. yeares old, he gathered his army together, and went to horſe, where entring Galicia in hoſtile manner, manner, he tooke Lymia, Turon, and other places: then returning into his countrie, hee drew his forces againe together, and marched beyond Guadiana, where he did aſſaile the cittie of Badajos which the Moores held, beeing in a countrie, the conqueſt whereof did belong to the Realme of Leon: whereby it appeares, that among the Chriſtian Princes of Spaine, there was ſome diuiſion made for their warres againſt the Moores, to the end they ſhould not croſſe one another by their ambition and couetouſneſſe. The king of Portugal battered Badajos with ſuch ſpeed, as he had meanes to enter it, and wonne two parts of the towne, forcing the Moores to retire into a part, which was of ſome ſtrength, where they defended themſelues. The King of Leon hearing of this enterpriſe of the King of Portugall, (although he were not fully reconciled with his nephew of Caſtile, by reaſon of the new troubles which happened by the reuolt of D. Fernand Ruiz de Caſtro, & that he muſt of force leaue ſome part of his forces to make head vpon the frontiers of Caſtile, (if happily they would preſſe him on that ſide) marched from Zamora, which was newly taken by him, with ſuch ſouldiars as he could gather together, towards Badajos, whereas D. Alphonſo came to meet him, and gaue him battaile, which the Portugals loſt: ſo as D. Alphonſo Henriques was forced to fortifie himſelfe in that part of Badajos, which he had wonne: yet finding himſelfe not very ſafe, he reſolued to retire as well as he could into his countrie: but as they went out of the cittie in a great preſſe, hee bruized his foot againſt a barre of the gate, ſo as he was taken by the Leonois, who carryed him to the campe to the king D. Fernand, who receiued him with all honour, as his father-in-law, and a great Prince as he was, from thence he was carried to Auila, where hee was carefully looked vnto, and there made an accord with the King of Leon his ſonne-in-law: ſo as they continued good friends. The places which the Portugals had taken in Galicia, were reſtored, and D. Fernand deſired no other ſatisfaction, but an oath of fealtie and acknowledgement of the countrie of Portugal, holding of Leon. So Don Alphonſo Henriques returned free into his Realme of Portugall: after which time he could not ride, being lame of his fall, but was ſtill carried in a coach or chariot.

Leon.

As for D. Fernand Ruis de Caſtro, who, as wee haue ſayd, had left the king of Caſtiles ſeruice, and was retired into the Moores countrie, after that hee had followed their armies ſome time, in the end he came to ſerue D. Fernand King of Leon, by whom he was put into cité Roderigo, after that he had ſuccoured it, and chaſed away the Portugals. This Knight who was of a turbulent ſpirit, and did hate the Caſtillans deadly, bred a quarell betwixt the Kings of Leon and Caſtile, making continuall roades from his garriſon of cité Roderigo, into the countrie of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtile, and had newly defeated ſome troupes of Caſtillans, which were gathered together to repulſe him, whereas ſome were ſlaine vpon the place, and ſome taken priſoners, among the which was the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, and others whome he deliuered afterwards vpon their faith. This was the occaſion which did much trouble and hinder the King D. Fernand, when as hee came againſt his father-in-law: and the Portugals who beſeeged Badajos, a towne in his iuriſdiction belonging to the Moores, whom notwithſtanding hee chaſed away, making himſelfe maſter of the towne: where he left Aben Abel, a Moore for Gouernor, in whom he truſted, for that the Inhabitants were all Moores: but this Infidell did not keepe the place long, but yeelded it to Aben Iacob, great Miralmumin of the Almohades, ſonne and heire to Abdelmon deceaſed.

15 Aben Abel did not onely commit this trecherie againſt the king D. Fernand, but moreouer hauing gathered together great forces of the Moores Almohades, hee ouerrunne and ſpoyled the territories of Leon: then entring into Portugal, he came and beſeeged the towne of Saint Iren, in the which the king D. Alphonſo Henriques was, being then old, and vnprofitable for the warre; who was in great danger to be taken within that place: but the King Don Fernand comming in good time, the ſeege was raiſed, and the Moores put to route: who were afterwards purſued by the Infant Don Sancho, who marched with the armie of Portugall neere vnto Seuille, where beeing incountred by the Moores, he vanquiſhed them, and then beſeeged Niebla: but he was forced to leaue it, beeing aduertiſed that the Moores were entred by Extremadura, and did beſeege Veija: wherefore being preſt to defend his owne, he left the other. Arriuing at Veija, he defeated and diſperſed the Moores, and freed the towne from danger: this was in the yeare, 1181. 1181.

At that time the chiefe in Spaine among the Princes of the Moores, according to the diuiſion which they had made among themſelues, vnder the Soueraigntie of Maroc, were the Kings of Murcia; one of the which called Lobo, had had a perpetuall hatred againſt the Royall family of Almohade, called the Mazemutes. This Lobo had beene tributarie to the King of Arragon: but during the quarrels betwixt Arragon and Caſtile, he had rebelled, by the fauour of the King of Caſtile: whereupon the King of Arragon fauoured the Mazemutes. Lobo beeing dead, his ſonne Modef ſucceeded him, who was father to Zaen, the laſt King of the Moores at Valencia. Moores. Zaen the laſt King of the Moores.

16 As for Zamora which D. Fernand King of Leon had newly ſubdued, it was thus: The king of Leon hauing built and peopled the towne of Ledeſma and others, to accommodate his new Collonies, hee had ſomewhat reſtrained the territorie of Salamanca, whereat the Inhabitants beeing incenſed, they rebelled againſt him: and hauing drawne vnto them Auila and Zamora, and infected other neighbour places with the poyſon of their rebellion, they made choice of a Knight, called Nugno Rauia, for their head; with whom going to field with a great number, as well of their cittizens, as of their allies, the King D. Fernand came and charged them neere vnto Valdemuça, where he did quite defeate them, and tooke their captaine D. Nugno Rauia aliue, whoſe head he cauſed to be cut off. This victorie made the chief of them which had taken armes againſt the King, to retire, giuing the reſt occaſion to giue ouer the enterpriſe, and then all ioyntly together demanded pardon, and obtained it. The towne of Zamora beeing (as we haue ſayd) ingaged in this mutinie, the King D. Fernand led his victorious armie thither, but the Inhabitants yeelded without any difficultie: ſo within few daies theſe two townes, and others by their example, returned to the obedience of the king of Leon. Leon.

17 This yeare 1181. D. Sancho king of Nauarre, fortified a little towne, called at that time Gaſteiz, to ſerue for a barre againſt the king of Caſtile, and to defend the frontier in the Prouince of Alaua. This place being ſince augmented in circuit and people, was called Victoria, a part whereof (which at this day is called Villa de Suço) was that Bourg of Gaſteiz. The king granted to his new town the ſame Lawes he had done to Logrogno, correcting and reforming them in ſome points: he gaue many priuiledges to the Inhabitants, namely, that they ſhould not haue any ſtranger to bee Iudge or Gouernour ouer them, but one borne in the countrie, who ſhould be choſen and changed by them, if they found him not faithfull and capable: the which was called the priuiledge Merino, according to the ſtyle of the countrie. They haue obſerued this order in the gouernement of the towne, the which is one of the beſt ordered in Spaine, hauing aboue all things beene carefull not to admit any new Chriſtian to publike charges, vnleſſe he bee of foure deſcents. The reaſon of this name Victoria, was for ſome victorie obtained in that countrey againſt the Caſtillans, as it is to be preſumed: but by the defect of Hiſtories of thoſe times the particularities are not knowne. Nauarre. Victoria built at Alaua.

After that this town came vnder the obedience of the kings of Caſtile, they did much inlarge it in circuit, and built the foure pariſhes of Saint Michel, Saint Vincent, S. Peter, and Saint Illefonce or Alphonſe. It is written of this king D. Sancho the Wiſe, that hauing about this time ouer-runne the territorie of Rioje and Bureua, the which D. Alphonſo of Caſtile had taken from him ſome yeares before, and beeing neere vnto Burgos, at a place called Atapuerca, he gaue a blow with his ſword againſt an Elme, for a marke that the limits of Nauarre ſhould extend ſo farre: then returning with an infinite number of cattell, and other ſpoyles, as he had a little paſt the Monaſterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, the Abbot of that place, who was a reuerent man, took the Standard of Cid Ruis Diaz great Grand-father to the king D. Sancho, (who was buried in that Monaſterie) & mounted vpon a Mulet, beeing accompanied by tenne of his Monkes; the ſtrongeſt of which carryed this Standard: he made all the haſt he could after this armie, vntill hee had ouertaken the king, before whome he humbled himſelfe. The king wondring to ſee theſe Monkes in this equipage, with ſtandard of warre, yet he gaue them good reception, beeing of himſelfe very deuout: and demanding what was the reaſon of their comming, the Abbot ſayd vnto him, That he was Abbot of Saint Peter of Cardegna, and that he was come vnto him to beſeech him, for the honour of Cid Ruis Diaz, his great Grandfather,

(who was interred with them and his Standard which he ſaw in their hands) that it would A pleaſe him to leaue the prey which he carried away. The King thought thereon a little, in the end he found himſelfe ſo touched with the remembrance of Cid Ruis, and the deuotion and great reuerence he bare vnto the religious, as he left this great booetie which hee had made, to reſtore it to the owners, wherewith all men were not content.

Caſtile. The quarrels betwixt the kings of Caſtile and Nauarre continued long, although by fits they had ſome reſt, but it was a counterfeit peace, or a feate of warre. Logrogno and Aguiſejo were (by ſome accord made betwixt theſe Princes) as neuters betwixt Nauarre and Caſtile, in the hands of Ramir de Barea: but the citty of Calaorra was held by a knight called Don Diego Ximenes, in the name of Don Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. And for that the warres betwixt theſe Chriſtian Princes were very diſhonorable and preiudiciall to re- B ligion, whereof they carryed the title, Pope Lucius the third then raigning, ſent a Cardinall Legat into Spaine, to reconcile them, who vſed great diligence, but not with ſuch effect, as he deſired. The kings of Caſtile and Arragon had an interview, and he of Arragon paſt to Saint Iames, to viſit the Apoſtles Sepulcher. This Legat did ſet downe an order betwixt theſe two kings, for the conqueſt of the Moores countrie, whereunto hee did animate theſe Princes, and aſſigned to Arragon, that which lyes from Valencia towards Cattelogne, and the reſt to Caſtile: with which diuiſion the kings of Arragon (which came after) were not well content, ſo as they were faine to make a new diuiſion, extending the iuriſdiction of Arragon, vnto Alicant: this happened ſince in the raigne of Don Pedro.

Arragon. 18 This king Don Alphonſo of Arragon, hauing about that time held a Prouinciall C Councell at Tarragone in Cattelogne, made a decree among other things, That from thencefoorth the Notaries ſhould not ſet downe the yeares of the raigne of the Kings of France, in any contract which ſhould be made in Cattelogne, as they had till then obſerued, but onely the yere of the Incarnation of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt; which was, that they would no more acknowledge the ſoueraigntie of France, of whom Cattelogne and the Countie of Barcelone did hold and depend. This King D. Alphonſo finding himſelf mightie, and hauing a good ſhare on this ſide the mountaines, buſied himſelfe in the French warres, taking part with the factions, which were among the Noblemen of that nation, and yet was neuer in very good tearmes with Caſtile, but for his own profit: yet he maintained himſelfe wiſely in his countrie, and with reputation. D

Portugall. 19 Don Alphonſo Henriques being very old, and at the graues brinke, thought what An. 1183. was fit for his ſoules health, as he had beene inſtructed: he procured in the yeare 1183. to haue the bodie of Saint Vincent tranſported to Lisbone; the which they ſayd, was in that countrie called Algarbo, on the holy promontorie, the which hath beene ſince called (by reaſon of this relique) Cape Saint Vincent, he was borne at Sarragoſſa. The king went twiſe in perſon to Cape S. Vincent, beeing 89. yeares old, for the remouing of this bodie, the which he placed in the Cathedrall church at Lisbone. This Prince was ſo religious, and ſo great a benefactor to the Clergie, as (beſides the three Monaſteries of S. Croix of Coimbra, of Alcouaſa, and of S. Vincent at Lisbone) hee built the great Cathedrall church of that cittie, and that of Ebora, indowing them with great reuenues. The queene E Donna Malfada his wife, carrying the like zeale, did alſo build the Monaſterie of Saint Dominike at Porto, the church of Saint Peter, the Monaſterie of Leza, of the Order of S.
Iohn, a League from the ſame cittie, and Saint Mary d'Aquas Santas, Saint Saluator of Goandara, Saint Peter de Retes, Saint Mary de Gojos, and about Guymaranes the Mo-naſterie of Acoſta, with many others, to the number (as they ſay) of an 150. if they fayle not in their account. And for a teſtimonie of great charitie, they ſay, that theſe good Princes left a rent to the barke of Mexanfrio, vpon the riuer of Duero, to the end they ſhould paſſe euery one without any fee.

Whileſt they buſied themſelues about theſe workes of pietie, Aben-Iacob great Miralmumin of the Arabians, (being aduertiſed of the routs and ruine of his ſectaries in Spain) F paſt the ſtreight in perſon with great forces of the Almohades Affricanes, where hauing ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, hee went to beſeege Saint Iren, into the which Don Sancho the Infant of Portugall had put himſelfe, beginning to make his Engines readie

A ready to batter it, where the beſeeged were likely to be in great danger: but the good old man Don Alphonſo Henriques would not let the Infidels glorie, in that they had done him this affront in his old age, but hauing put his men in order, and being reſolute, hee ledde them to ſuccor his ſonne, who had intelligence of the Portugall armie, the which (being fauoured by a furious ſalley which the beſeeged made) charged the Moores armie with ſuch reſolution, as they put them to flight, with great ſlaughter of their beſt men, and the loſſe of their king Aben Iacob, who being mortally wounded in the charge by a Portugal, dyed at the paſſage of the riuer of Tayo. This battell was wonne in the yeare 1184. on S. Iohn Baptiſts day, fiue dayes after the Moores had begun the ſeege. Aben Ioſeph his brother ſucceeded this Moore, and was the third King of the Almohades. 1184.

B 20 After this famous victorie, theſe Princes, father and ſon came to Coimbra, which was at that time the chiefe towne of the Realme of Portugal, and from thence to Porto, where the marriage of D. Thereſa Infanta of Portugall, was concluded with Philip Earle of Flanders. Beeing returned to Coimbra, D. Alphonſo Henriques fell ſicke, whereof hee dyed, being 91. yeares old, hauing raigned with the title of a King about 46. yeares, and had ſucceeeded in his fathers Eſtates, and held them 73. yeare. His body was interred in the Monaſterie of S. Croix of Coimbra, D. Sancho his ſonne was king after him in Portugall, ſurnamed the Builder of townes. Portugal. D. Sancho the 2. King of Portugal, firſt of that name.

21 D. Fernand King of Leon, had a little before his death, put away D. Vrraca his daughter, by reaſon of proximitie of bloud, their marriage beeing made without a diſ-
C penſation from the Pope, who beeing (as they write) wonderfully preſt by the King, to giue them leaue to remaine together, would neuer yeeld vnto it, notwithſtanding that of her was borne D. Alphonſo, who ſucceeded his father in the Realmes of Leon and Gallicia: they were couſins in the third degree. D. Fernand married afterwards with the daughter of the Earle Don Nugno, who liued little with him: then he tooke to his third wife D. Vrraca Lopes, daughter to the Earle D. Lopes, and ſiſter to Don Diego Lopes de Haro, with whom he continued not long, for hee died in the towne of Benauent in the yeare 1188. hauing had two ſonnes by her called D. Sancho Fernandes, and D. Garcia. His bodie was interred at Compoſtella, in Saint Iames church, where as his mother D. Berenguela the D Empreſſe did lye. Leon. Fernand King of Leon puts away his wife.

D. Alphonſo the 9. of that name, the 27. King of Leon.

22 AT the time of his death, it ſeemed there remayned no cauſe of quarrell, betwixt Leon and Caſtile, which was not decided and ended. His ſonne D. Alphonſo beeing troubled with continuall ſtormes and quarrels by his mother-in-law D. Vrraca Lopes, was retired into Portugall: ſo as at the time of his fathers death, he was abſent, but being aduertiſed thereof, he came preſently to Leon, where he was receiued and crowned king,
E without any contradiction. The King of Caſtiles Councellors were of opinion, that by the death of D. Fernand, their Prince had a good oportunitie offered, to bee reuenged of the wrongs which were done him during his nonage. If he had then any deſire of reuenge the future euents will ſhew. D. Alphonſo King of Leon.

D. Alphonſo ſurnamed the Noble, raigning then in Caſtille, was numbred for the 4. of that name, of thoſe that raigned alone in Caſtille, whoſe poſteritie was very great; for he had eleuen children by Queene Elenor, daughter of England; the eldeſt was Queene Blanche, mother to the king S. Lewis of France: the ſecond D. Berenguela who was queene of Leon, daughter to D. Alphonſo the ninth. The 3. was a ſonne named D. Sancho, who died in his Infancie: the 4. was D. Vrraca, Queene of Portugall, married to D. Alphonſo the ſecond of that name ſurnamed the Groſſe: the 5. child was Don Fernand, who died alſo
F yong: the ſixt was D. Malſada, dead in Salamanca and was not married: the 7. D. Conſtance Abbeſſe of las Huelgas de Burgos, a Monaſterie built by her father. Then had D. Alphonſa, and D. Elenora two daughters, who died young: and ſucceſſiuely the Queene was deliuered of another daughter, called alſo Elenor like her ſelfe, who was wife to Don Iayme, or Iames, firſt King of that Name, and the eighth King of Arragon. Caſtile. Genealogie of Caſtile.

In the end they had the infant Don Henry, who ſucceeded his father in the realmes of Caſtile and Toledo. Theſe were the children which iſſued of that marriage. A

Leon. The other Don Alphonſo being crowned King of Leon, his mother-in-law retired into Nagera, where ſhe liued long in her widdow-hood, and beeing dead, was buried in the Monaſterie of Saint Mary the royall, in the chappell of the true Croſſe, whereas afterwards others of her houſe were interred, and three of her brethren, Don Lopes Diaz, D. Martin Lopes, and Don Diego Lopes de Haro. The new king of Leon ſtayed not long after his Coronation before he came to the court of Caſtile, beeing at Carrion, where they ſay, that King Don Alphonſo the Noble his couſin made him knight, as he did alſo Conrad the fourth ſonne to the Emperor Fredericke Barbaroſſa; to honour whom, the Spaniards write, that he would haue giuen him the Infanta Donna Berenguela his daughter, but B ſhe would not go into Germany: others ſay, that the marriage was made and accompliſhed: but Conrad beeing departed to returne into Germanie, (whither he was called to be Duke of Suabe) Donna Berenguela deſired to be diuorced, the which was done by the meanes of Don Gonçalo Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and Cardinal, Gregorie the Popes Legate: and was afterwards married to D. Alphonſo King of Leon, couſin germaine to her father. Don Raymond called Flacade, Earle of Tholouſa, was alſo made Knight in the company of theſe two Princes. In this ceremonie the King of Leon kiſſed the king of Caſtilles hand, which was a fore-telling of the pretenſions and quarrels which ſhould fall out betwixt theſe two Realmes.

Caſtile. The court beeing then at Carrion, there was an aſſembly of Noblemen vaſſals, which C did acknowledge the Soueraigntie, to take the oath of fealtie vnto the King, as it was in auncient time obſerued almoſt euery yeare, where they were accuſtomed to treate of matters of conſequence concerning the State, and the houſes of Princes. The Councellors of greateſt note to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille in this aſſembly, were Don Gonçalo Arch-biſhop of Toledo, Primate of Spaine, the Biſhops Don Rodrigo of Calaorra, Don Maurice of Burgos, Don Arderic of Palence, and Don Gonçalo of Segobia, Don Iohn of Cuença, the Earles Don Pedro de Lara, Don Nugno de Lara, Don Diego Lope de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, chiefe Standard-bearer of the kingdome, Don Rodrigo Guttieres Lord Stuard, and Guttiere Rodrigues Chancelor.

Aſſembly of the Eſtates euery yeare in Spaine.

Hatred betwixt fiue Chriſtian kings raigning then in Spaine. The diſcontents and ſecret hatred betwixt the Chriſtian Princes, which raigned then D in Spaine, was great, beeing fiue, carrying the titles of Kings, that is, three Alphonſos, of Caſtile, Arragon, and Leon, and two Sanchos, one of Nauarre, and the other of Portugal. The King of Caſtile preſumed to haue ſuperiority ouer the other foure, as his vaſſals, notwithſtanding any accords which had beene made: wherefore hee thought hee might lawfully controule them at his pleaſure. Some yeares before he had taken from the king of Nauarre, the lands lying vpon the riuer of Oja, and Bureua, beeing the auncient patrimonie of Nauarre, which came not to them of Caſtile by any iuſt title, but by meere vſurpation and violence. As for him of Arragon, he complained, that the King of Caſtile had neuer kept any thing promiſed in the League, which had beene made betwixt them, E but had made his profit in all warres, of the Arragonois bloud and meanes. The King of Leon began to find the error which he had committed, to haue come to the court of Caſtille, beeing at Carrion, and to haue kiſſed the Kings hand. As for Portugal, there was neuer any good correſpondencie betwixt theſe Princes, and them of Caſtile, ſince the firſt Earle Don Henriques: ſo as theſe vlcers hauing infected the hearts of theſe Potentates, by iealouſie, enuie, and bad councell: they mooued the kings of Arragon and Nauarre firſt of all, to make an offenſiue and defenſiue League: for the concluſion whereof the two Princes met at Boria, where, of mortall enemies, they became great friends. There it was accorded, that the frends & enemies of any one of theſe Princes, ſhold be reputed for ſuch by the other, and that they ſhould be bound to aſſiſt one another, for the defence of their Eſtates. For the obſeruation of which accord, either of them did pawne for his part, the F townes and caſtels following: for the King of Nauarre, the townes of Valtierra, Ablitas, Montagu, Saint Mary of Vxue, and Chaſtillon of Sanguesſe with their forts: and for Arragon, the townes of Boria, Sos Malon, Rueſta and Petillas.

For the guard of theſe ten places, there was choſen, by a common conſent of the two kings

A Kings, D. Fernand Ruis d'Açora, a knight borne in Nauarre, but remained in Arragon, and was Gouernor of Daroca and Calatajub. He tooke an oath to both these Kings, well and faithfully to keepe those places, to deliuer all vnto him, in whose preiudice the treatie had beene broken by the other: the which was not only sworne by both kings, but also by their eldest sonnes, Don Sancho of Nauarre, and Don Pedro of Arragon. And moreouer, it was agreed, that whensoeuer Don Fernand Ruis would discharge himselfe of the gard of those places and forts, that foure knights of either partie should be named, out of the which number, the two kings should either of them choose one, into whose hands the forts should be deliuered with the like oath: that is, the fiue townes of Nauarre to the knight of Arragon, and the fiue of Arragon to the Nauarrois. These things thus
B concluded, sworne, and signed, the Kings departed, D. Sancho into Nauarre, and Don Alphonso to Daroca: whereas the articles were againe confirmed and sworne, in the presence of the chiefe knights of both kingdomes: whereof those of Nauarre were D. Pedro Ladron de Gueuara, Inigo Ortis, Garcia Almorauid, Pedro de Caseante, Michel de Leet, Lope de Valtierra, and Barthelemy de Rada, all of the most famous families in Nauarre.

This League beeing made in the yeare 1190. was followed by another made betwixt the kings of Arragon and Leon, into the which Don Sancho king of Portugall was drawn. An assembly being made to that end at Huesca, thither came the ambassadors, of Leon & Portugal, with ample authority and instructions: whereas a League was made among those Princes like vnto that of Boria, capitulating, that not any one of them should make warre, truce, or peace, without the consent of the others. These allyances made and con-
C firmed with all the oaths and solemnities required, did not cause so great a storm as they did threaten: for the kings of Leon and Portugall were long quiet, without giuing any annoyance to Castile: the kings of Arragon and Nauarre made some attempts, but to small effect.

1190. A League against Castile, made by Arragon, Leon, and Portugal.

D. Sancho the 2. King of Portugall, the first of that name.

D 24 WHen as Don Sancho came to the Crowne of Portugall, he was 31. years old: foure yeares before he had married Donna Aldoncia, or Douce, daughter to Don Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelone, and Regent of Arragon, and of Queene Petronilla. D. Sancho had by this Ladie Douce nine children, whereof there were foure sonnes, the eldest was called Don Alphonso, and was king after his father, hee was borne in his Grandfathers life time: the second was D. Fernand, who was Earle of Flanders, by marrying with the heire of that countrie, whose name was Iane daughter to Count Baudwin Emperour of Constantinople: the kings third sonne was D. Pedro, who was great in Arragon, where he married the Earle of Vrgels daughter: the fourth sonne
E dyed young, and was called D. Henriques. Besides these sonnes, he had fiue daughters, the eldest whereof was married to Don Alphonso king of Leon, the ninth of that name, and was called Donna Theresa, from whom he was diuorced, by reason of consanguinity, notwithstanding two daughters and one sonne which they had had: after which diuorce shee liued religiously in Portugal, in the Monasterie of Lorban, which her father built, and indowed with great reuenues for her sake. King D. Alphonso who had put her away, did afterwards marry Donna Berenguela daughter to the king of Castile, who was as neere allyed to him as the other.

Portugal. Genealogie of Portugal.

This was the practise of those kings, when they had a desire to change their wiues, either for their pleasures, or for some other aduancements, the Pope interposing himselfe, dispencing, binding or dissoluing at his will and pleasure, by the authoritie of the Romish F Sea. The second daughter of D. Sancho king of Portugal, and of D. Aldoncia, was Donna Maisada, Queene of Castile, a Lady of rare beauty, whom D. Henry of Castile married: but Pope Innocent the 3. dissolued this marriage within few daies, by the solicitation of D. Berenguela sister to this king of Castile, who in disdaine, that Don Aluaro de Lara had concluded it without her priuitie, informed the Pope of their neere allyance that was betwixt them, and perſwaded him to ſeparate them: but this Princeſſe being thus re- A iected, retired in great diſdaine into Portugal, where ſhe liued the reſt of her daies in the Monaſterie of Ronca, built by her. The third daughter was Donna Sancha, a Nunne in the Monaſterie of Saint Francis of Alanguer, built by her. The fourth, Donna Blanche, Lady of Guadalacara in Caſtile: and the fifth and laſt was D. Berenguela, who was not maried, but did accompany her eldeſt ſiſter Donna Thereſa, when as ſhe retired to the Monaſtery of Lorban. This King D. Sancho had familiarity with two Gentlewomen after the death of his wife: the firſt was called Donna Maria Aires of Fornello, by whom hee had one daughter called Donna Vrraca, and D. Martin Sanches of Portugall, who was Gouernor of the fronter of Portugall, and a great fauourite to Don Alphonſo king of Leon his brother-in-law: he married Donna Olalla Peres, daughter to the Earle D. Pero Fernandes de B Caſtro. Don Sancho did marrie this Gentlewoman his friend, to a knight called D. Gil Vaſ-quez de Sonça, and tooke a ſecond friend, whoſe name was Donna Maria Peres de Ribera, whom he loued much, and by her had Donna Thereſa Sanches, who was wife to Don Alphonſo Tellez, founder of the towne of Albuquerque, and had alſo one ſonne called D. Ruy Sancho of Portugall, and another daughter Donna Conſtance Sanches, who built the Monaſterie of Saint Francis at Coimbra. D. Ruy Sancho was ſlaine in a battaile neere vnto Porto: ſo as the king D. Sancho had in all fifteene children; nine lawfull, and ſixe Ba-ſtards, whereof there were ſeuen ſonnes and eight daughters. After the deceaſe of his father, hauing raigned about foure yeares, when as they began to treat of a League againſt the King of Caſtile, whereof we haue made mention, certaine Engliſh and French ſhips beeing arriued at Lisbone, with many Knights and ſouldiers, which went to the holy C Land, by the Streight of Gibraltar, beeing ſtayed there by foule weather, hee made vſe of this occaſion, and intreated theſe paſſengers to aſſiſt him at the ſiege of Silues, in the countrie of Algarbe: and about the ſame time there arriued eighteen other ſhips of war, which his brother-in-law Philip Earle of Flanders ſent him, with which forces hee tooke Sylues, and did great harme vnto the Moores of that countrie. It was at that time when the Emperour Frederick Barbaroſſa, king Philip Auguſtus of France, and Richard king of England, called Corde-Lyon, made their voyage into the Eaſt, that this towne of Silues was taken from the Moores, by the helpe of theſe ſtrangers. This King Don Sancho built more townes, and peopled more countries then any of the kings of Portugall, whereby he purchaſed the name of Poblador, which is as much to ſay, as Builder, or peopler of D Townes: Valencia of Minio, Torreſ-nouas, Monte Maior the new, Batellas, Penama-çor, Sortella, Penella, Figueira, Couillana. Folgacino, and Montemor, were his works, with many other places; part of the which hee gaue to the Orders of Saint Iames and Auis, which began in his time in Portugall: to Saint Iames hee gaue Alcacar de Sal, Pamela and Almada: and to that of Auis, Valeillas, Alcanebe, Geromegna, Alcantade and Alpedrin, with the caſtell of Mafra. He recouered Yelbes from the Moores which they had taken from Portugall.

25 D. Alphonſo king of Caſtille, againſt whom (as wee haue ſayd) the other foure Chriſtian Kings of Spaine had made a League, had not yet beene much annoyed thereby in the yeare 1194. wherefore hee thought rather to vndertake ſome warre againſt the E Moores, then to defend himſelfe againſt his neighbours, of whom he made ſhew to haue ſo little feare, as he would not leaue any thing which he had taken, or that were in con-trouerſie: nay, he built a towne betwixt Logrogno and Nagera, the which he called Nauarret, to the which he gaue many liberties and freedomes, as appeares by his letters granted in an aſſembly at Carrion, in the yeare 1095. Notwithſtanding all this, the Con-federats did not ſtirre: but Hiſtories make mention, that D. Sancho ſurnamed the Strong, king of Nauarre, who had newly ſucceeded his father Don Sancho the Wiſe, beeing de-ceaſed the yeare before 1194. and he of Leon, allyed themſelues with the King of Caſtile, for the warre which he intended againſt the Moores of Andaluſia: to beginne the which he ſent for Chiefe and General of his armie, D. Martin Arch-biſhop of Toledo, a Prelate F much eſteemed by the Hiſtoriographers of Spaine, by reaſon of his great vertues, honoured among others by Don Roderigo his ſucceſſour, who termes Don Martin, Stole, the Diademe of the Church; his wiſedome & prouidence, the peace of many; his tongue

the

A the reformation of diſcipline, his hands, the releeſe of the poore, and his armes, the perſecution of Blaſphemie, with other ſuch Spaniſh elegancies, ſaying in the end, that the Church was happie which had ſuch a Paſtor: theſe are his very words. This Arch-biſhop finding armes the fitteſt meanes to propagate the faith of Chriſt, made ſo furious an entry into Andaluſia, as he left horrible markes throughout the whole Prouince, where he filled all with murther, ruine, fire and deſolation, and then returned triumphantly, beeing laden with great and rich ſpoiles: but this expedition beeing ſuddenly made againſt the Moores, did afterwards bring more miſerie and diſhonor to the King and his Eſtate, then it had done profit or honor vnto the Biſhop, who had ſhewed more rage and fury, then valour, reaſon, or warlike diſcipline.

B 26 The Arch-biſhops exploit, did ſo incenſe Aben Ioſeph King of the Arabians, (beeing ſollicited by the Moores of Spaine) as hauing with great ſpeed leuied a mighty armie of Affricane Arabians, yea out of the regions neereſt vnto the Negros, hee paſſed the Sreight, and came into Andaluſia, where he ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, and marched beyond the mountaine which they call Sierra Morena, againſt the Chriſtians. King Don Alphonſo the Noble, beeing aduertiſed of this great preparation, was come to lodge at Alarcos, a fort at that time (by reaſon of the ſituation) of great Importance, whether all his vaſſalls and men of warre of Toledo, Extremadura, and Caſtile came, where hee alſo attended ſupplies from Nauarre and Leon. The Moores marching with all ſpeede, approched neere vnto Alarcos, the Chriſtians campe beeing but weake, hauing not all
C their forces together: yet ſeeing the Moores collours flying in the ayre: the king Don Alphonſo, and his Knights reſolued not to keepe themſelues within their rampars & trenches, but to charge the enemy valiantly, to the end they might haue the honor of ſuch a victorie: but it fell out otherwiſe, for beeing come to handie-ſtrokes, the leſſer number, which were the Chriſtians did valiantly, but the Moores beeing the greater, vanquiſhed, and ſlue many braue men: among the which D. Martin Martines the fourth maſter of the holy Knights of Calatraua dyed. The King D. Alphonſo beeing ſore wounded, ſaued himſelfe by flight. The loſſe of this battaile was the loſſe of Alarcos, and of many Chriſtians that were within it, who fell into the Moores hands, as many other Townes and ſtrong
D places did, the Infidels ſeazing vpon the whole countrie, euen vnto the Ports of Yebenes, which is within ſixe Leagues of Toledo. There are to be ſeene at this day, markes of this battaile, and of other incounters in thoſe quarters, betwixt Ventas of Daraſutan and Sacuela, in a plain called Matança, where there are infinit heapes of ſtones, and many croſſes, ſhewing, that in former times, there had bin much bloud ſpilt in thoſe places. Some charge D. Diego Lopes de Haro, ſaying, that he retired out of the fight too ſoone: others ſay, that he did it expreſſely, and led many Knights of Caſtile with him, beeing diſcontented for that the King had compared the knights of Extremadura with them: ſaying, that they were as good horſ-men, and did fight as well as the Caſtillans. Others accuſe the king and his captaines, that he made too great haſt to fight, and had not attended the E Nauarrois and Leonois, who were vpon the way, and made haſt to ioyne with him: ſo as the fault of the one and the other, both of King, Captaines and Knights, was to ſeek their owne glorie, and not that of God, nor the profit of the common-weale; and the beſt excuſe they had, was, that they ſhewed themſelues more valiant then wiſe. The kings of Nauarre and Leon, beeing aduertiſed of this defeat, were not much troubled: for he of Nauarre (without paſſing any farther) led his men home into his countrie, and the king of Leon ſent backe his, the which did much diſcontent the king of Caſtile: for they abandoned him at his need, whereas if they had aduanced, they might haue ſtayde the Conqueſt, ruines and ſpoiles, which the Moores made after the battell: yea he noted the little loue, and bad allyance of the King of Nauarre, who beeing entred into his countrie, would not vouchſafe to viſit him, knowing that he was ſicke of the wound, which he had receiued in F the battaile. Don Alphonſo king of Leon came to Toledo to ſee him, although hee loued him not much better then the king of Nauarre. All this he diſſembled for the preſent, and reſerued the reuenge till a conuenient time.

D. Sancho the 21. King of Nauarre, the eight of that name.

Nauarre.

27. THis King of Nauarre, which led ſuccors to D. Alphonſo of Caſtile, was Don Sancho the Strong, ſonne to D. Sancho ſurnamed the Wiſe, who had ſucceeded his father, in the yeare 1194. as we haue ſayd, hauing raigned three and forty yeares, ſeuen months and ſome dayes, he is interred at Pampelone, in the Cathedrall Church. This D. Sancho the ſonne, at his comming to the Crowne, was aduiſed to proceed politikely with the B
King of Caſtille, vntill he were well ſetled: and therefore King D. Alphonſo, did build at his owne pleaſure, the towne of Nauarret, in the country of Rioje, the which was diſputable betwixt them, and vpon the frontier of Nauarre: the ſurname of Strong, was giuen him for his valour, but they did alſo call him the Retired, for that in his latter dayes hauing a Canker in one of his feete, (which made it to ſwell, and put him to great paine) he ſhut himſelfe vp into the caſtell of Tudele, and would not ſuffer any to ſee him, not ſpeake to him but his ordinarie ſeruants. This was the 21. King of Nauarre in number, and the eight of that name, deſcended by the maſculine line from the firſt King D. Garcia Ximenes, the which had continued in ſucceſſors males 518. yeares, fayling in him by the death of the Infant D. Fernand his ſonne, who dyed before his father. C

Deeds of the king D. Sancho the Strong for the good of the Common-weale and Religion.

This Prince was much eſteemed for his vertue, valour, Iuſtice, and gouernement, ſo as the Nauarrois held, he was the beſt King that had raigned ouer them. Among other teſtimonies he left of him, he turned the courſe of the riuer of Ebro, the which did runne by Mirepoix, and made it paſſe by Tudele, a towne which he did loue and frequent much: the which he did beautifie with a collegiall Church, of a fayre building: and richly indowed it: he fortified the places of his fronters towards Caſtile and Arragon, and built new forts; as the caſtell of Treuigno, in the Prouince of Alaua: he enlarged the towne of Victoria: and in Rioje, la Garde, and Saint Vincent: and towards Guienne, (which the Engliſh then held) he fortified the towne of Saint Sebaſtian, and Fonteraby in Guipuſcoa, but it was for another. As for religious buildings, beſides the Collegiall Church of Tudele, he made for his ſepulcher, S. Mary the Royall at Ronceuaux, a Colledge of Chanoins, and moreouer the Monaſteries of Saint Mary de Hitero, and Saint Mary de Oliua, both of the Order of Ciſteaux, whoſe abbots haue a place and voice, in the Eſtates of Nauarre, the which the Prior of Ronceuaux hath in like manner, yet he was not very liberall, but in caſe of neceſſitie and workes of piety: wherefore hee gathered together greater treaſures then any King in Spaine. By this his ſparing, it may be, he loſt the Prouinces of Alaua and Guipuſcoa, which were ioyned to Caſtile. The iuriſdiction of Nauarre was neuer ſo much reſtrained, as during the raigne of theſe two kings, Sanches the father and ſonne. D

This king of whom we ſpeake, gaue himſelfe occaſion to Don Alphonſo the Noble, to take armes againſt him: for ſeeing him much troubled to keepe his countrie from inuaſion of the Moores, who were growne proud by their late victorie, and that hee kept his bed wounded: hee thought it now a fit time to recouer his lands of Rioje and Bureua, which his aduerſarie kept frō him: wherfore hauing layd a plot with the king of Leon his allye and confederate, he attempted warre againſt D. Alphonſo the Noble, and entred into Caſtile in the yeare 1196. putting all to fire and ſword, eſpecially in the countrie of Soria and Almaçan. D. Alphonſo king of Leon, aduancing alſo into the Prouince of Campo did worſe, for he brought in the Moores of Extremadura, with whome hee was in League. E

Kings of Nauarre & Leon inuade Caſtile An. 1196.

Arragon.

There is no doubt but Don Alphonſo king of Arragon would haue beene a partaker in this Inuaſion of Caſtile, if death had not preuented him in the ſame yeare 1196. He died F in Perpignan, hauing raigned three and thirty yeares, eight moneths, and ſome dayes, and was buried in the royal Monaſterie of Poublette, which he had founded: whoſe ſonne and ſucceſſor Don Pedro, thought it more ſafe to leaue the allyance of the kings of Nauarre and Leon, to ioyne with Caſtile, in whoſe defence and preſeruation he employed himſelf faith-

A faithfully againſt the two others : ſo as D. Alphonſo the Noble, had by this ſupport, meanes to ſtay the furie of his enemies, and to keepe his countrie and fronter townes.

Caſtille.

During theſe quarrels amongſt Princes, the Clergy was not idle; for the ſame yeere D. Rederigo Biſhop of Calaorra, deſirous to ſee the church of Saint Dominike de la Calſada (which Temple he had cauſed to be built) made an Epiſcopal ſea, would needs place Chanoins there : which cauſed great troubles; for this ſeemed an attempt againſt father Lopes : Abbot of the Monaſtery of Saint Mary the royal of Nagera, who pretended to be Biſhop of Nagera. On the other ſide D. Rodcrigo maintained, that there was no other Biſhop, hauing iuriſdiction at Nagera, but hee of Calaorra. The contention was great and drew neere vnto a ſcandale : but the King did ſo imbrace the cauſe, as information beeing made of the Abbots life and manners, hee was depriued by the Kings ſentence from all Eccleſiaſticall gouernment, and baniſhed the realme of Caſtille : this the King did by the aduice of the Biſhops which held againſt the Abbot who being diſlodged, was ſoone after followed by all the Monkes, whom the Biſhop Rederigo chaſed away, not onely aſpiring to the Epiſcopal title of Nagera, which was in this Monaſtery, but alſo to that which did belong vnto the Abbay : who in ſteed of Monkes, placed Chanoins at Saint Mary the royal; but the King diſliking the violent courſe of this Prelat, reſtored the Monkes to their Monaſtery : and the Chanonis were remooued to the church of Saint Dominike which was a ſigne of the future tranſlation of the Epiſcopal ſea of Nagera thether, which was the marke whereat the Biſhop of Calaorra aymed; but it was not ſo ſoone effected, remayning onely for the preſent a Colledge of Chanoins : for the which the Abbot and Monkes of Nagera, commenced ſute againſt the Biſhop of Calaorra, the which continued long.

C

28 King D. Alphonſo, being troubled by the Chriſtians, armed and diſarmed, both ſecular and Clergie; was alſo aſſailed in the yeere 1197. by the Miralmunim Aben Ioſeph, who came and laied ſiege to Toledo, cauſing his horſemen Moores, to runne as farre as Madrid, and Ahala de Henares, who ouer running the country, ſpoiled Ocagna Vcles and Cuenca, deſtroying all they found without the walles of townes and forts; but at that time the Arabians made other purchaſe, for ſeeing the ſtrength of the city, and beeing aduertiſed of the great garriſon and many Inhabitants which were within it, they returned into Andaluſia by Alcaras, carrying with them an incredible number of Chriſtians, of cattaile, and other ſpoiles : wherefore King D. Alphonſo ſeeing himſelfe freed from this daunger, reſolued to imploy the ſouldiars which hee had gathered together, and the alliance which hee had with D. Pedro King of Arragon, to bee reuenged of the Kings of Nauarre and Leon, who had ſpoiled his country during the troubles and calamities which he ſuffred by the Moores.

Moores ſpoile Toledo and Caſtille.

D

Hee therefore led his army firſt into the territories of Leon, where hee tooke Bolanos, Caſtrouerde, Valence and Carpio, he put many Leonois to the ſword, and repulſed the Moores their allies, who came to ſuccor them : Hauing puniſhed him, hee turned againſt Nauarre, but he was forced to leaue that enterpriſe, to make head againſt the Miralmunim Aben Ioſephe, who aduanced againe towards Toledo with greater forces then before, making ſhew to beſiege that city, yet he paſt by Magueda, where hee did the like, but finding thoſe places very ſtrong and well fortefied, hee turned to Saint Olalla, the which hee tooke and razed : hee attempted Talauera in vaine, and paſt into the territory of La Vera, where he tooke Plaiſance : then beyond Tayo hee tooke Saint Croix, Montanges, and Trugillo. Hauing made this ſpoile and committed horrible cruelties, hee returned very rich with his army into Andaluſia, in the yeere 1198. which was the greateſt perſecution which the Chriſtians of Toledo, and other places aboue mentioned, did euer ſuffer, ſince the entry of the Arabians into Spaine, the which grew by the warre which D. Martin Archbiſhop of Toledo, had made in Andaluſia; wherein it may bee, God would make it knowne, that hee tooke no pleaſure to haue the Paſtors of the church, play the captaines and conductors of armies, for the which notwithſtanding D. Martin and his Predeceſſor D. Iean, are much commended by the Spaniards which haue written the Hiſtory of that age.

The

Leon.

The Kings of Caſtille and Arragon, hauing not yet forces ſufficient to reſiſt ſo mighty an army, as that of Aben Ioſeph, kept themſelues in the mountaines of Palomera about Auila, from whence they returned againſt the King of Leon, hearing that the Moores were diſlodged, from whom they tooke Alba de Liſte, and al that was in the way vnto Aſtorga, the which hauing ruined, they came & laied ſiege to Salamanca, but they tooke it not; only they ſpoiled and burned the country about it, and that of Alba de Tormes, carrying away the people, and leauing it deſolate: in the end they tooke Montreal, and returned victors, finding not any one to make head againſt them. And ſuch was the deſire of King D. Alphonſo, to bee reuenged of the Kings of Nauarre and Leon, as the better to effect his will, hee neglected the iniuries and ſpoiles hee had receiued from the Miralmunim, and made a truce with him: whereby hee gaue meanes to this King of the Moores, to commit horrible cruelties in Portugal, in the yeere of our Lord 1199. An. 1199.

Portugal.

This Realme of Portugal was at that time viſited with many afflictions, for beſides the ſpoiles committed by the Moores, there was an extreame famine, with a great plague, whereof many died for hunger, and many left their country, eſpecially in the country of Braga and Porto; beſides the Pope did interdict the whole Realme of Portugal, for the marriage of D. Thereſa with the King of Leon her kinſman, the which was concluded without his diſpenſation, and therefore he would diſſolue it. Aben Ioſeph hauing made a truce with the King of Caſtille, marched towards Portugal, where hee recouered Sylues in Algarbe and Alcaçar de Sal; he ruined Cezimbra and Palmela, with other places, burning and ſpoyling all the champian country, and carrying away innumerable poore Chriſtians priſoners. D. Sancho King of Portugal, could by no meanes reſiſt this mighty Barbarian King, for beſide the Moores forces, hee was preſt by the warre of Leon: yet ſoone after he recouered Cezimbra and Pamela, and repaired them, but not in the ſame eſtate they had beene. The quarrel hee had with D. Alphonſo King of Leon, was the breaking of the marriage of his ſiſter D. Thereſa; In this warre hee had better ſucceſſe, it may bee, for that hee did affect it with more vehemency, beeing moſt commonly ſeene, that the hatred betwixt kinſ-folkes and allies is more violent, then that againſt ſtrangers. He tooke by force from the King of Leon (beeing otherwiſe weake) the townes of Tuy and Ponteuedra in Gallicia, which hee held for a time. After theſe things, the Miralmunim of the Arabians, beeing aſſured of the King of Caſtille, by the truce which hee had made with him, retired to Maroc in Affrike, thinking that the Moores of Spaine were ſufficient to reſiſt all the enterpriſes which might bee made by Portugal, Leon and Arragon.

The Moores ſpoile Portugal.

D. Pedro the ſecond of that name the ſeuenth King of Arragon, called the Catholike.

Arragon.

29 D. Pedro the new King of Arragon, tooke poſſeſſion of his Realme, in the yeere 1196. by the death of his father D. Alphonſo; hee was ſurnamed the Catholike, for that hee was too obedient to the Catholike church of Rome, and gaue much to Churches and Monaſteries already built; hee built the Monaſtery of Eſcarpe, vpon the riuer of Cinca, of the Order of Ciſteaux, not farre from Lerida. He had three ſiſters, the which were married during his raigne, as hath beene ſayd. As for his brother D. Alphonſo who had gotten the Earldome of Prouence, hee had to wife D. Mary Neece to the Earle of Folguaguier, from whom iſſued D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle of Prouence after his father.

Marriages of D. Pedro kings of Arragon.

There was an other Lady of the houſe of Folguaguier, who was married to the King D. Pedro, by whom hauing one ſonne, called D. Raymond Berenger, ſhe died ſoone after, and her ſonne alſo: after which the King D. Pedro married the daughter of William, Earle of Montpellier, borne of that Princeſſe of Greece, which had beene made ſure

to

A to D. Alphonſo his father. This ſecond wife was called Mary; and for that ſhee was not very faire, he was ſoone wearie, and would haue put her away: but Pope Innocent the third then raigning, would not yeeld vnto it, for hee was a ſtrickt obſeruer and defender of the Eccleſiaſtical lawes. For this cauſe D. Pedro went to Rome, where the Pope did him great honour, and crowned him in the church of Saint Pancrace, with a crowne of gold, garniſhed with pearles and precious ſtones of great valour: where they ſay hee renounced vnto the Pope, the right of Patronage to the churches of his Realme, the which his predeceſſors had enioyed; and did ſo much forget himſelfe, as to acknowledge his Kingdome to hold of the Pope, and to binde himſelfe, and promiſe for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors Kings, to pay him a yeerely tribute of two hundred and fifty peeces of gold, Submiſſion of D Pedro King of Portugal to the Pope.

B called the Mahozemutins, of the name of the Miralmunim Aben Ioſeph Mahozemut, vnder whoſe coine they were ſtamped: theſe peeces were about ſix ryals, then currant, to which acknowledgement the Noblemen of Arragon did not conſent. The King being returned into his country he beganne to leade a diſſolute life, and contemning his wife, he ſought for thoſe that were faire and pleaſing vnto him, wherein hee wanted not men to follow his licentious appetite: wherefore the Queene his wife, who was verie holy, ſeeing that her husband offended God, and that, not accompanying with her, it was to bee feared the Eſtates of Arragon and Montpellier would fall to a ſtranger, for want of iſſue borne of them, ſhee found meanes to abuſe him with a commendable deceite: for vnderſtanding by a groome of his chamber, called Pedro Flauian (who was ſometimes a Miniſter of the Kings loue) that the next night he ſhould bring him one of

C his Miſtreſſes, ſhee wrought ſo with him, as hee brought her into the Kings chamber, in the concubines place, ſo as the King (in this opinion) ſpent the night with her, but perceiuing it in the morning, he was much diſpleaſed: yet conſidering the holy zeale of his Queene, and of thoſe which had ſerued her in this action, hee was pacified, and tooke it in good part. A commendable deceite of Queene Mary of Hongary.

Soone after the Queene found her ſelfe with child, and at her time was brought in bed at Montpellier of a ſonne, called D. Iaime; which they cal Diego in Caſtille, and Iaques in French, who was heire of Arragon and Montpellier, notwithſtanding that Queene Mary had one brother by the fathers ſide, called William, who contended for the D Earldome of Montpellier, and did often attempt to kill the Infant D. Iaime. This matter was long in queſtion in the court at Rome, whether this Princeſſe went in perſon, as well to oppoſe her ſelfe againſt her brother, as to end the proceſſe which remained yet vndecided betwixt her and the King her husband, who ſought ſtil to bee ſeperated from her by Hugo Tarrogia his Ambaſſador. There by the ſentence of Pope Innocent, William was declared a baſtard, and vncapable to ſucceed in the Earledome of Montpellier. After this ſentence, the Queene thinking to returne into Arragon, fel ſicke, and died at Death of Queene Mary of Arragon.

Rome, where ſhe was buried, at the Vatican, in Saint Peters church, neere vnto the tombe of Saint Petronilla, daughter to Saint Peter as Authors write, and was put in the Catalogue of Saints. This Princeſſe had beene firſt married to the Earle of Cominges, by E whom ſhe had two daughters Mathilde and Petronilla.

In the beginning of the raigne of this King D. Pedro, hee had a great quarrel with the Queene D. Sancha his mother, aunt to the Kings of Caſtille and Leon, for that the Kings Officers and Courtiers did not regard her as was fit, wherevpon ſhee ſeized vpon ſome townes belonging to her dowry. And for that it might breed great inconueniences, D. Alphonſo the Noble, King of Caſtille, labored to reconcile them, for the which he and the King D. Pedro met in the towne of Ariza, where an accord was made betwixt the mother and the ſonne, ſo as euer after they liued in peace. By this accord the townes of Ariza, Epila and Ambite, with their caſtles, were giuen by the Queene Douager, vnto the King her ſonne, and hee gaue vnto the Queene the townes of Tortoſe and Vzcon,

F with ſome other places in the principality of Cattelogne. There came to this aſſembly, D. Pedro d' Aſagra, Lord of Albarraſin, who had beene much hated by the Kings of Caſtille & Arragon, but was then reconciled, of whom we haue made mention, this was in the yeere of our Lord 1200. at what time the marriage of D. Alphonſo of Leon, and of An. 1200.

D. Thereſa of Portugal was diſſolued by the decree of Pope Innocent the third, for that they they were kinſ-folkes in a degree which was prohibited by the church of Rome. A Nauarre. 30 The houſe of Nauarre approching neere it's end, for want of heires males, it is fit we ſhould prepare the Readers to the acceſſe which the deſcendants from women which are iſſued from it, haue had vnto that crowne, ſpeaking ſome thing of the houſe of Champagne, into the which D. Blanche, daughter to D. Sancho the wiſe, and ſiſter to this King D. Santho the ſtrong was married. The Earles of Champagne haue beene of great poſſeſſions in France, of an ancient and noble familie, as well of their houſe, as by their alliances and marriages with the greateſt houſes of Europe. In the nine hundred and ninth yeere, mention is made of Odon firſt Earle of Champagne, Brie, Blois, Chartres and Touraine, who was a turbulent man, and had great quarrels with Richard Duke of Normandy, whoſe daughter notwithſtanding he tooke in the end to B his ſecond wife: he made warre againſt Rodolphe or Ralphe, the laſt King of Bourgogne, and was the cauſe why hee reſigned his Scepter and crowne, to Conrade the Emperour, whoſe daughter Odon had taken to his firſt wife, and had Stephen and others by her.

Deſcendants of the houſe of Champagne.

This Stephen was Earle of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1032. (after the deceaſe of his father) and Lord of his other Eſtates by the ſucceſſion of his brethren. Hee died in the holie warre in Syria, hauing begotten of his wife Alis or Adela, daughter to William the conqueror, Duke of Normandie, and King of England, Thybaud and other children.

Thybaud ſurnamed the great, was Earle of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1101. hee did alſo enioy the Earledomes of Brie, Blois and Chartres, and was called C the father of the poore; hee had to wife Mahault a Princeſſe of Germany of a great houſe, by whom he had Henry who was Earle of Champagne and Bry after him, in the yeere of our Lord 1151. beſides other children.

This Henry ſurnamed the Big, the fourth Earle of Champagne, was in Aſia with King Lewis the yong, and afterwards with Philip Auguſtus, where hee did great ſeruice to the cauſe; hee married Mary of France, daughter to Lewis the ſeuenth called the young, by his firſt wife Elenor, Dutcheſſe of Guienne and Conteſſe of Poictiers; of this marriage iſſued Henry and Thibaud, who were ſucceſſiuely Earles of Champagne one after another. Henry went to the warre of Aſia, and marrying with the daughter of Almeric King of Ieruſalem, widow to Conrad Marquis of Montferrat, was made King of Ieru- D ſalem, but returning into France, hee died without iſſue male. Wherefore his brother Thibaud the ſecond of that name, ſeized vpon the country of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1196. to the preiudice of the two daughters of the deceaſed Cont Henry: and was the ſixth Cont Palatin thereof. It was this Thibaud which married D. Blanche, daughter to D. Sancho the wiſe, King of Nauarre, who had one ſonne after the death of her husband, about the yeere of our Lord 1201. called Thibaud, as the father, who was Earle of Champagne and Brie, notwithſtanding the pretenſions of a ſiſter, which was borne in their fathers life time, who contended for this ſucceſſion, but in vaine. Moreouer by the death of D. Sancho the ſtrong (of whom wee now intreate) without children, hee came to the crowne of Nauarre, by his mothers ſucceſſion: A Prince E greatly allied to the houſes of France and England, whereof wee will treate more at large. But let vs returne to D. Sancho the ſtrong, raigning at this time in Nauarre.

This Prince married with a French Lady, daughter to Raymond Earle of Tolouſe the fourth of that name, who was called D. Clemence: they hold that hee had not any children by her, wherefore, according vnto ſome Authors, hee left her, and married the daughter of the Emperour Frederic Barbarouſſe: notwithſtanding this ſecond marriage is doubtful: but as for the firſt, Garcia d'Eugui, biſhop of Bayone, hath left in writing, that hee had one ſonne named D. Ferdinand Calabaſa, vvho died in his fathers life time, vvith a fall of a horſe, running after a Beare, and vvas buried in the Collegial church of F Tudele. Hee had no other lavvfull children, but mention is made of one baſtard ſonne, called William.

31 The ancient league of Caſtille and Arragon beeing renevved, betvvixt the Kings

D. Alphonſo

A D. Alphonſo the Noble and D. Pedro, they did arme to annoy the King of Nauarre, about the yeere of our Lord 1200. the which he foreſeeing, he ſought to be ſupported by forraine Princes, and proceeded ſo farre, as hee did ſollicit Aben Ioſeph Mazemut, to breake the truce which he had made for ten yeeres, with the King of Caſtille; ſome Authors affirming that D. Sancho went himſelfe in perſon, into Affrike, to treat of the buſineſſe with this Mahumetan Prince: who notwithſtanding that he would not breake his faith, yet hee preſented him with a great ſumme of money and many rich Iewels. During his abſence, the confederate Kings, entred by diuers waies into Nauarre (where hee had left for his Lieutenant General, a knight called Alphonſo Fernandes of Guendulain) and tooke Ayuar and the valley of Roncal, which fell to the King of Ar-

B ragon, and on the other ſide Miranda, and Inſura, or Inzula, which places the King of Caſtille kept for himſelfe, theſe two confederate Kings hauing agreed to diuide the conqueſt of Nauarre betwixt them: this was all they did for that yeere. As for the King D. Sancho, hee fel ſicke on the waie of a peſtilent feuer, the which in the end fell to be a canker in one of his feete, which continued with him all his life.

This indiſpoſition beeing knowne in Spaine, it gaue courage to the King of Caſtille to purſue his good fortune, and to trie all meanes poſſible to ioyne that Eſtate to his, preſuming that the King D. Sancho (who had no children) could not liue long, and that he beeing dead, there ſhould be no great oppoſition againſt him, for that D. Ramir, one

C of his brethren, was of the church, the other was young and abſent, and the Earle of Champaigne his brother in law, was either dead, or gone to the holy Land, but howſoeuer, hee was ſo farre off, as before hee ſhould returne into France, to debate his title to the Kingdome of Nauarre, wherevnto hee had right, hee did hope to bee in poſſeſſion.

Vpon this deſeigne hee leauied a new army, entred into Alaua, and ouerrunne all that Prouince, where in the end hee beſieged the Towne of Victoria, the which was valiantly defended by D. Alphonſo Fernandes of Guendulayn, who had put himſelfe into it with many good ſouldiers of Alaua and Nauarre, and maintained the ſiege long, without any ſuccors, or newes from the King D. Sancho, vntil that

D their victuals beganne to faile them. During this ſiege the Deputies of the Prouince of Guipuſcoa, came to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, making offer that if he would goe thether in perſon, they would yeeld vnto him, hauing long deſired to bee vnited to the crowne of Caſtille, for that they were ouercharged by the Kings of Nauarre, whoſe fortunes they had followed ſeuentie ſeuen yeeres. This offer was very pleaſing vnto D. Alphonſo, as a matter of great aduantage; wherefore leauing D. Diego Lopes de Haro to continue the ſiege of Victoria, he went in perſon to Guipuſcoa, which Prouince put it ſelfe vnder his protection, and of the Kings of Caſtille, vpon certaine conditions, and de-liuered into his hands the forts of Saint Sebaſtien and Fontaraby, with the caſtle of Ve-

E loaga, which is in the valley of Ojarçun, which frontierd vpon France, a fit place to aſſure him a paſſage, if need were, into Guienne, which was then held by the Engliſh, for that hee had married a Princeſſe of England. Beſides theſe places they gaue him the caſtle of Athau, vpon the frontiers of Nauarre, which is now ruined, the caſtle of Achoros, Val du L'eniz, and the caſtle of Arraſate, called at this preſent Mondragon, vpon the frontiers of Biſcay, with the fort which was then built vpon the mountaine of Heloſua, the ruines whereof are to bee ſeene at this day, which mountaine is in the iuriſdiction of the towne of Vergara, and is otherwiſe called Ariznoa. Thus D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, obtained this prouince of Guipuſcoa, without force, and ſo returned wonderfully content to the ſiege of Victoria, which continued ſtil, the beſieged hauing ſpent al their victuals; who by daily meſſengers did ſollicit D. Sancho their King,

F aduertiſing him of their extremity, whereby they ſhould be forced to fall into their enemies hands, if hee did not preuent it; but hee beeing ignorant of all that had paſt in his country, beeing abſent, ill diſpoſed, and without good councell, aduiſed them to yeeld vnto the King of Caſtille, vpon the beſt conditions they could.

Hauing receiued this anſwere, the beſieged held out ſeuenteene daies longer, attending if the King had not taken ſome better aduice, but ſeeing there came nothing from him him whereby they might hope of releeſe, beeing extremely preſt with hunger and want of all things they yeelded the towne, the which for the ſcituation and fortification was held impregnable. By the taking of Victoria, the King of Caſtille was maiſter of that other Prouince of Alaua; the country of Araya yeelded vnto him; he tooke Irrutita, Maragnon, Saint Croix and all the valley of Campeſo. King D. Alphonſo made this goodly conqueſt in the yeere 1200. part by force, and part by a voluntary yeelding, and did greatly diminiſh the realme of Nauarre, although that ſome places ſubmitted themſelues againe vnder the obedience of the King D. Sancho, neither did the Prouince of Alaua euer receiue any law from Caſtille, except Victoria and Treuigno. To aſſure himſelfe the better of the Guipuſcoans, and to gratifie them alſo, the King of Caſtille canſed to bee re-edefied vpon the ſea coaſt of that Prouince, the townes of Guetario and Motrico, the which hee did fortifie, and indow with great preuiledges: after all theſe things, the King of Nauarre arriued at Carthagena, and ſlipt through Arragon into his country, bringing great treaſure with him out of Affrike, at what time D. Alphonſo had newly beſieged Eſtella, the which was freed from ſiege vpon the bruite of his comming, (ſo great power and reputation hath the name of a king that is preſent) but if he had ſtaied longer in Affrike his country of Nauarre had beene wholy loſt: hauing viſibly ſeene the great harme which the King D. Alphonſo had done him, hee ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to deſire him to reſtore him that which hee had taken from him in his abſence, againſt al law and iuſtice, and againſt the accuſtomed manner of making warre in that age full of loyalty: but the King of Caſtille entertained him with delaies and doubtfull anſweres.

Nauarre ſends Ambaſſadors to Caſtille.

Caſtille.

32 Whilſt that D. Sancho conſiders of his loſſes, and of the beſt meanes to repaire them, the King of Caſtille great, mighty, and redoubted, being allied to him of Arragon, and hauing a truce for many yeeres with Aben Ioſeph, hee beganne to repaire the ruines which the Arabians had made: he reſtored the city of Plaiſance, Bejar and other places of the country ruined: he did the like to Mirabel, Segura de la Serra, Monfredo, Moya, and many other places of the realme of Toledo: hee alſo built Aquilar del Campo in Caſtille: and moreouer in Guipuſcoa, he built the towne of Caſtro d' Ordiales, Laredo, Saint Ander and Saint Vincent de la Barquera.

An. 1201. About the yeere 1201. there was a peace treated of betwixt Iohn, ſucceſſor to Richard King of England, and King Philip Auguſtus of France, at Boutauant in Normandy, by the which amongſt other Articles, a marriage was concluded betwixt the Infanta D. Blanche the daughter of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, and Queene Elenor, ſiſter to the King of England, with Lewis eldeſt ſonne to Philip, and heire of the realme of France: for the which, Ambaſſadors were ſent from both Kings into Caſtille, & they were made ſure by a Deputy for Lewis, in the city of Burgos, with great feaſting and ſtate, and the Infanta was conducted by the King her father, and other Noblemen of Caſtille vnto the frontiers of Guienne, where the Deputies for the French King did receiue her, for whoſe dowry there was aſſigned by King Iohn her vncle, all the places which were in queſtion betwixt him and the French King, whereof the ſayd French King was in poſſeſſion, in the Dutchies of Normandy, Brittaine and Aniou.

At the ſame time D. Aphonſo King of Leon, ſeperated by the authority of Pope Innocent, from D. Thereſa of Portugal his wife, ſent to demande D. Berenguela, the King of Caſtilles other daughter: whereof (by reaſon of the diſcords which were betwixt theſe two Kings) the father made ſome difficulty; yet vanquiſhed by the perſwaſions and intreaty of Queene Elenor, who deſired as much to ſee her daughter weare a crowne, as a peace betwixt Caſtille and Leon, he yeelded vnto it, and theſe two Princes meeting to that effect in the towne of Vailledolit, the marriage was celebrated, aſſigning her for her dowry, the lands taken the yeere before from the king of Leon, except Carpio and Monreal, which remained to Caſtille. Of this marriage was borne the Infant D. Fernand, who ſucceded in the Realmes of Caſtille and Leon. Thinke that the Popes diſpenſation was not obtained for this marriage: for being couſin germains remoued, children of the vncle and nephew, Pope Innocent the third, did ſeperate them.

Caſtille.

In the yeers 1202. and 1203. the ancient preuiledges granted by the Kings of Nauar, vnto

A vnto Saint Sebaſtian and Fontarabie, townes of Guipuſcoa, were confirmed and augmented by the Kings of Caſtille, and their iuriſdictions lymited, eſpecially of Fontaraby, by the riuers of Oriaçun and Vidaſo, which diuides that Prouince from France, and by the mountaine Pegnadaya, by Leçaca, by Belſa and the ſea, and by Hirun vrançu, which is at this preſent a great Bourg, at which time Queene Elenor was deliuered of her laſt ſon, who was called D. Henry, by reaſon of his grand-father by the mothers ſide.

To theſe contents was added a truce betwixt this King D. Alphonſo the Noble, and D. Sancho the ſtrong, King of Nauarre, for the concluding whereof, D. Sancho came in perſon, vpon aſſurance, to Guadalajara in Caſtille, there it was agreed there ſhould be a ceſſation of armes betwixt the two Kingdomes, for fiue yeeres, with reſtitution of ſome of B thoſe places which the King of Caſtille had taken in Nauarre, and for the keeping of the truce, there were deliuered into the hands of certaine knights, named by both parties, the caſtles of Abuſeio, Clauijo and Iuvera, for Caſtille; and Irureta, Inzula and Saint Adrian for the King of Nauarre: and for that the warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon continued ſtil, the King of Caſtille tooke vpon him to reconcile them, and in the meane time cauſed al acts of hoſtility to ceaſe. Nauarre.

Theſe foure Princes being at peace, he of Leon moued new troubles againſt D. Vrraca Lopes, his mother in law, with whom hee could neuer agree, ſeeking to fruſtrate her of her doury. And ſhe for her part did neuer ceaſe practiſing againſt D. Alphonſo, ſeeking to depoſe him from the royal throne of Leon, and to aduance the Infant D. Sancho her ſonne; for the which ſhe did continually importune her brother, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, intreating him to imbrace this buſineſſe, the which he had deferred C vntil that time, when as hee went to field to aide the Queene his ſiſter: but he was not the ſtrongeſt, for D. Alphonſo King of Leon, being aſſiſted by the King of Caſtille, his father in law, chaſed him into Nauarre, from whence hee made roades into the territories of Caſtille, which made the two vnited Kings to goe and ſeeke him in his owne ſtrength, where they defeated him in battaile, neere vnto Eſtella, where hee was forced to ſaue himſelfe, which towne was inueſted and, as it were, beſieged by the armies of Caſtille and Leon, yet they could not take it. Vpon this occaſion the foure Kings of Caſtille, Leon, Nauarre and Arragon met together in Alfaro, whether alſo came D. Sancha, Do- D uager of Arragon, mother to the King D. Pedro, by the which the reconciliations and accords of theſe Princes were confirmed. D. Lopes being deſtitute of all meanes, hee retired in deſpight vnto the Moores pay at Valencia, and from thence to Maroc, where hee was accuſed to the councell of the Miralmumin, that hee had mounted D. Pedro, King of Arragon, on horſe-backe, being ouerthrowne in an incounter, which he had againſt the Moores of Valencia, vnder whoſe pay D. Diego made warre, yet hee was abſolued. Leon. VVarre betwixt the King of Leon and his mother in law.

The pittifull death of the Infant D. Fernand, brother to D. Sancho King of Nauarre, a Prince well beloued of the Nauarrois, ought to bee regiſtred amongſt the calamities E which fell vpon that realme in thoſe daies. The feaſt of Saint Nicholas being celebrated with ſuperfluous bankets and ſports, in the yeere 1207. in the towne of Tudele, according to the cuſtome of Chriſtians, as this generous Prince did runne on horſe-backe armed, doing ſome exerciſes which hee had inuented, a hog paſſing through his horſe legges, made him to fall, in ſuch manner, as he bruſed his head againſt a piller of ſtoane whereof hee died, thirteene daies after, beeing thirty yeeres old. Of this Prince, whom the Authors commend for a braue and valiant Knight, there is no mention made in the warre betwixt Caſtille and Nauarre: wherefore it is to bee preſumed that the King his brother, doubting leaſt hee ſhould attempt ſome thing to his preiudice, during his abſence, had led him with him into Affrike, although hee loued him deerely. Thus are the affaires of this world mingled with pleaſure and griefe, loue and F iealouſie. Nauarre. An. 1207. Death of D. Fernand of Nauarre.

Of the marriage which had beene made the yeere before, betwixt D. Alphonſo Infant of Portugal, ſon to the King D. Sancho then raigning, and D. Vrraca daughter to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, was this yeere 1207. a ſon borne called D. Sancho, as his grand-father by the fathers ſide, in whoſe life time this Lady was deliuered of an other Portugal.

Moores. Aben Ioſeph Miralmumin of the Arabians Almohades, being dead in Affrike, whileſt theſe things paſt in Spaine, there ſucceeded in his place his ſonne called Aben Mahomad, ſurnamed the Greene, the fourth King of that ſect, ouer the Moores of Affrike and Spaine: this ſurname was giuen him, for that hee carried a Miter, or ſome ſuch Ornament on his head, of a greene collour. In his raigne the truce expired, made betwixt the King of Caſtille, and his predeceſſor Aben Ioſeph, when as they fell more cruelly to armes them euer.

Caſtille. 33 Betwixt both, D. Martin Archbiſhop of Toledo died, to whom ſucceed Roderigo Ximenes, borne in Nauarre, the Author of the Hiſtory of Spaine which wee read at this day. A prelate of great authority, and much commended by the Spaniards: a- B bout the time of his death the riuer of Tayo did riſe ſo high, as it was fiue foote aboue the port of Almofala in that city. This was about the end of December, and the yeere before there was ſo great an Eccliſpe of the Sunne, as the day was darkned for the ſpace of ſixe houres. At that time King D. Alphonſo did two remarkable workes in the city of Burgos in Caſtille: which were the Monaſtery of Saint Mary the royal, of that citty, called de las Huelgas, for the daughters of noble houſes, according to the Order of the Ciſteaux: and ioyning to this Monaſtery, hee cauſed the Hoſpital royal to bee built, indowing both the one and the other with great reuenues: for the third, which is no leſſe to be eſteemed, hee erected an vniuerſity in the towne of Palencia, which was the firſt in Caſtille, ſince the comming of the Moores, and drew many learned men in al faculties Vniuerſity of Palence. thether, from France, England and other places, aſſigning large penſions to the pro- C feſſors: and as he was a warlike Prince, and could not liue long in quiet, the quarrels reuiuing betwixt the French and Engliſh, about the yeere 1209. hee made a voyage into An. 1209. Guienne, for that hee had an intereſt therein, yet hee returned without doing any thing memorable. Returning by the Prouince of Guipuſcoa, hee gaue preuiledges to the towne of Guetaria, the which he reſtored, granting the like vnto Saint Sebaſtian. This towne hath a good hauen, couered from al windes, by a little Iſland which is before it, John Sebaſtian del Cano, the famous Pilot borne at Guetaria. ryſing in ſuch manner, as it defends the ſhips from all ſtormes, and giues them free entry and paſſage with any winde: that famous pilote Iohn Sebaſtian del Cano, was borne at Guetaria, who in the time of the Emperor Charles the fifth did cõpaſſe the whole world by ſea, D. Alphonſo did alſo giue the like priuiledges to Motrico as to Guetaria. D

Arragon. The ſame yeere a peace was fully concluded, betwixt D. Pedro King of Arragon, and D. Sancho the ſtrong, king of Nauarre, by the mediation of D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, and the Prelats and Noblemen of al the Kingdomes of Spaine, wherein the endeauors of D. Roderigo Ximenes Archbiſhop of Toledo, were very great: this peace was made, the two kings being in field about Mallen: among other particularities which the Spaniards write of this accord, the King of Nauar lent vnto him of Arragon 20000. Marauidis of gold, for the which were giuen in pawne the caſtles of Gallur, Pitilla, Pina and Eſco, the which were deliuered for ſixe monthes into the hands of D. Ximeno de Rada, a Knight, at the end whereof, if the King of Arragon did not pay the money, the places ſhould bee deliuered vnto the King of Nauarre, to hold them vntil he were ſatisfied. The diſſention E and warre which had continued betwixt Nauarre and Arragon, for the ſpace of ſixty fiue yeeres, was then ended, and there was a good and durable peace concluded betwixt thoſe two Eſtates: after which it did behoue the King D. Pedro to paſſe into Prouence, by reaſon of the death of the Earle D. Alphonſo his brother, whoſe daughters they of Beziers had married into France, without the conſent of the King of Arragon, and had beene too buſie in the gouernment of that Earldome, wherevpon hee came armed into Prouence, tooke Beziers and ruined it, and hauing waſted the country about Marſeilles, he returned into Spaine, hauing ſetled his Nephew Raymond Berenger in his fathers ſucceſſion: The towne of Tortoſe, was giuen by this King, to the Knights of the Temple, whereof Peter of Montague was Maiſter in the yeere 1210. A Affrike into Spaine with great forces of Moores Almohades, and other his ſubiects. This young Prince D.Fernand impatient of idleneſſe, began to ouerrunne the Moores country, about Baeça, Andujar and Iaen: but for all this, the Moore did not leaue to beſiege and to take within the third month the towne of Saluatierra, with great ſlaughter of the inhabitants, carrying away them that remained for ſlaues. The King of Caſtille had drawne his forces together at Talauera, to diuert him, but not able to come in time, hee retired, and ſoone after loſt his ſonne D. Fernand, in Madrid, by ſickneſſe, whereat hee was wonderfully greeued, his bodie was carried to Burgos, to the new Monaſterie of Las Huelgas, D. Roderigo the Archbiſhop accompanying it, with many other Prelats and Knights, yea D. Berenguela Queene of Leon, beeing ſeperated from B her husband by the Popes authority, who would not allow of the marriage, although hee had children by her. It is ſtrange theſe Princes were no better aduiſed in the marriage of their daughters, ſeeing they obaied the Popes reſtraints.

Saluatierra taken by the Moores.

Death of the Infant D. Fernand.

This warre begunne did much trouble the King of Caſtille, wherefore hauing called a Parliament of the Lords, Prelats and Deputies of the townes of his realme at Toledo, he reſolued to inuite al Chriſtian Princes to his ſuccour, and to demaund of Pope Clement the Indulgences and pardons of a Croiſado, for this holy warre, to the end he might draw vnto it more Knights and ſouldiers, for this cauſe hee ſent (by the election of the whole aſſembly) D. Roderigo to Rome; and for that neceſſity did force him to reforme the exceſſe and ſuperfluities of his Realmes, there were orders ſet downe for C feaſts, apparel, and other things. There were alſo publike proceſſions enioyned, with faſting, praying, and giuing of almes to pacifie the wrath of God.

Parliament at Toledo for the Moores warre.

In the end commandement was giuing to all his vaſſals and men of warre, to bee redie with horſe and armes, for the yeere following. The like prouiſion was made by the Moores in Spaine, euery one preparing for the warre: that is, thoſe of Extremadura, Andaluſia, Algarbes, Granado, Murcia and Valencia, and other lands which they held yet in the territory of Toledo; ſollyciting moreouer their King and Miralmumin of Affrike, to repaſſe into Spaine, with the forces of thoſe great Prouinces, which hee did hold in that part of the world.

D Whileſt theſe great preparations were making, the King of Caſtille came to Cuenca, where finding himſelfe accompanied with good troupes of ſouldiers, hee made a road into the Moores country by the riuer of Xucar, to exerciſe his ſouldiers, and tooke from them the fort of Alcala, Las Cuéuas of Algarande, and Tubas, and ſpoiled ſome Bourges in the territory of Valencia, and then hee returned to Cuenca, when the King of Arragon came vnto him, and offered to ſuccour him with all the forces of his realme, in this warre; the King of Nauarre in like manner ſent to make him the like offers.

In Italie the Archbiſhop D Roderigo, vſed great dilligence, and obtained from Pope Innocent the third a bountifull grant of his ſpirituall treaſors, of indulgences and par- E dons, to all thoſe that ſhould croſſe themſelues for this warre, the which was proclaimed in all places, and the Croiſadoe preached, eſpecially by the Archbiſhop of Toledo, in all places as hee returned, with ſuch efficacy, as there came out of Italy, Germany France and England an infinite number of ſouldiers into Spaine, who vowed their liues to defend the Chriſtian religion, and to repulſe the perſecutors thereof: ſo as hee aſſembled at Toledo an army (beſides the forces of Caſtille, Arragon and Portugal) of aboue a hundred thouſand ſtrangers, bearing armes, which number is by ſome augmented, and by others diminiſhed: for there are ſome Authors which mention, one hundred thouſand foote, and tenne thouſand horſe, others reſtraine it to fifty thouſand foote, and twelue thouſand horſe, ſome more, ſome leſſe; but howſoeuer, there was a great and mightie army, the which was lodged neere vnto the city, in the F moſt fertil places of the riuer of Tayo. The King of Arragon came thether, as the Authors of the Arragon Hiſtory write with twenty thouſand foote, and 3500. horſe, the number of footemen of Caſtille, and other countries of the King D. Alphonſos dominions was vncertaine, but they ſay there were 14000. horſe, amongſt the which were aboue fifteen hundred Knights nobly deſcended. Of them of Portugal the number is not by the King D. Alphonſo, according to euery mans ranke and dignity, giuing pay to all in general: to euery footman ſixe pence a day, and to euery horſe-man two ſhillings, which were worth a Marauidis and one third part of the money which was then cur-number of beaſts of burthen, and not of cartes. What ſoeuer it were, this army was

Many were of opinion, that they ſhould not ſpend their time in the ſieges of townes, C all put to the ſword. The Earle D. Diego Lopes de Haro, had the charge to conduct them to a place of ſafety, according to the compoſition. The towne was ſpoiled by the ſtrangers and Arragonois, and then deliuered to the Knights of the Calatraua: at which place there grew ſome diſcontentment, by reaſon that their victuals for ſo great a multitude grew ſhort, as it often happens, and therefore the greateſt armies are not cauſe, returned into their countries, whereby the Spaniards purchaſed the more honor.

The army parted from Calatraua, and came and camped at Alarcos, which place, being found abandoned, was manned with a good garriſon; there D. Sancho King of Nauarre came and ioyned with the Kings of Caſtille and Arragon, bringing with him great troupes of ſouldiers, both of his owne ſubiects, and of other nations, eſpecially

dard-bearer of Nauarre, D. Garcia Almorauid, D. Pedro Martines de Leet, D. Pedro Garces d' Aronis, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagudo, D. Pedro Martines of Subica, D.

of Aoyz, D. Pedro Ximenes of Oilleta, and D. Ximenes d' Aybuar, chiefe Knights of Na-uarre, which accompanied the King of Nauarre to this warre, many forts and places which were held by the Moores in that countrie, were taken by the Chriſtian Princes, who marched againſt Saluatierra, where they tooke a vew of their army, the which they lodged vnder the mountaine called Sierra Morena, at Guadalfajar: Aben Mahomad, F who had ſucceeded his father Aben Ioſeph Mahozemut, in the Empire of the Almohades of Affrike, beeing aduertiſed of this great preparation which the Chriſtians made againſt him, and his ſect, was paſt into Spaine, with great troupes both of horſe and foote, beeing followed by other forces which came dayly out of Affrike into Andaluſia;

A Andaluſia; ſo as hee had gathered together about Iaen, one of the greateſt armies that had beene euer ſeene ſince the firſt entry of the Moores, whileſt that the Chriſtian armie was imployed to recouer the country which lies betwixt Toledo, and the mountaine which bounds Andaluſia: the which the Moores ſeeing to bee loſt they reſolued to attend the Chriſtians army in a place of aduantage, and to flie the plaines, ſo as marching to Baeça, they ſeized vpon the paſſage of Loſa, in the fieldes of Tolouſa.

The Chriſtians (as it was the will of God) whileſt their enemies were doubtful what courſe to take, paſt ouer the mountaine called Sierra Muradel, by ſafe and vnknowne waies, being guided by a huntſman and ſhepheard (whoſe Image is to bee ſeene in the
B great chappel of the Cathedral church of Toledo, cut in ſtone) and chaſed away ſome Moores which were in the caſtle of Ferral, neere vnto the rocke of Loça, from whence after many difficulties and councels, they made choiſe of a place fit to put themſelues in battaile, as the Moores did in like manner. King Aben Mahumad, who lodged vpon a hill, where he might view his whole army, diuided into many ſquadrons; in that where the Kings perſon was were the moſt valiant Moores of the whole army, and they ſay hee cauſed that battailion to be compaſſed about with ſtakes, tied together with chaines, that taking from them al hope of flight, they might be forced to fight with more reſolution, hee himſelfe was ſeated in a high throne vnder a rich pauilion, and in this equipage hee proudly offred battaile to the confederate Kings, the which (for that their men were
C weary with the rough and vneaſie paſſage of the mountaine) they would not accept that day; which the barbarous King tooke for his aduantage, as if feare had kept the Chriſtians from fighting; writing to the chiefe townes of his dominions, that were neere, that he held the victory in his hands, and that within three daies hee ſhould haue the three Kings his aduerſaries at his command, notwithſtanding that many of his captaines did aſſure him, that the Chriſtians made ſhew rather to fight then to flie. The day following the Moores preſented themſelues againe in battaile, but the Chriſtians kept themſelues, within their forts and trenches: The 3. day which was the 16. of Iuly, both armies ioyned in battaile, where there was a furious fight, battailon againſt battailon, and ſquadron againſt ſquadron, with ſuch obſtinacy, as the victory was for many houres doubt-
D ful, euery one, both captaines and ſouldiers, ſtriuing to doe well, being ſeene and obſerued by their Kings, and by the principal men of both parties; but in the end the Moores beganne to recoyle, and to goe to route. Then did the Chriſtians preſſe them ſo furiouſly as they put them to a ſhameful & lamentable, flight & made an incredible ſlaughter. King Aben Mahumad (beeing perſwaded by his brother Aben Zeit) retired with great griefe, towards the towne of Iaen, there beeing no meanes to gather his troupes againe together. The Authors of the Spaniſh Hiſtory write (wherein it may be they exceed) that there were 200000. Moores ſlaine vpon the place, and many priſoners taken, among the which they number aboue 35000. horſe. Great was the riches they found in their campe, of tapiſtry, ſiluer plate, armes, horſes, moyles, camels, gold and ſiluer coy-
E ned, and other things of great price. Of the Chriſtians, according to the Archbiſhop Roderigo, there died but 25. others ſay 115. but Beuter and other affirme, there were 25000. ſlaine of the Chriſtians ſide; the which is not vnlikely, conſidering the reſiſtance the Moores made, and the long time the fight continued. But it is a thing worthy obſeruation, that notwithſtanding the great multitude of dead bodies, which lying one vpon an other, were like hils, after they had beene ſpoiled by the horſe-boyes and peaſants, there was little bloud ſeene vpon the ground: the which is to be imputed to the dry conſtitution of the Arabians and Affricans, Sotherne people, who (beſides that they are dried vp with the heate of the ſun in that region) eate thoſe things which are of ſmal norriſhmēt, and drinke nothing but water, ſo as they engender little bloud, the which is pale & diſ-
F colloured. The Kings performed the parts, not only of wiſe and circomſpect captaines, but alſo of valiant ſoldiers. The conſtancy of King D. Alphonſo was great, who was neuer ſeene to change collour, nor the countenance of an aſſured captaine, notwithſtanding the diuers euents which we may thinke were repreſented vnto him in ſo dangerous a battaile; great was his valour and reſolution, to expoſe himſelf to a ſhower of arrowes which fel vpon his men, and to thruſt himſelfe into the preſſe, where hee ſaw they gaue A backe, to ſuccour them: ſo as the Lords and Prelats which were in armes that day, had great labor to keepe him back, D. Pedro King of Arragon had his cuiraſſe peirced to the quicke, with a lance, but God preſerued him. The King of Nauarre did alſo carry himſelfe worthily; but there was a Chanoine Chanter of the church of Toledo, called Domingo Paſcal, who carried the croſſe before the Archbiſhop D. Roderigo (as it is the cuſtomes to carry before Primates) which did wonders: for hee paſt and re-paſt, and ranne through the ſquadrons of the Moores with his croſſe, and had no harme. The tombe of this Chanoine is to bee ſeene at this day, in Saint Lucies chappel, in the great church of Toledo. It is a pittie the Authors of theſe hiſtories, haue not beene more iuſt vnto thoſe valiant men which imployed themſelues that daie, to maintaine the Chriſtians B eſtate in Spaine, and haue not written many particularities which happened during the fight, which ſhould redound to the honour of families, and their poſterities, and ſhould ſerue as a ſpurre to generous mindes; wherein the Archbiſhop D. Roderigo, is chiefly to be blamed, hauing beene preſent at that battaile. The victorious army purſued them that fled vntil night, and then they went to lodge in the enemies campe, where they found tents, victuals, armes and other riches in great aboundance, & there they paſt the night, giuing thankes vnto God for ſuch an important victory.

Diuiſion of the ſpoiles after the battaile of Muradal.

Then the King D. Alphonſo thought it fit to diuide the ſpoiles, and to doe publicke honor, after the manner of the ancients, to thoſe great perſonages, which had carried them valiantly in the battaile. He named for Iudge and diſtributer of theſe things, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, a Nobleman very expert in matters of warre: by whom the tent of the C Miralmumin of the Arabians was giuen to D. Pedro King of Arragon, the which was exceeding rich, yet others ſay it was alotted to the King of Nauarre for his part; to whom (for that hee with his men had firſt broken the fortification made with chaines, about the ſquadron where the great Miralmumins perſon was in battaile) was adiudged all the bootie taken within the ſayd circuit, in the which were many camels with their burthens; for which conſideration ſome ſay, that the Kings of Nauarre carrie in their armes, chaines of gold in a field gueules. Of the reſt of the ſpoiles which were foũd without this fortification, there was a good part thereof giuen to the King of Arragon. D. Diego Lopes did adiudge vnto D. Alphonſo for his part, the honour of the victorie, and to the other captaines, knights and ſouldiers, what they could get. This diuiſion was al- D lowed by the Kings and all the reſt. Many haue thought that by reaſon of this victory King D. Alphonſo tooke a caſtle Or, in a field gueules, which are the armes of Caſtille at this daie, inferring thereby, that the realme of Caſtille was a fort and aſſured rampar againſt the Moores, and Infidels their enemies, in whoſe bloud the Tower ſeemes to bee planted, but there are priuiledges found in the treaſury of Saint Dominike of Calſada (the which Garibay reports that he hath ſeene) more ancient then this battaile, granted by this king, hauing a ſeale of lead like vnto the Popes, the which hath on the one ſide a caſtle, and on the other, the picture of a king on horſebacke, the which doth witneſſe that before the battaile of Muradal, or Tolouſe, they vſed this deuiſe, or blaſon in their armes; it is like that this King D. Alphonſo vſed it firſt in his armes, but vpon what conſi- E deration, it is neither eaſie nor ſafe to iudge. The Chriſtian Princes making vſe of this happy victory, whilſt the Moores were amazed and weake, tooke Bicles, Caſtro Feral, Bagnos and Tolouſe: then they came to Baeça, which they found abandoned, the inhabitants hauing carried their wiues, children, and all they had to Vbeda, except ſome which were fortified in the Megida, the which they burned.

Armories of Nauarre, as the Spaniards report.

Then they marched to Vbeda, and tooke it by force, putting many of the Inhabitants to the ſword, and making ſlaues of the reſt, by the inſtigations of ſome Prelats which followed the army, the ſpoile whereof was giuen to the ſoldiars; the honor of the taking of Vbeda, is giuen to D. Lope Ferencio de Luna, an Arragonois: as they went on ſtil conquering vpon this ſect of Mahumetiſts, it pleaſed God to ſtay the Chriſtians army: for F it began to be ful of diſeaſes, the which in the end were contagious: wherfore theſe kings were forced to returne with their campe, and re-paſſing the mountaine, or Sierra Morena, by the ſame mount of Muradal, they came to Calatraua, where they found the

A Duke of Auſtria, whoſe name was Thibaud ſonne to Leopold, who beeing deſirous to bee at this battell, was come into Spaine with two hundred Knights, but it was too late: wherfore he returned into Germany by Arragon: there the Kings parted with great ſhewes of loue. He of Arragon meaning to entertaine the peace with Don Sancho of Nauarre, with all ſinceritie, he reſtored vnto him fourteene caſtels and places of Strength which he had taken from him. The King D. Alphonſo beeing come to Toledo, where hee was receiued with great triumph by the Arch-biſhop Don Roderigo, it was ordained, that from that time the memorie of that great victorie obtained againſt the Moores, in the playnes of Tholouſa, ſhould be euery yeare celebrated on the ſixteenth day of Iuly, vnder the title of Triumphus crucis, the which is obſerued at this day, eſpecially at Toledo; whereas they B hang vp and diſplay that day in the great Church, many Guidons, Enſignes and Standards of the Moores, which had beene taken then, or others which do repreſent them. The chiefe men which did accompany the King in this battaile, were Don Roderigo Ximenes Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine, Don Roderigo of Siguença, D. Tello of Palença, D. Mendo of Oſma, D. Pedro of Auila, D. Domingo of Plaiſance, all Biſhoppes, with other Prelates, all which did ſerue, either for counſell or for armes. D. Pedro Arias, or Aus, Maſter of the Order of Saint Iames, D. Roderigo Diaz, maſter of the Calatraua, D. Gomes Ramires Prior of the Templers, D. Guttiere or John Gelmirido Prior of S. Iohn, with many Commanders and Knights of their Orders. Of Secular men, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, and his eldeſt ſonne D. Lope Diaz de Haro, of whom it is written, that hauing ſome feeling, for that his father had abſented himſelfe out of Caſtile, after that he had fought C at Eſtella againſt the king D. Alphonſo, and alſo for that the loſſe of the battaile of Alarcos was imputed vnto him, he came and caſt himſelfe at his feet, a little before the battel, beſeeching him to carry himſelfe ſo well, according to the hope which hee had of him, that he might not be hereafter called the ſonne of a traytor: wherewith the father beeing incenſed, ſayed vnto him: It is more to be feared, thou wilt be called the ſon of a whore: for no man will call thee the ſonne of a traytor: which anſwer the father made vnto the ſonne, as the Earle D. Pedro ſonne to D. Denis king of Portugal writes in his booke of the Genealogies of Spaine, for that the mother of Don Lope Diaz, a woman of a weake brayne, beeing fallen in loue with a man of Burgos, which, they ſay, had beene a blacke-D ſmith, or Lock-ſmith, went out of Spain, and wandred through the world with this man, in a diſguiſed habit. With D. Diego Lopes was alſo D. Pero Diaz his other ſonne, D. Sancho Fernandes de Canamero, D. Martin Nugnes de Hinojoça, and Don Inigo de Mendoſa, kinſmen or allyed to the houſe of Haro: moreouer, the Earles D. Fernand de Lara, D. Aluar Nugnes de Lara, Don Gonçalo Nugnes, D. Lope Diaz de los Cameros, Ruy Diaz de los Cameros, and his brother Don Aluar Diaz, Don Pedro Aria of Toledo, Gontes Peres the Aſturien, D. Garcia Ordognes, John Gonçalo of Vzero, D. Gonçalo Gomes, D. Gomes Manriques, D Gil Manriques, D. Alphonſo Telles de Meneſes, and his brethren, Fernand and Ruy Garcia, D. Roderigo Peres d'Auila, William Ginez, D. Willyam Peres and his brethren, Nugno Peres de Guſman, Gonçalo Yuanes of Quintana, who was afterwards maſter of the E Calatraua, Don Iohn Gonçales, and Don Gonçalo Ruis and his brethren, Don Ray Peres of Villalobos, Suero Tellez, Don Fernand Garcia, and many others of the Realmes of Caſtile and Toledo. Thoſe which accompanied Don Pedro king of Arragon of greateſt Nobilitie, were, Don Garcia Frontin Biſhop of Taraſſone, and Don Berenger elect of Barcelone, with other Clergie men: and of Knights, Don Garcia Romeu, Standard-bearer royal of Arragon, Don Ximen Cornel, Aznar Pardo, Don Willyam of Peralta, Don Michel of Luezca, D. Sancho Earle of Roſſillon, vncle to the King, and Don Nugno Sanches his ſon, Don Lope Ferrench de Luna, Arnaud of Alaſcon, or Artal of Alagon, William Aguillon of Tarragona, Don VVillyam of Ceruera, Berenger of Petra Mola, Don VVilliam of Cardona, Raymond Fouleques Earle of Ampurias, Don Pedro Ahones, Don Roderigo of Liça-F na, Don Pedro Maça, Don Artorella, and Don Artal de Foces. There were many Noblemen and valiant Knights out of Leon and Portugal. Don Alphonſo king of Caſtile did reward the Nobilitie of his countrie with honours and liuings, according to euery mans degree. As for Aben Mahomad, King of the Moores Almohades, after this notable loſſe, he cared no more for the affaires of Spaine, but paſſed ſodenly into Affricke, fearing that the brute of his defeate would breed ſome innouation in his kingdom of Maroc, beeing not yet ſo well aſſured, but there remayned ſome feeling of the Almorauides gouernement: wherefore knowing how much a route or loſſe of a battaile may preiudice the reputation of a King, with a nation that is deſirous of change, as the Arabians, he poaſted ſpeedily into Affricke to preuent it. Portugal. Death of Don Sancho king of Portugall.

36 D. Sancho king of Portugall, whileſt theſe things paſt betwixt the Chriſtian Princes and the Moores, died in his kingdome, the which he had held 27. yeares, beeing 58. yeares old, more broken with trauell then with age: a wiſe and well aduiſed Prince, but much croſt with aduerſities, notwithſtanding he gathered together great treaſures, and therefore is ſomewhat taxed of couetouſneſſe, which is the greateſt cauſe of the ruine and diſhonour of kings. They write, that he had at the time of his death in the caſtell of Lisbone, and in the Monaſterie of Alcabaça, Saint Croix of Coimbra, and other places where his treaſure lay, aboue 500000. Markes of gold (it may be they ſhould ſay Marauidis of gold) and a thouſand foure hundred markes in ſiluer coyned, beſides many other Iewels: and yet his expence was great. Drawing neere his end, hee diſpoſed thereof, giuing by his teſtament vnto his eldeſt ſonne 200000. Marauidis of gold, and to either of his other three children 80000. Marauidis of gold, and 250. Markes of ſiluer, to his Baſtards 7000. Marauidis of gold, and certaine Markes of ſiluer. The reſt he ordained ſhold be employed to charitable vſes, as to build and indow Monaſteries and Hoſpitals, to redeeme captiues, and to make Chalices, Croſſes, and ſuch like ornaments. He alſo ordained to haue the bridge of Coimbra, and the houſe of Saint Ladre built, neither did hee forget the Apoſtolike Romaine Sea, for he did bequeath vnto Pope Innocent the third, an hundred Markes of gold, and there was not any Church in his Kingdome, but taſted of his bountie. He was interred in the chappell of Saint Croix of Coimbra, neere vnto the Queene Donna Aldoncia his wife, from whence he was afterwards remoued into the Arch of the great chappell. In the ſame Monaſtery are buried D. Henry, D. Sancha, Donna Blanca, D. Berenguela, and D. Conſtance his children. B C

1212. Genealogie of Portugall.

AFter him D. Alphonſo his ſon held the ſcepter of Portugal, who was then about 27. yeares old, and was crowned in the citty of Coimbra. And for that he was big, fat, and vnweldie of his perſon, they ſurnamed him the Groſſe: he was alreadie father of two children, D. Sancho, and D. Alphonſo, whereof the ſecond married Matilda, heire to the Earle of Bologne in France: beſides theſe he had by his wife D. Vrraca of Caſtile, Don Fernand, who was Lord of Serpa, and married to the daughter of the Earle D. Fernand of Lara, of Caſtile, called D. Sancha Fernandes, from whom iſſued a daughter, which was Queene of Denmarke; into which Realme D. Elenor daughter to this king D. Alphonſo was firſt married. Beſides theſe lawfull children, the king had company with a Moore, of whome he begot D. Alphonſo Martines. D. Alphonſo at his firſt entrance, had great iars with his ſiſters, for that hee would haue taken from them the lands which his father had giuen them for their portions: whoſe quarrell D. Alphonſo king of Leon did imbrace, and ſent his ſonne D. Fernand, accompanied by D. Martin Sanches (brother to theſe Ladies) for his guide, being very young, with an armie, who took from the king of Portugal, Valencia of Minio, Melgaçon, Hulgoſo, Frexo and other places: this war was afterwards ended by the commandement of Pope Innocent, who threatened to cenſure the kings of Portugal and Leon, if they made not a peace, to take armes againſt the Mores, who were enemies to the true Catholike Religion: from whom, about that time, and as the armie of Caſtile was diſſolued after the battell of Muradal, D. Pedro king of Arragon tooke Caſtelfabid and Ademus, which are in the Realme of Valencia. 37 Wee haue ſayd before, that this king had a ſonne by his wife, vnthought of, who was called Iaime, this Infant was much enuied, and his life ſought by his Vncles

A of either ſide; who wiſhed there had iſſued no heire from Don Pedro and Donna Mary Counteſſe of Montpellier, that they might haue ſucceeded to their Eſtates: a murtherous and couetous deſire, which did chiefly poſſeſſe Don Fernand Abbot of Montarragon. Wherefore they did breed vp Don Iayme carefully, and as much as they could out of danger: the king his father was aduiſed to ſend him into France, to bee kept by ſome Noble man his friend, where hee might be more ſafe then in Spaine: wherefore hee gaue him to Simon Earle of Montfort to bring vp, in whome he had great confidence, but hee abuſed him: for warre beeing attempted againſt the Albigeois, in the which the Earles of Tholouſa were ingaged, Don Pedro king of Arragon, and the Earle of Montfort grew enemies, and were in armes one againſt another; the Earle beeing made Generall againſt
B them of Albi, and their adherents: and the king Don Pedro fauouring the Earles of Tholouſa, father and ſonne, who had married his ſiſters. The euent was, as the Hiſtories of Spaine report, that the Earle of Montfort (who had conceiued a great hatred againſt the Earles of Tholouſa) hauing then great forces from the French king, vnder colour of making warre againſt the Albigeois, which were fallen from the Church of Rome, hee entred in hoſtile manner into the Earles countrie, whereof the king of Arragon beeing aduertiſed by his brother-in-law, hauing vntill then taken part with the Earle of Montfort, in this quarrell of the Albigeois he turned againſt him, hauing firſt aduiſed him, but in vaine, and cauſed the Pope to admoniſh him, that vnder the pretext of warre againſt the Albigeois, who were declared Heretickes, he ſhould not reuenge his priuate quarrels. D.
C Pedro beeing paſſed into France, and meaning to beſeege Symon of Montfort in the caſtle of Muret, which place he meant to abandon, there happened a furious skirmiſh among them, where as the king of Arragon was ſlaine vpon the place, and with him Don Aznar,, and Pedro Pardo, father and ſonne, Don Gomes de Luna, Don Michel Lueſia, Michel Rada, and many other Noblemen of Arragon: the Earle of Montfort retired ſafe with his men. Such was the pittifull end of this King Don Pedro, in September 1213. hauing raigned happily, and in great reputation, eighteene yeares, three moneths, and 20. dayes: his bodie was carried to the Monaſterie of Sixena, founded by the Queene his mother. The Albigeois warre continued, the end whereof you may ſee in the Hiſtories of France. They were people which oppoſed themſelues againſt the Popes Supremacie,
D and humane inuentions, brought in to the Chriſtian Religion, taught firſt by one called Amaulry in the towne of Alby, and thereabouts; againſt whom the Pope incenſed Chriſtian Princes.

D. Pedro king of Arragon ſlain in France 1213.

In this action Dominicke a Chanoine of Oſma did great ſeruice to the Romiſh Church, beeing brought into France, by D. Diego his Biſhop, whom the Pope did ſend his Legat for that effect. The Vniuerſitie of Paris did alſo condemne the opinion of the Albigeois: but Dominick relying not much vppon diſputations and reaſons, perſwaded all Princes and their ſubiects to armes, as beeing the moſt expedient meanes, for the which he was canonized, and put in the catalogue of Saints. It was he which brought in the Order of preaching Friars. Our French Hiſtories ſay, that Don Pedro fauoured the E Albigeois; and yet thoſe of Spaine giue him the title of Catholike. In his time beganne the Impoſt for Beeues and other cattell in Cattelogne, which was after his returne from the battaile of Muradal, as well by reaſon of the great expences of the warre, as for the great ſummes diſburſed, for the marriages of Don Pedro's three ſiſters.

Dominicke of Oſma author of the Order of Iacobins.

Don Iames the firſt of that name, the eighth King of Arragon.

F 38 DOn Iames, or Iaime his ſonne was then in the power of the Earle of Montfort in the towne of Carcaſſone, the which did much trouble the Arragonois and Caſtellans; who laboured all they could to haue their Prince, but it auayled little: wherefore Pope Innocent the third was forced, at the ſute and inſtance of the Eſtates of Arragon and Cattelogne, to ſend a Cardinall, called Peter of Beneuent, into Languedoc, to whome the the young king was deliuered, and led by him into his Countrie, where hee was receiued and crowned at Monçon, and then tooke and receiued the oath at Lerida. It was ordayned in theſe aſſemblies of Monçon and Lerida, that Don Sancho Earle of Roſſillon ſhould gouerne the realme during the king's minoritie, but they gaue him limitation. The kings perſon was recommended to Friar William of Monredon, Maſter of the Templers, to whom was giuen for an Aſſiſtant, Friar Raymond of Pegnafort, a Caſtellan, he that compiled the books of the Decretals, and did write arguments in caſes of conſcience, whereof there ſhall be more ample mention made. Don Sancho Earle of Roſſillon of a Regent, became a tyrant, and did in time much trouble the king Don Iames. Theſe things paſt in this manner in Arragon, the yeare after the victory of Muradal, or Tholouſa.

William of Monredon, and Raymond of Pegnafort or Rochefort, Gouernors of the kings perſon.

In Nauarre, the king D. Sancho the Strong, at his returne from Caſtile, found great diſorders and mutinies among his ſubiects, eſpecially in the citty of Pampelone, which grew by the young maydens of the towne, who had iniuried one another: and as oftentimes a ſmall coale kindles a great fire, which burnes a houſe, yea a whole cittie, ſo theſe petty brabbles made all the Inhabitants fall into factions, thoſe of the Bourg of Saint Sernin, and Saint Michel, to defend the female kind, fell to blowes and murthers, the which could not be preuented in the Kings abſence, who by his preſence pacified and reconciled them for a time: but beeing afterwards retired to his caſtell of Tudele, where he would not ſee any man, by reaſon that the incurable griefe in his foot increaſed daily, the young men of Pampelone reuiued their inſolencies and quarrels, ſo as one day thoſe of Saint Sernin and Saint Michel falling to armes, their fury and rage was ſuch, as there were aboue 800. ſlaine vpon the place, both men, wiues, and virgins, and many houſes were burnt: ſuch was their furious rage one againſt another, the which cauſed the King Don Sancho to leaue his voluntarie priſon, to pacifie it, as he did.

Nauarre. Pampelone in ſedition.

39 Among other remedies which might ſerue hereafter, hee found that peace could not continue long among a people, where there was a multitude of idle youth, and that of neceſſitie there muſt grow daily quarrels among them, if there were not meanes found out to employ them Seeing then that his ſubiects were giuen to armes, more then to any other exerciſe, he reſolued, ſeeing there was no warre with his neighbors, to make a garriſon vpon the Moores frontiers, whether the young men of the countrie ſhould be ſent, to be trained vp in martiall diſcipline, and to practiſe armes honorably againſt the enemies of Chriſt: for this cauſe he intreated the king D. Iames, or thoſe which did then gouerne his Realme of Arragon, to ſell him the fruites and poſſeſſion of the townes of Ademus, Caſtelfabib, Ferreta, Ferrelon, and Calamator, for his life, to make them a ſchole for armes: the which hee obtained, confirming alſo by the ſame mediators the peace which had beene concluded betwixt the kings Don Sancho, and Don Pedro, ſome yeares before, the which began to be troubled betwixt theſe two eſtates.

Caſtile. Exploits againſt the Moores.

D. Alphonſo king of Caſtille, hauing ſuffered his ſoldiers to reſt ſome time in their houſes, drew his army againe together, in the yeare 1213. and recouered the Caſtell of Duegnas, which he reſtored to the Order of Calatraua: he alſo tooke the Caſtle of Ezna Vexor, the which he gaue to the Order of Saint Iames: from thence hee came and planted his campe before the towne of Alcarras, ſeated vpon a very high and rough part of the mountaine called Sierra Morena, the which hee tooke without any great difficulty, the Moores beeing yet amazed at the defeate they had the yeare before, and then hauing ſeazed vppon many other places with the like eaſe, hee returned to Toledo, where the Queenes D. Elenor his wife, and D. Berenguela his daughter, with the Infant Don Henry attended him. There was a great famine that yeare in Spaine, when as Don Roderigo Ximenes the Arch-biſhop, did much good by his preaching, perſwading the rich to releeue the poore: for which conſideration the King did afterwards giue many places to him and his ſucceſſors Arch-biſhops, the which did much augment the reuenues of that Sea; honouring moreouer the ſayd Don Roderigo, and his ſucceſſors Arch-biſhops, with the title of High Chancelors of Caſtile.

Leon.

The Kings of Caſtile and Leon had beene no very good friends, vppon diuers occaſions, but now lately by reaſon of the diuorce betwixt the King of Leon and his wife D. Berenguela, daughter of Caſtile, the which was partly the cauſe why the king of Leon was not

not at the battell of Muradal: but this yeare (all hatred forgotten) the two kings had an interview in the towne of Vailledolit, whereas it was agreed, that Carpio and Montreall ſhould be reſtored to the King of Leon, vpon condition, that he ſhould raze them, and that he ſhould make warre againſt the Moores: for the execution whereof D. Diego Lopes de Haro was ſent to accompany Don Alphonſo king of Leon, with a good number of ſouldiers. The places beeing ruined, the king of Leon went againſt the Moores of Alcantara vppon the riuer of Tayo, on the confines of Portugall, the which hee tooke: whereas ſince he did inſtitute an Order of Knights, like vnto that of Calatraua. This king D. Alphonſo of Leon, is numbred the tenth of that name by them that mingle the kings of Caſtile and Leon together. We haue ſayd before that he had two wiues, the one was daughter to Don Sancho the firſt king of Portugall, called Donna Thereſa; of which marriage iſſued Don Fernand, who died before his father, Donna Sancha, and D. Dulce: being afterwards ſeparated by the Popes authoritie, for that they were couſins in the third degree: he married to his ſecond wife Donna Berenguela, daughter to Don Alphonſo the Noble, king of Caſtile, of whom was borne Don Fernand, who was King of Caſtile and Leon, and Don Alphonſo who came to be Lord of Molina, and had moreouer two daughters by this Lady Donna Conſtance, a Nunne in las Huelgas of Burgos, and Donna Berenguela, who married with the Earle Iohn de Brenne, whom they termed king of Ieruſalem. This ſecond marriage was alſo diſſolued, for that Donna Berenguela was daughter to her husbands couſin-germaine, & therefore Don Alphonſo had a friend, which brought him a baſtard, called Don Roderigo Alphonſo of Leon.

Caſtile.

After the taking of Alcantara, Don Diego Lopes de Haro came vnto the king of Caſtile, who beeing entred into Andaluſia beſeeged Baeça, which the Moores had rampared: but by reaſon of the great dearth, he raiſed the ſeege, and returned to Calatraua, where hauing left Don Roderigo the Arch-biſhop, to order all things vpon the fronter, he came to Burgos. The Arch-biſhop began to build the new towne of Milagro, where the worke-men were charged by the Moores, who made a great ſlaughter of them, and of many of the people which began to inhabit it: for the which the Arch-biſhop prouided as well as he could, and made a truce with the enemie in the Kings name. Beeing returned to the king to Burgos he reſolued to make a voiage into Guienne, where hee had ſome pretenſions, in the right of Queene Elenor his wife. Before his departure, hee would conferre with Don Alphonſo king of Portugal, his ſonne-in-law, ſending to intreate him to meete him at Plaiſance, on a certaine day: but beeing vppon the way he fell ſicke in Garci Mugnos a Bourg of Areualo, where he was forced to ſtay: then did his griefe increaſe, by the anſwer he receiued from the King of Portugall, who ſent him word, he would not paſſe the limits of his kingdome, by reaſon whereof hee was ſo much mooued with choller, as he dyed, in the yeare 1214. the fiue and fiftith yeare of his raigne, and the nine and fiftith of his age: his body was carried to Burgos, whereas his funerals were made, and it interred in the Monaſterie of las Huelgas, with the teares and griefe of all Spaine.

Death of Don Alphonſo the Noble King of Caſtile.

D. Henry the firſt of that name, the eighth King of Caſtile.

41 IN his place raigned his ſonne D. Henry the firſt of that name in Caſtile and Toledo, who was but eleuen yeares old: whereupon the Prelats, Nobles and Commons aſſembled at Burgos, where hauing declared him king, and taken the oath, they made the Queene Donna Eleonora his mother, Gouerneſſe of his perſon and Realmes: but ſhe ſuruiued her husband but 25. dayes, and was interred in the ſame Monaſterie. By her decree Donna Berenguela the kings ſiſter gouerned both him and his Realmes, who carried herſelfe vprightly to the contentment of all the Eſtates, during her adminiſtration. She was Ladie of Vailledolit, Mugnon, Curiel, Gormas, Saint Stephen, of the caſtell of Burgos, and other places and rents aſſigned by Don Alphonſo her father. During her regency the Councell of Latran was celebrated at Rome, vnder Pope Innocent the third with a great great concourſe of Prelates from all parts of Chriſtendome. Whither there went D. Roderigo Ximenes Arch-biſhop of Toledo and Primate of Spaine: the Arch-biſhop of Braga, the Biſhop of Vic, and other Prelates of Spain. There were aboue 300. at this aſſembly, which did exerciſe chiefe dignities in the church, beſides others innumerable of all eſtates, they did chiefely treate of the meanes how to vphold the Chriſtians eſtate in Paleſtina, or the holy Land: then of the rights of Patronage and reception of fruites and reuenewes of Churches by lay men. The Archbiſhoppe Don Roderigo preached with the Popes leaue, in the aſſembly, very learnedly in Latin, according vnto thoſe times: and for that that language was not well vnderſtood by all that were there preſent, he expounded the ſubſtance of his Sermon in Italian, Germaine, French, Engliſh, Caſtillan, and Biſcain, or Nauarrois which was his naturall tongue, for the which he was much commended and eſteemed, as Garybay ſaith, next to Doctor Blaz Ortiz, which done, and the Councell freed of the affaires which touched the generall of Chriſtendome: the Arch-biſhop D. Roderigo complayned of the contumacie and diſobedience of the Arch-biſhops of Narbone, Tarragone, Braga, and Saint Iames, who would not acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo: to proue the which he produced many priuiledges of the holy Apoſtolike ſea, eſpecially of theſe Popes, Vrbain, Gelaſius, and Honorius the 2. Lucius the 3. Adrian the 4. and Innocent the 2. granted to the Church of Toledo, and the Prelates therof, as Primates of Spaine. He alledged many ancient Councels celebrated in Spaine, and iuſtified the equitie of his cauſe, by many ancient Hiſtories and authenticall Records. The Pope deſired to heare the parties interreſſed: wherefore the Archbiſhop of Braga beeing preſent, anſwered for himſelfe: for him of Tarragone who was abſent, the Biſhop of Vic, one of his Suffragans preſented himſelfe, both which denyed the Primacie. They of Narbonne and Saint Iames were excuſed, beeing abſent. And for that the Archbiſhop D. Roderigo Ximenes was preſt to returne into Spaine, the proceſſe remained for that time vndecided, yet he obtained from the Pope many great prouiſions, which were both profitable and honorable, as to be Legate of Spaine for ten yeares, with power to make legitimate to the number of three hundred, with other ample faculties: right to chooſe and eſtabliſh Biſhops in all the townes which ſhould come into the Chriſtians power, and that the Church of Seuile in that caſe ſhould acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo, without any ſute: and that the Arch-biſhop thereof ſhould diſpoſe of all other Eccleſiaſticall dignities, in places conquered, or to be conquered. This Archbiſhop D. Roderigo Ximenes, hath written the Hiſtorie of Spaine in Latine vnto his time, and in like manner that of the Moores or Arabians ſince Mahumet.

THE Arch-biſhop D. Roderigo Ximenes beeing returned into Caſtile, found the affaires wonderfully troubled by the practiſes of D. Fernand Nugnes de Lara, D. Aluar Nugnes, and D. Gonçalo Nugnes, his breethren, ſonnes to the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, who (as their fathers and Vncles had done during the Nonnage of the king D. Alphonſo the Noble) would haue the perſon of the young king Henry in their cuſtodie, by which meanes they ſhould haue all authoritie and prerogatiue in the gouernement of the ſtate. Theſe Noblemen, who were great and mightie, wrought ſo, as they had what they pretended, by the meanes of Garcia Laurens, who had the gouernement of the Prince, and in whom the Queene Regent did rely much. They corrupted him by gifts and promiſes, ſo as hee counſelled the Queene D. Berenguela, and cauſed the Prelates, and other Noblemen of the Realme to allow thereof, that the king ſhould be put into the hands of theſe Noblemen of the houſe of Lara: whereunto Don Roderigo Ximenes the Arch-biſhop did alſo conſent, ſo as they did homage, and did ſweare faith and loyaltie in the hands of the Q. Regent, not to attempt nor change any thing in matter of State, were it in peace or war, without her counſell and conſent, whom they ſhould honor and reſpect, as it was fit: they ſhould defend her, her eſtates and goods in all occaſions, vpon paine to be held guiltie of high treaſon. Theſe promiſes beeing made by the Lords of Lara, the king D. Henry was deliuered into the hands of the Earle D. Aluar Nugnes: but they did not performe what they had promiſed, for as ſoone as they ſaw themſelues ſeazed of the Kings perſon, and therefore reuerenced and feared, they began to purſue many great perſonages and rich men with all violence, ſo as ſome were forced to flie. Moreouer, falling vppon the liberties, goods, and reuenues of the Clergie, they made their profit of them: whereuppon they were excommunicated by Don Roderigo Deane of Toledo, Vice-gerent or Subſtitute to the Arch-biſhop, the which did reclaime them from theſe inſolencies, eſpecially againſt the Clergie and Churches, whereof they promiſed to become Protectors.

Troubles during the minority of D. Henry king of Caſtile.

The young king deliuered into the hands of them of Lara.

But

A But for that it is a hard matter to reſtraine great men, when they are once giuen to tyranny, theſe Earles of Lara turned againſt lay-men, which enioyed ſpirituall liuings, whom they did vexe and ſpoile of their reuenues, ſo as they grew odious to all ſorts of men, and they began to be mooued, and to repine much at their exceſſe. D. Aluar who had beene newly made Earle of Auila, called an aſſembly of the Eſtates in the Kings name at Vailledolit, whither came certaine of his confederates, great men of Caſtile: but D. Lope Diaz de Haro, ſonne to D. Diego Lord of Biſcay, D. Gonçal Ruis Giron, and his breethren, D. Roderigo Ruis, D. Aluar Diaz de los Cameros, and Don Alphonſo Teles de los Meneſes, with many other Noblemen of the Kingdome, deteſting this tyrannie, exhorted the Queene to complaine of the extorſions, miſeries and calamities, which the peo- B ple and whole Realme ſuffered by their meanes: according to which aduice, ſhe did write to the Earle Don Aluar Nugnes, putting him in mind of the faith and homage which hee had ſworne to her, and admoniſhing him to gouerne better: wherewith D. Aluar beeing incenſed, he did all the wrong he could vnto the Queene, and in the end diſpoſſeſt her of all that the King her father had left her for her portion, yea he grew ſo inſolent, as he commanded her to depart the Court; the which this poore Princeſſe was forced to do, retiring with her ſiſter D. Elenor, who was yet a mayd, to Oteilla, where they remayned vntill the death of D. Henry their brother. This violent contempt was not concealed from the young King, who began to complaine, demanding to be deliuered againe vnto the Queene D. Berenguela his ſiſter, but it was in vaine: for he himſelfe beeing forced and reſiſting all he could, was led from place to place, as it pleaſed the Earle Don Aluaro: and C which was more, he was forced by him to marry D. Malfada Infanta of Portugal, daughter to the King D. Sancho, without imparting it to the Prince, nor to the Princeſſes of the bloud; not to any but to his owne faction: which marriage hee beganne to broach at Palencia, where they were made ſure; and ſuddenly beeing come to Medina del campo, hee cauſed them to lye together: whereat the Queene D. Berenguela was ſo mooued (beeing not made acquainted with this treaty) as ſhe wrote vnto Pope Innocent the third, aduertiſing him that the married couple were ſo neere akin, as according to the ordonances of the Church, they could not be ioyned together without ſcandall, by whoſe meanes the Pope did ſeparate them: whereupon D. Malfada (who was a very faire Princeſſe) returned D into Portugal very much diſcontented, as well for the breach of the marriage, as for that Don Aluaro would preſume to marrie her, the king D. Henry being an infant. They were couſins in the fourth degree by an vnequall line, wherof the Infanta had the better. Some Authors report it after this manner, that the Queene D. Berenguela hauing ſent one to Maqueda, where the king was, to carry him newes of his Eſtate, the Earles of Lara hauing intelligence thereof, cauſed him to be apprehended and put in priſon, and hauing counterfeitted letters, to ſome priuate men of baſe condition, from the Queene, as if ſhe would haue procured them to poyſon the king, they cauſed this priſoners proceſſe to bee made, who was for that cauſe hanged: yet not any one did beleeue, that euer the Queene D. Berenguela, would practiſe ſuch a trecherie; but held it to be a fraud, deuiſed by the Earle D. E Nugno, and D. Aluar his ſonne. Wherefore the Inhabitants of Maqueda beganne to mutine, which made the King and his Gouernors to go to Hueté: where beeing arriued, a Knight called Roderigo Gonçales of Valuerdé, who had charge from the Queene D. Berenguela, to ſteale away the king. Don Fernand de Lara layed hold of him, and carryed him priſoner to Alarcon.

Factions in Caſtile.

D. Aluar de Lara ſpoyles D. Berenguela the Queene Regent of her authority and eſtate.

Marriage forced of the K. D. Henry.

This made the Earles of Lara to keepe a more ſtreight guard about the King, whome they conducted to Vailledolit, and there beganne the warre againſt them, which held the Queenes partie. Montalegre in the which Don Suer Teles Giron remayned, was beſeeged and taken: and then ouer running and ſpoyling the country, Don Aluaro de Lara, chiefe of this warre, came to Carrion, then to Villana of Alcor, who hauing ſud- F denly ſurprized Don Alphonſo Teles de Meneſes, without the fort, beeing ill accompanied, his men vnhorſed and diſarmed ſome of Don Alphonſos troupe, and thought to take him priſoner, but he fled into the fort beeing wounded, where hee was beſeeged by the King in perſon, and the Earle Don Aluaro, but not able to take it, they retired to Palencia, where the king was lodged in the biſhops Pallace.

Ciuill warre in Caſtile.

All things (ſay they) paſt before the marriage, which was then concluded in Palence. A
It beeing accompanied, the king would go againſt D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and paſſing by Burgos, whereas his ſiſter the Queene D. Berenguela was, he went on, and did not ſee her, and ſo came to Calaorra, which fort was taken by Garcia Zapata, from Ruis Diaz de los Cameros, and his brother Aluaro Diaz. The king beeing afterwards returned to Burgos, the Queene his ſiſter began to write, and to ſollicite the Pope to diſſolue this marriage, which was the cauſe why D. Aluaro diſpoſſeſt her of her lands & reuenues, vnder the kings name and authoritie, which ſhe could not reſiſt. Moreouer, the Hiſtorians ſay, that Don Aluaro did purſue a ſecond marriage for the King D. Henry, with Donna Sancha Infanta of Leon, daughter to Don Alphonſo by his firſt wife D. Thereſa, by the which it was agreed that after the death of the king D. Alphonſo, the king D. Henry ſhould ſucceed him in the B Realme of Leon, and in the meane time he ſhould giue vnto his father-in law, the vſe and poſſeſſion of Saint Iohn de la Mota, whereof a Knight called Sancho Fernandes ſhould bee Gouernor, and anſwerable for it: the Earle D. Aluaro thinking to fortifie himſelfe with the ſupport and fauour of the king Don Alphonſo, by the granting of this place, although he repented him afterwards, giuing him in exchange Tiedra in ſtead of S. Iohn, and aboue 10000. Marauidis of gold, all to annoy the Queene D. Berenguela, and to diſ-inherit the Infant D. Fernand of Leon his ſonne and heire to the Realme, who was with her: for Tiedra did belong vnto the Queene, who was conſtrained to giue the place vnto the king Don Henry her brother, who demanded it. And then ſhe ſent the Infant D. Fer- nand vnto the king of Leon his father, : which done, ſhe retired to Oteilla, and the king to Palence, from whence D. Gonçalo Nugnes de Lara, brother to the Earle D. Aluaro, was C ſent with good troupes of horſe and foot, againſt D. Lope Diaz de Haro, who was towards Miranda of Ebro well accompanied: but as they were readie to fight, certaine religious men came betwixt them and parted them: ſo as the Earle D. Gonçalo returned to the king and D. Lope vnto the Queene; who was ſoone after beſeeged by the king her brother, and the Earle of Lara in Oteilla, but not able to take it, they left it to go to Frechilla, where they razed the houſes of D. Roderigo Gonçales Giron, and then they returned to Palence.
The Queene had in the meane time ſent to demand ſuccors, from the king of Leon, ſomtimes her husband, the which he granted, but the ſeege beeing raiſed, there was no neede to ſend any. Theſe things are written by many Authors very doubtfully and diuerſly: how ſoeuer it were, the realmes of Caſtile and Toledo did indure much miſerie by the wicked D and tyrannous gouernement of the Earles of Lara, the which had an end by the ſuddaine and miſerable death of the king D. Henry, whom they held in their power, and whoſe au-thoritie they did abuſe impudently. This young Prince beeing at Palença, lodged in the biſhops pallace, as they ſuffered him to play with certain young children of Noble houſes, who ſerued him and were about the ſame age, ſporting with them freely, and more inconſideratly then was fit for one of his quality: one of them whom they hold to bee of

D. Fernand F

D. Fernand called the Holy, the ninth king of Caſtile, and third of that name.

3 THe death of the King Don Henry, was very grieuous to the Earles of Lara, who ſought to keepe it ſecret for ſome dayes, but it was in vaine: for the Queene D. Berenguela was preſently aduertiſed, who inſtantly diſpatched D. Diego Lope de Haro, and D.
B Gonçalo Rais, to Toro in the countrie of Leon, to bring the Infant Don Fernand, who was there with the King his father. And for that ſhe feared leſt the King Don Alphonſo of Leon, beeing aduertiſed of this death, ſhould attempt ſomething vppon the Realme of Caſtile, the Ambaſſadors had charge to conceale it, and to faine that the Queene was ſtil moleſted, and readie to be beſeeged by her enemies, vpon which pretext they ſhould demaund the Infant her ſonne with ſome ſuccors of ſouldiers, the which the Ambaſſadours did wiſely effect, bringing D. Fernand to Oteilla, where hee was proclaimed king of Caſtile, Toledo, and Nagera in the open field, vnder an Elme, by the Noblemen which were there preſent: and preſently marched towards Palencia, where as the King, the Queen his mother, with their whole traine, were receiued with great honour by Don Tello the Bi-
C ſhop. From thence they came to Duegnas, which place they were conſtrained to force, ſo as the warre began to grow hote: which the Prelates and Noble-men of the countrie laboured to preuent, but in vaine: the Earle D. Aluar refuſing to quit his authoritie, and to lay downe armes, vntill he had the perſon of the new King Don Fernand in his power, as he had had that of D. Henry: but the memorie of his bad gouernment diſtaſted euery man: ſo as they were ſo farre from ſatisfying his deſire, as they were all aſhamed to haue beene ſo ill aduiſed, to giue the authoritie and gouernement of the Realme, to ſuch violent perſons as them of Lara: wherefore they ſought how to haue the king obeyed by Armes, to the great ruine of the countrey. The King and Queene-mother paſt on with their troupes to Vailledolit, and ſo to the riuer of Duero: from thence they went to Co-
D ca, where they ſhut the gates againſt them: wherefore they came to Saint Iuſt, where they receiued two aduertiſements: the one was, that they ſhould not go to Auila nor Segouia: the other, that the Infant Don Sancho Fernandes, brother to Don Alphonſo king of Leon, borne of D. Vrraca Lopes was comming againſt them with a mightie army: whereupon they turned backe towards Vailledolit, where they found ſome alterations againſt the Queene and her ſonne, practiſed by them of Lara, whom by her wiſedome ſhe pacified. There hauing aſſembled the Noblemen which had charges and dignities within the Realme, ſhe intreated them to aduiſe what was fit for the peace and publike quiet, offering to do any thing which they ſhould councell her. They who knew her to be a wiſe
E and diſcreet woman, were of opinion, that ſhe ſhould raigne as lawfull heire of Caſtile: but ſhe deſiring more the good and greatneſſe of her ſonne, then her owne, renounced the royaltie, in the preſence of them all, & reſigned it wholly vnto her ſon Don Fernand, the which was a worthy act, and commended of all men. Whereupon the King was conducted vnto the Church of Saint Mary the great, and there with a generall applauſe and conſent was confirmed King, and the oath taken of either ſide, the King being ſcarce ſeuenteene yeares, whoſe raigne was happie and full of all good.

Fernand the third proclaimed king of Caſtile.

4 The Moores of Spaine, ſubiect to Aben Mahomad, Miralmumin of Affricke, ſeeing themſelues deſtitute of his ayde and ſupport, after the loſſe of the Battaile of Muradal, (as it doth often happen after ſuch inconueniences and loſſes) grew to haue a bad conceite of their King Mahomad, and did beleeue, or made ſhew to beleeue, that the battaile was F loſt by his fault: wherefore all ſuch as had any charges and gouernements reuolted and erected many petty Kingdomes in Spaine. Among them, the firſt and chiefe was the Miralmumims owne brother called Zeit Aben-Zeit, who by others is called Zeita Buzeit, who ſeazed vpon the towne of Valencia, & the Iuriſdictions therof. A couſin of his called Aben Mahomad, when as the Chriſtians army, infected with the plague, returned into

The Arabians in Spain reiect the Miralmumins of Africk.

Caſtile, ſeazed vpon Baeça, who had the cittie of Cordoua alſo at his deuotion, with many other places in Andaluſia, and on the confines of Toledo; whom many Moores followed, for that he was deſcended by maſculine line from Abdelmon, the firſt king of the Almohades, and came of Abdalla one of his ſonnes: theſe two had yet ſome colour to hold that which their grandfather had conquered in Spaine. But at Seuille there did riſe a mightie Moore, called Aben Lalle, vnder whoſe power the townes of Eccia, Carmona, Xeres, and others of Andaluſia did ſubiect themſelues. In Murcia and Granado, there was one named Aben Hut, made himſelfe King, beeing of the race of thoſe Moores which had raigned in Sarragoſſa. In this ſort the other Moores made themſelues maſters of townes and Prouinces in Spaine, where they had beene ſet for Gouernors, all which did enter into league with the aboue-named as the mightieſt, giuing an end in Spaine to the Empire of the Almohades, and Kings of Maroc, two and fiftie yeares after the paſſage of king Abdelmon. This was the laſt diuiſion betwixt the Moores of Spaine and Affricke, the which were neuer more vnited vnder one Crowne, notwithſtanding that there haue many times troupes and armies paſt out of Affricke into Spaine againſt the Chriſtians, to ſuccor thoſe pettie Kings of the Moores which raigned there, whereas the Kings of Maroc might hold ſome ſea-townes and forts giuen them by the Kings of Granado, to fauour their deſcents: yet they neuer after had any great power nor Empire there. From theſe new erected eſtates, which were not yet very well vnited, the King of Caſtile (as we haue ſayd) had taken the ſtrong citty of Alcaraz, and he of Leon, that of Alcantara, in the yeare 1213. Since a truce beeing made betwixt the Chriſtians and Moores for ſome yeares, theſe Infidels had leyſure to ſettle themſelues, and to fortifie their places.

1217. In the yeare 1217. Don Mathew Biſhop of Lisbone, beeing leader of the armie of Portugal, tooke from them Alcaçar de Sal, beeing aſſiſted by ſtrangers, which were going into Syria, and by the Prior of the Templers, and Prior of Saint Iohn. Theſe ſtrangers were Engliſh, French, and Flemings, hauing a fleet of an hundred ſayle, beeing mooued thereunto by the admonitions and decrees of the Councell of Saint Iohn de Latran, held by Pope Innocent the third, which was the fifth expedition made by publike decree and Councell, by the which Andrew king of Hungarie was named Generall of the Chriſtians armie in the Weſt, notwithſtanding Iohn Earle of Brenne went in his place.

Caſtile. 5 Returning to Caſtile, the young king Don Fernand, his mother, and and all the Caſtillans, were much troubled after they had choſen him, for that the King D. Alphonſo his father, beeing diſcontented that D. Berenguela had by policy gorten away his ſonne, and ſeemed to diſtruſt him, and withall being deſirous to vnite that realme to his of Leon and to be called Emperour of Spaine, he came into Spaine with a mightie armie: whereupon they ſent Don Maurice Biſhop of Burgos, and Don Domingo biſhop of Auila to beſeech the King not to diſquiet his ſonnes Realme, of whoſe good he ſhould bee rather glad then ſorrie: but he was thereby incenſed the more. King Don Alphonſo marching on as farre as Burgos, ſpoyling all where he paſt, found the citty well garded by Don Lope Diaz de Haro and other Noblemen, who were well accompanied: wherefore ſeeing there was no meanes to enter, he returned, doing all the harme he could. About this time the Queene D. Berenguela, parting from Vailledolit, came to Palencia, whereas the Noblemen about Segobia and Auila came to offer her their ſeruice. The Caſtillans beeing freed from the feare of King Don Alphonſo, the new Kings army was ledde to Mugron, where the battery was begun: during the which the Queen returned to Burgos, to the funerals of her brother Don Henry, the which by her Order were very ſtately. Mugnon beeing taken, and the Queene come to the campe, with the ſouldiers which were at Burgos, they marched againſt Lerma and Lara, which places were taken by force. Beeing returned to Burgos, the army was led along the riuer of Oja, whereas the townes of Villorado, Nagera, and Nauarret yeelded vnto the King, but not their caſtels. In the meane time the Lords of Lara, laboured to make a generall rebellion againſt the king, ſo as the Princeſſe being forced to return to Palencia, there was an incounter vpon the way, where D. Aluaro was taken and led priſoner to Burgos, who was afterwards deliuered vpon condition that he ſhould yeeld vnto the King, all the places and garriſons which were held and maintained by his men at arms, belonging to the Crowne, eſpecially Amaya, Tariego, Cerezo

By this meanes there was a peace betwixt the king and the Noblemen his ſubiects whom hee receiued into fauour, ſuffring them to hold their Offices and Gouernments: but it was a peace of ſixe monthes onely, for ſeeing themſelues out of credit, they rebelled againe, againſt whom the king ſent ſome troupes, which forced them to retire to Leon. By reaſon whereof the warre reuiued betwixt Caſtille and Leon, but not too hotly: for there was preſently a truce made, the Earle D. Aluaro falling ſicke, whereof hee died at Toro, hauing firſt made a vow to take vpon him the habit and order of Saint Iames; wherefore they buried him at Veles. Preſent-

Death of D. Aluar and D. Fernand de Lara.

B ly after D. Fernand de Lara his brother retired into Affrike, where hee was well entertained in the court of the King of Maroc; but hee died ſoone after, hauing cauſed himſelfe to be carried to a Bourge inhabited by Chriſtians, called Elbora, neere vnto the city of Maroc. Drawing neere his end, he tooke vpon him the habit of the Order of Hoſpitaliers, thinking it would ſerue to mitigate his offence, in which habit his bodie was carried into Caſtille, and buried in the Commanderie of Pont de Hitero, in the Biſhoprike of Palencia, by the care of Donna Major his wife, D. Fernand and D. Aluar his ſonnes.

6 This age brought forth new Orders of religion, contrary to the precedent Orders of Monkes; for whereas theſe could not bee ſatisfied with temporal wealth, which was

Order of preaching friars.

C giuen them by Kings and Noblemen, as it were in emulation one of an other, thoſe reiected all riches, making profeſſion to be poore, and not to poſſeſſe any thing. The firſt was that of the preaching friars, which are called Iacobins in France, the Author whereof was that Chanoine of Oſma, which came out of Spaine into France, with his Biſhop, to maintaine the authority of the church of Rome, againſt the Albigeois and their adherents, beeing pronounced heretikes by Pope Innocent the third, as wee haue ſayd: the vow and profeſſion of this Order was, to preach againſt thoſe which ſhould ſtray from the faith. The Order was allowed and confirmed by Pope Honorius the third. Dominike was borne at Calaruega, and not at Calaroga, nor Calahorra; it is a Bourg in

D the Dioceſe of Oſma, betwixt Aranda of Dueto, and Saint Domingo of Silos, and is at this day a Monaſtery of Nunnes of that Order, the which was built by King D. Alphonſo the eleuenth, or laſt of that name, where they doe ſhew his fathers houſe and the font where he was baptized.

The confirmation of his Order was preſented by him, in the yeere 1218. vnto the King D. Fernand, hee himſelfe hauing obtained it at Rome; and in truth the ſea of Rome is much bound to theſe preaching friers, who haue beene one of the chiefe ſupporters thereof, the King D. Fernand as an obedient ſonne to the Pope, receiued the Order and the Author with great reuerence, and cauſed the Monaſteries of Saint Croix of Segobia, and of Saint Domingo the royal at Madrid, to bee built. Dominike dying ſome time

7 At the ſame time the Knights of the Order of Alcantara were diuided from that of Calatraua, beeing alike, and ſubiect vnto it, from which time they had their diſtinct maiſters. D. Alphonſo King of Leon, who had inſtituted this order, was a meanes that Alcantara, with all that this order did hold in the realme of Leon, was giuen to Saint Iulian del Pereiro of Portugal, which was of the ſame order of Ciſteaux, vpon condition that the maiſter and Order of Pereiro and his ſucceſſors ſhould remaine vnder the obedience, and be ſubiect to the v ſite of the Maiſters of Calatraua. Lara, which did trouble his realme, he began to raigne in peace; and beeing now of age fit to be married, the Queene D. Berenguela his mother, with the aduice of such as shee knew to be faithful, began to treat a marriage in Germany, with Beatrix, daughter to the Emperour Philip, and cousin to the Emperour Frederic the second King of Naples and Sicile. The Germains say, that she had beene married to Otton Duke of Saxony, who was Emperor after Philip; so as she must of necessity haue beene a widow. To this effect D. Maurice Bishop of Burgos, and D. Pedro Abbot of the Monastery of Saint Peter of Arlança, with the Prior of the Order of Saint Iohn were sent Ambassadors wel attended, who concluded this marriage, notwithstanding that they held them foure monthes without any resolution: this Princesse was sent into Spaine through France, B whereas Philip Augustus, then raigning, did her much honour throughout his whole realme, causing her to bee conducted vnto Guipuscoa, from whence the Noblemen of Spaine which were deputed to receiue her, conducted her to Victoria, whereas the Queene D. Berenguela met her, and did accompany her to Burgos: this Princesse did please D. Fernand, for she was exceeding faire. Three daies after her arriual, the King was made Knight, and did arme himselfe in the Monastery of Las Huelgas, and then he married D. Beatrix the last of December 1220. Of this marriage issued many children, whereof the eldest was Alphonso, who succeeded in the two Realmes of Castille and Leon: the second was D. Frederic, the third D. Fernand, the fourth D. Henry, the fifth D. Philip the sixth D. Sancho, the seuenth and last D. Manuel. Hee had also two C daughters, D. Elenor, who died and Infant, an D. Berenguela a Nunne in the Monastery of Las Huelgas.

D. Ferdinand King of Castille marries the Emperor of Germanies daughter.

An. 1220.

The yeere following 1221. the marriage was concluded betwixt D. Elenor, the King of Castilles aunt, and D. Iames King of Arragon, who was then but thirteene yeeres old, which argues falshood in some which haue written that this King before hee married this Princesse, had contracted a secret marriage with D. Theresa Gil of Bidaura, daughter of D. Iohn of Bidaura, of whom hee begot two sonnes, the one called D. Pedro, who was Lord of Aierbe, and the other D. Iaime Lord of Xerica, the which hath no great ground in nature, considering the King was very yong, and we must beleeue that the acquaintance he had with this Lady, either as a spouse or a friend, was ten yeeres after, when he was diuorced from D. Elenor. He was in a manner constrained to make this D alliance with Castille, hauing need of D. Fernands assistance, by reason of the troubles he had in his country, which grew through the bad and tyranous gouernment and ambition of his vncles: the which wee must relate and fetch farther off. This Prince had beene drawne, as wee haue sayd, out of the hands of Symon Earle of Montfort, and conducted into his realme of Arragon, where there was great contention betwixt the Estates, and the Earles of Roussillon, the father, and sonne to D. Fernand, and the Abbot of Montarragon, the Kings vncles, who in stead of gouerning the realme, would haue wrested it from him: notwithstanding by the fidelity of the Estates and their authority, E together with the dilligence of the Cardinal of Beneuent the Legat, right preuailed, and the Infant D. Iames was acknowledged for lawfull King at Lerida, as I haue sayd, where the Princes contending did not appeere. There were three Gouernors appointed, two in Arragon, which were D. Pedro d' Ahones, and D. Pedro Fernandes d' Açagra, whose Gouernments were distinct by the riuer of Ebro, and the third in Cattelogne. Ouer all the which D. Sancho, Earle of Roussillon, was appointed superintendent. There it was also concluded, that D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Prouence, a young Prince of nine yeeres of age, sonne to D. Alphonso, should be with the King, vnder the same tutors aboue mentioned, the which was put in execution: but the Earle soone after, about the yeere of our Lord 1216. escaped from them, and retired into Prouence, where hee married the daughter of Thomas Earle of Morienne, named Beatrix, who was mother of F fiue Queenes.

To preuent the continual practises of the Earles of Roussillon, and of D. Fernand, vncles to the young King, it was resolued, about the yeere 1217. that hee should bee declared of full age, being then but tenne yeeres old, according vnto some, the which the

A Earle of Rouſilllon did wonderfully contradict: yet after great contention, he quit the Regency, in the yeere 1218. by the authority of the Eſtates aſſembled to that end at Tarragone, whereas the Earle receiued certaine places in fee of the King. At this time the authority of the Magiſtrate (called the Iuſtice of Arragon) was great, for the defence of the publike liberty.

The yeere following 1219. all the continent of Spaine was afflicted with a great drought (whereunto it is very much ſubiect) as well through want of raine, as for that the ſprings were dried vp; ſo as there followed a great dearth, and peſtilent diſeaſes. Theſe calamities were accompanied with troubles and ciuill ſeditions, by the rebellion of D. Roderigo Lizana, a man of great authority and power, who being incenſed for ſome pre-
B tended wrongs againſt Lope a' Albero, hee ſurprized him in his houſe, and ſhut him vp in a fort of his, from whence the King deliuered him by force; his commandements, nor the decrees of his councel preuailing nothing. D. Roderigo deſpayring to finde grace with the King, retired to Albarrazin, to D. Pedro Fernanaes de Açagra, whether they ſent troupes of ſouldiers to beſiege them, who could not force the place, beeing ſtrong both by nature and art: notwithſtanding D. Roderigo and D. Pedro Fernandes, acknowledging their fault, obtained pardon of the King. In theſe ſieges they vſed an Engine of battery made at Hueſca, which did caſt great ſtones, making one hundred and fifty ſhot in a day and a night, with great ruine.

Theſe things happened in the yeere 1221. whileſt they treated of the marriage of the ſayd King D. Iames, with D. Elenor of Caſtille, the Mediators whereof were D. Symon
C *Corne*l, William Cerucra, and William Raymond of Moncade, hee which married Garſinde, the heire of the country of Berne: for the accompliſhing whereof, the parties met at Agreda, where they were made ſure, and the contract of marriage drawne, greatly to the Queenes aduantage, from whence they went to marry in the city of Tarraſſone. Of this marriage D. Alphonſo was borne, who died before the father: This marriage was not firme, for being made without a diſpenſation from the Pope, being couſins in a prohibited degree, it was diſſolued by Pope Honorius the ſecond after ſome yeeres, and the Infanta ſent home into Caſtille; yet ſome ſay that ſhee profeſſed herſelfe in the Monaſtery of Saint Mary de la Vega.

D 9 A little before this, King D. Iaime, had inſtituted the Order which they call our La- Order of Merced.
dy of the redemption of priſoners, otherwiſe de la Merced, by the councel of his confeſſor friar Raymond of Pegnafort, or Rochefort, who ſet downe the rules for the religious of this Order, vnder that of Saint Auguſtine. Their profeſſion and chiefe vow was to goe into the Moores country, to redeeme Chriſtians that were priſoners, and if any one for want of money could not redeeme a Chriſtian ſlaue out of the hands of an Infidel, and did ſee him by ill vſage in deſpaire or otherwiſe in danger to renounce the Chriſtian faith, they were bound to put themſelues in the ſlaues place, and to ſerue for him vntill they had paied his Maiſter the price agreed vpon, which was a rare charity.
E The firſt brother of this Order, was Peter Nolaſco of Barcelona, or Francis according vnto ſome; who receiued the habit in the chiefe church of that towne, with great ſolemnity, in the yeere 1218. by the hands of friar Raymond the maiſter thereof, the King D. Iames being preſent. This habit was white, as they carry it at this day, with the armes of Arragon and Cattelogne, which are, a croſſe argent, and foure bends gueules in a field Or. The Order was ſince confirmed, in the yeere 1230. at the requeſt of the King D. Iaime and purſute of the maſter, D. Raymond of Rochfort, by Pope Gregory the ninth, he who confirmed the Order of the friars Mineurs, inſtituted after that of the preaching friers, by the Seraphicall father Saint Francis vnder the Order of Saint Auguſtin, but Order of the Cal. of S. Francis.
ſomewhat changed: the Author of this Order was wonderfully perſecuted by the enemy of mankinde, enuious (ſay the Spaniſh Authors) of the great good which ſhould 10
F come vnto the Catholike church of Rome, by the erudition and piety of the religious of that Order. This father of Franciſcan friars, came into Spaine, during the raigne of D. Fernand King of Caſtille, of whom wee write, who receiued him with great reuerence, and did build many goodly conuents of that Order, and by his example other Kings did the like.

11 Fiue

Portugal.

11 Fiue of the Brethren of this Order, not yet allowed nor confirmed by the Pope (the which notwithſtanding floriſhed in Portugal, in the latter time of king D. Alphonſo the groſſe) were deſirous to paſſe to Maroc, there to preach the faith of Chriſt, but they proſpered not; for the King of the Arabians, offended with the habit, countenances, and importunity of theſe friars, ſlue them all with his owne hand, by reaſon whereof they were put in the ranke of bleſſed Martires, according to their Legend. Of this cruel execution was an eye witneſſe D. Pedro of Portugal, brother to the King, who cauſed their bodies to bee brought to Coimbra, where they were buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Croix.

They ſay that theſe Monkes partting from Portugal, had prophecied to the Queene D. Vrraca, that ſhee ſhould die in the yeere of our Lord 1220. as it happened. In the time of the ſame King D. Alphonſo floriſhed that religious man whom they call Saint Anthony of Padoua, who notwithſtanding was borne at Lisbone; and for his great knowledge, according to the time, was called the arke of the holy Scripture. Hee being a Chanoine of Saint Croix at Coimbra, had ſo great a feruency to ſerue God, as he became a friar of the Order of Saint Francis, changing his name, which was Fernand into that of Anthony; hee was a Doctor and a profeſſor in diuinity, and did read in the vniuerſities of Tolouſa, Bolonia and Padoua, where he died; of whom Portugal and all Spaine glory much. As for King D. Alphonſo ſurnamed the groſſe, hee hath not miniſtred much matter to write of his actions: for his raigne was ſhort, and himſelfe in diſpoſed of his perſon. Hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1223. beeing but eight and thirty yeeres old, whereof hee raigned eleuen. His body lies in Alcouaça, neere vnto that of the Queene his wife.

D. Sancho Capello the ſecond of that name, the fourth King of Portugal.

Surname of Capello.

12 D. Sancho his ſonne, called Capello, raigned after him. He was ſixteene yeeres old when he began to raigne, & was crowned in the city of Coimbra. His ſurname of Capello came by reaſon of the habits which hee ware wide and long, like a Clergy man. It may bee hee ware ſome great cap or hat, as the Portugals doe at this day, who will haue all their apparel very wide and eaſie, euen their buskins of Spaniſh leather, which are ruffled downe to their heeles, ſaying that it doth not become a gentleman to carry them ſtraight and ſmooth.

This Prince was more courteous, affable, and a louer of peace then was fit for a commander that will keepe his ſubiects in awe. Wherefore hee was contemned by his ſubiects, and held for a couard and baſe minded, ſo as they attempted many things inſolently and audatiouſly, againſt all right or reaſon, without reſpect of Prince, or Iuſtice, the which was ill adminiſtred in his time, his baſeneſſe yeelding to the malice of his ſubiects. Hee married with D. Mencia Lope de Haro daughter to the Earle D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biſcay the fourth of that name: a Lady of great beauty and an excellent ſpirit, but not much pleaſing to the Portugals, for the King tooke her, beeing a widow againſt their likings, and beſides ſhee bare him no children: wherefore they vſed great meanes in the court of Rome to diſſolue this marriage.

Marriage of the King D. Sancho.

Amongſt all the Kings of Portugal, as well thoſe which went before, as which followed, hee onely was childleſſe, for hee neither had lawfull children, nor baſtards. D. Mencia Lopes did gouerne him in ſuch ſort, as no reſpect of the publike good of the Realme, nor the exhortations, intreaties, nor admonitions, made vnto him by the Noblemen, and religious perſons, who were then much reſpected, neither yet any other meanes whatſoeuer, could mooue him to bee diuorced from her, wherefore they ſpake it publikely, that ſhee had bewitch'd him, what happened you ſhall vnderſtand hereafter.

Returning

A Returning to the affaires of Caſtille, the King D. Fernand hauing ſolemnized his ounts marriage, after all the feaſts and ſports he found himſelfe ingaged in new troubles, procured by D. Fernand Ruiz Diaz de los Cameros, who had newly croſt himſelfe to paſſe into Syria, to the holy warre; for the performing of which voiage, it may bee his purſe was not very well furniſhed, wherefore hee beganne to taxe and ſpoile the Kings country, which was vnder his command, for theſe concuſſions hee was cited to appeere in court, at Vailledolit, where he did in ſome ſort iuſtifie himſelfe.

Fernand Ruiz Diaz de las Cameros, a concuſsionar and a rebel.

Afterwards being pricked in conſcience for theſe outrages, beeing alſo by nature inconſtant, feareful, and with all ill aduiſed, hee abſented himſelfe, wherefore the King ſeized vpon all his goods. D. Fernand Ruiz ſeeing that they proceeded againſt him with
B all rigour, fortefied himſelfe in certaine caſtles, from the which hee did much trouble the Kings affaires, ſo as in the end hee was forced to compound with him and to giue him money.

By this accord, hee yeelded vp the places which hee held, and receiued fourteene thouſand peeces of gold. After him Gonçalo Peres, Lord of Molina did rebel, beeing mooued therevnto by D. Gonçalo Nugnes de Lara, who beganne to ouerrunne and ſpoile thoſe parts which lay neere his houſes, like an enemy; not ceaſing, for any admonitions or threats made vnto him in the Kings name, vntill that hee was forced to goe and beſiege him in Molina; notwithſtanding by the means of D. Berenguela the Queene mother, hee was reſtored to the Kings fauor, and the ſouldiers were drawne from before
C Molina. But D. Gonçalo Nugnes de Lara, who for feare of puniſhment was retired into the Moores country, demanding pardon alſo could not obtaine it: wherefore hee liued the remainder of his daies, which were but ſhort, at Baeça in Andaluſia, where hee died miſerably, as his brethren D. Aluaro and D. Fernand had done, worthy in truth of great puniſhments, for their raſh and ſeditious enterpriſes, beeing greater and more eminent then all the other Noblemen of the realme. The King beeing freed from this care, and the realme in ſome quiet, D. Maurice Biſhop of Burgos, an Engliſh man borne, beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1222. to ſet his hand to the building of the great church of that city, according to the faſhion wee ſee it at this day, the which was finiſhed in his time. The Epiſcopal ſeat was before at Saint Laurence. The D Archbiſhip D. Roderigo cauſed them alſo this yeere to worke about the building of the chiefe Church of Talauera, the which was indowed with foure dignities, and twelue Chanoins, and at the ſame time the Churches of Vailledolit and Oſma were built by a Biſhop of Oſma, who had beene Secretary to the King D. Fernand. The church of Padron, the Biſhops lodging, and the bridge which is vpon Minio were alſo then built, by the care and charge of D. Laurence Biſhop of that place.

D. Gonſalo Peres Lord of Molina, and D Gonſal Nugnes de Lara rebel in Caſtille.

An. 1222

It was alſo about the beginning of this yeere 1222. that D. Ramir Infant of Nauarre, brother to the King D. Sancho the retired, was made Biſhop of Pampelone, of whoſe charity Authors write with admiration, that hee gaue all he had vnto the poore, and the E more his riches did abound, the more he gaue.

Nauarre.

In all the time after the marriage of the King D. Iames, and D. Elenor of Caſtille, vnto the yeere 1228. when as the warre of Majorca was attempted, the realme of Arragon was troubled with continual ſeditions, procured by the Infant D. Fernand, the Kings vncle, beeing exceeding ambitious, who hauing entred into League, with D. Nugno of Arragon his couſin, ſonne to D. Sancho Earle of Roſillon, D. William of Moncada (a little before enemies, but now growne friends, vpon this occaſion) Pedro d' Ahones and others, tooke vpon him againe the Regency of the realme, by force, in the yeere 1223. and diſtributed amongſt his fauourers and confederats the chiefe dignities of the realme, holding the King and Queene, in his power: but a while after the King eſcaped from Tortoſa, and retired to Huetra or Horta, where hauing conferred with the Nobi-
F lity, hee raiſed an armie, with the which hee entred the territories of the Moores of Valencia and Murcia beeing tired with ciuill tumults, ſo as hee forced Azebut or Zeit King of Valencia to promiſe him tribut, and in like manner him of Murcia, which was the fifth penny of their impoſts. In this warre many commaunders of the League, intermedled, contrarie to the Kings liking. Amongſt others, D. Pedro d' Ahones discontented that the King had made a truce with the Moores, sought to breake it, and did often lead troupes of souldiars into the territory of Valencia, spoyling all he found: so as the King hauing often aduised and intreated him to conteine himselfe, but in vaine hee commanded they should take him prisoner, but D. Pedro seeking to defend himselfe, being pursued by the King and others, was slaine by D. Sancho Martines de Luna, with a lance: the which did put all the townes of Arragon (beeing already infected) into open rebellion against the King: who marched presently with his army into the countries of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorça, whereas the houses, lands and subiects of D. Pedro were, the which he wasted al he could.

D. Pedro de Ahones slaine.

The townes of Saragossa, Huesca and all the rest, except Calatajub, followed the Infant D. Fernand, and the Noblemen of his faction, as defenders (sayd they) of the publike liberty, the chiefe of the Saragossans, was their Bishop D. Sancho d' Ahones: brother to D. Pedro, that was slaine. On the other side the Kings army was led by D. Blasco Alagon, and Artal de Luna, who did much annoy them of Saragossa and others. In the end, the mildnesse, patience and dissimulation of the King D. Iames, surmounted al these alterations and mutinies, who could so winne the Princes and Noblemen, beeing much troubled to maintaine this warre, as they all submitted themselues vnto him; by whose example the townes were quiet, yet the citties of Saragossa, Huesca and Iacca made a league amongst themselues, for the defence of their lands and iurisdictions against theeues and robbers, and remainders of ciuil dissentions, and erected a Magistrate, holding a forme of Iustice, like vnto that which they call Hermandades in Castille, yet without any preiudice to the Kings royal prerogatiue.

Moores.

13 In Castille whilest that the King D. Fernand was busie to suppresse his owne subiects, and to dispose of the affaires of old Castille, the Inhabitants of Cuenca, Huete, Alarcon and Moja, beeing gathered together, made a roade into the territories of Valencia, from whence they brought a great booty. This was an aduice giuen by D. Berenguela the Queene mother, and the prelats of Castille, to the end they might breake the truce which was betwixt her sonne and the petty Kings of the Moores, thinking it high time the King should goe to the warre, and that it was the dutie of a Catholike Prince to pursue these Infidels, with what right soeuer. Wherefore the King animated by this councel, gathered his army together, and marched into Andalusia, where at his first entry, Aben Mahomad, King of Baeça, made himselfe his vassal, sending to meet the Christians army, when it was at the passage of the mountaine called Puerto del Muradal. Afterwards they came to Quesada, whereas many Moores were slaine, and many taken, the townes of Lacra, Teua and Palhes were abandoned by the Moores, the castles of Esnader, Escamel and Espulei were razed, whereof the two last were yeelded by composition. From thence D. Lope Dias de Haro, was sent with D. Fernand Ceci, Maister of the Order of Saint Iames, and D. Gonçal Tuannes, maister of Calatraua, to Biuoras, whereas there were certaine bands of Arabians of Affrike, whom they defeated, bringing away many prisoners. D. Roderigo Ximenes the Archbishop and Primat did accompany the King in this expedition, who after these happy exploits, returned to Toledo, whereas the Queenes attended him.

Arragon.

In the meane time D. Iames King of Arragon, being discontented that the Castillans had attempted to inuade the Moores vpon the marches of his conquest, according to the diuision which had beene made by the Popes order, entred into Castille by his fronter, where he did some spoile towards Soria, and therefore the peace was like to breake betwixt these two Kingdomes: yet the King D. Fernand beeing come to Cuenca, the two Kings were reconciled, and had a friendly enterview there, yet the King of Castille, to the preiudice of Arragon, had receiued Zeit Abenzit King of Valencia to fealty and homage, as his vassal, who beeing terrified with the great power of the Christians, and mooued by the example of the King of Baeça was come to the King D. Fernand to Cuenca.

Moores. An. 1224.

In the yeere 1224. there was a new army raised, and led into Andalusia, which committed great spoiles, and tooke Andujar and Martos, with many forts and castles of smal fame, finding no resistance in field.

And

A And in the yeere 1225. the Chriſtians army was lead againe into the Marches of Andaluſia, being drawn thether by their good ſucceſſe, the King affecting nothing more then this Mooriſh warre, wherein he tooke exceeding delight. In which expedition Xadar was taken, and other ineſtimable harmes done vnto the Infidels. Of the fruits of this war the Knights of Calatraua, had Martos, for them and their ſucceſſors: then was there in Spaine, Legat for Pope Honorius the third, Iohn Abbatis Villa, Biſhop, Cardinal Sabina who perſwaded the King of Caſtille, not to ſuffer the Moores in quiet, but to preſſe them whilſt they were wauering: wherefore in the yeere 1226. the army of Caſtille aſſembled at Toledo, was lead into Andaluſia, where they tooke from the Moores Saint Eſteuan, Exnatoraphe, and the Tower of Albep, or Albezo, and beſieged Iaen, which An. 1226.

B they could not take, for the towne was great, and well fortified with men, and all things neceſſary for the warre. In it was D. Aluar Perez de Caſtro, a baniſhed man of Caſtille, with 160. horſe Chriſtians. Chriſtians in pay with the Moores againſt the King of Caſtile.

Wherfore the king D. Fernand, rayſing his ſiege went to Priego, where there were many knights of the Almohades lodged, who were very rich; the town was taken by aſſault, & ſoone after the caſtle yeelded by cõpoſition. After which, the Chriſtians tooke Loxa, & hauing taken great ſpoiles, and many priſoners in thoſe places, they came and camped at Alhambra, which was a ſtrong place, ſeated vpon a ſteepe rocke: but the Moores were ſo amazed, as without any reſiſtance they abandoned their goods and fled to Granado: whereby it ſeemes, that that part of the fort of Granado, which is called Alham- Exploits of the Chriſtians againſt the Moores.

C bra was built and peopled by theſe Moores; for after that time the towne of Granado, began to be wonderfully peopled with Moores, which were chaſed from ſuch towns & places as the Chriſtians did win in Andaluſia. The fort of Alhambra being ſpoiled, the Chriſtian army did ouerrun the champian country of Granado, burning and deſtroying al they found, with great ſlaughter of the Moores, amongſt the which there died a famous captaine, called Harippus, a great enemy to the Chriſtians, & who had done them much harme the yeeres before. The Chriſtians approched ſo neere vnto the city of Granado, as the Moores fearing to be beſieged, or that they wold ſpoile their goodly building there abouts, compounded and did homage to the King D. Fernand, deliuering him 1300. Chriſtian captiues, which they held. This compoſition was treated by Aluaro Granada and Albambra.

D Peres de Caſtro, aboue mentioned, whom the King D. Fernand receiued then into grace. And thinking he had done ynough, he returned with this victorious army to Toledo. D. Roderigo Ximenes did not willingly looſe any one of theſe voiages, yet he could not bee preſent at this laſt, by reaſon of a ſickneſſe, which ſurprized him at Guadalfajar, ſo as hee gaue his troupes to D. Dominike Biſhop of Plaiſance, with power to execute his Epiſcopal charge in the campe. So did the Prelats in thoſe daies labour in the Lords vineyard, as many doe alſo in this age. The Garriſons left by the King at Martos, Andujar, and other places of the fronter, among the which was D. Aluar Peres the commander, & the maiſter of the Order of Calatraua beganne to ſpoile the territories of Seuile, whereas there raigned a mighty Moore, called Abullalle or Aben Lalle, who hauing drawne a

E great number of ſoldiars out of Seuile, Xeres, Carmona and Eccia, came and charged theſe Chriſtians, who were neither amazed nor weake; wherefore they did not onely withſtand the Moores valiantly, but did wholy defeat them, ſo as there were 20000. ſlaine vpon the place, yet the Moores hauing repaired their forces, beſieged the caſtle of Garces, and notwithſtanding that the Chriſtians, which were nere, did attempt to ſuccor it and that the King D. Fernand with D. Lope Dias de Haro, with many other knights, did aduance to raiſe the ſiege, yet the place was taken: wherefore the King D. Fernand came to Exaldalulla, whether the King of Baeça came vnto him, being accompanied with 3000. horſe Almohades, and Alarabes, and a great number of foote, offring both himſelfe and his men to doe him ſeruice. He was welcome to the King, and entertained Moores of Seuile defeated.

Theſe Princes being together, they made an accord, by the which the King of Baeça promiſed to deliuer vnto the King of Caſtille, the caſtles of Saluatierra, Burgalhimar, & Capilla; vpon condition the King of Caſtille ſhould take him & his country into his protection, & defend him againſt al men: for aſſurance of the deliuery of which places, it was agreed that the caſtle of Baeça ſhold be preſently giuen in after Saluatierra (yet with ſome difficulty) receiued a garriſon of Caſtille: but Capilla, a place in the Archbiſhoprike of Toledo, ſtrong by nature, beeing built vpon a rocke, would not obay, wherfore three months being ſpent in treaties and parlees, and nothing concluded, the King returned to Toledo, leauing the fronter well manned; and winter being paſt, he came and laied ſiege to Capilla, being ſtil ſeized of the caſtle of Baeça: this place was obſtinatly defended by the Moores which were rebels to Aben Mahomad, who furniſhed the campe with victuals from Cordoua, whether he was retired, ſhewing him ſelfe faithful in al things to the King D. Fernand. In the end Capilla was yeelded, vpon condition they ſhould depart with ther baggage, and then the King returned to Tole B

iects to Aben Mahomad, incenſed at the ſubmiſſion which hee had made vnto the King of Caſtille, and that hee had ſent victuals vnto the campe before Capilla, were rebelled againſt him, and had forced him to flie to the caſtle of Almodauar del Rio, whereas pleaſing to this Mooriſh King, and expecting ſome good recompence, were deceiued, for the King of Seuile cauſed both their heads to bee cut off, and caſt vnto the dogges.

An. 1227. This happened in the yeere 1227. at that time died Lewis the eight, the French King, father to Saint Lewis, and hnsband to the Queene D. Blanche of Caſtille. This Lady by the will of the King her husband, was left Regent of the realme of France, during the C minority of the King her ſonne, who was but twelue yeeres old: wherewith many Noblemen of France being diſcontented, banded againſt her, to diſpoſſeſſe her of the go-uernment; thinking it vnworthy the name of the French, and ominous for their Eſtate, to be gouerned by a woman, eſpecially a ſtranger. The chiefe of the conſpirators were Philip Earle of Bologne the Kings vncle, Peter Duke of Brittan, Hugh de la March, Troubles in France for the Gouernment. Robert d' Eureux, Raymond of Tolouſa, and Thybauld of Champagne, who was King of Nauarre: but the Queene, who it may bee found they had more regard to their priuate intereſts, then to the publike good, reſiſted them courragiouſly, beeing ſupported by other Noblemen of France, ſo as from words they fell to armes. Vpon this occaſion the King D. Fernand was ſollicited to ſuccor the Queene D. Blanche his aunt, againſt the D Rebels, whereof he excuſed himſelfe; although hee ſeemed to be much greeued for her diſtreſſe: But hee was then ſo ingaged in warre againſt the Moore, as it was impoſſible for him to deuide his forces: but you muſt obſerue that by the right of ſucceſſion the realme of Caſtille did belong vnto her, the which D. Fernand did hold, ſo as there was little loue betwixt them. Afterwards all ſucceeded to the Queenes deſire in France, who made fruſtrate her enemies deſeignes, as the French Hiſtories report, gouerning the realme, and breeding vp her ſonne vnder the diſcipline of the religious of Saint Dominike and S^t. Francis, who were then in great credit. The King of Baeça being ſlaine as we haue ſayd, new difficulties did arriſe for the King of Caſtille, for the Moores of Baeça

The death of Aben Mahomad King of Baeça, gaue way to the raigne of Aben Hut A who was of the race of the Kings of Saragoſſa, and enemy to the faction of the Almohades: this King ſeized vpon the fort of Ricot, in the realme of Murcia, and tooke occaſion of their religion, publiſhing that that which the Almohades had brought in, was falſe, and inuented by wicked, turbulent and mutinous perſons, whoſe raſh impiety the ſoueraigne God had ſhewed was diſpleaſing vnto him, by their vnfortunate euents in the late warres of Spaine: wherefore they muſt returne to the ſimple beliefe of their aunceſtors, and reiect that prophane Almohade, with his King Abdelmon, and their followers. Vpon this quarrel hee intitled himſelfe King of Murcia, and beganne to perſecute the ſect of the Almohades, ſo as all hee could get into his hands, he put to a miſerable death; hee cauſed the Meſquites or Meſgides to bee purified, and waſhed, with B exorciſmes and ſuperſtitious ceremonies, as hauing beene poluted and violated, in ſeruing the new ſect of the Almohades.

Aben Hut King of Murcia aboliſheth the ſect of Almohades in Spaine.

So vnder collour of reſtoring the ancient beliefe and knowledge of the law of Mahomet, hee was wonderfully followed, and was reſpected, feared and honoured, as King in the realme of Murcia and part of Andaluſia, the country of Granado, Almery, Cordoua and Eccia: yet hee found Zael who made head againſt him, a Moore who had newly vſurped the realme of Valencia, and chaſed away Zeit Aben Zeit, for that they ſayd hee had laied a plot with the Pope, and the King of Arragon, to become a Chriſtian, and that hee had had conference to that end with the King D. Iames at Calatajub, whither C hee had alſo carried his ſonne. This Zael was ſonne to Modef and Nephew to King Lobo: Aben Lalle King of Seuile made the like reſiſtance, yet Aben Hut troubled them all, and tooke from them a part of their countries, ſo as hee became the moſt powerfull of all the Kings of the Moores in Spaine, beeing otherwiſe a bountifull Prince, and a good Iuſticer. The new ſect of the Almohades was thus rooted out by him, and the ancient interpretation of their Alphurcan reſtored in Spaine, eighty and one yeeres after that Almohad, had paſt.

Yet the firſt attempt he made againſt the Chriſtians, ſucceeded but il; for D. Alphonſo King of Leon, being in the country of Extremadura, where he had made warre, whilſt that D. Fernand his ſonne did ouerrunne Andaluſia and their tooke the townes of Badajos, Caceres and others, this King of the Moores preſumed to diſlodge him from D Merida, before the which hee was camped, to which end hee came towards him with a mighty army: King D. Alphonſo notwithſtanding that hee was very old, gaue him battaile, and defeated this King of the Moores, forcing him to ſaue himſelfe by flight: and returning to the ſiege, he tooke the towne of Merida, in the yeere 1229. which was the laſt of his exploits: for being now very old, and much broken, he died ſoone after, in the yeere 1230. at Villanoua of Sarrio, hauing raigned forty and foure yeeres in Leon Galicia and the Aſturies: whoſe body was interred at Saint Iames.

Leon.

16 The King D. Fernand who was then in Andaluſia, at the ſiege of Daralferza, being aduertized of his fathers death, tooke councell of the Noblemen which were with E him in the army; who were all of opinion, that hee ſhould goe with all ſpeed into the realme of Leon, which by hereditary right did belong vnto him, before his ſiſters children did ſeize thereon, who pretended an equall right with him: for ſo had the King D. Alphonſo ordained by his will, to preiudice his ſonne D. Fernand, whom hee had alwaies hated and purſued to the death; yea a little before hee died, hee ſought to marry his daughter Donna Sancha to D. Iames King of Arragon, who by the decree of Pope Honorius the third, had put away D. Elenor of Caſtille his wife. Don Alphonſo offring to giue in dowry with the Infanta the Realmes of Leon, Galicia and the Aſturies, after his deceaſe, to depriue the King of Caſtille his ſonne, but his death preuented the effect: wherefore the king D. Fernand following this good councel, came to Toledo, to paſſe from thence into Leon; vpon the way, hee met with the Queene F D. Berenguela, his mother, at Orgaz, who came to haſten him, and returned with him to Toledo: from thence hee went with ſpeed into the territories of Leon, where hee was receiued and acknowledged in all places where hee paſt for their lawfull King, vnto the city of Toro, which did him all the honour hee could deſire, hauing ſent their

A Deputies to meete him vpon the way, in the which hee was proclaimed King of Leon.

In the beginning the other towns and caſtles did not allow of this election of them of Toro, by reaſon of the Infants D. Sancha and D. Dulce or Douce, who would in the confidence which they had in their cauſe, diſpute their intereſt and put it to the triall of law: but all well conſidered D. Alphonſos will tooke no effect; for D. Fernand was ſonne and right heire to theſe realmes before the daughters, who were forced to agree with their brother, and had 30000. doublons euery yeere during their liues. This accord betwixt the King Don Fernand and the Infantes of Leon his Siſters, was wrought and concluded betwixt the Queenes D. Berenguela the Kings mother, B and D. Thereſa, mother to the Infants: after that the King had beene crowned in Leon, the chiefe city of the Kingdome, in the preſence of the Biſhops D. Iohn of Oueydo, D. Roderigo of Leon, D. Nugno of Aſtorga, D. Martin of Salamanca, D. Michel of Cité Roderigo and D. Sancho of Coria. By this accord the King D. Fernand did peaceably enioy the Realmes of Leon, Galicia, & the Aſturiaes, hauing raigned thirteene yeeres in Caſtille, the re-union of which Eſtates made this yeere, 1230. 73. yeeres after their laſt diuiſion, hath remained firme euer ſince, without any further ſeperation. From Leon, the King came to Beneuent, whereas the Infantaes his ſiſters met him, and there did ratifie the accord made by the two Queenes, renouncing all pretenſions to the ſayd Realmes, and to the teſtament made by the King D. Alphonſo their father. Then the King went to viſit the Prouinces, Townes and Forts of his Kingdomes, where without
C any contradiction he was receiued & intertained with great ioy and acclamation of the people, as it was fit.

This death of the King of Leon, fell out happely for D. Fernand, to couer his retreat from Daralferza, with ſome honourable pretext. In the meane time they made light skirmiſhes, with the taking and recouering of caſtles, vpon the fronters of Toledo and Andaluſia.

for a reward of their valour, in recouering thereof, was giuen to the church of Toledo, but it was afterwards loſt and recouered againe diuers times. The King of Caſtil-
D le continuing his warre, there was eſtabliſhed vpon that fronter, that which they call Adelantamiento of Caſorla giuen to the Church of Toledo.
Adelantamiento of Caſorla, by the taking of Pilos, Toya, Lacra, Agozino, Font Iulian, Tour de Lago, Higuera, Maulula, Arcola, Dos Hermanas, Villa Montin, Niebla, Caſorla, Concha and Chelis, all which places were by prodigality and inconſiderate zeale (altogether vſed in thoſe religious times) giuen (in a religious acknowledgement to the Apoſtolike Sea) by the King D. Fernand to the Archbiſhops of Toledo, the which the haue enioyed vnto the aſſumption of the Cardinall D. Iohn Tauera to the Arch-biſhoprike, who gaue this country to the Marquis of Camaraça, whoſe ſucceſſour Don Iohn Martines Sileſio Cardinal, had by reaſon thereof great and earneſt ſute againſt the Church of Toledo; but
E notwithſtanding that the Church had diuers ſentences (by reaſon of the great ſway the Church of Rome bore at that ſame time) in its fauour, yet could they neuer gette poſſeſſion of any of thoſe places, for certaine ſpeciall reaſons which are not ſpecified.

17 At that time the realmes of Naples and Sicile were held by the Emperour Frederic the ſecond, who married Yoland, the onely daughter of Iohn de Brenne, who called himſelfe king of Ieruſalem (which is the reaſon why the Kings of Naples and Sicile haue euer ſince intitled themſelues Kings of Ieruſalem) by which alliance they vnited the titles of Naples, Sicile and Ieruſalem, which the deſcendentes of this Noble Princeſſe haue carried.

F This Iohn of Brenne beeing choſen chiefe Generall of the Weſterne ſuecours, which by the procurement of the councell of Latran went into the Country of Syria, and obtained amongſt them the firſt and ſoueraigne degree, and was called King of Acre or Ptolemaide: yet hee did neuer hold the city of Ieruſalem: but hauing neede of greater forces to reſiſt the Turkes and enemies of our faith, hee was forced to returne againe into Europe to ſollicit the Chriſtian Princes to aſſiſt him. Bee- A ing arriued into Italie, hee married his daughter as wee haue ſayd, and then paſſed into Sapine, in the yeere of our Lord 1232. to viſit the ſepulcher of Saint Iames, which was a pilgrimage of greateſt merit after that of Ieruſalem. Paſſing through Caſtille, hee was receiued with great honour by the King D. Fernand, who in confirmation of their friendſhip, gaue him D. Berenguela, his ſiſter by father and mother in marriage.

Nauarre. The Realme of Nauarre was at that time but ill gouerned by reaſon of the Kings ſollitary life, who was retired and did not ſpeake with any man, but his houſhold ſeruants, and would not heare of any affaires. This miſchiefe was increaſed by the death of D. Ramir his brother, Biſhop of Pampelone, who by his authority and re- B ſpect might ſomething haue reſtrained them that would haue troubled the ſtate, were they home-bred or ſtrangers: wherefore about the yeere of our Lord 1231. D. Lope Diaz. Lord of Biſcay, who had ſome lands in the ſoueraignty of Nauarre, prouoked and ſupported by D. Fernand King of Caſtille, hee found an occaſion to commit ſome ſpoiles in the Kingdome.

Impatiency of Cont Thybauld of Champaigne to raigne. 18 On the other ſide Thybauld Earle of Champagne, pretending right to the ſayd realme by his mother D. Blanche, daughter to the King D. Sancho the wiſe, had ſecret practiſes and Intelligences in Nauarre, to bee admitted to the Regency of the realme, during the life of King D. Sancho the retired: whereof hee being aduertiſed, after great negligence, in the end hee beganne to diſcouer it, to his great preiudice, where- C fore beeing much diſcontented at theſe attempts, both of the King of Caſtille, and of the Earle of Champaigne, he reſolued to fruſtrat both of their pretentions, and to bee reuenged, eſpecially of the King of Caſtille; he therefore gaue D. Iames King of Arragon to vnderſtand, that hee had ſome matters to impart vnto him, which would redound greatly to his proffit: and therefore he intreated him to come to Tudele, excuſing himſelfe that hee had not come vnto him, by reaſon of the indiſpoſition of his perſon: The King of Arragon fayled not to come to Tudele: and for that the King of Nauarre could not ſtirre out of his chamber, hee entred into the caſtle, where they conferred together.

The King D. Sancho complayning much of D. Fernand King of Caſtille, that not D content to hold the Lands which his predeceſſors had wreſted from him, had againe inuaded and ſpoiled his country, hee demanded his aduice and helpe to bee reuenged: and hauing in like manner diſcourſed of the diſobedience and little reſpect of Thybauld Earle of Champagne, who had attempted to play the King in Nauarre in his life time, hee concluded, that if hee would make a firme alliance with him, and betwixt Nauarre and Arragon, to inuade the realme of Caſtille, and not to ceaſe vntill they had forced the King D. Fernand to reſtore the Lands of the riuer of Oja, Bureua, Alaua, and Guipuſcoa, or beeing conquered, to yeeld him the fruits and reuenues thereof, and to pay the charges of the warre, hee ſhould bee content to harken to a mutuall donation of both realmes, very profitable for the King of Arragon, and his ſonne D. Al- E
Vniuſt accord betwixt the Kings of Nauarre and Arragon. phonſo: which was, that the ſuruiuor ſhould inherit both Kingdomes of Nauarre and Arragon. The King D. Iaime liked well heereof, for hee was in the floure of his age, and his ſonne alſo likely to liue, whereas the King D. Sancho was aboue threeſcore and eight yeeres old, and moreouer hee was ſo fat, and full of humors, and ſo tormented with a canker, as hee expected hourely to leaue this world. This Accord beeing made betwixt them, they concluded that the troupes of both Realmes ſhould bee ready againſt the next yeere, and ſhould meet at the Rendezuous in May. The King D. Sancho deſired nothing more then to recouer the Prouince of Guipuſcoa, imagining that ſince the ſeparation thereof, the realme of Nauarre had loſt one of the chiefe commodities which a country may haue that lies vpon the ſea.

Theſea a chief commodity to a country.

The Noblemen and chiefe of the King D. Sanchos councell at this accord were F D. Garcia Almoranid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montague, D. William Baudouin, and D. William Iuſtice of Tudele, which is a principall dignitie. Theſe and other Noblemen, with the Deputies of the Townes of Nauarre, ſigned the conuen-

A conuention and accord betwixt theſe two kings: the which the Noblemen of Arragon, which held the chiefe charges, did in like manner: among the which are named D. Pedro Fernandes d'Açagra Lord of Albarazin, Athon de Foces L. Steward, William de Moncade, Roderigo Lizines, Artal de Lune, Simon Vrrea, Blaſco Maza, Pedro Peres Iuſtice Maior of Arragon, and Pedro Sanches Secretarie of State in Arragon. For the defraying of this warre, D. Sancho was forced to imploy his treaſure, which was very great: for hauing liued long in this ſolitarie life, hee might eaſily gather together, hauing no cauſe of expence. He therefore deliuered to the king of Arragon, an hundred thouſand ſolz of gold, that is to ſay, Crownes or Ducats, in loane, and aduance, and had in pawne, Herreta, Pegnaretonda, Ferrelon, and Faxine: and as he was wiſe and very iudicious in matters of war,
B he diſpoſed what ſhould be done in the beginning: but the loue of his treaſure ſpoiled all: beſides at ſuch time as the army was to march againſt Caſtile, newes came vnto the king of Arragon, that the Iland of Maiorca had rebelled: wherefore beeing more carefull to keepe his owne, then to take from another, he made vſe of thoſe ſouldiers which hee had leauied for the warre of Caſtile, and led them into Majorca, ſo as the king of Nauarre found himſelf too weake to attempt any thing againſt Caſtile, whereas the Earle D. Lope d' Haro was in armes to fight with him at the paſſage. He was of opinion that the King D. Iames had mocked him, ſo as falling into a great rage, he wold breake the accord which they had made. King Iames was aduertized of all that he ſayd and did, by ſome Knights of Nauarre, which were falſe vnto their Prince, and diſcontented with this ſtrange and diſdainfull manner of liuing, of the which D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra was one. The warre
C of Majorca beeing ſoone ended, the king Don Iames returned to Tudele to excuſe himſelfe, and to offer ſatisfaction hereafter, yea to furniſh 2000. horſe, with other forces for the warre of Caſtile, but the King Don Sancho would by no meanes enter into conference with him. Moreouer, Don Garcia Almorauid and Don Iohn Peres de Barzan, captaines of the armie, which was vppon the frontiers of Caſtile, beeing in ſight of the enemie, were reduced to that extremitie by Don Lope Diaz de Haro, as they feared euery day they ſhould be forced to fight, he neglected both them and all they did: and they write, that a Gentleman beeing ſent from them to acquaint the king with the eſtate of their affaires, and to demand two hundred horſe of Supply, with the which they ſhould be able D to giue battell vnto the Caſtillans, he attended foure dayes, and could neither haue entry nor audience. This ſtrange and diſdainfull behauiour cauſed the king Don Iames to returne into Arragon much diſcontented, whereupon the Caſtillans ſpoyled Nauarre, the which he might eaſily haue preuented, whereuppon he grew wayward, and inſupportable euen to his houſhold ſeruants, who could not pleaſe him. This waywardneſſe and diſtemperature, together with the burthen of a repleate and ill-diſpoſed bodie, his long incurable diſeaſe, together with his many yeares, brought him to his graue, in the yeare 1234. hauing raigned nine and thirty yeares, nine moneths, and ten dayes. He was buried in the royall Monaſterie of the Chanoins of Saint Mary of Ronceuaux, the which hee himſelfe had cauſed to be built.

Strange behauior of Don Sancho the Groſſe in his age.

D. Thibault firſt of that name, the 22. King of Nauarre.

1) THe Nauarrois ſent into France to Thibault Earle of Champagne, the ſonne of D. Blanche, ſiſter to the deceaſed king, to aduertiſe him of this ſucceſſion, and to aduiſe him to make haſt, before that Don Iames King of Arragon ſhould ſeaze thereon, in vertue of the pretended rights, by reaſon of the mutuall donation paſt betwixt the two kings
F at Tudele, and alſo by meanes of the intelligences which he had within the Countrey: wherein the Earle was nothing ſlouthfull, for hauing many partizans in Nauarre, who had aduertiſed him of all that had paſt betwixt the two kings, and in the end of the death of his vncle. The Ambaſſadors found him alreadie in order, and readie to march towards Nauarre, where he arriued happily, for the well effecting of his deſſeigne, by reaſon of ſome

ſome lets which reſtrained the King Don Iames, the which were more fitting for him to care for, then to purſue the donation made vnto him in preiudice of the right heire of that Crowne, without any reaſon or proportion, by a king troubled with violent paſſions both of body and mind. But it is very certaine, that the king of Arragon did little reſpect it: yea ſome haue written, that without any difficulty, he diſcharged the Nauarrois (they requiring it) of the oath, fealty and homage, which they had ſworne, when as the contract betwixt him and the deceaſed king D. Sancho, was paſt at Tudele: others ſay, that afterwards he gaue all his pretenſions and right to D. Pedro his ſonne, to purſue it when opportunitie did ſerue, as a matter whereof there was but ſmall hope. Thus D. Thibault Earl of Champagne, was receiued, proclaimed, and crowned King of Nauarre, to the great ioy and content of all good Nauarrois.

Arragon.

The king of Arragon was then by the aduice of all his faithfull Councellers, entred into the conqueſt of the Realme of Valencia, hauing a fit oportunity offered, by reaſon of the diuiſions which were in the kingdome, betwixt the factions of Zeit Aben Zeit, and Zael or Zaen, which were both ſtrong. This Zeit Aben Zeit ſeeing himſelfe purſued, hee made open declaration of that which he had long before deſſeigned, and making himſelf vaſſal to the king Don Iames, he became a Chriſtian, and was called D. Vincent de Belluis. He afterwards married a Lady called Dominick Lopes of Sarragoſſa, of which mariage was borne a daughter called Alda Fernandes, who was married to Blaiçe Ximenes d'Arenos.

Zeit King of Valence baptized.

21 The warre of Valentia beeing reſolued, the Generall of the army vnder the king was D. Blaſco Alagon, by whoſe valour and diligence Morelia was taken; a place which was held impregnable: Buriane was alſo beſeeged, and with great difficulty taken: Peniſcola, Chiuert, Ceruera, Polpes, Alcalatena, Albufera, Almenara, Vxo, Noles, Caſtro, Alfandecho, Paterna, Bulla and other places, ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, and partly by the meanes and intelligences which king Zeit had, and by the fauour of ſuch as held his partie, came into the power of the king D. Iames, ſo as by degrees hee enuironed the citty it ſelfe, cutting off their victuals and all other commodities. In theſe expugnations they did then vſe rammes, mooving towers with many ſtages, and other ſorts of engins. The reſiſtance of the Moores which held Zaens partie was very great: neither were they abandoned of their friends, nor of the kings raigning in Affricke, for twelue gallies, and ſixe veſſels called Zabres of Tunez, ſhewed themſelues often, as if they would land, or aſſayle the places held by the Arragonois along the coaſt, but without any effect. The Eſtates of Arragon and Cattelogne were aſſembled at Monçon in the yeare 1236. for the continuance of this warre, and the conqueſt of Valencia; without the which it was not lawfull for the king to vndertake any matter of importance. The Preſident at theſe eſtates was Pedro Perez Iuſtice maior of Arragon, where there aſſiſted D. William of Montgrin, co-adiutor to the Arch-biſhop of Tarragone, the Biſhops of Barcelona, Saragoſſa, Vic, and Tortoſa, the Maſter and Prior of the Templers and Hoſpitaliers, Friar Raymond of Pegnafort, a moſt famous Iacobin, Roger Bernard Earle of Foix, and Don Fernand the kings vncle, D. Ponce Cabrera Earle tutelarie of Vrgel, D. Pedro Vgo Earle of Ampurias, D. Nugno Sanches Earle of Roſſillon, D. Gerard Vicount of Cabrera, D. William of Cardona, D. William, and Pedro of Moncada, Berenger Puçuert, William and Berenger Angleſol, Bernard Portella, Hugues Mataplan, ſonne to Hugues, Galſerand Pinos, William of Laquila, Raymond of Peralta, Peter Vicount of Villemuir, Raymond VVilliam Odena, Berenger Erille, and William Ceruera, all Knights and Noblemen of Cattelogne. And of the realme of Arragon, D. Pedro Cornel Lord Steward, Bernard William, Garci Romeo, Symon Vrrea, Artorella, Artal de Lune, Blaſco Alagon, Roderigo Lizana, Blaſco Maza Berenger, Gombald Entenza, Symon de Foces, Aſſalit Gudalis, Fortun Verga, Simon Lueza and others. The meanes to defray this warre, beſides the Croiſados, pardons and indulgences, were ordayned to be leuied vpon the people, by the Impoſition of a cuſtome called Morabetine and the exaction of the Impoſt for cattell. In this aſſembly it was decreed, that all peeces of gold and ſiluer coyned, ſhould be of one goodnes and weight, in Arragon and Cattelogne: to the obſeruation of which Edict for coynes, all were bound to ſweare, that were aboue 14. yeares old. During the ſeege of Valencia many Noblemen, and common ſouldiers ſtrangers, French and Engliſh came to D. Iames his campe.

V Warre in Valence againſt the Moores.

An. 1236. Eſtates at Monſon for the warre of Valence.

The

A The Authors of the Arragon Hiſtorie write, that the Kings army, at the hotteſt of the ſiege, might bee 60000. foot, and a thouſand horſe, (meaning Knights and Maſters) followed according vnto the Order and Diſcipline of warre in thoſe dayes, by their vaſſalls, beſides the forces at ſea. This warre was long, and the ſeege troubleſome: yet it was attempted, battered and aſſaulted, and the Moores within it brought to ſo great extremity, as Zaen the Vſurper of that Principalitie, beeing not yet well ſetled nor aſſured of the peoples wils, abandoned it, and retired to Denia. The cittie was yeelded the 28. of September, 1238. Valencia taken by the Arragonois.

The King Don Iames had in the yeare 1232. beene diuorced from D. Elenor of Caſtile his wife, and yet had declared D. Alphonſo their ſon, the lawfull heire of the realmes
B of Arragon and Maiorca, the lands of Cattelogne, Vrgeil, Montpellier, and others: appointing for Gouernors of his youth, the Biſhop of Tarragone, the Maſters or Priors of the Templers and Hoſpitaliers, and William Ceruera: ordayning, that he ſhould be bredde vp at Monçon: and if he ſhould chance to die, then did he ſubſtitute vnto his Realmes and Seigneuries, Don Fernand of Arragon his vncle, and Don Raymond Berenger Earle of Prouence his couſin. Notwithſtanding the king Don Pedro during this warre of Valencia contracted a new marriage with the daughter of Andrew king of Hungary, named Violant, by whom he had a ſonne called D. Pedro, who was king, after him, of Arragon and Valencia, and Prince of Cattelogne: he had moreouer the Infant Don Iaime, who was king of Maiorca and Minorca, and Earle of Roſſillon and Montpellier, and a third called
C Don Sancho, who was Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine. Hee had alſo fiue daughters by her: D. Iſabell married to Philip the third King of France, ſonne to Saint Lewis: D. Violant who was Queene of Caſtile and Leon, wife to D. Alphonſo the ninth: D. Conſtance married to Don Manuell brother to the ſayd D. Alphonſo, King of Caſtile, D. Mary and D. Elenor who dyed young. The dowrie of Queene Yolant or Violant, as Surites writes, was ten thouſand Markes of ſiluer, and two hundred of gold, for her mothers rights, for the which the Duke of Auſtria became anſwerable. Moreouer, a portion of the County of Namur in Flanders, and the lands and rights which her Predeceſſors had enioyed in France, with certaine places which ſhe did then poſſeſſe in Hongarie, and o-
D thers that were fallen to her in Bourgogne, by her mothers right and ſucceſſion. This Princeſſe was conducted to Barcelona in the yeare 1235. by the Biſhop of the fiue Churches, and a kinſman of his called Cont Denis, who remained in Arragon, and was the Author of the noble family of Denis, which is vnited to that of Vrrez, hee had two ſonnes Amour and Gabriel Denis. Don Pedro the eldeſt ſon of Queene Yolant, was married young to Conſtance, daughter to Manfroy, baſtard to the Emperour Frederick the ſecond, whom they called Prince of Tarentum, which was a degree to attaine vnto the ſucceſſion of the Realmes of Naples and Sicily, and by the marriage of his daughter Iſabel with Philip the Hardy, ſonne to Saint Lewis the French king, the Kings of Arragon obtayned (as the hi-E ſtories of Spain report) a full freedome of the Principalitie of Cattelogne, and Earldome of Barcelona, to enioy it from that time in full proprietie and Soueraignty, without acknowledging themſelues any more vaſſals to the Kings of France: the which was done at Clermont in Auuergne, whereas both Kings met in the yeare 1260. In recompence the King of Arragon did alſo quit for his part the rights of Soueraigntie which he pretended to Carcaſſone, Rhodes, Beziers, Locate, Albi, Amillaire, Niſmes, Saint Giles, and other lands in France, the which he aſſigned in dowrie to his daughter D. Iſabel, with the reuenues of Carcaſſone and Beziers: and moreouer, he quit all right which he could pretend to the Earledome of Prouence, Folquaquier, Arles, Auignon and Marſeilles, in fauour of Queene Marguerite of France.

Dowry of Q. Iſabell.

The death of D. Sancho king of Nauarre, the beginning of the warre of Valencia, and the ſecond marriage of D. Iames King of Arragon, happened all in the yeare 1234. by rea-
F ſon whereof, and to giue order for the affaires of the Infanta D. Elenor, whom he had put away, by reaſon of the ſtrict allyance which was betwixt them, according to the Popes decree, there was an interview of this King of Arragon, and of Don Fernand king of Caſtile, in the Monaſterie of Huerta, vpon the confines of Caſtile; where it was accorded, that the Infant Don Alphonſo, whom Don Iames had by Donna Elenor, named King of Arragon, Genealogie of Arragon.

Accord betwixt the kings of Caſtile and Arragon for the diuorce of Q. Elenor.

Arragon, if he had liued, ſhould remaine in the cuſtodie of the Queene his mother, to whom for an increaſe of her dowrie, the towne of Hariza was giuen, to enioy it during her life, but in caſe ſhee ſhould marry againe, then ſhould it returne to Arragon. Theſe and other things being friendly accorded betwixt the two kings, they parted with great loue, to make warre againſt the Moores, euery one apart. Some haue left in writing, that D. Thereſa of Bidaure, with whom the King D. Iames had had familiar acquaintance, before he married the Queene D. Yolant, and had children by her, ſued him vppon a promiſe of marriage before the Pope, where ſhe loſt it for want of prooſes, and D. Yolant was declared his lawfull wife. There the Biſhop of Girone then the kings Confeſſor (hauing vnderſtood by his confeſſion of this matrimoniall promiſe) had reuealed it vnto Pope Innocent the fourth, but to what end he did it, it is vncertaine: but his teſtimonie alone was not allowed. The king beeing wonderfully incenſed againſt the Biſhop, hauing ſent for him into his chamber, cauſed his toung to be cut out. For this outrage committed vpon the Biſhop, notwithſtanding that he were faultie, hauing reuealed the Kings confeſſion, the Pope made great complaints, being at the Councell of Lyons, and in the end did interdict all the Realme of Arragon, and excommunicate the king D. Iames. To free them from this interdiction, and to get abſolution, the king ſent the Biſhop of Valencia vnto the Pope to carry his excuſe, and to make an humble petition, wherewith the Pope beeing ſomewhat pacified, he yeelded to ſend two Legates into Arragon with full power. Hauing aſſembled a Synode of Biſhops at Lerida, they cauſed the king to come thither, who confeſſed his fault vppon his knees before theſe Fathers, with great ſubmiſſion and teares: who gaue him abſolution, vpon condition, that he ſhould cauſe the Monaſtery of Benface, neere vnto Tortoſa to be built, (the which hath beene ſince a Conuent of Chartrous Monkes) and to indow it with an hundred and forty pounds of ſiluer of annuall rent. And moreouer, that he ſhould endow the hoſpitall of Saint Vincent of Valencia, with foure hundred pounds waight of ſiluer by the yeare for the nouriſhment of the poore: and that he ſhould giue a Prebendarie to the great Church of Girone, for the maintenance of a Maſſe-prieſt: Then fell he to the loue of this ladie againe, and entertayned her during the life of his Queene D. Violant.

The King of Arragon asketh pardon of the Pope.

Caſtile and Moores.

23 As for the king D. Fernand, he was affronted with the power of king Aben-Hut, who was mightie: but ſeeing his forces increaſed by the ſucceſſion of the Realmes of Leon, which were fallen vnto him, he was in hope to effect his deſſeignes. Wherefore he aſſayled him towards Baeça which he held, and went and layed ſeege to Vbeda, a neere towne, ſtrong, and well fortified, yet he preſt them in ſuch ſort, as the Garriſon compounded to depart with their liues: into the which the king D. Fernand entred the ſame yeare 1234. in the which his fortunes were ſeaſoned with ſome bitterneſſe, according to the condition of humane things: for he loſt the Queene D. Beatrix his wife, who died in Toro in the kingdome of Leon: her body was carryed to the Monaſterie of las Huelgas of Burgos, and buried neere vnto the king D. Henry. Vpon this ſubiect the king D. Fernand came into the territories of Leon: during his abſence the garriſons vppon the fronter tooke certaine Moores Almogaueres (for ſo they call their Mortepaiez) of the cittie of Cordoua: and for that they were in quarrell with the Inhabitants thereof, they were eaſily corrupted, promiſing to giue entry to the Chriſtians into the cittie of Cordoua. The plot beeing layd, and all things diſpoſed accordingly, there came a good troupe of Chriſtians in the night with ladders, the which they planted vnto the wall neere vnto the tower and Bourg, called Axarquia, where by the helpe and fauor of thoſe Moores whom they had wonne, Aluaro, Colodro, and Benoiſt of Bagnos entred firſt, beeing well followed by their companions, without any diſcouerie of them of the towne, who ſlept without feare or apprehenſion vntill the morning, when as they ſaw the Chriſtians had ſeazed vpon the tower, and there did fortifie themſelues, attending ſuccors from Don Aluar Perez, whom they had ſent vnto beeing at Martos, vppon their entry: and as men expecting ſome great reſiſtance, they had alſo ſent to aduertiſe the King Don Fernand of their enterprize and happie ſucceſſe, to the end he ſhould approch neere to fauour them. The Moores of Cordoua ſeeing themſelues ſurprized, went to armes, and beſeeged the Chriſtians in this tower, where they defended themſelues: the combate was furious, and often

Cordoua ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

A often renewed, euery one doing his beſt indeauour, wherein they ſpent ſome dayes, yet could they not chaſe the Chriſtians out of the tower, which they had intrenched from the reſt of the towne. In the meane time, the king D. Fernand aduanced with all ſpeed, giuing order for the reſt of his forces to follow, and paſſing by Extremadura, neere vnto Bienguerencia, the Gouernor a Moore, furniſhed the kings armie with victuals as it paſt, yet beeing ſummoned to deliuer the fort vnto the king, he made anſwer, that when he had taken Cordoua, it ſhould be at his commandement, and in the meane time he would keep it: Wherefore the king of Caſtile paſſed on, and arriuing at Cordoua, hee found that D. Aluaro Perez de Caſtro, and other Captaines and ſouldiers in great numbers, were already come to ſuccour his men. King Aben Hut beeing aduertiſed of all theſe things, and
B of D. Fernands arriuall with ſmall forces, although there came great troupes afterwards, thought it fit to preuent him, if he could, or at the leaſt to ſtrike ſome terror into the Chriſtians, and force them to retire from this ſeege. He had in his armie which lay about Eccia, a Chriſtian Knight, a baniſhed man called D. Laurens Suares. Hauing imparted his deſſeigne vnto him, he reſolued to ſend him one night vnto the campe, vnder colour of ſeeking to recouer the kings fauour: but it was to eſpie, and to diſcouer vnto him the true eſtate of the Chriſtians armie. This Knight hauing obtained a paſport, came vnto the campe, and ſpake vnto the king, doing the contrarie to that which he had in charge: for he diſcouered vnto the King D. Fernand, all the Moores deſſeignes, and what forces hee had: wherefore beeing aſſured from the king, of his grace and fauour, he retired to Aben Hut, to whom he concealed what he had ſeene and vnderſtood, telling him that the Chri-
C ſtians army was much ſtronger then it was indeed. Wherefore king Aben Hut durſt not attempt that which he had reſolued, and thinking that they of Cordoua wold hold good for a time, he reſolued to employ his forces to ſuccour king Zaen, who was preſt by the king of Arragon towards Valencia, thinking after that he had repulſed the Arragonois, to returne fortified with Zaens forces, and cauſe the Chriſtians to retire from before Cordoua. Beeing arriued at Almery, to imbarke his army, a vaſſall of his, whom hee did much eſteeme, called Aben Arramin, inuited him to ſupper, where he ſo feaſted him, as beeing drunke, he caſt him into a great veſſell full of water, and there drowned him: wherupon the army disbanded, and D. Laurence Suarez whom king Aben Hut had ledde with D him, retired to the king of Caſtile, who receiued him graciouſly, notwithſtanding that he had betrayed him who had entertayned him during his exile. This death of this Mooriſh king, beeing generally knowne, eſpecially at Cordoua, the beſeeged deſpayred of ſuccors, ſo as they yeelded the cittie vnto the king of Caſtile, the ſixt moneth of the ſeege, in the yeare 1236, which was 522. yeares after that it had beene firſt taken by the Moores. The king Don Fernand cauſed a croſſe to be ſet vppon the tower of the great Meſquide, in token of our redemption, and neere vnto it the ſtandard of Caſtile, which Meſquide was purified (beeing one of the goodlieſt buildings in Spaine) and made the Cathedrall Church, of the which Don Lope de Hitero of Piçuerga was made biſhop. The king did E indow it with rents and reuenues like the reſt, and ſo did the Arch-biſhop Don Roderigo in his returne from Rome, where he had beene during the ſeege, and was not at the taking thereof, to his great griefe, but affaires of greater Importance had kept him abſent: in the meane time Don Iohn Biſhop of Oſma was his Vice-gerent and Chancelor to the King. There the bells of Saint Iames were found, which the Alhagib Almançor had taken away in the yeare 975. and placed them in this great Moſqueé, making them to ſerue for lampes, which the king Don Fernand cauſed to be tranſported to their auncient manſion. The affaires of this great cittie, which had beene the chiefe of the Moores eſtate, were ordered by the king, both for religion and Iuſtice, and for the guard and ſafety thereof, with great care. Don Tello Alphonſo de Meneſes, was made Gouernor of the citty, and F Don Aluar Perez de Caſtro of the whole fronter.

The

The kingdome of Granado.

BY the loſſe of Cordoua and the death of king Aben Hut, the Moores were wonderfully diſmayed and voyd of Councell: wherefore they returned to their old courſe euery one reſpecting his priuate intereſt: ſo as the Infidels eſtate was diſmembred into many parts. Aben Hudiel among others, ſeazed vpon the Realme of Murcia, Zeit and Zaen being yet in warre, and contending for the realme of Valencia. In the country of Algarbe, whereof Niebla was the chiefe citty, Aben Iafon raigned, who had for his ſucceſſor Aben Amarin, and then another called Aben Moſad. Thoſe of Seuile would haue no king, but onely a Gouernor: where one Axataf was in great authoritie, and it was he which loſt it.

24. Beginning of Granado. But aboue all the power of Mahomad Alzenalagmar or Aben Alamar was great; ſo called for that he had a red face: who from a ſhepheard hauing followed armes, had attained to the chiefe places of honour, and was in ſuch credit by reaſon of his valour, force, and ſtature, as in theſe tumults, the Inhabitants of Arjona, where he was borne, choſe him for their king, and then other people ſubmitted themſelues vnder him, eſpecially the townes of Iaen, Baeça, which was ill garded, and Guadix, and in the end the citty of Granado, which he afterwards made his royall ſeate, and the chiefe of all his country and Seigneuries. This was the firſt king of Granado, whereas vntill that time there was no kingdome: it was erected at ſuch time as Cordoua the chiefe cittie of all the Moores Eſtate in Spain was made ſubiect vnto the Chriſtians.

Nauarre. 25 Whileſt that the king Don Fernand is buſie at this honorable enterprize of Cordoua, and D. Iaime or Iames king of Arragon, at that of Valencia, which was nothing inferior, Thibaud the new king of Nauarre had meanes to ſettle his affaires without any difficultie, for he found all the Eſtates of the Kingdome willing to obey him. At his reception he did ſweare and confirme the liberties and priuiledges of the country, the which he did alſo augment. This was the beginning of the ſecond maſculine line of the Kings of Nauarre, the firſt ending in D. Sancho, the which ſince D. Garcia Ximenes had continued 518. yeares. Succeſſions of States and Soueraignties falling to women againſt all lawe and preſidents of well ordered kingdomes, in the firſt ages, is the cauſe that ſtrange and vnknowne Princes, of diuers humors, come to raigne ouer Nations, which ſometimes haue ſucceeded well, but very often great troubles and inconueniences haue followed. At this time the Nauarrois were not vnfortunate, to haue a king of the French nation, who was a meanes to augment the power and dignitie of that Crowne, by many acceſſories from France: his mother D. Blanche daughter to the king D. Sancho the Wiſe, and ſiſter to the laſt Sancho, was the firſt which brought the ſucceſſion of women into Nauarre, although ſhe did not raigne, beeing dead before the king Don Sancho the Strong her brother. D. Pedro Ramires of Pedrola, Biſhop of Pampelone, among others did faithfully maintaine the rights of this king Thibaud, who was called the Elder, to diſtinguiſh him from his ſonne and ſucceſſor, being alſo of the ſame name: of whoſe deedes wee haue no great inſtructions out of hiſtories, onely we haue gathered out of ſome writings and records tending to other ends, that which we ſhall relate of him. He was thrice married, as the Spaniards write. Firſt, he had to wife a Lady of Lorraine, daughter to an Earle of Metz, frō whom he was diuorced by the Popes authoritie hauing no children. His ſecond wife was daughter to Guichard Lord of Beaujeu, who it may be was the 3. of that name: from which marriage iſſued Blanche, who was married to Iohn Duke of Brittanie, ſurnamed the red. Thirdly, he married Marguerite daughter to Archembaud one of the Earles of Foix (it may be there is ſome error in the name, for there is no mention made in the Hiſtories of that time, of any Archembaud of Foix) of whom he begot Thibaud and Henry, who ſucceeded one after another in the Realme of Nauarre, and one daughter called Donna Leonora, and Don Pedro Lord of the houſe of Muruçabal (which is now ruined) neere vnto Mendegerria, ſo called in the Biſcaine tongue, which ſignifies a redde mountaine.

Second race of the kings of Nauarre.

Genealogie of Nauarre.

All

A All theſe marriages, or at the leaſt the two firſt, were before his comming to the crowne of Nauarre, which was in the 33. yeare of his age. The manners of this Prince are commended by the Spaniards, ſaying, That he was liberal, modeſt, a great builder, louing muſicke, curious of matters belonging to tillage, by reaſon whereof he planted his country of Nauarre with many ſorts of vnknowne frutes, the which he cauſed to bee brought out of France: ſo as there is yet a kind of Peare of Nauarre, which they call Thibuatinas, or Thibaudines: he was a great catholike, and zealous of the Romiſh Religion: the caſtell of Treuas was of his building. Diſpoſition of King Thibaud.

In his time there was a great ſute ended betwixt the blacke Monkes Benedictines, and thoſe of Ciſteaux, for that the deceaſed king D. Sancho, would haue changed the ancient
B Monkes of Saint Sauueur of Leyre, and placed them of the Order of Ciſteaux there, the which he could not effect, being violently oppugned by the Benedictins: who during the raigne of king Thibaud loſt their cauſe: but notwithſtanding that they were condemned and diſpoſſeſſed, yet they gaue it not ouer, vntill they were reſtored to their auncient poſſeſſion: the which was after the death of Thibaud the ſecond, Henry his brother raigning, to whom they bound themſelues to pay 600. charges of corne yearely, vntill they had deliuered the ſumme of 8500. Marauidis of gold. Finally, to end the new inſtances which were daily made by the one or the other, D. Sancho Archb. of Toledo, Infant of Arragon, and he of Tarragone, hauing authority from the Apoſtolike ſea of Rome, commanded the Monkes of S. Benet to perpetuall ſilence, and reſtored them of Ciſteaux to the poſſeſ-
C ſion: and after the death of the king D. Henry, the Gouernor of Nauarre freed the Monks of this tribute, for the diſcharge of the Kings conſcience, as an exceſſiue & vniuſt Impoſt. Thus the Ciſtercian Monkes of S. Bernard, remained in quiet poſſeſſion of the Monaſtery of S. Sauueur of Leyre. By reaſon of the contentions of theſe Monks, there were many letters, remembrances, and records of this Monaſterie loſt, the which did ſerue much in thoſe times for the illuſtrating of matters of Nauarre. The Chriſtian affaires in Syria being ill managed, and their eſtate in thoſe parts declining much, Pope Gregory the 9. cauſed Thibaud the 1. king of Nauarre goes into Syria.
a Croyſado to be preached throughout all Chriſtendome, by the Monkes of the Orders of S. Dominick and S. Francis: wherefore many Princes and great Perſonages of France
D and other countries inrolled themſelues, of which expedition Thibaud king of Nauarre was the chiefe. The Noblemen and Knights Chriſtians, deſiring to paſſe their troupes by ſea, could not be accommodated by the Commonweales of Genoa and Piſa, who were then very ſtrong in ſhipping, by reaſon of the mutuall warre they had together, to the great preiudice of Chriſtendome. The Venetians in like manner troubled with the affairs of the Empire of Greece, gaue them no meanes to performe this voyage. Wherfore king Thibaud and his troupe were forced to take their way by land into Syria, where beeing arriued at Antioch, after infinit toyle, hauing to incounter with hunger, diſeaſes, and want of all things, beſides the enemy, who had ſeazed vpon the paſſages in the ſtreights of Mount Taurus, he found that two parts of his ſouldiers which had come out of France, E Nauarre, and the fronters of Germany, were wanting, beeing either dead by the way, or ſlaine by the Turks: the remainders of theſe poore Chriſtians arriued at Acre, which is the ancient Ptolemaide, where they began to make war againſt the Turks with ſmall ſucceſſe.
A litle before this expedition, the Emperor Frederick the 2. had bin in Paleſtina: and as if Vanity of the Emperor Frederick the 2.
he had had no other occaſion to make this voyage, but ambitiouſly to ſeeke to ioyne the vaine tide of king of Ieruſalem, to the reſt which he carried of many kingdomes, he entred the citty of Ieruſalem without any reſiſtance, hauing purchaſed the fauor of Corradin Sultan of Egypt: and hauing cauſed himſelfe to be crowned there, he returned preſently into Italy, hauing made a truce with the Infidels. He left ſome Germane ſouldiers in thoſe contries to ſupply the garriſons, who had no good correſpondency with the king of Nauarre nor his men, neither could they euer draw any ſuccors from them, for that they held
F the French to be affected to the Pope, with whom their Emperor had had great quarrels: wherfore they were forced to make war alone. And the more to croſſe K. Thibauds good fortune, it fell out that many Noblemen which came in his company disbanded, and returned home, among the which was the Duke of Brittany: ſo as the king D. Thibaud, after many vnfortunate Incounters, was forced to returne by ſea into the weſt.

Beeing arriued in France, he made ſome abode there to viſit his lands, and then he paſt into Nauarre. Don Thibaud king of Nauarre made not this voyage in the company of Saint Lewis the French king, as ſome write: but ſome yeares before, beeing in the yeere 1238. where as that of S. Lewis was ten yeares after, or twelue, as ſome affirme, as it appeares by the hiſtories of France. A

1238. Arragon. 26 In the ſame yeare 1238. the citty of Valencia, hauing beene long beſeeged by Don Iaime King of Arragon, and reduced to great neceſſitie, was yeelded vnto him by Zaen the Moore, who had vſurped that Principalitie, who retiring to Denia, left it without men or goods, leading with him aboue 50000. Moores, who carried with them (according to the compoſition) their gold, ſiluer, armes and all their mooueables: ſo as that citie which was held one of the richeſt and moſt ſtately of all Spaine, was to be peopled anew, if they would keepe it: wherefore there were chiefe men appointed by the king D. Iames, to diſtribute the houſes and buildings, lands, and poſſeſſions to the new Colonie, which was ſent out of the countries of Cattelogne and Arragon. Theſe were D. Berenger Palatiol Biſhop of Barcelone, D. Vidal Canelia Biſhop of Hueſca, Don Pedro Fernandes d'Açagra, and Don Symon d'Vrraca, knights: who diſpoſed of the places vnto thoſe that ſhould people this great citty, according vnto euery mans ranke, dignity, and merit. Valence taken Peopling of Valence. B

There were 380. heads of families, among other men of marke, or old ſouldiers, (hauing faithfully and valiantly carried armes, as well at this ſeege, as in former warres) then to this effect inrolled, to hold the firſt place and prerogatiue among the Inhabitants thereof, and there were priuate lawes made for them of Valencia: yet the Gentlemen of Arragon, who were appointed for this new Colony, did inſiſt, that they and their inheritors might enioy the priuiledges of Arragon, the which did afterwards breed trobles and diſſentions betwixt them and the reſt of the people. The Epiſcopall ſea was reſtored to this citty, and D. Ferrier of S Martin was the firſt biſhop, being made ſubiect to the Arch biſhop of Tarragone: notwithſtanding that in the Goths time, that church did acknowledge the Metropolitan of Toledo. D. Roderigo Lizana was made the firſt Viceroy of Valencia, by the king D. Iames: there were many Chriſtian families found in it, who did exerciſe their religion in the church of S. Sepulcher, called at this day S Bartholomew. It was then of a round forme, and but weakly walled, at this day it is enlarged and made ſquare, and hath 12. gates, where as it had but 4. The chiefe citty of this realme beeing now in the power of the king of Arragon, he ſoone recouered all the other places and forts, which was a goodly conqueſt, and a great increaſe to his other Eſtates. The other places continued peopled with the ancient inhabitants, who were contented to liue vnder the king of Arragon, enioying their religion. C D

Caſtile. The affaires of Spain being in this eſtate, D. Fernand king of Caſtile, after the death of D. Beatrix his wife, married a French Lady called Ieanne, daughter to Symon Earle of Ponthieu, who was ſomewhat allyed to the houſe of Caſtile, by the mothers ſide; for that her mother, wife to Cont Symon, called Mary, was daughter to Adella Counteſſe of Ponthieu, grand-child to king Lewis the 7. and D. Iſabella of Caſtile, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphonſo. This Lady was very mild, and greatly beloued and honored of the Spaniards. Genealogie of Caſtile. The king had by her the Infant D. Fernand, ſurnamed of Ponthieu, one daughter called D. Leonora, and another ſon, whoſe name was D. Louis. The marriage being conſumated, the king led his new ſpouſe through the townes of Caſtile and Leon, whereas great honours were done vnto her. In the meane time he diſpoſed of all neceſſarie prouiſions vpon the Mores fronters, where they were continually annoyed by their incurſions, to preuent the which, the Gouernor D. Aluaro Perez de Caſtro, a wiſe and politick Captaine, omitted not any thing that might concerne the duty of his charge. The Mores were ſo inſolent vnder their new king Mahomad Aben-Alhamar, as D. Aluaro Perez was forced to come in perſon to confer with the king at Aillon, and to acquaint him with the affaires of that fronter: where the Mores were the ſtronger, and had a little before his departure, beſeeged Martos, the which (without the ſuccors which D. Tello Alphonſo de Meneſes brought had bin taken, and in it his wife, whom he had left there. Wherupon the king commanded he ſhould be ſupplyed with all things that were needfull: but as this knight returned into Andaluſia, he dyed at Orgas, in the yeare 1239. whoſe loſſe was great: and at the ſame time E F

A there dyed alſo D. Lope Diaz de Haro, another valiant and wiſe knight, leauing one ſonne, heire of the ſeigneurie of Biſcay and other lands, called D. Diego Lopes the 3. of that name. The good ſucceſſe which the kings of Spaine had in their conqueſts, made them and their ſubiects the more ſuperſtitious. They of Arragon ſhewed great deuotion at that time, to an image which was found during the war of Valence, to the which there was a Monaſtery built at Puig, and it recommended to the Monks, called de la Merced. Then was the Epiſcopall ſeate of Calaorra remoued to S. Dominick de la Calçada, by the procurement of D. Iohn Perez the biſhop, who ſpared not his paines to go to Rome, where he obtained what he pretended from Pope Gregory the 9. the holy Father prouiding, and giuing power vnto the Biſhop to taxe his Dioceſſes, for the defraying of his charges. If this touB ched the glory of God, or the edification of his church, let the wiſe iudge: but this did not hold, for ſome yeares after the church of Calaorra was reſtored to her former dignitie, and yet that of S. Dominick remained a Cathedral, being in former time but a Collegial, yet one biſhop holding both vnto ourtime. At that time there liued a Doctor called Hugues Candido a Iacobin, of whom Spaine makes great account. After the death of D. Aluaro de Caſtro, the king of Caſtile, hauing led an army in perſon into Andaluſia, and giuen order for the ſafe keeping of the citty of Cordoua, he tooke partly by force, partly by feare, and partly by accord, the citty of Eccia, and the townes of Eſtepa, Almodoual del Townes and caſtels taken frõ the Moores. Rio, Siettefilla, Lucena, Luque, Porcuna, Core, Moron, Caſtellar, Marchena, Coeros, Cabra, Oſuna, Baena, Montaquilar, Tenexir, Ballar, Bute Morgu, Pardal, Caſra, Ornachuelos, Mirabel, Fuenteçumel, Moratilla, and S. Ella, moſt of which places the knights of Cala-C traua, they of S. Iames, and the Prelates obtained from the king, and was giuen to the Noblemen and knights. The kings affairs were much aduanced by the taking of a Moore Almohade, who had paſt out of Affrick into Spaine, to challenge that which the kings of his race had enioyed there. Caid Arrax then raigned at Maroc, beeing grand child to Aben-Mahomad the Greene, borne at Bufax, who dyed while his father liued.

In the yeare 1240. a truce was made betwixt the king of Caſtile, and Mahomad Aben-Alamar of Arjona, who raigned in Granado. Vntill this time Don Roderigo the Archbiſhop and Primate hath written the hiſtorie or Chronicle of Spaine. The title which Don Fernand king of Caſtile gaue himſelfe at that time, was, king of Caſtile, Toledo, Leon, GaD licia, Cordoua, and Baeça, leauing that of Nagera, and other ſmall places, for the which he tooke thoſe of the great townes which he had conquered from the Moores. Hee gaue the like titles to the Queenes his mother and wife, as it appeares by that which was written of him in Latin the ſame yeare, as the cuſtome was then: where particular mention is made of the infants D. Alphonſo and D. Frederick, D. Martin Gonçales of Mijancas, beeing Vniuerſitie of Salamanca. Merino Maior of Caſtile. Beſides the Art of warre, wherein the king was very expert, he was alſo very careful to maintaine Iuſtice in his kingdomes, with all other good gouern- 27. ment, by reaſon whereof, he tranſported vnto Salamanca the Vniuerſity which D. Alphonſo his grandfather had inſtituted at Palença, as a place more commodious for the good of all Spaine, and in a country more fertill, and abounding with all things neceſſaE ry, to which Vniuerſity this king, his ſonne D. Alphonſo, and others their ſucceſſors, haue giuen great reuenues, priuiledges, and exemptions, ſo as it is thought there is no Vniuerſitie in the world where as the profeſſors haue greater penſions.

Whileſt that he buſied himſelfe in theſe good and honorable actions, hee had ſome troubles by the meanes of D. Diego Lope de Haro, who was retired into his country of Biſcay, diſcontented with the King, yet after ſome little warre attempted againſt him, by the Infant D. Alphonſo, the king was aduiſed not to eſtrange from his ſeruice a Nobleman of ſo good a race, frõ whom the kings of Caſtile had receiued ſo good ſeruices in their wars againſt the Moores: wherefore D. Diego Lope was receiued into more fauor then before.

The truce made with Mahomad Aben-Alamar, expired in the yeare 1241. wherefore the An. 1241. F Infant Don Alphonſo was ſent vnto the fronters of Andaluſia: beeing arriued at Toledo, hee found the Ambaſſadours of Alboaquis, or according vnto ſome, of Aben Hudel King of Murcia, who went vnto the King Don Fernand, to offer him the Realme of Murcia, whome hee cauſed to returne backe, marching himſelfe with them to receiue this realme, which was voluntarily offered vnto him, hauing in his company Don Pelayo

Perez Correa, Maſter of the Knights of Saint Iames. The conditions were, that the king Alboaquis ſhould remaine vaſſall to the king of Caſtile, and that the reuenues of the Realme of Murcia ſhould be equally diuided betwixt the two Kings,, and that the fort of Murcia ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the Infant Don Alphonſo, and they ſhould compound with the Captaines which held the other places, the which was put in execution, with them of Alicant, Elche, Orihuela, Ceruillan, Alhama, Aledo, Ros and Cieca: but they of Lorca, Carthagena, and Mula, would not hearken to this compoſition, whereunto they were afterwards forced. Thus this Realme was vnited to Caſtile without any paine or danger, whither the king came in perſon, and was receiued with great ioy and honour. A Murcia deliuered to the king of Caſtile.

At that time Don Roderigo Arch-biſhop of Toledo was excommunicated by Don Pedro of Albalate, Arch-biſhop of Tarragone, for that he had paſt by the Iuriſdiction of his Arch-biſhoppricke, carrying his croſſe, as Primate of Spaine, for which dignity he of Tarragone did contend with him. The cauſe beeing pleaded at Rome before Pope Gregory the ninth, he declared by a decree giuen at Saint Iohn de Latran, in the yeare 1242. the ſentence of the Excommunication againſt the Arch-biſhop D. Roderigo to be void. An. 1242.

By reaſon of ſome loſſe which Don Roderigo Alphonſo of Leon the kings baſtard brother had vppon the marches of Andaluſia, the king D. Fernand, and the Infant D. Alphonſo marched towards the fronter, where diuiding their forces, the king remained in Andaluſia, and the Infant tooke the way to Murcia. The king began to ouer-runne the countrie from Andujar towards Arjona and Iaen: he tooke Arjona, Pegalier, Montijar, and Cartejar, he cauſed his brother Don Alphonſo, Lord of Molina, to enter into the Realme of Granado, who ſpoyled the champion countrie: and approching neere vnto the cittie, he made a ſhew as if hee would beſeege it, entertayning his troupes about it vntill the king came in perſon to ioyne with him: where he had an incounter with King Mahomad Alen-Alhamar, who made a ſally with aboue eight hundred horſe, and great numbers of foote Moores, who were defeated; But after that the King reſolued to retire to Cordoua, beeing not ſtrong enough for ſuch an enterprize. Towards Murcia the Infant Don Alphonſo went to beſeege Mula, which was his firſt exploit, for hee had not yet beſeeged any place, the which hee tooke, and did much annoy Carthagena and Lorca. King Fernand beeing aduertiſed that the Moores came to put victuals into Iaen, and to fortifie it, he ſent his brother Don Alphonſo to meet them, who not onely repelled them and hindred the victualling, but alſo ſpoyled the whole countrie round about. In the meane time the King was come to Pozuelo, betwixt Toledo and Cordoua, to ſee the Queenes D. Berenguela his mother, and D. Ieanne his wife, which was the laſt ſight betwixt the ſonne and the mother. Hauing ſpent ſome dayes there in feaſting and pleaſure, the Queene-mother returned to Toledo, and the king came to Andujar with the Queene his wife, whom he led to Cordoua, and there left her, whileſt that he cared for the warre, eſpecially for the ſeege which he meant to lay to Iaen, ſpoyling the countrie about it, as he alſo did about Alcala of Benſaide and Illora, running euen vnto the gates of Granado, from whence he returned a victor to Martos. There he found Don Pelayo Perez Correa, Maſter of the knights of Saint Iames, who counſelled him to inueſt Iaen without any further delay: the which he did, and preſt it with ſuch fury, as the king of Granado had no time to ſuccour it: who to preuent greater dangers, which he feared to fall vppon him by this warre, reſolued to let the king Don Fernand vnderſtand, that hee deſired to make ſome good accord with him, if he would grant a ſafe-conduct to come vnto him, the which was granted: whereupon he came vnto the campe to kiſſe the king of Caſtiles hand, who entertained him courteouſly, ſo as they were good friends, and made an accord, that the citty of Iaen ſhould be deliuered into the king D. Fernands hands, whome the king of Granado ſhould acknowledge for his ſuperior, and come to all aſſemblies in Caſtile, and moreouer ſhould pay him 150000. Marauidis of gold for a tribute: others ſay 300000. beeing the moity of the reuenues of the Realme of Granado in thoſe daies, which was eſteemed to be 600000. Marauidis of gold, accounting euery Marauidis for 108. deniers, and euery denier for a Marauadis at this day: ſo as the reuenues of Granado did amount to 64800000 Marauidis, which make 172800. of gold, at 375. Marauidis a-peece. C D E F

A King Fernand did promiſe him for his part ayde and ſuccor againſt a mighty family of the Moores, his capitall enemies, called the Oyſemels. Theſe conditions were faithfully performed of either part, and by this meanes Mahomad Aben Alomar remained peaceable king of Granado. The king Don Fernand hauing thus compounded with him, he turned his forces againſt the king of Seuile. The citty of Iaen (as ſome ſearchers of Antiquities do beleeue) is the ancient Mentiça, an Epiſcopal ſeate in the Goths time. The ſame dignitie was reſtored, and the Meſquide made a Cathedrall church by the king D. Fernand, in the yeare 1243. who continued there eight moneths, for that it had beene taken in Winter, and for that it did behooue him to giue order for many things, for the preſeruation of his new conqueſts in that countrie, as alſo for the diſtruſt hee might haue of the King
B of Granado, his new ally, whom notwithſtanding he had no cauſe to doubt, beeing very faithfull. From Iaen he came to Cordoua, where he was aduiſed to aſſayle Carmona, whither king Mahomad came to ſerue him with fiue hundred Genets. Hauing ſpoyled the countrie, the two Kings came againſt Alcala of Guadajaira, which place by the king of Granados meanes, yeelded: from thence certaine fore-runners were ſent to a place called Axarafe of Seuile, beeing led by the Maſter of the Knights of Saint Iames: and others vnder the conduct of the King of Granado, and the Maſter of the Knights of Calatraua, were ſent towards Xeres. The King beeing in the mean time at Guadajaira, he had newes of the death of D. Berenguela his mother, whereat he was much grieued, ſo as the warre of Seuile grew ſomewhat cold, yet he was ſo farre imbarked, as he durſt not abandon the C fronter to come into Caſtile. The king of Granado had leaue to returne into his country, the King Don Fernand remaining very well ſatiſfied of him.

Portugal. Whileſt matters paſſed thus in Caſtile, all was in combuſtion in Portugal, by the negligence and baſeneſſe of the king Don Sancho Capello, who was wholly giuen to his wiues humors, beeing hated of the Portugals, and he himſelfe diſliked for her ſake: for many malefactors and inſolent perſons were ſupported by her, who grew daily more audacious in their exceſſe, without any feare of Iuſtice, which was troden vnder foote, for their reſpect. For theſe conſiderations (the Queene beeing alſo barren) all the Noblemen of the kingdome deſired to haue this woman ſeparated, and ſent out of Portugall: for the effecting whereof they made great inſtance at Rome: but neither exhortation, admoni-
D tion, commandement nor cenſure could preuaile: for the King did ſo doat of D. Alencia Lopes, as hee would not leaue her; which the Portugals perceiuing, ſome of them preſumed to ſeaze on her in the citty of Coimbra, & conducted her into Gallicia, from whence ſhe neuer returned more into Portugall. Not content herewith (as exceſſe and inſolencies were familiar and ordinarie among them) laying aſide all reſpect and reuerence which they ought vnto their Prince, they ſought to depoſe him from the royall dignitie: whereby it appeared that the whole ſubiect of the troubles did not conſiſt in the Queene Donna Mencia, but in their ambition and priuate deſſeignes: for their chiefe deſire was, to haue Don Alphonſo the Kings brother, who was married to Matilda Counteſſe of Bo-E logne, and liued in Picardy, aduanced to the royall throne in his place.

Queene of Portugal expelled by her ſubiects for her inſolencies.

The newes of theſe tumults beeing publiſhed in Arragon, Don Pedro Infant of Portugal, who was Earle of Vrgel, and Lord of Segorue, intreated the King Don Iaime to ſend Ambaſſadours into Portugall to perſwade the Noblemen and States of the Countrie to receiue him for Gouernour, as a Prince of Portugall, who beeing affected to the good and quiet of the Countrey, would order the affaires, to euery mans liking and content: The which the king Don Iaime did, but it was in vaine, for moſt of the Portugalls were ſo affected to the Earle of Bologne, as the Ambaſſadours of Arragon were forced to returne ſuddenly.

It was therefore reſolued that the Earle Don Alphonſo ſhould be called: and to the end that matters might paſſe with ſome colour of Iuſtice and lawfull Order, they ſent
F the Arch-biſhop of Braga, the Biſhop of Coimbra, with ſome Noble-men of the Countrey, to Pope Innocent the fourth, who had begunne a Councell at Lions, who did authorize this fact of the Eſtates by his Apoſtolicke power, and named Don Alphonſo Earle of Bologne, Regent of Portugall, leauing the title of King to his brother Don Sancho Capello.

D. Alphonſo called to be Regent in Portugal.

D. Sancho king of Portugal abandons his realme and retires into Caſtile.

Some write, that the Earle came to Lions, to kiſſe the Popes foote, and accepted from his hands the charge of Gouernor of Portugal, and afterwards at Paris he ſware the Articles and capitulations which were made in that behalfe: from whence he went into Portugall with the Popes Briefes, where he was receiued by the ſubiects but not by D. Sancho, who would not obey the Popes commandement, but retired into Caſtile. The Authors do not agree well about the time of this retreate: ſome ſaying, that it was during the raigne of Don Fernand: others attribute it to the time of D. Alphonſo his ſonne, which is the moſt likely: wherefore continuing to treate of the affaires of Caſtile in D. Fernands time, we will afterwards returne to the Eſtate of Portugal. A

Caſtile. 1245.

The yeare 1245. was the laſt of the life of Don Roderigo Ximenes Arch-biſhop of Toledo, a Prelate of great eſteeme among the Spaniards. He dyed in his returne of a voyage from Rome, vppon the confines of Caſtile and Arragon, in the Monaſterie called Our Lady of Huerta or Horta, where he was interred: famous for his doctrine, good life, great experience, and rare eloquence, according to the time, and eſpecially for his hatred againſt the name of the Mahumetiſts and Moores, to whom hee made warre with all his power, ſpirit, body, and wealth: he was a fauourer of the rents and priuiledges of the Clergie, the which he did much augment in Spaine, eſpecially in his owne Sea, and built and peopled many places which had beene ruined. Don Iohn the ſecond ſucceeded him in the Arch-biſhopricke of Toledo, Primacie of Spaine, and Chancelorſhip of Caſtile. B

Rocke found in Spaine.

About the end of Don Roderigo Ximenes dayes, mention is made of a Booke found by a Iew in a ſtone, in the which it was contained, without any ſhew of ioyning together: it was written in three languages, Hebrew, Greeke, and Latin, the which made mention of three worlds from Adam vnto Antichriſt, ſhewing the nature and diſpoſition of the men of either world: and in the beginning of the diſcourſe of the third world, it contained, that the Sonne of God ſhould be borne of a Virgin, and ſuffer for the ſaluation of mankind: and (the which ſeemed more then wonderfull) it was written in this booke, that it ſhould be found during the raigne of Don Fernand. Whether this were a thing done of purpoſe, or accidentall, by this ſtrange inuention, rather then for that which the Booke contained, this Iew was mooued to become a Chriſtian at Toledo: for hee might haue learned the comming of the Sonne of God in Iſay, and other bookes of the old Teſtament, and in the Goſpell, if he would haue read them. C D

In Segobia there was a ſtranger accident of a woman Iew, who had a great deuotion to the Virgin Mary in ſecret, who beeing wrongfully accuſed by her husband of adultery, as by the order of law ſhe was ready to be caſt downe from a high rocke neere the town, ſhe recommended herſelfe to the bleſſed Virgin, who preſeruing her in the fal, layd her at the foot of the rocke without any harme. This Iew beeing ill inſtructed in her religion, and worſe in that of the Chriſtians, publiſhed this miracle vnto the people, and was ledde with great admiration vnto the church of S. Mary the great in Segobia, where beeing baptiſed, ſhe was named Mary that leaped from the rocke: theſe are the tales of Friar Alphonſo d'Eſpina in his booke called Fortalitium fidei.

An. 1246.

The King Don Fernand hauing a great deſire to chaſe the Moores of Seuille, about the yeare 1246. prepared an armie at ſea in Biſcay and Guipuſcoa, whether hee ſent a Captaine of great experience, called Raymond Boniface, borne at Burgos, inioyning him to be at a prefixt time vppon the coaſt of Andaluſia, that he might at one inſtant beſeege the cittie both by ſea and land. In the meane time he ſo annoyed the towne of Carmona, as he forced them to ſome ſubmiſſion: hee tooke Conſtantine, the which he gaue to the citty of Cordoua, and to the towne of Reyna, wherewith he endowed the knights of the Order of Saint Iames, the which is at this day a goodly Commanderie. The towne of Lora hauing yeelded for feare of a ſeege, the king gaue it to the Order of Saint Iohn of Hieruſalem: he afterwards tooke Cantillana by force, where there were aboue ſeuen hundred Moores ſlaine: Guillena yeelded by compoſition, ſo as they ſped well for that time, but rebelling afterwards, it was razed. Hereupon the king fell ſicke, which ſtayed the courſe of his victories, for that he could not be in perſon in the army, the which is of great importance: yet Alcala del Rio was taken after a long ſeege, and a great reſiſtance. E F

Arragon.

The king hauing recouered his health, they treated a marriage betwixt the Infant Don Alphonſo,

A Alphonſo and D. Violant Infanta of Arragon, daughter to the King D. Iaime, and the Queene D. Violant his ſecond wife, the which was conſummated in the towne of Vailledolit, whether the Princeſſe was brought this yeere 1246. By this marriage all quarrels betwixt theſe two Kings were reconciled: for the King D. Iames held himſelfe wronged by him of Caſtille for many reſpects, but eſpecially for that hee had aſſiſted and ſupported his ſonne D. Alphonſo, who had conſpired againſt him ſome yeeres before, with the Nobility of Arragon and Valencia, for that the King D. Iames, hauing in the yeere 1243. propounded vnto the Eſtates, aſſembled at Daroca, to allot portions vnto his children which he had by diuers ventures, that he might leaue them in peace after his death: he had aſſigned vnto D. Alphonſo the eldeſt, the crowne of Arragon, and to D. Pedro, which
B he had by Queene Violant, the Principality of Cattelogne: which Pronince notwithſtanding he would reſtraine by the riuer of Sigro, leauing by that meanes the towne of Lerida, in Arragon, whereat the Cattelans ſeemed to be much diſcontented, and the Infant D. Alphonſo more, who would not haue this principality diſmembred from the crowne; this buſineſſe being referred vnto the Eſtates which were held ſometime after at Barcelona, the limits and iuriſdiction of Cattelogne were extended vnto the riuer Singa, ſo as Ribagorçe and Pallars were conteined in Cattelogne: notwithſtanding the King perſiſting to leaue D. Pedro his younger ſonne heire of that Prouince, the Infant D. Alphonſo conſpired with D. Fernand his great vncle, D. Pedro of Portugal, D. Pedro Fernandes d' Aragra, D. Iohn Gonçal of Heredia, and drawing vnto him all the Nobility
C of Arragon and Valencia, he had taken armes, and being aided and fauored by D. Fernand King of Caſtille, he had cauſed great troubles in Arragon, the which the King hauing by good councel ſomewhat pacefied, hee was this yeere reconciled to the King of Caſtille, by meanes of this marriage, many Noblemen of both Kingdomes hauing beene mediators therein, yea and ſome learned men, whereof there were many in Caſtille, for this King D. Fernand was the firſt of the Kings of Caſtille, which did honour his councell of Eſtate with learned men, chooſing twelue, which were well read in the law, who did alwaies accompany him, the which was imitated by many Kings his ſucceſſors.

Learned men firſt admitted into the councel of caſtille.

D By theſe graue and learned men, was then begun, by the Kings commandement, the bookes of the lawes of the realme, called Las Siete partidas, the which was finiſhed in the time of D. Alphonſo his ſonne: a worthy worke, copious and ful of variety: this aſſembly of learned men was continued for a time, and then changed, mingling ſometimes church-men amongſt them, and knights that were not learned, for the affaires of the Eſtate. In the end they did conuert it into a Chancery, whereas ſuites were decided, the which was as a court of Parliament following the King, and afterwards it was diuided into two Courts or Chanceries, one ſetled at Grenado, and the other at Vailledolit, as we ſee in our time. In like manner D. Iames King of Arragon, cauſed the lawes and cuſtomes of Arragon, to be reduced into writing; as it were in one body, hauing til that E time beene obſerued by tradition, which volume was confirmed by the Eſtates held at Hueſca, in the yeere. 1247.

caſtille.

Las Siete partidas conteyning the lawes of caſtille.

The King being at Alcala del Rio, he was aduertiſed that his Admiral Raymond Boniface, was come into the mouth of the riuer of Guadalquiuir, with thriteene ſhips of warre, which had beene ſet vpon by twenty Moores ſhips of Seuile, Ceuta and Tanger, whom the Chriſtians had vanquiſhed, taken three ſhips, broken and diſarmed the ſecond, and ſonke one, the reſt hauing recouered the ſea. Of which danger the King hauing intelligence before, and that there was a fleet of Moores at ſea, which attended his army, hee had ſent ſome troupes of horſe and foote vnto the ſea coaſt to fauour them, if they ſhould bee forced to run on ſhoare: but they arriued after the victory: theſe thirteene veſſels keeping the month of the riuer, the land army came and camped about the F city of Seuile, in the mouth of Auguſt 1247. not without great and bloudy skirmiſhes againſt the Moores, who ſallied out vpon them which made the approches, eſpecially towards the ſea, vſing withall many politike ſtratagems to fire the ſhips which lay at anchor within the riuer, which attempts the Admiral Raymond Boniface did valiantly withſtand, and repulſed the Moores, to their great loſſe and ſhame.

Seuile beſieged. An. 1247.

The

The beginning of this ſiege was ſo proſperous for the Chriſtians, as the garriſon and A Inhabitants of Carmona, being but ſixe leagues from Seuile, reſolued to yeeld themſelues to King Fernand, ſuppoſing that if they did protract it any longer, they were vndone. The city being enuironed, and al paſſages ſtopt, ſo as there could no victuals enter, they were daily in fight both by land, and ſea, where the Moores were moſt annoyed, and therefore they had a great deſire to burne the nauy, but they found good reſiſtance. Hee amongſt the commanders which did moſt feats of armes, was D. Pelayo, Perez Correa, maiſter of the Order of Saint Iames, and of the Knights Garcia Perez de Vargas, of Toledo.

Whilſt they were buſie about this ſiege of Seuile, the Infant D. Alphonſo of Caſtille B was in the realme of Murcia, where he ſought to take the towne of Xatiua, which is not farre from Valencia, hauing already ſeized vpon Enguerra; but the King D. Iaime, his father in law, croſſed his conqueſts, ſaying that he attempted vpon his right, for that Xatiua and other neighbour places belonged vnto him, according to the laſt lymitation. And for that the Infant D. Alphonſo did not retire his forces, the King of Arragon tooke Villena and Saix in the country of Caſtille, the which were held by the knights of Calatraua; and from the Moores he tooke Capdetes and Burgarra, places belonging to the conqueſt of Caſtille. Theſe differences being like to cauſe greater troubles, ſome great perſonages interpoſed themſelues, procuring the father in law and the ſonne to meet at Almizra, where they reconciled them: yet the King of Arragon ſhewed himſelfe very C ſtrict againſt D. Alphonſo, refuſing to giue him leaue to conquer Xatiua, the which hee promiſed to hold in doury of his wife Yolant. There they did aſſigne the lands which ſhould belong to either Realme, appointing for the fronter to Murcia againſt Valencia, Almança, Sarazul, and the riuer Cabriuol: and to Valencia, Caſtralla, Biar, Saxona, Alarch, Fineſtrat, Torres, Polop, La Meule lez d' Aquas, and Altea, with their confines. The mediators of this accord were the maiſter of Saint Iames, the Prior of the Templers, and D. Diego Lopes de Haro, who returned with the Infant D. Alphonſo of Caſtille, and all their troupes, to the campe before Seuile, where the King of Granado arriued alſo, wel, accompanied, and there were ſome ſuccors ſent from the King of Arragon; at this ſiege there were great and dayly skyrmiſhes, eſpecially about a bridge of boates which was D betwixt the city, and the Bourg of Triana, vpon the riuer of Guadalquibir, the which in the end was broken by the Chriſtians, hauing taken the oportunity of a great and violent winde, in the which they let ſlippe two great boates, the which came with ſuch violence as they brake the bonds wherewith the bridge was tied: the which did wonderfully amaze the Moores.

Confines of Murcia and Valence.

This great city was ſo ſtraightly beſieged as they began to want victuals, and therefore doubting they ſhould not be able to defend it long, they demanded a compoſition, the which was granted them vpon theſe conditions. That the city ſhould be deliuered vnto the King D. Fernand, and that all the Moores that would ſhould depart, with their goods, to whom there was left for a retreat the townes of Saint Lucar, Aznalfarache and Niebla: and for that they ſhould haue time to depart, the King nor his E garriſons ſhould not enter but a month after the making of this accord, and in the mean time the fort or caſtle of the city ſhould be deliuered vnto the King. According to theſe Articles there went out of Seuile aboue a 100000. Moores of all ages and ſexes, which paſt into Affrike, beſides ſuch as remained in Andaluſia and Granado. Thus the King D. Fernand got this goodly great city in the yeere 1248. hauing continued his ſiege
An. 1248. ſixteene monthes: it was not commanded by any King, but only by a Gouernor called Axataf.

Seuile yeelded to King Fernand.

The firſt thing the King did was to prouide for matters of religion. He went in a ſollemne proceſſion to the great Meſquide, the which was cleanſed and hallowed, and a Maſſe ſong by D. Guttiere elect Archbiſhop of Toledo, ſucceſſor to D. Iohn deceaſed F
D. Raymond Lozana was choſen Archbiſhop of that church, the king reſoluing to enrich it with great reuenues like vnto the reſt. The greateſt perſonages which were at this ſiege with the king D. Fernand, were his children, D. Alphonſo, D. Frederic, and D. Henry, D. Guttiere Archbiſhop of Toledo, hee of Saint Iames, called D. Iohn Arias,

D. Garcia

A D.Garcia Biſhop of Cordoua, D.Sancho biſhop of Coria, with other Prelats and Clergy men, as D.Pelayo Peres Correa the foureteenthmaiſter of the Knights of Saint Iames, D.Gonçalo Ibanes of Quintana, the fifteenth maiſter of Calatraua, the maiſter of the Alcantara, the Priors of the Templers and of Saint Iohn, with a great number of their Knights. Of ſecular Noblemen, there were D.Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, D.Pedro Nugnes de Guſman, D.Gonçalo Gonçales of Galicia, D.Pedro Ponce of Leon, D.Ruy Gonçales Giron, Arias Gonçales Quixada, D.Alphonſo Telles de Meneſes, D.Gomes Rais de Mançanedo, D.Roderigo Aluares of Toledo; D.Roderigo Froles, D.Fernand Yanes, Ruy Gonçales, firſt Alcayde or captaine of Carmona, Garcia Peres de Vargas, of Toledo, D.Laurence Suarez, and Diego Martines Adalia: all theſe were in the Land army. In that
B at ſea was Raymond Boniface Admiral, with many knights and Squiers of Biſcay and Guipuſcoa, with whom there ioyned many marriners and ſouldiers Baſques, from about Bayonne in France: al that had done the King any ſeruice in this warre, were rewarded according to their merits and callings, much land, and many houſes were giuen to the Nobility, wherein the Clergy was not forgotten. And for that the city was vnpeopled, the King inuited people from all parts, with guifts, preuiledges, and great immunities; ſo as it was ſoone full of inhabitants.

Soone after this prize, the King ſent part of his victorious army againſt ſome places of ſtrength thereabouts, the which were made ſubiect vnto him, ſome by force, and ſome by a voluntary compoſition, as Medina Sidonia, Alcala, Bejel, Alpechin, Aznalfarache, Arcos & Lebrixa and others towards the ſea. By this conqueſt the King D.Fernand
C was free from all warre behinde the limits of his Prouince, for hee ment to entertaine peace and friendſhip with King Mahomad of Granado, who had alwaies carried himſelfe faithfully towards him: wherefore he began now to conceiue in his imagination the conqueſt of all Affrike, and reſolued to paſſe the Straights in the ſpring, with a great army, againſt Caid Arrax, Miralmumin of Maroc, but death preuented him, in the city of Seuile, newly conquered, in the yeere 1252. hauing raigned in Caſtille about fiue and thirtie yeeres, and in Leon one and twenty. There were preſent at his death, his ſons, D.Alphonſo, D. Frederic and D. Henry, D. Alphonſo Lord of Molina, the deceaſed Kings brother, and the Archbiſhop D.Raymond. Hee gaue many admonitions to his ſonnes, D touching concord and the publike peace, recommending the Queene Donna Ieanne very ſtraightly vnto them.

Death of D. Fernand King of Caſtille.

This King was reputed a Saint among the Spaniards, but he is not canonized by the Popes, yet he was a great fauorer of the Sea of Rome, and of all the Clergy in General, whom he aduanced to honour and riches, as much as any of his predeceſſors. He did wonderfully perſecute the Albigeois, who deſcouered themſelues in his countries, burning them aliue, and he himſelfe ſetting fire to them. In his raigne and during the life of D.Iohn Archbiſhop of Toledo, Saint Lewis King of France imparted vnto the church of Toledo, ſome of the ſingularities which he and others had brought from the holy land, from Egipt and other places; as, of the wood of the true croſſe, one of the thornes
E of our Sauiours crowne; of the Virgin Maries milke: a peece of the purple roabe wherewith Chriſt was couered, ſome of the towel wherewith he wiped the Apoſtles feet, of the ſheet wherein he was buried, and of the toyes wherewith he plaied when he was little, with other ſuch relikes, whereof the Princes, Arabians and Turkes, yea and they of Conſtantinople, made rare preſents vnto the French, who (aboue all other Chriſtians) did reuerence theſe things, and did afterwards diſtribute them to other nations. Theſe goodly Iewels were receiued by the Spaniards with great deuotion, and of this ſubiect there is a letter found written by that King Saint Lewis, in Latin, to the Chapter of Toledo, with a ſeale of gold, giuen at Eſtampes in the yeere 1248. The death of the King D.Fernand was much lamented by the Chriſtians, and by the Moores alſo
F of Granado, who did mourne with great teares and lamentations after their manner.

32 Soone after the deceaſe of D.Fernand, died Thybauld King of Nauarre, the firſt of that name, in Iuly, in the yeere 1253. in the towne of Pampelone, leauing the realme to his ſonne Thybaud the ſecond. After his returne from Syria, he had great troubles and difficulties with the Nobility and commons of his Realme, or that held in fee of him, whom whom he deſired (as it was needfull, beeing new come and a ſtranger) to content, the A which he did by his wiſdome great patience and dexterity. Thoſe which croſt him moſt were D. William Vicont of Sola, D. Raymond Arnaud Vicont of Tartax, and D. Gaſton of Moncade, Lord of Bearn, who made great complaints of the King; but he gaue them the beſt ſatisfaction he could. To the Vicont of Tartax, he gaue Ville-neuue, with all the land of Miexa, and Hoſtauares, and to the reſt he gaue other things, ſo as he pacified them all.

Nauarre.

The King had great controuerſie with D. Pedro de Gaçolas Biſhop of Pampelone, for the rights and immunities of his church, the which proceeded ſo farre, as the Biſhop preſumed to excommunicate the King, and did not onely interdict his owne Dioceſe of Pampelone, but the whole realme of Nauar, where by reaſon of his pretenſions and B controuerſies, there was no Maſſe nor Mattins ſayd, but whereas the King did force them, from the which they did appeale: and in the meane time the Biſhop kept at Nauardun in Arragon: from whence going ſometimes forth, the King cauſed him to bee taken and put in priſon as a traitor, but it was too hardy an attempt, the people could not endure it, ſo as he was forced to ſet him free. Theſe ſtormes continued three yeeres, whereas the Spaniards lay all the blame vpon the King. In the end by the mediation of Noblemen, Knights, Prelats and ſome good religious men, the King and the Biſhop were reconciled. The King acknowledged his fault, and the interdiction was taken away, and ſome affirme that he went in perſon to Rome to demand abſolution, the which he obtained of Pope Innocent the fourth. As we haue ſayd, this King died in the yeere 1253. and was buried in the great church at Pampelone. About the ſame yeere there C died alſo D. Blanche of Caſtille, Queene mother to Saint Lewis King of France, leauing vnto her ſonne a good title to Caſtille (if he would haue followed it) and to his deſcendants: ſhe was buried at Saint Denis neere Paris.

Caſtille.

THe Moores of Spaine were reduced to that extremity, as they did all obey the Kings of Caſtille and Arragon, as their vaſſals, euery one in their iuriſdiction, the yeere that D. Alphonſo the eleuenth came vnto the crowne: but they continued not long in this Eſtate, for as liberty is the moſt pleaſing of all things, when as they found any ſubiect of alteration they imbraced it. Yet in the beginning they kept themſelues quier, ſeeking to confirme the alliances which they had made with the King D. Fernand deceaſed: and for that King Mahomad of Granado ſhewed himſelfe ready to doe this homage, the King D. Alphonſo, who was alwaies bountifull, abated him 50000. Marauidis of gold of his yeerely tribute, beeing in the city of Seuile, where hee was proclaimed and crowned King of Caſtille, Leon &c.

The firſt Ordonance he made, was to decry the money which was then currant, called Pipions, in place whereof he cauſed an other peece to be coyned, which they named Burgaleſes,

A Burgaleſes, euery one being ninety deniers, ſix deniers making a ſolz, and fifteene ſolz a marauidis of gold, ſo as the Burgalois and the marauidis in gold were all one in value. This change of money made all things deere in Spaine, wherevpon the King did much augment the Eſtates fees and ordinary penſions of his followers. The firſt alteration which happened in the Moores countries, was in Tareda, but they were eaſily ſuppreſt, for the petty King of that place, called Amet, was ſo amazed, as hee quit the place vnto the Chriſtians, and fled into Affrike.

We haue ſayd before that King D. Alphonſo had married D. Violant daughter to D. Iaime or Iames King of Arragon, by whom hauing no children in ſix yeeres they had liued together, he intended to leaue her: wherevpon hee ſent into Denmarke, to treat a B marriage betwixt him and Chriſtienne, the Kings daughter, attending the returne of his Ambaſſadors at Toledo, where he was againe viſited by King Mahomad of Granado. The King of Arragon hauing ſome intelligence of this diuorce, which D. Alphonſo pretended to make, was much diſcontented, and in a maner ready to proclaime war againſt Caſtille, if he had not bin diuerted by ſome noblemen and great perſonages of his realm, notwithſtanding their ſubiects, vpon the frontiers, did for a long time ſpoile one an other, & their was a league alſo made betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which did incenſe them more.

Thibaud the ſecond of that name, and three and twentith King of Nauarre.

2 THis league was to defend the realme of the young Thybaud the ſecond, who had ſucceeded his father in the yeere 1253. being not yet 15. yeeres old, whoſe gouernment, and the Regency of the realme was in the hands of Marguerite of Foix his mother. The Hiſtories of Nauarre ſay, that the King of Arragon came in perſon to Tudele to viſit the Queene widow, and King Thibaud her ſonne, whereas they made an offenſiue and defenciue league: the King D. Iaime offring vnto the widow and to this Pupil, whatſoeuer hee could doe, or they demand, alwaies reſeruing the rights which he pretended in D Nauarre, the which he would end friendly, when as King Thibaud ſhould be come to age, and in the meane time it was agreed that being of full yeeres, he ſhould marry D. Conſtance or D. Sancha, daughters to the King of Arragon, and if King Thibaud died, then ſhould D. Henry his brother marry one of them: the King of Arragon promiſing moreouer not to marry his daughters into the houſe of Caſtille, without the conſent of Queen Marguerite: ſhe promiſed alſo for her parr, to do her beſt endeauor that the King her ſon ſhould not marry with any of the daughters of Caſtille, lawful, nor baſtards eſpecially of King Fernands ſecond marriage. In this league was comprehended the French King, and the Emperour, by Queene Marguerite: and the King of Arragon would inſert a condition, that this preſent league ſhould be allowed and confirmed by the Popes
E authority, within a certaine time, and great penalties and cenſures ſet downe by him, for them that ſhould breake it. The Queene mother was aſſiſted by D. Garcia Almoranid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagu, D. Garcia Gomes of Agoncillo, D. Gonçalo Yuanes of Batzan, D. Corbaran of Leet, D. Martin Garces of Euſa, D. Pero Gonçales of Morentiu, D. Martin Gonçales of Morentia, D. Guerero Siere, Symon Giros, D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra, and D. Lope Arcez, Deane of the Collegiall church of Tudele, who did all ſollemnly ſweare to obſerue the Articles of this league. The company beeing gone from Tudele, the King of Caſtille was preſently aduertiſed of the league which they had made; wherevpon hee ſent many companies of horſe and foote vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, pretending that the realme did belong to him, and that hee would purſue his F right by armes. On the other ſide Queen Marguerite the Regent, manned the townes & forts ioyning vpon Caſtille with good garriſons, being alſo ſuccored by the King of Arragon; ſo as the Caſtillans paſſed no farther at that time. In the meane time King Thibaud grew to be ful 25. yeers old, wherfore they thought it fit to declare him of age, & to crown him, the which was done in the yeere 1254. in the great church of Pampelone, where where he did ſweare to obſerue and augment the preuiledges of the country. Being in A poſſeſſion of the gouernment, he would haue the alliance and league which his mother had made with the King of Arragon newly confirmed, for the effecting whereof, the two Kings met in the church called our Lady of Montagu, where they did capitulate: and it was ſayd that the King D. Iaime ſhould defend the realme of Nauarre againſt al, and that not any one of the two Kings ſhould make any peace or truce without the conſent of the other, for aſſurance whereof, eſpecially of the aboue mentioned marriages, there was deliuered in pawne, for King Thibaud, the forts of Gallipienço, Arguedas & Monreal: and for Arragon, the caſtles of Rueda, Sos and Vncaſtillo: which places ſhould remaine in the hands of certaine knights of Nauarre, who notwithſtanding ſhould be diſcharged by the King of Nauar of the oth which they did owe him, and with his conſent ſhould take B an oth to the King of Arragon, with a reſeruation and promiſe to yeeld the places to him againſt whom the other had made the offence: all this was promiſed and ſworne by both Kings, and the chiefe of their ſubiects; for the King of Nauarre, by D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagu, Seneſhal of the realme, D. Garcia Almoranid, D. Gil of Rada, D. Gonçalo Tuanes of Batzan, D. Martin Ximenes of Ayuar, Fernand of Leet, Ramir Perez of Arronis, D. Corbaran of Leet, D. Artal of Luna, D. Pedro of Varillas, and other knights, with ſix Bourgeſes of Tudele: and for the King of Arragon, D. Alphonſo Infant of Arragon, D. Garcia Biſhop of Tarraſſone, D. Garcia Romeo, D. Pedro Cornel, D. Symon de Foſſes, D. Frederic Lizana, D. Pedro Martines de Luna, D. Sancho d' Antilla and others. In this league were comprehended and named by the King of Nauar, the King of France and his brethren, and by the King D. Iaime, Charles Earle of Prouence, brother to the C French King. This being concluded betwixt theſe Kings, the warre grew hot and furious vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Caſtille; where the King of Arragon did more willingly aſſiſt, for that the ſame yeer the Moores of the country of Valencia being rebelled to the number of 60000. vnder one Alardrac their leader and captaine, the King of Caſtille did ſupport and aide them vnder-hand, vpon a ſecret hatred which hee bare vnto the King D. Iames: yet by the diligent endeauors of ſome great perſonages, there was a truce made for ſome months, during the which the King D. Iaime being come into Nauarre, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biſcay came vnto him, and made himſelf his vaſſal, being diſcontented with the King of Caſtille, which was no ſmal aduantage for the affaires of this league againſt Caſtille: for D. Diego was a braue & valiant captaine. King D Alphonſo pretended the realme of Nauarre by ancient right from his predeceſſors, or at the leaſt that D. Thibaud ſhould doe him homage, as the king D. Garcia Ramires, and the kings D. Sanchos, his ſonne and Grandchild had done to King D. Alphonſo the eight, Emperor of Spaines, and to other Kings of Caſtille; the which King Thibaud refuſed, alleadging that it was a forced acknowledgment, without any reaſon, and that he was ſo far from ſubmitting himſelfe to the Kings of Caſtille, as he pretended to recouer the territories of Bureua, Rioja, Alaua, Guipuſcoa, and other lands in old Caſtille which the predeceſſors of D. Alphonſo had vſurped of the crowne of Nauarre: theſe were the cauſes which made theſe Kings enter into warre, who (the truce being expired) went to field E with their forces: the Nauarrois and Arragonois aſſembling the body of their army about Tudele; and the Caſtillans towards Alfaro and Calaorra.

League confirmed betwixt Nauar and Arragon.

Caſtillans in armes againſt the Nauarrois and Arragonois.

The Kings of Caſtille and Arragon lead the contrary armies, and were ſo nere one vnto the other, as they expected the houre when they ſhould ioyne: but there were many good men which laboured to preuent this diſorder, amongſt Chriſtian Princes, ſo neere allied: The King D. Alphonſo gaue him of Arragon to vnderſtand, that it was an vnworthy thing, and beyond all expectation, to ſee him that was his father in law, carry armes againſt him, hauing done him no wrong; wherefore he intreated him not to hinder him in his iuſt purſute of the right which he had to the realme of Nauar, which the Earle Thibaud detained from him. The King D. Iaime anſwered, that he could not in conſcience, nor duty, abandon the defence of a yong Prince, which was recommended vnto him, whoſe F affaires he eſteemed as his owne. Many Prelats and men of great authority hauing imployed themſelues in vaine to make a peace betwixt theſe Princes, a ſimple gentleman of Cattelogne, borne at Beſalu, of the houſe of D. Violant Queene of Caſtille, preuailed

A preuailed more then al the reſt. This gentleman came to the King of Arragon, and perſwaded him with ſuch liuely reaſons, as he yeelded to a peace. Hauing done this good office with him, he did the like to the King of Caſtille, and was ſo happy in his negotiation, as they promiſed to confer perſonally together of their diſputes and quarrels: wherefore certaine Tents being pitched in a plaine betwixt both armies, the three Kings met, and imbraced one an other louingly, where they feaſted each other, and made a good accord before they parted. Yet notwithſtanding the league made betwixt the Kings of Nauarre and Arragon, and the courage which the yong King Thybaud did ſhew, he yeelded to doe homage to the Kings of Caſtille, as his predeceſſors had done for the realme of Nauarre, for the King of Caſtille thinking that he had won the King of Arragon, his

King of Nauarre confeſſeth himſelfe vaſſal to him of Caſtille.

B father in law, by this enterview, the which in truth did auaile him much, for that the Queene Donna Violant his wife was there preſent, he demanded of King Thybaud the hardeſt conditions he could, deſyring nothing leſſe then to make an accord with him: but nothing being refuſed, they compounded, King Thybaud remayning vaſſal to the King D. Alphonſo: and it was ſayd that he ſhould entertaine a Lieutennt in the court of Caſtille, and that whenſoeuer the King of Nauarre ſhould bee called vpon any occaſion of warre, he ſhould be bound to come and ſerue himſelfe in perſon, or by his ſayd Lieutenant with two hundred horſe. The young King yeelded to all theſe conditions, either for that he was not able to reſiſt his aduerſary, or elſe doubting that the King of Arragon was wonne, or it may be in conſideration of the publike quiet; beſides hee

C did no new thing, but what his predeceſſors had done before him: yet D. Sancho Fernandes of Calcante, and other knights of Nauarre diſſwaded him from it, the like did the Inhabitants of the Bourg of S^t. Sernin of Pampelone, who after that all the Prelats, knights and commonalties of the realme had approued this peace, they ſtill diſallowed it, and would not ſubſcribe, wherevpon the King did puniſh them by fines, as mutines, yet his choller being paſt, ſome few daies after he conſidered that thoſe of Pampelone were good and faithfull ſubiects, louing his honour and greatneſſe, and that they had reſiſted his will by a true zeale, and loue, which they bare vnto the crowne of Nauarre, ſo as he cauſed their money to be reſtored vnto them againe, wherevpon there Inhabitants of Pampelone refuſe the homage which their King did to him of Caſtille.

Caſtille.

4 The diuorce which D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille pretended to make, as we haue ſayd, from the Queen D. Violant, could not take effect, for that the cauſe of ſterility, which he obiected againſt her, did ceaſe, being the wil of God ſhe ſhould be with child, in the yeere 1254. and yet the Ambaſſadors which were ſent into Denmarke, had wrought ſo, as they brought the Princeſſe Chriſtienne to Toledo, wherewith the king D. Alphonſo was wonderfully troubled, ſo as not knowing how to couer this fault, D. Philip his brother preſented himſelfe vnto him (being Abbot of Vailledolit, and Cueua Rubia, and deſigned Archbiſhop of Seuile, for which cauſe he had beene brought vp in ſtudie, and

D. Alphonſos ſecond marriage pretended, diuinely broken.

E had remained ſometime in the Vniuerſity of Paris) and demanded this Princeſſe in marriage. It greeued the King much to giue D. Philippe a portion, yet finding no better meanes to ſalue this diſorder, hee cauſed him to marry her, and in fauour of this marriage allotted him great rents and reuenewes, but it was ſhort and vnfortunate; for this Princeſſe Chriſtienne thinking her ſelfe contemned and ſcorned, was ſo oppreſt with griefe as ſhee pined away and died. Thus the marriage of D. Violant of Arragon with the King D. Alphonſo remayned firme; to whom afterwards ſhee gaue an ample off ſpring. Her firſt child was D. Berenguela, then D. Beatrix, D. Fernand, ſurnamed de la Cerde, D. Santho, who was King after the father, D. Pedro, D. Iohn, D. Iaime or Iames, of all which wee will hereafter make ample mention, and in the end ſhee had Donna Iſabell, and Donna Leonora: Beſides theſe lawfull children,

F the King had D. Alphonſo Fernandes, whoſe mother is vnknowne, and D. Beatriz, begotten of D. Maior Guillen of Guzman, daughter to Don Perez of Guzman, in which familie the Kings of Caſtille haue often found Ladies for their ſeruice. This daughter D. Beatrix was Queene of Portugal. The ſame yeere of our Lord 1254. there came vnto the Archipiſcopal dignity of Toledo, and Primacy of Spaine, one called

D. Sancho, whom the Spaniards hold to bee an Infant of Caſtille, ſonne to the King D. Fernand deceaſed, and brother to this Alphonſo, but it is not verie certaine. D. Paſcal ſucceſſor to D. Guttiere, had beene Archbiſhop before him. A

Moores. As for the Moores, they were, as wee haue ſayd, diuided into petty States, except Granado: all which had done homage to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille. In Algarbe there raigned in this quality Aben Mofad, who held Niebla and Xeres: a Lady a Moore ruled at Lebrixa, or Nebriſſa, and Arcos: Murcia was held by Mahumet Aben Hudiel, and other places by other captaines and Lords, which did al hold of the King of Caſtille, to whom notwithſtanding, when occaſion ſerued, they ſhewed no great loyaltie: wherefore in the yeere 1256. King D. Alphonſo diſpoſſeſſed al theſe petty Kings, & he receiued Xeres of the fronter, by a voluntary yeelding, where D. Nugno de Lara was made Gouernor, and Garcia Gomes Carillo, a hardy knight, his Lieutenant. Arcos and Lebrixa, following the example of Xeres, yeelded alſo to D. Henry the Kings brother, who was ſent thether from Xeres. The yeere following 1257. the King came into Algarbe, where he tooke the towne of Niebla, and appointed lands about Seuile for King Aben Mofad, and many rents in that city, ſo as by this meanes he had al the reſt of the country of Algarbe: that is, the townes of Gibraleon, Huelma, Serpa, Mora, Alcabin, Caſtro, Martin, Tauira, Faro and Laule, al held by Moores, who did not in any ſort acknowledge the King of Granado, with whom D. Alphonſo entertained firme friendſhip, ſo as hauing ordained an Aniuerſary in the city of Seuile, for the King D. Fernand deceaſed, the which was celebrated yeerely in the Cathedral church, King Mahomet Aben Alhamar, ſent many of his chiefe Moores thether, with a hundred footmen, carrying ſo many great torches of white waxe, the which they ſet about the dead kings tombe. B C

An. 1256. 5 Petty Kings of the Moores diſpoſſeſſed and chaſed out of Spaine. An. 1257.

All matters betwixt Nauarre and Caſtille, were in outward apparence quiet, but the effects ſhewed this yeere 1257. that peace betwixt Princes, is moſt commonly entertained by no other bond, but their pleaſures and commodities, without any reſpect of accords, othes or promiſes: for the king of Caſtille hauing rayſed a mighty army, vnder collour of ſome doubt he had of the Moores, cauſed it to turne head towards the frontiers of Nauarre, to make ſome notable breach there, before they ſuſpected him. Wherefore the two Kings, D. Iames of Arragon and D. Thybaud of Nauarre, went ſodainely to armes, and ſoone after D. Henry Infant of Caſtille, the Kings brother, and D. Diego Lopes Dias de Haro, ſonne to D. Diego Lopes Dias, who was dead a little before, at the bathes of Bagnerets, came vnto the King of Arragon, being at Eſtelle, with whom they made a league againſt Caſtille, the Infant making great complaints againſt the King D. Alphonſo. With the young Lord of Haro, there came D. Diego Lopes de Mendoça, Michel Inigues de Suaçu, Inigo Ximenes of Nanclares, Sancho Gonçales of Heredia, Ruy Sanches of Landa, which were all principal Noblemen of the Prouince of Alaua: Lopes of Velaſco, Gonçalo Gomes of Aguero, Lopes Garcia of Salezar, Lopes Inigues of Orozco, Sancho Garcia of Salzedo, D. Gonçales of Cauallos, great Noblemen in the Mountaines, who came al with D. Diego Lope Dias their Lord, & did there homage to the King D. Iaime, promiſing to follow him againſt all Princes whereſoeuer he would lead them. The affaires ſtanding vpō theſe termes, likely to breake out into an open combuſtion, thoſe which loued peace labored in ſuch ſort, as the Kings of Caſtille & Arragon had an enterview at Soria, where a new accord was made. D E

Nauarre. And for that the Eſtates which king Thibaud had in France, that is to ſay, Champagne & Brie, required his preſence, or of ſome great perſonage, Queene D. Marguerite went thether, but ſhe died in the towne of Prouince, from whence ſhe was carried to the Monaſtery of Cleruaux, and there buried: for this cauſe the king was forced to go himſelfe, wherefore he recommended his country of Nauarre to the king of Arragon, and left a French knight for Seneſhal and Gouernor thereof, his name was Ieoffry of Beaumont, of whom the Nauarrois made no great account, and leſſe of the king of Arragon, to whom they would yeeld no obedience, ſo as there began to be a breach of friendſhip betwixt F

A twixt the Nauarrois and Arragonois, in the yeere 1257. at which time D. Gil de Rada, a knight of Nauar, did homage to the King D. Iaime for his caſtle of Rada, for him and D. Maria de Leet his wife. The Seneſchal ſeeing the coũtry, which was committed vnto him, ready to fal into a combuſtion, came vnto the king D. Iaime, who was at Barcelona, and obtained of him an aſſurance of peace, for a certaine time betwixt the two Eſtates.

The King of Caſtille finding himſelfe in peace with all his neighbors, both Chriſtians and Moores, he tooke care for the good gouernment of his ſubiects, who at that time made great complaints, for that by reaſon of the altering of the value of coines, al things were growne exceeding deere, which thinking to preuent, by ſetting a certaine price vpon al wares that were ſold, he wrought a contrary effect, ſo as the dearth increaſed, B wherefore he diſanulled that law, and gaue them free liberty to ſel their victuals & wares at their pleaſures. About that time there was great trouble in the Empire of Germany, betwixt Conrade ſonne to Frederic the 2. King of Naples and Sicile, and William Earle of Holland, both which carried themſelues as Emperors. The death of Conrade happened, who (as the Italians write) was poyſoned by Manfroy his Lieutenant and baſtard brother, who vſurped the realmes of Naples and Sicile, which the Popes would draw vnto them ſince Frederiks time, and exclude the houſe of Soaue: notwithſtanding that Conrade left Conradin his ſon and heire, in whoſe preiudice Manfroy made himſelf king, ſugieſting that he had newes of his death in Germany, hauing in the meane time corrupted ſome to poiſon him, as he had done the father, but they failed him their vowed ſeruice. William Earle of Holland had bin choſen Emperor by the practiſes of Popes againſt Frederic who held C that title vnto his death, which was ſoone after that of Conrad: for hauing war againſt the Friſons his rebels, he was defeated by them and drowned in a Mariſh. He being dead, the Electors of Germany were diuided, ſome ſtriuing to haue a Prince of Germany choſen, according to the lawes of the Empire; and the others (it may be corrupted with money) ſought to haue ſome forraine Prince placed in the Emperiall dignity, that he might paceſie the troubles and tumults which did afflict Germany, and Italy. Two Princes were then vpon the file: Richard ſonne to Iohn King of England, and brother to Henry the third, then raigning: and D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille. Conrad Archbiſhop of Cologne and Lewis Cont Palatin of Rhin Electors, practiſed by the Engliſh man who was preſent, D did choſe him King of the Romains, where vnto the Archbiſhop of Mentz conſented: But Adolph duke of Saxony, the Archbiſhop of Treues, and the Marquis of Brandeburg, diſallowing of this Election, they named the king of Caſtille, who was abſent, who being aduertized of this Electiõ by a ſollemn Ambaſſage, yet would he not go into Germany, hearing that Richard would force obedience by armes, & that the war was hotter among the Germains then before, wherefore attending the euent, he kept himſelf within the city of Toledo.

7 The ſame yeere of our Lord 1257. D. Sancho Capello King of Portugal, whom they had depriued of the gouernment of the realme, to giue it to his brother D. Alphonſo of Bologne, came into Caſtille, to King D. Alphonſo the wiſe (according to the moſt certain E Authors) intreating him to aide him in the recouery of his dignity, and to puniſh his rebelious ſubiects, who had made his brother their King in his life time: wherevnto the King of Caſtille was well affected: but a priuat reſpect made him to abandon the cauſe of the afflicted, for the Earle of Bologne, Regent of Portugal, knowing that his brother made this purſute, intreated King D. Alphonſo by his letters, not to trouble him in the charge wherevnto he had beene called by the Eſtates of the realm, for lawful conſiderations, the which had alſo bin allowed and confirmed by the authority of the Romain ſea. That if he would forbeare to annoy him, he promiſed to marry D. Beatrix his baſtard daughter, which was then of age to be maried, & would be diuorced from the Counteſſe Mahaut his wife, & moreouer did reuiue the ancient homage which Portugal did to Le- F on. Theſe offers made king D. Alphonſo to open his eares, who entertayning the king D. Sancho with good words, concluded the marriage of D. Beatrix, with the Regent his brother, to whom he gaue in doury the country of Algarbe, newly taken from the Moores. this vnion of the realm of Algarbe to that of Portugal, was the cauſe that from that time the kings of Portugal carriedin their armes, a border gueules ſemeè with caſtles or,

D. Sancho Capello ſpoiled of the realme of Portugal. Sancho Capello being out of al hope to raigne in Portugall, died ſoone after in Caſtille, where for that ſhort time he was entertained in a royal Eſtate, by D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, whoſe caſe was like vnto his ſome few yeeres after; for he was diſpoſſeſſed by his owne ſonne D. Sancho, where it was happy for him to haue preſerued the friendſhip of the Moores: for there was not any Chriſtian Prince, that did either fauor him or aide him. Whilſt that the King D. Sancho of Portugal liued, the city of Coimbra reſiſted D. Alphonſo his brother, and would neuer acknowledge him for Regent, and much leſſe for King. And the writers of Portugal ſay, that the newes of the Kings death being publiſhed; he which commanded within the towne, whom ſome cal Fleet, demanded a paſport to goe vnto Toledo, to informe himſelfe, of the Kings death, and that the tombe B wherein he had beene laied, being opened, he began to ſigth, and to lament the aduenture of this Prince, and to proteſt of his loyaltie vnto him, and of the affection of the citizens of Coimbra, and laying the keyes of the city vpon his hands, he ſayd, that ſeeing he had receiued them from him, with the charge and gouernment thereof, he deliuered it vp vnto him againe: and then reſoluing to acknowledge King D. Alphonſo for his lawfull Prince, and to draw the citizens therevnto, he returned into Portugal.

D. Alphonſo the third of that name, the fifth King of Portugal. C

Nauarre. BY the death of King D. Sancho Capello, which was the fifth yeere of his age, hauing raigned foure and thirty yeeres, leauing no children, the realme of Portugal fel to D. Alphonſo his brother, without any diſpute, who was crowned King in the city of Liſbone, in the yeere 1257. and being married to two wiues, hauing no lawfull cauſe of diuorce from the firſt, he was the cauſe of many troubles and miſeries to the realme of Portugal, for the preuenting whereof he had beene called. He had children by the Counteſſe Mahault: Fernand, who accompanied his mother into Portugal and there remained, and Robert who ſucceeded his mother in the county of Bologne. Fernand, D whom ſome call Peter, lies in the Monaſtery of Saint Dominike of Lisbone which this King built.

The Counteſſe his mother led him with her, when as being aduertiſed of this ſecond marriage ſhe came into Portugal, to know the cauſe why ſhe was thus abandoned. She landed at Caſcais, a ſea towne at the mouth of the riuer of Tayo, fiue leagues from Liſbone, and from thence ſent to intreat, exhort, and to ſummon the King her husband of his duty: for want whereof ſhe made the proteſtations ordayned by the Canons in that cauſe: but ſhe could haue no other reaſon nor anſwere from the King, but if it were lawful to breake the lawes, it was for a kingdome; and that if he thought to augment his dominions by marrying againe, he would euery day take a new wife. Theſe were E the fruits of her voyage, and D. Alphonſo ſhewed himſelfe ſo rigorous vnto her, as hee would not vouchſafe to ſee her, nor to heare any councel that was giuen him by his ſeruants, who had a regard to Iuſtice, & feared God more then him; wherefore this poore Counteſſe returned, and left this ſonne in Portugal: being in France, ſhe made her complaints of the diſloyalty of her husband to the King Saint Lewis, and ſent ſome to doe the like to Pope Alexander the fourth, that by his Eccleſiaſtical cenſures, D. Alphonſo might be forced to leaue D. Beatrix, and take the Counteſſe his lawful wife againe. The Pope did what he could, exhorting, commanding, yea and excommunicating the King, and interdicting his realme, but D. Alphonſo was ſo obſtinate as he ſuffred the realme of Portugal to remaine interdict ten or twelue yeeres, as long as the Counteſſe liued. Alphonſo King of Portugal. ing the which time the Portugals had leiſure to forget that which they had learned F in religion, when as the King finding himſelfe free, he was abſolued by Pope Clement the fourth, retayning D. Beatrix without any let, who in the meane time brought him foure children, the Infant D. Denis, ſo called for that hee was borne on Saint Denis day,

A in the yeare 1261. who was king of Portugal and Algarbe: the Infant D. Alphonſo who was Lord of Portalegre, Ronches, Murban, Caſtile de Vide, and other lands, and had to wife D. Violant daughter to D. Manuel of Caſtile, ſonne to D. Fernand the third, and two daughters D. Blanche, who was a Nunne in the Monaſterie of Lorban, and afterwards Abbeſſe of Saint Mary de las Huelgas of Burgos, and D. Conſtance. Beſides theſe lawfull children, this king D. Alphonſo had one baſtard ſonne called Fernand Alphonſo of Portugall, and one daughter whoſe name was D. Leonora of Portugall, married to an Earle called D. Gonçalo. Whileſt he ſtood excommunicated, he made warre againſt the Moores which remained in Algarbe, in the yeare 1260. and chaſed them out of Faro, Laule, Algezir, and Albofera, and augmented his dominions therewith. Hee built the towne of

B Caſtro of Portalegre and Extremos: he repayred Veja, and other places which had beene ruined by the Moores. He did not leaue to build Monaſteries and religious houſes during the Interdiction: for he finiſhed that of the preaching Friars of Saint Dominicke at Liſbone, and did build that of Saint Clara, of Saint Iren, and others: he gaue great almes, and did many charitable deeds, to expiate the ſinne which he intended, by the taking of a ſecond wife, not beeing ſeparated from the firſt. Moreouer, to eaſe the people, and to haue greater ſtore of fruites in the country, he cauſed certaine barren and waſte ground to bee tilled: neither did he forget to maintaine Iuſtice, puniſhing theeues and malefactours, whome his brothers careleſneſſe had made inſolent. To conclude, although he were defectiue and blemiſhed in his marriages, yet was hee a profitable Prince for his country.

Religious houſes built by D. Alphonſo during the Interdict.

C Whileſt theſe things paſſed in Portugall, and that the warre continued in Germany againſt the fauourers of Richard elect king of the Romanes, D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile ſent an Ambaſſage of certaine Cleargi-men to Pope Alexander the fourth, the which were D. Dominicke biſhop of Auila, D. Garcia biſhop of Sylues, and Iohn Alphonſo Archdeacon of the church of Saint Iames, learned men, and of great authoritie, who demanded aſſignation of the time of his Coronation, and alſo to contradict the election of Richard, who did not care to proſecute his right by iuſtice, but by force and armes. Attending the euent of theſe troubles, and the returne of his Ambaſſadours, D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile ordered ſome things touching the policie of his Realm, he decryed thoſe ſorts of money which he had coyned, called Bourgalois, and cauſed others to be made, which Whileſt he was buſie about theſe things, and irreſolute of his voyage into Germany, hee had another croſſe which ſtayed him more: for his brother D. Henry a turbulent Prince, and an enemy to all quiet, committed many inſolencies at Lebrixa, where he did remain, tending to open rebellion: wherefore he ſent D. Nugno de Lara from Seuile to ſuppreſſe him, by whom he was vanquiſhed, and forced to fly to Valencia, from whence the king Don Iaime cauſed him to diſlodge, for that he would not diſcontent his ſonne in lawe: wherupon he paſt into Affrick to the King of Tunes. This Prince foure yeares after croſt

E into Italy, and was made Senator of Rome (which is the chiefe dignity of that citty) and grew to haue great authority and credit in the eſtate of Italy, in the time of Pope Clement the fourth, who was ſucceſſor to Vrbain the fourth.

8 The king of Nauarre, who was come into France, finding his affaires in great diſorder, ſought to ſettle them, & to maintain his rights in the Counties of Brie and Champagne, beeing in controuerſie, the which he preſerued by the fauour and authority of the King Saint Lewis: and moreouer a marriage was made betwixt him and Iſabel of France, the kings daughter, at Melun, whom he led into Nauarre. D. Iaime king of Arragon was the mediator of this marriage, who in a manner at the ſame time gaue his daughter Izabel in marriage to Philip the Hardy, ſonne to the king Saint Lewis, and heire to the crown of France, promiſed vnto him long before. King Thibaud had not any children by this

He had one baſtard-daughter called D. Marquiſe, whoſe mothers name was D. Marquiſe Lope de Rada, who we may coniecture was allyed to that Gil de Rada, who it may be for this iniurie left Nauarre, and retired into Arragon, where he did homage to the King D. Iaime for his caſtell of Rada. This daughter was afterwards married vnto Don Pero Fernandes

Caſtile. 9 It was at that time that by the commandement of D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile, many learned men laboured to reduce into one body, the booke of the lawes of Caſtile, commonly called las ſiete partidas, which the King D. Fernand had cauſed them to begin, and which ſince hath beene augmented by the ſucceeding kings, with many ordonances, the which was reviewed againe by Pero Lopes Alcocer, Doctor Eſcudero, Pero Lopes Arrieta, and in the end by Bartholomew of Ariença, Lawyers: theſe are the lawes by the which the Realmes of Caſtille and Arragon are gouerned, and the adminiſtration and practiſe of Iuſtice in thoſe countries.

Tables aſtronomicall of Don Alphonſo. This King Don. Alphonſo giuen to ſtudy, it may be more then was fit for a Prince B which had ſo great a kingdome to gouerne, cauſed alſo thoſe famous Aſtronomicall tables to be made, which carry his name, hauing drawne into the citty of Toledo a great number of men learned in the Mathematickes and Phyſickes, as well of his owne countries, as out of Affricke and other parts, both Chriſtians and Arabians, where he comprehends a certaine ſupputation of the heauenly motion of the ſtarres, and planets, and of their aſpects and incounters, ſetting downe for a rule and fundamentall point of all aſtronomicall account, the ſituation of Toledo, where he conſumed an infinit treaſure. Hee did beautifie theſe goodly Sciences of Phyſicke and Philoſophie, cauſing the writings of the Arabians, and other Ancients to be put into more familiar tongues: whereby he deſerues, that thankefull poſteritie ſhould maintaine a commendable memorie of his vertue: yet he is to be blamed, for that theſe honeſt exerciſes did ſo rauiſh his ſpirits, and hin- C dred the care he ought to haue had of the affaires of State, that hee ſhewed himſelfe ſo ſlacke and negligent, as thinking to be Emperor, he found himſelfe not onely excluded from that dignity, but alſo diſpoſſeſt of his owne Realme; hauing reaped no other fruites of his ſtudies, but the vaine ſurname of Wiſe and Learned. Which doth admoniſh Princes to preferre action before contemplation, yet ioyning the one to the other with moderation. He left ſome markes of him in the Prouince of Guipuſcoa, in the town of Mondragon, the which was ſo called by him for certaine cauſes, whereas the auncient name was Arraçate: and did indow it with great priuiledges, whereof the letters are to be ſeene at this day, Giuen in the towne of Exnatorafe, called at this day, as the Spaniards ſay, Adelantamiento of Caçorla, which are the moſt ancient letters which are to bee found in D the Caſtillan tongue in all Spaine: for vntill this Kings raigne, all records, inſtruments, and publike writings were made in Latin: but he brought in the Caſtillan ſtyle, in all ſorts of writings, cauſing many bookes, yea of the holy Scripture, to bee tranſlated into that tongue, whereby it was much beautified. In this priuiledge there are many aſſiſtants or witneſſes named, as well of his owne Realmes, as ſtrangers: which ſhewes, that his Court was frequented (as if hee had beene peaceable Emperour) by Princes and Noblemen of the Empire, which are there named his Vaſſalls: as Hugh Duke of Bourgongne, Guy Earle of Flanders, Henry Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Beaumont, and other Princes holding their Lands and reuenewes in fee of the Empire: Many E Princes of the Moores are there alſo named as Vaſſalls to this King. In the ſame qualitie are named in this priuiledge, Gaſton Lord of Bearne, Guy Vicount of Limoges, who (it may bee) had ſome fees in Spaine, or depending of the Empire. Many alſo are named in this priuiledge as Benefactours: Queene Violant, his children Don Fernand, and Don Sancho, according to the cuſtome of the Kings of Spaine: and of witneſſes a great number.

This king Don Alphonſo did alſo cauſe a collection of the Hiſtories of Spaine to bee made, the which is read at this day, called a generall Chronicle. Beeing by reaſon of theſe things in great reputation, and eſteemed among ſtrangers, by the report (as it is likely) of learned men, whome he did cheriſh in all countries. The Sultan of Egypt, a Turke which raigned then, called Aluandexauer, ſent him preſents of cloth, and beaſtes F of Egypt, Lybia, Æthiopia, and other neighbor Countries ſtrange vnto the Spaniards, the which were requited by him with other gifts.

Beeing thus reſpected by Barbarians afarre off, hee was contemned by them which

A which held their lands, dignities and liues of his bountie: for in the yeare 1261. there beeing an assembly at Granado, of all the Princes Moores, which held any lands in Spaine, they made a league together, and conspired all against him, and without any long delay, beeing long before prepared, they went to field and forced the townes of Xeres, Arcos, Bejar, Lebrixa, Medina Sidonia, Rota and Saint Lucar, king Mahumet Aben-Alhamar of Granado beeing the chiefe, against whome Garcia Gomes Gouernour of Xeres defended himselfe valiantly, but it auayled not. This reuolt did much annoy the elect Emperor Don Alphonso, yet hauing sent some troupes of horse and foote, the Moores which were dispersed in the Christans countrie, were soone suppresst. An. 1261. Moores.

The Realme of Valencia had beene subdued by the king of Arragon, so as that time D. Arragon.
B Simon de Fosses beeing Vice-roy, there was no alteration in those parts by the Moores: yet this Prince was neuer in good quiet with his subiects, by reason of the importunitie and contumacie of his eldest sonne Don Alphonso, who did continually stirre vp new tumults, vppon colour of portions betwixt him and his brethren: a question which had bin handled, but not decided in many Assemblies of the Estates, and by Iudges appointed by them during D. Alphonso's life-time. He died about the yeare 1260. soone after his marriage with Constance daughter to Gaston Lord of Bearne. In the yeare 1261. the marriage of the Infant D. Pedro was consummated (who then tooke the degree of the eldest) with Constance daughter to Manfrey Prince of Tarentum, soone after the celebration of the marriage of his sister D. Izabel with Philip of France, at Clermont in Auuergne. After
C which solemnities the question for the Infants portions was reuiued, with as bad successe as it had beene when Don Alphonso liued: for Don Pedro could not indure that any thing should be dismembred from the Crowne, nor that any lands or titles should bee assigned to his brethren, but would haue them to depend wholly vppon him, the which the King their father did not hold fit for the quiet and rranquility of the Realme, knowing wel the rough disposition of Don Pedro, who was cruell and inexorable: wherefore notwithstanding the protestations of Don Pedro, which were ordinarie, refusing to allow of Order in that respect, but by constraint, and to obey the king his father. It was decreed, that after the decease of the king Don Iaime, the Infant D. Pedro should succeed in the realme
D of Arragon and Valencia, and should haue by the same right the Principalitie of Cattelogne, limited from the riuer of Singa vnto Cap de Crux. That Don Iames the younger should haue, with the title of a King, the Ilands of Majorca, Minorca, and the Pityuses, and moreouer the Counties of Rossillon, Collibre, Conflans, Cerdagne and Vallespire, with the rights of Montpellier, with charge to acknowledge the Soueraigntie of Arragon for these Segneuries vpon the maine land: but Don Pedro did complaine wonderfully at this portion which was assigned to his brother D. Iames. There were other quarrels pretended by the Nobility of Arragon, complaining that the king D. Iaime did breake their priuiledges and liberties: by reason whereof they made many leagues and factions. The matter beeing debated in the Estate of Sarragossa, and then at Exea, in the yeare 1265.
E there were orders made for the pacifying of those troubles: As not to giue any honors or militarie fees to any but to Gentlemen of race, and borne in the country. That no Gentleman should be subiect to the tribute of cattell, nor to any other. That in all controuersies which the Nobility might haue against the king, or among themselues, the Magistrate, called the Iustice Maior of Arragon, should be Iudge, beeing assisted by the Councell. That the King should not giue the fees and military rewards, affected to them that do him seruice, as a recompence of their vertue and valor, to any of his lawfull children, who by right haue their portions in the realme. In this assembly of the Estates the King was sollicited by the Pope to roote the Moores out of his Dominions, the which was hard to effect, neither was it done. Death of D. Alphonso Infant of Arragon.

The warre in Germany began to grow cold by the absence of Richard, who for want of Castile.
F money was forced to dissolue his army, and to go into England, to make a supply, whereas he found his brother Henry ingaged in ciuill warres, whereby he stayed there, and neuer returned into the territories of the Empire: so as Don Alphonso by his delayes lost many good occasions to effect his desseignes. Approching neare vnto the Moores fronters with a great army, he built a castell in the territorie of Alarcos, which hee named

Villa

Villa Reall, and ſince called citty Reall by the king D. Iohn the ſecond. The place where it was built, was before called Pozuello of Saint Gil. Leauing all care of the Empire for a time, he made violent warre againſt the Moores of Granado, Murcia, and other confederates, ſo as Mahumet Aben-Alhamar was forced to flie to Aben Ioſeph Miralmumin of Maroc for ſuccors, who ſent a thouſand geners or light horſe Arabians into Spain, in the yeare one thouſand, two hundred, ſixty three, which was the firſt ſuccors which paſt into An. 1263. Spaine ſince that the kings of Maroc had abandoned and loſt it, one and fifty yeares after the rout in the fields of Tolouſa, or Muradal in Andaluſia. The towne of Xeres was recouered by the Chriſtians, and manned with a great garriſon: Bejar, Medina, Sidonia, Rota, and S. Lucar were in like manner taken, as alſo Arcos and Lebrixa, from whence the king chaſed the Moores and planted Chriſtians. Port S. Mary was built, and other ſmall exploits of warre done whileſt the good time laſted. Winter comming on, the king diſſolued his army, the which was exceeding great: for he had called all ſuch as had in former times beene at the warre, and had horſe and armes, exempting them of the village of Martiniega, from the Cuſtome of cattel, and other Tributes and Impoſitions, beſides their ordinary pay. The king with ſome Noblemen ſtayed at Seuile: during this warre 1264. which was in the yeare 1264. his father-in-law D. Iaime of Arragon met with him in Alcarras, with good troupes of ſouldiers, to ſecond him againſt the Moores of Murcia, the which with their king was reduced vnder the obedience of the king of Caſtille, the yeare An. 1265. following 1265.

Moores. The king of Granado was ſo ioyfull of theſe ſuccors which were come vnto him out of Affricke, and gaue ſuch great intertainment to theſe Arabians, at his ſubiects charge, as many began to murmure againſt him, in ſomuch as the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, of friends became his enemies, and many of his followers holding themſelues leſſe eſteemed then theſe new come, conceiued a great hatred againſt him, ſo as hee began to feare a reuolt of his ſubiects. And for that he would not be ingaged in two wars at once, one ciuill, another forraine, he laboured to make his peace with king D. Alphonſo, coming vpon aſſurance vnto him to Alcala of Bencaide, and there ſware his fealty and homage anew, in the preſence of Mahomet Alamir his ſon, promiſing to pay him 250000. Maraуidis of gold for a yearely tribute, and renounced the allyance of Aben Hudiel king of Murcia. Wherefore king D. Alphonſo did more eaſily ſubdue him, who yeelded with all his townes, demanding pardon for his offence, the which he obtained by the interceſſion of the king of Granado newly reconciled: his life was ſaued, and ſome rents aſſigned him, but his royal dignity was taken from him, in the which the king of Caſtile placed another Moore, called alſo Mahomet, brother to Aben-Hut, who had beene ſlaine in Almerie, to whome he gaue the third part of the reuenues of that Realme. As for the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, D. Alphonſo had promiſed vnto the king of Granado by this laſt accord, not to fauor them againſt him, the which he kept at that time, & did procure a truce betwixt them for a ſeaſon. During the which Mahomet Aben Alhamar came vnto D. Alphonſo at Murcia, to intreate him againe (the truce being expired) not to ſupport theſe two Captaines, which had rebelled againſt him: wherein the king of Caſtile diſſembled, refuſing to promiſe him directly, for he had an intent to bridle him by this meanes, and in the end to ruine him. Whereupon the king of Granado returned diſcontented: being in his country, he ſought to corrupt the captaines of the king of Caſtiles forts, which were neere vnto him: namely, Don Nugno Gonçales ſonne to the Earle Don Nugno de Lara, who was diſcontented for the wrongs and grieuances which his father Don Nugno de Lara, and his Vncle Don Iohn Nugnes had receiued from the king, perſwading him to rebell againſt his Prince, with aſſurance that he would fauour him, and would giue him ſuccors vpon all occaſions.

Accord betwixt Caſtile and Granado.

Caſtile. During theſe actions king D. Alphonſo, Emperor elect, had newes of the death of Richard his competitor, who had bin ſlaine in England, at the ſeege of a towne of ſmal conſequence, being greatly ſollicited by his partiſans and fauorers to go into Germany, aſſuring him that he ſhould be receiued without any contradiction: but he excuſed himſelfe, either for that he wanted courage or mony, or elſe being ſtayed by the aduertiſements he had of the king of Granados practiſes: yet he called a Court in the city of Burgos, to conferre

A ſerre of this voyage with the Eſtates of his countries, who did exhort him to march, yea offering him money, whereof he had then need, but there was no meanes at that time.

He had ſent Ambaſſadors into France, for the marriage of his ſon D. Fernand ſurnamed de la Cerda, with the eldeſt daughter of the king S. Lewis, called Blanche, as her grand-mother, in the end of the yeare 1267. this Princeſſe being not ful ten yeares old, according to An. 1267. ſome Spaniards, and the ſupputation of Garrybay himſelfe, who makes profeſſion to be a great obſeruer of times. By this marriage was decided a great controuerſie betwixt the houſe of France, and that of Caſtile, for the ſucceſſion of the Realms of Caſtile and Toledo; the which by right, and the cuſtome receiued of the ſucceſſion of the elder, did be- Marriage of D. Fernand with Blanche daughter of France.
B long vnto the king S. Lewis: for that after the deceaſe of the king D. Henry the firſt, who dyed without children, being ſlain with a tyle which fel vpon his head, the ſucceſſion came to his eldeſt ſiſter D. Blanche, mother to this S. Lewis, and not to D. Berenguela the yonger mother to king Fernand the 3. whom ſhe had by the king of Leon. But the Spaniards diſdaining to be gouerned by a ſtranger, did eaſily fruſtrate this right, through the careleſnes of the king S. Lewis, choſing D. Fernand his couſin germaine for their King. In fauor therfore of this marriage made betwixt D. Fernand de la Cerde, ſon to D. Alphonſo the wiſe, K. of Caſtile, and D. Blanche daughter to the king S. Lewis, he did quite renounce al the right and intereſt which he and his ſucceſſors kings of France might pretend to the crowne of Caſtile and Toledo, tranſferring it to Don. Fernand and to D. Blanche his ſpouſe, and to *S. their heires. This accord was made in France betwixt the king S. Lewis his councell, and confirmed by him, and the ambaſſadors of Spaine, with whom the Princeſſe was ſent tho-though that they and the Caſtillans were no great friends: yet for that ſhee was their Queenes ſiſter, they ſpared not any thing that belonged to duty and honeſty. D. Thibaud was then in France, during his abſence there were many things done in Nauarre by exceſſe, or through the error of Gouernors, or the policy of neighbor Princes. One of the principall knights of Nauarre called Gonçalo Yuines of Batzan, retired to the king of Arragon, and made a fort vpon the fronters betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which hee called Boeta, from whence he made great ſpoyles in the country of Nauarre. Notwithſtanding

D the friendſhip which was betwixt the kings of Arragon and Nauarre, yet there wanted no grieuances and ſubiect of quarrels betwixt them. One of the moſt apparent pretenſions, which the king D. Iaime had, was, that he ſayd, that to ſuccor the king D. Thibaud hee had made great expences, whereof he would be rembourſed: making alwaies vſe therof when there happened any diſorder. The ſumme which he demanded was ſo great, as neither K. Thibaud nor his brother Henry, who raigned after him could euer acquit it. About that time, or ſoone after was the paſſage of the Princeſſe Blanche into Caſtile, whom the king D. Alphonſo her father-in-law receiued at Logrogno: the king D. Thibaud arriued in Nauarre, where he labored to ſet ſome good order in his affairs, and to prepare all things ne-E ceſſary for his voyage beyond the ſea, which he pretended to make with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law. He did ſomwhat repaire the breach of friendſhip which had bin betwixt the K. of Arragon and him, and renewed the accord with him of Caſtile: and hauing left his brother Henry Erle of Ronay, for Gouernor in Nauarre, he came into France, leading with him D. Iohn Nugnes de Lara, eldeſt ſon to D. Nugno Gonçales de Lara, and many other knights of Nauarre and Caſtile. He alſo led Q. Elizabeth or Iſabel with him, whom he left gouerneſſe of his Counties of Champagne and Brie, and then he parted with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law, who imbarked at Marſeilles, with his whole army in May, 1269. to An. 1269.

ſulted of the voyage at Toledo in an aſſembly of Princes: where hee did proteſt to go in perſon, although he were very old. King D. Alphonſo promiſed money, Michel Paleologue Emperor of Conſtantinople offered ſhips and victuals by his Ambaſſadors, but he could not put it in execution. Yet his children D. Pedro, and D. Fernand proceeded in their voiage, and arriued in Paleſtina, where they ſtayed not long. At their returne they landed in the Iland of Sicily, then enioyed by king Charles the firſt brother to S. Lewis, from whome they receiued great honour and good vſage: there the infant D. Fernand was made knight by the hands of king Charles, whereat D. Pedro his brother took occaſion to hate him, and neuer after loued him. As ſoone as K. Thibaud was gone out of Nauarre, whether hee neuer more returned, the king D. Iaime forgetting not the right he pretended to this realme, made donation and tranſport thereof to D. Pedro, reſigning all his intereſt to him, by vertue of the mutuall donation made betwixt him and the laſt king D. Sancho the Strong. A B

Caſtile. In Caſtile there was nothing but feaſting, for the new marriage of the Infant D. Fernand, at the which (being as ſtately as any had beene ſeene in Spaine) there were preſent D. Iaime of Arragon, Philip eldeſt ſon to S. Lewis king of France, Edward eldeſt ſon to the king of England, who had beene armed knight by the king D. Alphonſo: D. Pedro Infant and heire of Arragon, and Mahomet king of Granado, not yet proclaimed an enemy with other Princes Moores: the king D. Alphonſo himſelf, Emperor elect, his brethren and children, with his vncle D. Alphonſo de Molina, and a great number of Prelats and Noblemen of his countries, and of France, Ingland, Italy and other places: whither alſo came the Lords of Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other mal-contents, who did then conferre with the king of Granado, and concluded a dangerous league with him. Of this marriage were C born the Infants D. Alphonſo and D. Fernand de la Cerde, of whom we will make mention in the diſcourſe of this Hiſtorie.

The feaſt being ended, D. Alphonſo Emperor Elect, began to thinke afreſh of his paſſage into Germany, whither they called him by ordinary meſſages: but whether feare or neceſſity did hinder him, he could not begin it. It may be the quarrels of Germany ſeemed too dangerous vnto him, beeing alſo loth to charge his ſubiects with the expences, for the conducting of an army into Italy and Germany: for that his prodigality had exhauſted his treaſure, and emptied his coffers. For beſides the great expences which hee had made in ſearching out the Mathematickes and other commendable things, which amounted to ſo great ſummes of mony, as a Spaniard writes, that for the compiling of the work D which they call Tabulas Regis Caſtillæ, hee ſpent more then the reuenues of S. Peters patrimony could amount vnto in ten yeares. He gaue at one time an hundred and fifty Kintals of ſiluer to the Empreſſe of Conſtantinople; who came vnto him to Victoria, to beſeech him to ayde her, to redeeme the Emperor Bauldwin her husband, priſoner among the Turkes, from whom Michel Paleologue detained the Empire. And withall it is likely, that he ſpared not any mony to practiſe the Germaine Electors, by whom hee had beene choſen: together with the feaſts, triumphs, gifts and preſents of his ſons marriage: and the prouiſion for war which it behooued him to make, to defend himſelfe againſt the trecherie of the Moores, and of thoſe that were vnited vnto them. All which things kept him ſo E low, as he had neither meanes nor courage to purſue that which he had ambitiouſly affected. The rebellion of D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, the fiſt of that name, who had beene made king during the fore-ſayd marriage, and of D. Nugno de Lara, and others, may in ſome ſort excuſe him. Theſe with other their confederates were entred into a ſecret league with Mahomet Aben-Alhamar king of Granado, who for his part had openly broken the truce with the captaines of Malaga and Guadix, vaſſals to the king of Caſtile, annoying them all he could by open force: wherefore king D. Alphonſo came to Seuile to oppoſe himſelfe againſt this king of the Moores, and to preuent the deſſeignes of theſe conſpirators, calling an aſſembly there of all his knights and other his faithfull ſubiects. Hauing a great army readie, and an occaſion beeing offered, hee did aſſaile and ſuddenly take the town of Cadiz ill garded, and the Iland which was vnder the protection of the K. F of Maroc, where the ſouldiers got great ſpoiles: but for that there wanted people, he left it ſtill in the Moores hands. This was in the yeare 1269.

Portugal. The King being at Seuile, D. Denis infant of Portugal came vnto him, beeing well accompanied companied by the Noblemen and Knights of the country, who beſought his grandfather to make him Knight, and moreouer, that he would diſcharge the Realme of Portugall, of the homage and vaſſalage it ought to the king of Leon. King D. Alphonſo was deſirous to gratifie this young Prince, ſonne to his daughter D. Beatrix: but thinking it would bee taken ill by the Noblemen his ſubiects, hee aduiſed the Infant to propound it in an open aſſembly, the which he called to that end. The demaund being made in the name of Don Denis, who was yet a child of eight yeares old, by a Knight of Portugall, the opinion of D. Nugno de Lara (who had not yet declared himſelfe) was, that by no meanes he ſhould diminiſh the authority and greatneſſe of his Crown, the which he ſhould do, if he did quit this homage to the king of Portugall, and that in any other thing he was of opinion, the king ſhould gratifie his grand-child D. Denis: whereuith the king ſeemed diſcontented againſt the Earle D. Nugno: wherefore the reſt ſeeing that he would haue it ſo, they aduiſed him to do it. Whereupon the Realme of Portugal was freed from all homage and obedience due to the kings of Leon and Caſtile, this yeare 1269. And D. Denis being made Knight by the king, he returned ioyfull to his father, who about the ſame time was abſolued, and the generall Interdict, in the which the Realm had beene for twelue yeres ſpace, taken away by Pope Clement the fourth.

VViſe aduiſe of D. Nugno de Lara. II.

This prodigality with ſome other reaſons, did much diſcontent the Noblemen of Caſtile: and made the Earle D. Nugno to run into open rebellion, for that the king had taken it ill, for deliuering his opinion freely in open Councell. After theſe things audience was giuen to the Ambaſſadors of the Miralmumin Aben Ioſeph, who were come to complaine in their Maſters name, for the taking and ſacke of Cadiz, and to demand reparation: but they were ſent home with good words. King D. Alphonſo being parted from Seuile to come into Murcia, being at Villa Reall, he was abandoned by his brother D. Philip, the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other Noblemen & Knights which came into Caſtile, to put the League in execution which they had made with the king of Granado againſt their king, and to ſeeke to draw others vnto them, making the ground thereof to be the diſmembring of Portugal from the Crowne of Leon: which league was renewed in Lerma. Many other Noblemen and knights ioyned with them, the chiefe whereof, beſides the Infant D. Philip, the Earles D. Nugno de Lara, and Lope Diaz de Haro, were D. Eſteuan Fernandes, D. Fernand Ruis de Caſtro, D. Ximen Ruis de los Cameros, D. Iean Nugnes, and D. Nugno Gonçales de Lara, children to the Erle D. Nugno, D. Aluar Diaz D. Diego Lope de Haro, brother to D. Lope Diaz, D. Lope de Mendoça, D. Gil Ruis de Roa, D. Aluar Diaz de las Aſturias, and D. Roderigo Rodrigues de Saldagne, all diſcontented with K. D. Alphonſo: ſome for one cauſe, ſome for another. Caſtile.

The firſt thing they did, after they had ſworne the League, was to ſend the Infant D. Philip into Nauarre, to ſee if he could draw D. Henry the Regent of that Realme to ioyne with them, for the intereſt he had to pull downe D. Alphonſo, who detained ſo many Prouinces belonging to the Crowne of Nauarre, the Confederats promiſing him (yet without any ſuch intent) to ayde him in the recouery thereof. If hee would fauour them with the forces of the Realme which he had vnder his command, where they pretended to ſtay, and there aſſembled all forces, friends and meanes. The Regent Don Henry hauing duly conſidered of the conſequence of this enterpriſe, beeing wiſe and well aduiſed, excuſed himſelfe, that he was but Lieutenant to his brother, to whom hee muſt yeeld an account of his gouernement, and that he deſired nothing more, then to reſtore him his Realme in the ſame eſtate that he had deliuered it him, without attempting to trouble his Eſtate by any new enterpriſes, vpon a vaine hope of bettering it. Don Philip returned into Caſtile with this anſwer, being fruſtrate of his expectation. Soone after D. Henry had newes of the death of his brother K. Thibaud, which hapned in the town of Trapani in Sicile, in his returne from the voyage of Tunes, whereas the king S. Lewis was alſo dead, and the army forced by peſtilence, and other diſcommodities, to returne, hauing done nothing of conſequence. Nauarre.

VViſe anſwer of D. Henry of Nauarre to the Conſiuators of Caſtile.

D. Henry the Groſſe, firſt of that name, 24. King of Nauarre.

DOn Thibaud hauing held the Crowne of Nauarre 17. yeares and about foure moneths, and dying without any lawfull children, Don Henry his brother ſucceeded him in the yeare 1271. he was ſurnamed the Groſſe, for that he was exceeding fatte. And although the common opinion be, that fat men are moſt commonly of a ſoft and mild diſpoſition, yet this was of a ſower and froward conuerſation; the which he did eſpecially ſhew to Don Armingol Biſhop of Pampelone, whom he did afflict much. D. Iſabel the Queene Dowager who was in France, when as D. Thibaud her husband dyed, receiued his bodie (the which was carried with that of the King S. Lewis) and cauſed it to be buried in the Church of Prouins: and whether it were for the griefe of her husbands death, or ſome other infirmity, ſhe liued not long after him. The Confederates of Caſtile, ſeeing Don Henry receiued king of Nauarre, ſent to Don Philip againe, to ſollicite him to ioyne with them in league. The new king Don Henry made anſwer, that ſeeing he was now abſolute, and was not to make accompt of his actions to any one, hee was very willing to receiue the Confederates into his Realme, and to aſſiſt them with all his power: but vpon condition, that they ſhould in like manner come with all their forces and friends, to put him in full poſſeſſion of the lands of Bureua, Rioje, Alaua, Guipuſcoa, and others, the which king D. Alphonſo had vniuſtly vſurped and detained, belonging to the crowne of Nauarre.

An. 1271.

Anſwer of the king of Nauar to the Confederates of Caſtile.

This demand ſeemed great and difficult to the Infant Don Philip; and as one which had not reiected all loue of Brother or Country, he refuſed this allyance which would be ſo deare and burthenſome, and therefore he made anſwer, that neither he nor his companions had any ſuch power, as to accompliſh that which he demanded, confeſſing freely that he would not do ſo great wrong vnto the King his Lord, as to diſpoſſeſſe him of ſo great a country. The king Don Henry hearing this anſwer, would not enter into their League, beeing loth to breake the accords which Nauarre had with Caſtile, but vppon great aduantage: wherein he did wiſely not to incenſe ſo mighty an enemie againſt him. Don Philip returning into Caſtile, met with his Confederates, to whom he related what he had done, the which they allowed.

Caſtile.

King D. Alphonſo was wonderfully perplexed, during theſe practiſes, imploying al his friends to pacifie and to diuert theſe conſpirators from their enterpriſe. Firſt he ſent Don Henry Perez of Arana with letters of credit vnto them: the king went in perſon to Valencia with Queene D. Violant his wife, to intreate the king D. Iaime her father to mediat an accord for him, or to keepe him from ioyning with the Confederates: with whom Don Henry Perez labored in vaine, aduertiſing the king of all that paſt, as many of the Councell of Caſtile did in like manner: wherefore after many meſſages of either ſide, and many fruitleſſe negotiations, which did rather kindle the fire then quench it, king D. Alphonſo was forced to come to Burgos. The Confederats did not onely ſollicit the king of Portugall to enter into their league, but alſo Aben Ioſeph k. of Maroc, promiſing a ſafe acceſſe and all fauor againſt this Prince: the which was diſcouered by a letter written by this Moriſh king in the Arabian tong to the confederats: Iu the meane time the king of Granado began to make open war againſt Caſtile, ouer-running the country of Andaluſia with the horſemen which he had out of Affrick: againſt whom he ſent the Infant D. Fernand de la Cerde. D. Alphonſo being come to Burgos ſome of the rebels came vnto him vppon paſport, where there were diuers conferences, the king ſhewing himſelfe tractable in many things, for the deſire he had to go into Germany: but all preuailed not, notwithſtanding that there was an aſſembly of the Eſtates at Burgos for this pacification, the which was held without the towne, for the ſafety of the Conſpirators, who reiecting all treaties of peace, retired to Granado, their troupes committing infinit ſpoiles where they paſt without any reſpect, loue, and charity of their country, yea in the country of Guadix, whereas the Captaine a Moore was enemy to Mahomet Aben Alhamar: and they ſay, they entred into Granado with aboue 5000 cattel, and many carts laden with ſpoile which they had taken.

Mohomad Mir, the ſecond King of Granado.

WHileſt theſe fugitiue Knights were at Granado, the king there dyed, which was in the yeare 1273. hauing raigned 36. yeares, and ſome moneths. By their ſupport and aſſiſtance his ſonne obtained the Crowne, beeing alſo called Mahomad as his father, but ſurnamed Mir Almus-Lemin, otherwiſe Abedialle & Aboabdicke, and Alamir Aben-Azar: for after the death of Aben-Alhamar there were great diuiſions vpon the election of a new king: ſome demanding a younger brother to this Mahomad Mir, who was called Ioſeph Aben Alhamar, others would haue one of the Captaines of Malaga or Guadix, deſiring thereby to make them leaue the allyance of the king of Caſtile, to the end they might vnite all the Moores of Spaine. For the fauour which the Chriſtians did herein to Mahomad Mir, he cauſed a pallace to be built, which was called the pallace of D. Nugno. Such as had held the party of Ioſeph Aben-Alhamar eſcaped, and retired with him to Malaga, from whence he went & ſpoiled the country of Granado; But the knights which were with king Mahomad, hauing aſſembled ſome forces, went againſt them, and defeated them neere vnto Antequera. Moores. An. 1273.

C King D. Alphonſo was come neere vnto Toledo, alwaies negotiating a peace, for the which they aſſembled the Eſtates againe at Auila, whither came D. Fernand Ruis de Caſtro and Roderigo Rodrigues de Saldaigne, who abandoned their companions. Nothing being concluded, the King reſolued to make war with all violence: he came to Requegna, whereas D. Iaime king of Arragon ſhold meet him. During his aboad there, he had intelligence from his Agents in Germany, that the Electors, tyred with his delayes, and deſiring to ſettle a good peace in Germany, had proceeded to a new election in the perſon of Rodolphus Erle of Habsburg and Holſacia, againſt the which his ſaid Agents had obiected many things, and proteſted in his name of nullity. Theſe newes did much trouble king D. Alphonſo, who was ingaged in theſe ciuill diſſentions, the which he then reſolued to compound, at what price ſoeuer, to the end he might go into Germany to recouer his imperiall authority by armes, the which he had let ſlip by negligence. Wherefore hee ſent the Queene D. Violant his wife to Cordoua, with ſome of his Councell, to treat a peace with the king of Granado, and with his owne rebellious ſubiects, and likewiſe with the Miralmumin Iacob Aben Ioſeph, who threatened to paſſe into Spaine. He intreated and coniured the king of Arragon to ayde him to ſubdue them, if they wold not yeeld to reaſon, the which he promiſed, and he ſent Ambaſſadors preſently into Italy to Pope Gregory the 10 to make new proteſtations againſt the Election of Rodolphus, and to lay open vnto the Pope his pretenſions and reaſons. The Ambaſſadors were Friar Aymar a Iacobin, & Fernand of Zamora, Chancelor to the king, and Chanoine of Auila, who deliuered their charge in open Conſiſtorie: yet the negligence and little regard which the king their maſter ſeemed to haue of the Empire, did make good the election of Rodolphus, ſo as they returned into Caſtile, without any effect. Caſtile. 13.

Pope Gregorie hauing afterwards called a Councell at Lyons, whether he came in perſon for the reformation of Chriſtendome, eſpecially for the reconciling of the Greeke Church with the Romaine or Latin, and in like manner to releeue them in the Eaſt, who went to ruine. He aduiſed king D. Alphonſo, and admoniſhed him by the Biſhop of Aſtorga, to deſiſt from his pretenſion of the Empire, where hee ſhould do nothing but ſpend, and thruſt himſelfe and his kingdomes into open danger, without any hope of benefite: which aduice could not pleaſe the King, who being aduertiſed that the Queene, who was at Cordoua, had brought the king of Granado, and the Noblemen Confederats to ſome reaſonable conditions, he came to Seuile, whither all the Noblemen came with the Queene, and the Infant D. Fernand, where as an accord was made. The Noblemen and Knights were reſtored to the kings fauour, and to their goods and honours. Councel at Lyons vnder Pope Gregory the tenth.

Accord betwixt D. Alphonſo and his rebellious ſubiects.

The King of Granado promiſed to pay a yearely tribute of 300000. Maraudis of gold to him of Caſtile, and did pay him a great ſumme of ready money: the which D. Alphonſo demanded to make his voyage into Germany, whereof he ſtill dreamed. There was great diſpute touching the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, for king Mahomad would haue D. Alphonſo wholly to abandon them. but in the end the Queene D. Violant procured a truce for them for a yeare. Thus the conſpiracie made againſt D. Alphonſo was diſſolued in the yeare, 1274. the which had continued almoſt fiue yeares. Hee that wrought beſt effects in this negotiation of peace, and that tooke moſt paines was Gonçal Ruis of Atiença, a gallant Knight, and a faithfull ſeruant to the king D. Alphonſo. There is no doubt, but this Prince, by his inconſiderate bountie, his negligence in great affaires, and contempt of his ſubiects and Councellors, was the cauſe of great troubles and diuiſions, which were both preiudicial and diſhonorable vnto him, although that conſpiracies can not be excuſed.

An. 1274.

Many Princes came to the Councell of Lyons, and many ſent their Ambaſſadours: namely, Michel Paleologue Emperour of Conſtantinople ſent Germain Patriarke of Conſtantinople, George Acropolite, and Theophanes Metropolitane of Nicea in Bithynia, with charge to make a ſhew to deſire an Accord betwixt the Greeke and the Latine Churches: but in effect it was to diuert, by this goodly pretext, the Armes of Bauldwin his aduerſarie, and of Charles King of Naples and Sicily, who preſſed him, and to aſſure his Eſtate which hee had gotten by vniuſt and violent meanes.

Arragon.

Thither went Don Iames king of Arragon in perſon, who came to do his filiall ſubmiſſion vnto the Pope: yet the king beeing deſirous to be crowned in this Councell, by the hands of Pope Gregorie, (a Ceremonie whereof he made great account) he refuſed him, vnleſſe he would acknowledge himſelfe Vaſſall to the Church of Rome, and pay the arrerages of the Rent which the deceaſed King Don Pedro his father had promiſed: the which the King Don Iames would not do, holding it an vnworthy thing, ſo to debaſe the greatneſſe of his Crowne, and reſtraine the libertie of his Realme in any ſort. Wherefore ſeeming to haue ſome feeling thereof by his words, and making his merits knowne vnto the Church, by ſo many victories gotten againſt the Moores, in regard whereof, they ſhould do him honour, hee returned very much diſcontented to Montpellier.

Troubles in Arragon.

Both this yeare 1274. and ſome others before, the Realme of Arragon and Cattelogne had beene in continuall tumults and rebellions, the Nobilitie oppoſing themſelues againſt the king, vppon colour of breach of their priuiledges and liberties, beſides the continuall practiſes of the Infant Don Pedro againſt his brother Don Fernand, who drew the Nobilitie and Townes of Arragon into pernicious factions: Don Pedro proceeding ſo maliciouſly, as the king Don Iames their father was forced to take the gouernement of the Realme, and the managing of affaires from him: the which hee did in an open aſſembly of the Eſtates called to that end at Exea, in the which were condemned for contumacie, Don Artal of Luna, Lopes Ortis Sentia, Symon of Ahones, Diego Gurrea, and Pedro Ortis, by the ſentence of Roderigo Caſtelliuol, holding then the Magiſtracie of Iuſtice Maior of Arragon: by reaſon whereof, and of theſe ſeditions and quarrells, hee was afterwards ſlaine by Bertrand Canelia, and Don Willyam Raymond Odena ſmoothered in the water, by the commandement of the Infant Don Pedro, who accuſed his brother Don Fernand of treaſon, and practiſes againſt the life of their father: whereof diligent information was made, and Don Raymond Foulques, Vicount of Cardonne, Don Pedro Verga, Galſerand de Pinos, and other Noblemen were purſued, both by reaſon thereof, and for that they refuſed to do their due ſeruices and obedience vnto the king, in his warres, voyages, and expeditions, as feudataries are bound, whereuppon they were depriued of their fees and military honours, according to the cuſtome of Spaine, by the which Places and States were giuen to be held in fee, vnder the Soueraigntie of the Crowne, vppon condition to yeeld them vp vnto the king beeing demanded.

It did auaile them nothing to obiect the priuiledges of Cattelogne, which were

That

A That the Nobility might quit the kings obedience in caſe of controuerſies and ſutes, eſpecially if there were queſtion of their liberties, and to proteſt it publikely. To compound which troubles the Eſtates were aſſembled againe that yeare 1274. at Lerida, and Iudges appointed by them: but the diſorder was ſo great, as the king incenſed with a raſh and inhumane fury againſt his ſon D. Fernand and his confederates, he gaue him ouer in prey to his brother D. Pedro, who beſeeged him in the Caſtell of Pomar, took him, and cauſed him to be drowned in the riuer of Singa, and obtained his goods and ſpoile, for the execution of this cruell act. D. Fernand had married Donna Aldoncia of Vrrea, by whom he left a ſonne called Don Philip Fernandes, which was the ſtemme of the noble houſe of Caſtro in Arragon. Don Pedro of Arragon drowneth his brother.

B 14 Theſe diſorders were ſeconded by the proceedings of the Inquiſitors Monkes, againſt them that were ſuſpected to fauour the opinion of the Albigeois, condemned by the Popes. This Commiſſion was affected by Friar Raymond of Begnafort a Iacobine abouementioned, and giuen to Friar Pedro Cadreta, and William Colonico of the ſame Order, who inquiring of this crime with great vehemency, did many exploits in Cattelogne, namely, in the Dioceſſe of Vrgel, where they tooke out of the graue the bones of Arnaud of Caſtelbon, and of Ermeſinde, or Brunicende his daughter, Grandmother to Roger Bernard Earle of Foix, deceaſed a little before, and cauſed them to be publikely burnt, condemning their memorie. Such was the eſtate of Arragon after the returne of the king D. Iames from the Councel of Lyons.

C D. Henry king of Nauarre newly come to the Crowne, was to diſpute with D. Pedro infant of Arragon, for the right which he pretended, to the Realme of Nauarre, as Ceſſionarie to D. Iaime his father: but it fell out happily for him, that there grew ſo great diuiſion betwixt the father and the ſonne: by reaſon whereof the Infant D. Pedro entred into familiarity with the king of Nauarre, that he might be fauoured by him in his enterpriſes: and the better to incourage him, he ſent a knight vnto him called D. William of Cruillas, to make an accord betwixt them for this pretended right, wherof the king D. Henry made no great account, yet he gaue him good words, and intertained this young Prince, ſtill keeping Don Iaime in feare, that they would agree to his preiudice, which was a good meanes for the king of Nauarre to be aſſured of him: for D. Iaime fearing this league D ſhould take effect, preuented his ſonne, and ſought D. Henries friendſhip, making a truce for many yeares with him, during the which they ſhould not talke of right, pretenſions, nor of any reall nor perſonall actions. So King Henry the Groſſe inioyed his Realme quietly, by the diſcord of others. Nauarre.

This king was married before he came to the Crowne, beeing but Earle of Ronay, to Ieanne daughter to Robert Earle of Arthois, Brother to Saint Lewis: ſo as ſhee was allyed to the Royall houſes of France and Spaine. The king had Don Thibaud by this marriage, whome the nurce let fall out of a Gallerie, in the towne of Eſtella, and ſlue him: ſome ſay, it was his Gouernour, who let him fall vnaduiſedly, and was ſo grieued, E as hee caſt himſelfe headlong after the child, and ſlue himſelfe: Hee had no other ſonne, Wherefore the maſculine line of the Earles of Champagne in Nauarre, ended in this king, hauing continued but forty yeares. Hee had beſides one daughter by his wife called Donna Ieanne by her mothers name, who came to inherit the Realme of Nauarre with the Counties of Brie, Champagne, and other Eſtates of her Father. The Spaniſh Authours write, that the King and Queene, her father and mother, cauſed her to bee receiued and declared Queene in the Eſtates of Nauarre beeing but two yeares and ſeuen moneths old, which was a meanes to vnite Nauarre to France for ſome yeares. This King Don Henry beeing Lieutenant in Nauarre for Don Thibaud his brother, being yet vnmarried, had the company of a Lady, the heire of the houſe of Lacarra, of whom hee begatte a ſonne, whome he named Henry as himſelfe. Beeing growne, he was much fa- F uoured by the kings which ſucceeded his father, and obtained the dignitie of Marſhall, or chiefe Commander of armes in Nauarre: They hold, that the noble family of Henriques in Nauarre, Lords of Ablitas, is deſcended from him. D. Henry the Groſſe raigned only three yeares, 7. moneths, and 17. dayes. He died in the citty of Pampelone in the Biſhops pallace this yeare 1274. and was interred in the Cathedrall church. Genealogy of Nauarre. Family of Henriques of Nauarre Lords of Ablitas.

There is no particular mention of his deedes, nor of his gouernement in Nauarre, but A that he brake an vnion made in the time of the king D. Sancho, betwixt the Bourgers and inhabitants of Pampelone, from that time diuided in Nauarriere, a Bourg, the reaſon that mooued him thereunto, is not ſet downe, but that it it was preiudiciall to the Cittie.

D. Ieanne heire of Nauarre. 15.

Donna Ieanne the onely daughter and heire to the king D. Henry, remained in the power of the Eſtates of Nauarre, beeing onely three yeares old: preſently there grew great troubles among the Nauarrois, as well for the gouernement of the Realme, as for the bringing vp of the Infanta. The gouernement of the Realme was in the hands of Pero Sanches de Montagu, Lord of Caſcant: but for the bringing vp of the Infanta D. Ieanne, B who was then in the cuſtodie of the Queene her mother, there was great diſpute in an aſſembly called to that end in the citty of Pampelone. Some would haue her deliuered to the king D. Alphonſo: and of this number was Don Garcia Almorauid: againſt theſe Don Pero Sanches of Montagu, Don Armingol Biſhop of Pampelone, with many others, were of opinion, that ſhe ſhould be put into the hands of D. Iames king of Arragon: but the Queene her mother deſired ſhe might come into the hands of the French, demanding Philip king of France to be tutor to her daughter and Realme. In theſe debates which were neither gouerned by modeſtie nor reaſon, the Queene (fearing leſt ſome inconuenience ſhould fall vpon her daughter and her ſelfe, beeing aſſiſted by the Noblemen and Knights which were of her faction) ſtole away in the night, and carried the Infanta (who C was the cauſe of all the quarrell) with her into France, where ſhee was courteouſly intertained by King Philip the third then raigning, her couſin germaine. The Nauarrois hearing of her departure, diſputed no more for the daughter, but applyed themſelues wholy to the ſeeking of ſome reconciliations which were made betwixt the kings of Arragon and Caſtile, either of them ſeeking to be receiued King of Nauarre, vppon fauour of the rights which they pretended to haue.

D. Pero Sanches de Montagu Regent in Nauarre.

The heire of Nauarre tranſported into France by her mother.

Don Iaime of Arragon was firſt aduertiſed of the death of the King Don Henry: wherefore hee ſent Ambaſſadours preſently vnto the Eſtates, intreating them not to hinder him in the poſſeſſion of the Realme which did of right belong vnto him, not only by reaſon of the adoption and donation which the king D. Sancho the ſtrong had made vnto him, but by a more ancient title: for that (ſayd they) the kings which had held the D Realme ſince D. Alphonſo the Warrior, had vſurped it by force, and were intruders without any lawfull title, to the preiudice of the Kings of Arragon. Moreouer, he let them vnderſtand, that there was due vnto him by the deceaſed kings of Nauarre, 60000. markes of ſiluer, which did augment and better his pretenſion to the ſayd Realme: for which conſiderations the Ambaſſadors required them to receiue the king D. Iaime, or D. Pedro for their king, which they ſhould beſt like of, promiſing them all good vſage. On the other ſide, king D. Alphonſo deſiring that his ſonne D. Fernand de la Cerde ſhould obtaine this realme, renouncing the ancient rights which he pretended thereunto, and without any other requeſt, he gaue him an army to ſeaze thereon. It fell out that theſe two pretendants demanded ayde and ſupport one of another, to recouer that which they both deE ſired.

Realme of Nauarre affected by the kings of Caſtile and Arragon.

The Noblemen and Deputies of the Eſtates, ſeeing the great danger which did threaten the Realme by theſe diuiſions, reſolued to ſend the Biſhop of Pampelone, and the gouernour, to Sos, to accommodate their affaires in ſome ſort with D. Pedro of Arragon, who came thither, where they agreed, that in regard of 60000. markes of ſiluer, they ſhould ſtand to that which ſhould be ſet downe by Don Sancho Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and brother to Don Pedro, who was held to be a Prelate of a good conſcience, and as for the reſt, they ſhould vſe no force of either ſide, but all peaceable meanes: whereuppon they made truce for a certaine time. The Ambaſſadors beeing returned, the place of the Nauarrois aſſembly was changed to Puente la Reyna, whether came the chiefe PreF lates, Noblemen, and knights of the Realme, and the Deputies of the Townes of Pampelone, Tudele, Eſtella, Olite, Sangueſſa, Puente la Reyna and others of the ſame iuriſdiction.

There in the preſence of this honourable Aſſembly Don Garcia Ortis of Açagra, one of

A of the Agents for the Infant of Arragon, required to haue the King D. Iaime receiued for King of Nauarre, making a large relation of his rights, with promiſes and aſſeuerations that it ſhould redound to the great good of the Realme: whilſt they are thus buſied, D. Fernand de la Cerde, Infant of Caſtille, entred the country in armes, where he had many knights of his party: Comming therefore by the country of Oja hee paſt Ebro, and beſieged the towne of Viana, but finding it wel garded, hee left it, and came to Mendauia, the which he tooke, and afterwards won the tower of Moreda, and committed great ſpoiles finding no reſiſtance in field. This force offred by the Caſtillan, made them incline more to Arragon, and to the end they might preuent the danger which did threaten them, they ſent the Biſhop D. Armingol againe to the Infant D. Pedro, being at Tar-
B raſſone, who although he were a Caſtillan; yet was hee not of D. Fernands faction, and with him were the Gouernor D. Gonçalo Yuanes of Batzan, and his ſonne D. Iohn Gonçales of Batzan, D. Gil Balduin Gouernor of Tudele and D. Martin Garces of Vnça. Theſe Deputies gaue him to vnderſtand from the Eſtates, that they ſhould bee very glad if hee had any good intereſt to the realme of Nauar, and that they deſired much to know from him, what good alliance they might now treat together. To whom D. Pedro made anſwere that he deſired there ſhould bee a promiſe of a marriage betwixt the Infanta D. Ieanne, and his eldeſt ſonne D. Alphonſo: and if that he ſhould die before ſhe came to ful age, then ſhee ſhould marry with D. Iaime his ſecond ſonne, and if the marriage could not be accompliſhed with the Infanta, that it ſhould then be with ſome one of her coſin
C germains, iſſued from the daughters of King Thibaud the firſt, eſpecially of the Ducheſſe of Brittan. He offred to giue them his ſonne D. Alphonſo, to aſſiſt them in the gouernment of the realme: he did withall lay open vnto them the right which his father D. Iaime had to the realme of Nauarre, and the ceſſion which had beene made vnto him, concluding, if theſe things were not pleaſing vnto them, that they ſhould aduiſe to receiue him for their King within a yeere, deliuering the whole realme freely vnto him.

Accord betwixt the Eſtates of Nauarre and D. Pedro of Arragon.

The Ambaſſadors being returned with this anſwere, the aſſembly was put off to Olite, where hauing conſulted of their affaires, they made an accord with the Infant of Ar-D ragon, according to the Articles which follow. That the marriage betwixt D. Alphonſo of Arragon his eldeſt ſonne, and the Infanta D. Ieanne ſhould take effect: and if ſhee ſhould die before the conſummation, the Eſtates ſhould ſeeke to marry him to one of her couſin germains, daughter to Iohn Duke of Brittaine; and in caſe D. Alphonſo ſhould die before the conſummation of the marriage, the Infanta, or one of her couſins, ſhould bee giuen to him of D. Pedros ſonnes which ſhould bee next heire to the crowne of Arragon. And whereas the Eſtates of Nauarre, could not for ſome lawfull let accompliſh it, then they ſhould pay vnto D. Pedro, a hundred and forty thouſand Markes of ſiluer, for the expences hee had beene at in the defence of the realme of Nauarre, and that out of the reuenues of the crowne, beſides the 60000. markes which E were already due, making in all the ſum of 200000. markes, as it was currant at that time, payable within one yeere after the ſayd let, accounting from Eaſter day: which accords ſhould not bee any preiudice to the rights and pretenſions which his father D. Iaime and he had to the realme of Nauarre, wherein the Eſtates promiſed to bee fauourable vnto them, and to aide them all they could. Theſe promiſes were made and ſworne by moſt of the Noblemen and Deputies aſſembled in the yeere 1274. vpon paine of high treaſon if they failed, except in regard of the marriages, for that the Princeſſes were not in their power.

But D Garcia Almorauid and others, who were otherwiſe affected, did not allow of theſe accords, neither would they conſent, nor ſweare them, which cauſed great troubles and diuiſions within the realme, neither did any of theſe Articles take effect, for that Phi-
F lip King of France, tooke the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and made his ſonne King, to whom hee married the Infant D. Ieanne, fruſtrating the King of Arragon; for the Queene D. Ieanne widow to D. Henry, beeing retired into France, with the Infanta her daughter, heire to that crowne, and being aduertiſed of all that had paſt in the aſſembly of the Eſtates at Olité, was ſo incenſed, as ſhee deliuered her daughter into the hands of

King Philip, who receiued both her and the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and A Nauarre vnder the protection of the French. cauſed her to be brought vp with his two daughters, Marguerite and Blanche, whom he had had by his ſecond wife, Mary of Brabant, beeing alſo very young. This Infanta D. Ieanne was tall, beautifull, and of as good a grace as any Princeſſe of her time, wherefore King Philip married her very yong, by a future promiſe, to his ſonne Philip, ſurnamed the faire, who ſucceeded in the realme of France.

16 The Eſtate of Nauarre ſtanding vpon theſe termes D. Garcia Almorauid, a great enemy to the Gouernment of D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, Lord of Caſcante, and a fauourer of the Caſtillan faction, tooke occaſion to enter into quarrell and to trouble the realme, vpon certaine iarres which were betwixt the Inhabitants of Pampelone, who B had beene long diuided and in mutiny one againſt the other. Thoſe of the quarter, called Nauarriere would haue made certaine fortifications againſt the Bourg, but they were hindred by the Gouernor, who thought that ſuch barres betwixt the Inhabitants of one towne would be the very nurſes of hatred and ſedition: Wherefore D. Garcia taking vpon him to ſupport the Inhabitants of Nauarriere, the realme grew into ſuch factions, as there was nothing but Inſolences, murther, thefts and ſuch like diſorders committed; to remedy the which the Eſtates were againe aſſembled at Pampelone, whereas diſagreeing who ſhould gouerne the country, they reſolued to ſend into France, to beſeech Euſtache of Bellemarche Gouernor of Nauarre. King Philip to ſend them a Nobleman to ſupply the place of Viceroy, for their Princeſſe, who was vnder his Gouernment. King Philip ſent them a knight, who was wiſe and very vertuous, called Euſtache Beaumar, or Bellemarche, who was receiued and reſpected, C in whoſe hands the Eſtates did ſweare fealty vnto their Queene, whoſe perſon he did repreſent.

This knight by his wiſdome and milde courſes did ſoone reduce the realme to a quiet peace, D. Iaime King of Arragon, being iealous that the French did thus ſet footing into Nauarre, and being out of hope of the marriages which were concluded with his ſonne D. Pedro at Olite, he beganne to demaund the other point of the Capitulation, which was to deliuer him the Realme, and that the Eſtates ſhould aſſiſt him with their forces to recouer his rights, the which being not accompliſhed, a warre began betwixt Nauarre and Arragon. The pacification made within the realme by the French viceroy, continued not long, for ſome knights, enemies of all reſt, began vnder hand to accuſe, and to D ſpeake ſeditious words againſt their Gouernor, ſaying, that it was an ignominious thing for the Nauarrois to be gouerned by a ſtranger, ſeeking to draw the people of Pampelone into a muteny. Moreouer hauing practiſed ſome gentlemen of Caſtille, neere vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, making them to enter the country in hoſtile manner, to the end they might draw the Gouernor into armes, and to haue meanes in ſome incounter or charge, to diſpatch him. The French Gouernor ſeeing the affaires troubled towards Caſtille, came to Eſtella, hauing giuen commandement to all knights and ſouldiars to come thether with their armes and horſes, where he was aduertiſed of the treaſon which was plotted againſt him: wherefore in the night time he returned to Pampelone, where hauing complained in open councel of this treachery and rebellion, he did wonderfully amaze the confederars, but eſpecially the chiefe actors, ſeeing their mallice diſcouered: wherefore as it often happens that the wicked, being reproched of their wickedneſſe, grow more impudent and mad, theſe conſpirators were ſo raſh, as they commanded him to retire into France, ſaying, there were men ynough in Nauarre, better able to gouerne then he: to whom the Gouernor anſwered, that he doubted not of the ſufficiency of the Noblemen of Nauarre, and that for his part hee had not affected that charge, but it had beene impoſed vpon him by King Philip his Lord; who was Tutor and Protector of their Queene and her realme; wherein they (who were priuat perſons) ſhould not hinder him, neither was he reſolued to obey them: notwithſtanding hee would aſſemble the Eſtates, and if it were ſayd by a common conſent that he ſhould re- F tire into France, he would obey, ſo as they gaue him a diſcharge, and teſtimony of his adminiſtration, otherwiſe he could not with his honour ſhew himſelfe before his King, the which he eſteemed more then his life.

The aſſembly being called at Pampelone, there was nothing concluded, for they found found not any iuſt cauſe why they ſhould refuſe the Gouernment of this French knight: wherefore after many diſputes, and ſeditious ſpeeches vſed by the confederats of D. Garcia Almorauid, the chiefe Author of this diſorder, they departed, and preſently went to armes: ſo as the Gouernor was conſtrained to fortefie himſelfe in the Bourg of Saint Sernin: the Inhabitants whereof promiſed to aſſiſt him, and to die at his feet, rather then to ſuffer him, who was Lieutenant to their Soueraigne Princeſſe, to take any wrong, whether alſo D. Corbaran of Bidaure retired. Againſt this Bourg, they of Nauarriere banded for the other faction, D. Garcia Almorauid beeing their head: committing all acts of hoſtility, one againſt the other, which choller and the fury of a barbarous multitude could inuent; ſo as neither the authority, admonitions nor intreaties of Prelats, and other great perſonages, which ſeemed Neuters and Meadiators of peace, preuailed any thing, but did rather adde oyle to this fire.

D. Garcia Almorauid chiefe of a faction.

Pampelone diuided into two factions.

They did labour much to make a truce for forty daies, which did but giue them means to fortefie themſelues, to commit all the cruelties which enſued, for the mutines of Nauarriere during the truce drew in, by the meanes of the Biſhop Pampelone, great ſupplies of ſtrangers, with the which the truce being expired they attempted the Bourg: but ſeeing they could not force it, they went into the Vignes of the aduerſe partie, the which they cut and pulled vp by the rootes; and not ſatisfied therewith, they murthered all the little Infants which they of the Bourg had put forth to nurce in thoſe villages, beating out their braines (with a moſt barbarous inhumanity) againſt the ſtones and walles, adding to theſe impieties, many iniurious words againſt their aduerſaries, to the diſhonour of their Queene.

Biſhop of Pampelone a fauorer of the ſeditious.

Moreouer this brutiſh people hauing intelligence that D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, who in this laſt tumult had beene oppoſite to the Gouernor Euſtache Bellemarche, would reconcile himſelfe vnto him, they came in the night into his lodging, and murthered him cruelly. Such inſolencies did the Inhabitants of Nauarriere commit againſt the Maieſty of God and their Queene: wherefore they drew a heauy Iudgement vpon them: for the French King beeing aduertiſed of their rebelious actions, vpon the diſcouery of their conſpiracy, was wonderfully offended: wherefore he raiſed a great army, meaning to puniſh thoſe which had carried ſo little reſpect vnto his greatneſſe, and had beene the cauſe of the enſuing miſeries, which army he himſelfe would lead into Nauarre, in the yeere 1276. but being arriued at Saluaterre in Bearn, and forced to ſtay there ſome time, by reaſon of the aboundance of ſnow which had fallne, and ſtopt the paſſages of the mountaines, he was ſo ſollicited by them that were not well pleaſed with this voyage, as he reſolued to returne, giuing the floure of his army to Charles (the Hiſtories of France call him Robert the ſecond) Earle of Artois, to conduct it into Nauarre, who croſſing the mountaines by Iacca, came by Sangueſſa to Pampelona, refuſing to paſſe by the Valley of Roncal, for that the Inhabitants held the party of them of Nauarriere: To whoſe ſuccors there were certaine bands of Caſtillans entred into the realme, who would haue retired, when as they heard of the comming of the French, but beeing charged in the reereward, they loſt ſome men, and as they retired ſlowly, the French and Nauarrois of their party charged them againe, wherevpon they turned head, but they were defeated and put to flight, with great loſſe. And for that during the fight the Nauarrois cried often vnto the Caſtillans, A qui tornais? that is to ſay, doe you returne? and that this demaund was often heard; they ſay that the hoſpital which was built to bury them that were ſlaine in this incounter, was for this cauſed named Aqui tornais, and ſo continues vnto this day. The Earle of Artois beſieged Nauarriere, the which he preſt in ſuch ſorrt, as D. Garcia Almorauid, who was within it with many of his confederates, fearing they ſhould not bee able to defend it, got out in the night, abandoning thoſe miſerable wretches to the puniſhment which they had deſerued. Theſe comanders retired to the caſtle of Sar, from whence the French diſlodged them, forcing them to flie into the Iſland of Sardaigne.

D. Pero Sanches de Montagu murthered.

An. 1276.

Earle of Artois ſent into Nauarre to puniſh the rebels of Pampelone.

D. Garcia Almorauid abandons the rebels.

The Inhabitants of Nauarriere finding themſelues in the morning without captaines, were much troubled, and like men which were better theeues and mutines then ſoldiars, they beganne to cry out for mercy, and to craue pardon of the Earle of Artois, who ſeeming Nauarriere of Pampelone taken.

ſeeming to pitty them much, whilſt he entertained them with words on the one ſide, hee A cauſed the walles and forts which were vnmanned to be aſſailed on the other, ſo as the ſouldiars entred ſodainely, and made a cruell butchery of this wretched people, neuer ceaſing to kil whilſt that day laſted, and when night came they fel to the ſpoile, committing ſuch exceſſe and violences, as victory, hatred and fury doth ſugieſt to inſolent ſoul-diars: and not content to haue ſlaine the men, and taken their goods, without reſpect of holy or prophane, they extended their rage euen vnto the houſes and buildings, which they did ruine and burne: wherewith the other quarters of the towne were indo-maged, the fire flying from one to the other, doing great harme to them that had not offended. The Chamber of accounts was fired, where there were many titles, letters and ancient Records of the realme of Nauarre burned: the reſt which could bee ſaued, B was carried to the caſtle of Tiebas, whereas the Treaſor and Chamber of accounts of Seuere puniſhed. Nauarre hath continued long. The fury beeing ended, thoſe which had eſcaped the ſword, were condemned, and publikely executed as traitors: not any one eſcaping the ſeuerity of that ſentence, but ſuch as the innocency of their age excuſed, and all their goods were confiſcated.

Thus Nauarriere of Pampelone was ruined by a iuſt iudgement of God, in reuenge of the bruti ſh cruelties, which theſe mutines did vſe againſt innocent age, in the villages, a-gainſt the city, and other their inſolencies and rebellions. For the murther committed vpon the perſon of D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, Lord of Caſcante, and other their inſolencies, there were called in queſtion and accuſed before the Eſtates of Nauarre which were called to that end, D. Gonçal Inigo, Iohn Inçalbiz and his ſonne, Symon of Varriz, Mi- C chel Garces of Varriz, Garcia Perez of Liçoani, Pedro Ximenes of Sabalça, Symon Perez of Opaco, Inego Gil of Vrdauiz, Sancho Inigues of Vrdaniz, Gonçaluo of Arbiçu, and Ruy Gon- çales his brother, Sancho Perez of Aguerre, & Ochoa Perez his brother, Iohn of Armenda-riz, Iohn and Sanches the Biſcain, al which appeering not, their cauſe was more hainous, hauing for their aduerſe parties, Ruy Peres of Echales, Fernand Perez of Echales, Michel Perez of Subica, and Pedro of Aybar. By theſe proceedings and excutions, the reſt of mutines were terrefied, and the realme remained in peace.

Caſtille. 17 During theſe actions in Nauarre, D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, made preparation to march, with an intent to deſpoſſeſſe the Emperor Rodolphus, who had beene choſen to his preiudice, notwithſtanding that he had beene perſwaded by many of his friends D not to make any more account of the Empire, ſeeing the occaſions which might haue fauored him were loſt: yea Pope Gregory being come to the councel of Lyons, conſider-ing the miſeries which might come to Chriſtendome, if D. Alphonſo ſhould wilfully purſue his pretended right, hee ſent one vnto him, called Fredul Abbot of Lunel, afterwards Biſhoppe of Ouiedo, to perſwade him to reſt ſatisfied with his royall Eſtate, and not to trouble himſelfe any more with the affaires of the Empire, ſeeing that by the conſent of all the Electors, Rodolphus had beene crowned in the towne of Aix La Chappelle. And to make him beleeue that hee gaue him fatherly councell, he diſpen-ſed with him to take the tenth of all the reuenues of the Clergy, for fixe yeeres to make warre againſt the Moores. But D. Alphonſo, being obſtinate, hee thought that if hee E went to ſee the Pope, he might draw him to ſet downe ſome order betwixt him and Ro- dolphus, ſo as both might intitle themſelues Kings of the Romains: wherefore he told the Abbot of Lunel, that he deſired to paſſe into France, and to conferre perſonally with his Holineſſe, in ſome commodious towne, either Montpellier, or where hee pleaſed.

Pope ratefies the election of Rodolphus. The Pope hearing this anſwer, perſwaded, himſelfe that D. Alphonſo had no great de-ſire to be Emperor, whereupon without further deliberation, he ratefied the Election of Rodolphus, with the conſent of the whole conſiſtory, in a conuocation at Lyons, calling him King of Romains, and commanding all the Princes and Prouinces of the Empire, to obay him: aduiſing Rodolphus to paſſe ſpeedily into Italy, to receiue the crowne of the F Empire. It may be he had regard to the diuerſity of humors betwixt the Germains and Spaniards.

D. Alphonſo hauing in the meane time ſetled his affaires, with his Nobility, and

giuen order for the gouernment thereof(not caring to ſeeke any truce with Aben Ioſeph King of Maroc, holding it would be diſhonorable, which notwithſtanding was the cauſe of great miſchiefe, as we ſhall ſee) he went from Toledo, to goe into France, to the Pope, yet was he aduertiſed, that he had proceeded to the confirmation of Rodolphus. He was accompanied by D. Manuel his brother, the Queene D. Violant the Infants D. Sancho, D. Iohn, D. Pedro and D. Iaime his children, with many Noblemen and Knights of Marke, of Caſtille, Leon, and his other dominions. He left the gouernment of the realme to his eldeſt ſonne D. Fernand, and the Moores frontier, to the Earle D. Nugno of Lara. Hee had giuen order to haue a fleet prepared of many ſhips, in the ports of Aſturia, Gallicia, and Andaluſia, the which coaſting along Spaine, Languedoc and Prouence, ſhould attend him at Marſeilles, being furniſhed with many ſouldiers, and great ſtore of victuals; ſending with it the ſuperfluous horſes and baggage of his traine. D. Alphonſo marching through the country of his father in law D. Iaime, he came to Tarragone where he was honourably entertained by him, then they arriued at Barcelona, about Chriſtmas, in the yeere 1275. D. Alphonſo ſtayed there with his traine ſix weekes, being often aduiſed by the King of Arragon, not to proceed, giuing him many great and conſiderable reaſons: but there was no meanes to diuert him from this voyage, beeing ſo farre aduanced. An. 1275.

Being come to Perpignan, hee ſtayed ſome time to conclude of the time and place of their enterview; the towne of Beaucaire was choſen, and the Archbiſhop of Narbonne had commandement to goe and meet him, and to conduct him. Hee left the Queene his wife and his children at Perpignan, except D. Sancho whom he ſent into Caſtille, by the aduiſe of the King of Arragon; and croſſing Languedoc hauing the Archbiſhop for his guide, he arriued at Beaucaire, whereas the Pope met him with ſome of the chiefe Cardinals, the councel of Lyons being ended. D. Alphonſo treated of many matters with the Pope, but he could not obtaine any thing that hee propounded. He ſhewed him the nullity of Rodolphus election by many reaſons, complayning greatly of his confirmation, making a great inſtance vpon that point in vaine; but the Pope wanted no excuſes. Then he laied open to the Pope the reaſons he had to the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Suabe after the death of Conradin King of Naples and Sicile, and Duke of Suabe, who was inhumainly beheaded by the French at Naples, in the yeere 1269. who hauing left no lawfull children, the ſucceſſion of the houſe belonged to him, in the right of his mother D. Beatrix, who was the right heire of that Dutchy, whereon Rodolphus had to his preiudice ſeized: beſides he complayned of the French King, who had intruded, and ſeized vpon the realme of Nauarre, which by ancient rights belonged to the houſe of Caſtille, whereof he produced ſome reaſons to iuſtifie his ſaying, but all was in vaine: finally he beſought the Pope to be a mediator for the deliuery of D. Henry his brother, who ſince the battaile, and defeat of Conradin, was priſoner in the hands of Charles King of Naples and Sicile. D. Alphonſo propounded many other things vnto the Pope, but without any effect: So as he ſpent the whole ſpring and part of the Sommer in this negotiation, vntill that the Pope leauing him much diſcontented, returned to Rome, yet hee ſtill vſed the title and armes of the Empire, vntill that he was forced by cenſures to leaue them, the Archbiſhop of Seuile hauing charge to intimate them vnto him.

Pope and D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille meet at Beaucaire.

Complaints & requeſts of D. Alphonſo to the Pope, but in vaine.

18. King D. Alphonſo being buſied in this vaine purſute, the Moores his confederats and vaſſals of Spaine, called in Aben Ioſeph Miralmumin of Affrike, thinking they might not onely ſhake off the Chriſtians yoake, but make ſome notable breach in the Eſtates of Leon and Caſtille, the King being abſent, or at the leaſt they ſhould ſeize vpon Andaluſia; and for that wee haue often made mention of this King Iacob Aben Ioſeph, it is needful we ſhould relate what he was, and treate ſome thing of the Moores Eſtate in Affrike, for that thoſe of Spaine haue had their ſupport from them. The Miralmumin Aben Mahomad the old, of the race of the Almohades, beeing dead, after he had loſt the battaile of Muradal, we made mention that his Grand-child called Caid Arrax, raigned, who was the ſonne of Buxaf, dead before his father Mahumet. This Caid Arrax was the fifth King of Affrike, of the race of the Almohades, whoſe Empire extended from the Moors.

Weſt

Weſt Ocean vnto Egipt. There were many Admirals, or Gouernors vnder him, ruling the Prouinces; among the which Gomoranҫa Aben Zeiη, of the Linage of Abdalues, held that of Tremeſſen, who behauing himſelfe couetouſly and violently in his gouernment, fell in diſgrace with his King Caid Arrax, ſo as carrying himſelfe rebelliouſly, the King came and beſieged him in a caſtle called Tremezezir, whereas a Moore, couſin to Gomaranҫa, going out of the fort ſlue the Miralmumin, ſeeming to yeeld vnto him, and ſhewing him a place whereby the caſtle might be taken. The army amazed at the death of their King, was inſtantly ſet vpon by the garriſon of Tremezezir, being led by Gomaranҫa, and put to flight, by which victory the Moore did appropriat that Prouince vnto himſelfe, cauſing himſelfe to be called King of Tremeſſen, and this was the beginning of that Kingdome. Kingdome of Tremeſſen.

At the ſame time there was in the city of Fez, a family of Moores, called the Benaotazes and Merines, which deſcended from a famous Moore, called Merin, who had beene a Chriſtian and became a Mahometiſt. The chiefe of this houſe at that time, was called Bucar Aben Merin, and gouerned the city of Fez, vnder the Miralmumin Caid Arrax; after whoſe death, and the defeat of his army by Gomaranҫa, before Tremezezir, this Bucar Aben Merin fell vpon the Almohades, which had eſcaped, and gathered themſelues together about Fez, whom hauing put to rout, he carried himſelfe for King of Fez, imitating that which his companion Gomaranҫa Aben Zeiη had done in Tremeſſen, and giuing a beginning to this new Kingdome. A brother of his called Iacob Aben Ioſeph, vſurped (in the ſame troubles) the Principality in Ribat: ſo as the Eſtate of the Almohades raigning in Maroc, was then much decaied. Theſe being aduertiſed of the death of Caid Arrax, and of the tyranies aboue named, did preſently aduance a kinſman of his, to the royall ſeat, his name was Almorcada, who was the ſixth Miralmumin of the race of the Almohades. He was no ſooner crowned King, but he went to field with an army, to puniſh theſe rebels which had intitled themſelues Kings in their gouernments: Firſt he came and aſſailed Bucar Aben Merin, the new King of Fez, but he was repulſt, and vanquiſhed by him; ſo as the race of the Merins kept the poſſeſſion of Fez, and of the territory, in the plaine country, or Algarue, as the Moores call it. So as Bucar dying a peceable King, his ſonne Hiaja raigned after him, vnder the tutelage of Iacob Aben Ioſeph, his vncle, for that he was then very young, but he liued not long; wherefore Iacob Aben Ioſeph remained heire of the realme of Fez, and was much eſteemed and feared amongſt the Moores, being called (as an honour) the old or elder of the Merins. This Moores good fortune was not ſo bounded for Budebuz nephew to Almorcada king of Maroc, being rebelled againſt him, and retired to Fez, he gaue him an occaſion to get the realme of Maroc, and to ioyne it vnto Fez. Budebuz intreated Iacob Aben Ioſeph, to aide him againſt his vncle, promiſing to giue him all that he held of the realme of Fez, vnto the riuer Natab. Realme of Fez. Almorcada the ſixt Miralmumin of Maroc.

Iacob Aben Ioſeph gaue him ſuch ſuccors, as Almorcada being amazed, durſt not attend him within Maroc, but fled, being purſued by certaine horſemen which Budebuz ſent after him, whom they ouertooke and ſlue, carrying his head to the King of Fez: wherefore Budebuz was peaceable King of Maroc, the ſeuenth and laſt of the Almohades. Finding himſelfe ſetled in his Kingdome, he would haue mocked Iacob Aben Ioſeph, who had helpt him to attaine this dignity, not caring to performe any promiſe, but threatned to take Fez from him, by reaſon of which Ingratitude, there beganne a cruell warre betwixt them, the which hauing continued three yeeres, at the laſt it was ended, by the defeat and death of King Budebuz, being ſlaine in battaile, of whoſe Eſtate Iacob Aben Ioſeph ſeized, giuing an end to the raigne of the Almohades, and a beginning to that of the family of Merin in Affrike, about the yeere of our Lord 1270. It is this Iacob Aben Ioſeph, which we haue ſayd, had ſent one thouſand light horſes Arabians into Spaine to Mahumet Alhamar King of Granado, vnder the conduct of a captaine with one eye, of great authority: with whom D. Alphonſo the wiſe, King of Caſtille, hauing not vouchſafed to treate of a truce, when as he went in France to court the Pope, Mir Almuz who had ſucceeded in Granado, and hee conſpired together, to the preiudice of Caſtille, and all the Chriſtians in Spaine: for this King of Granado beeing diſcontented with the Budebuz the ſeuenth King of Maroc. Iacob Aben Ioſeph firſt King Merin at Maroc.

Accords

A accords which he had made at his firſt entrance, in the which he could not procure King Alphonſo to abandon the captaines of Malaga and Guadix his enemies, he feared that theſe Moores which had beene enemies to his father and him, would attempt ſome thing againſt his realme, and therefore he reſolued, at what price ſoeuer, to ruine them. And for that it was a meanes to imbarke him in a warre with the King of Caſtille, hee did ſolicit Iacob Aben Ioſeph to vndertake the enterpriſe of Spaine, as his predeceſſors Kings of Arabia had done, offring him the townes and ports of Algezire and Tariffe, for his deſcent, whereof the Miralmumin did willingly accept, finding himſelfe aſſured in his Eſtate, and mighty in men and armes: but it happened that they of Malaga and Guadix, ſeeing that the truce, which they had with the King of Granado, was nere ex-
B pired, and doubting they ſhould haue warre, and not be releeued by the forces of Caſtille, by reaſon of the Kings abſence, they held it the beſt courſe to reconcile themſelues to the King of Granado, as in like manner the captaine of Comares did, who was of the ſame league.

Notwithſtanding the Miralmumin hauing leauied great forces to paſſe into Spaine, ſent ſome troupes of Moores to receiue the townes of Algezire and Tariffe, according to the accord, the which were deliuered vnto them: ſo as he ſtayed not long to come himſelfe in perſon to Algezire, whereas afterwards he paſt his troupes to the number of ſeuenteene thouſand horſe: The two Kings met in the country of Malaga, whereas they concluded to make warre againſt the Chriſtians; the African King towards Eccia, and he of Granado by Iaen. This paſſage was contrary to the expectation of the C Chriſtian Princes, for the Miralmumin, who could not make ſo great a leauy of horſe, without knowledge, made a ſhew as if he would goe againſt one of his ſubiects which was rebelled, and had by ſtealth taken the towne of Ceuta; and the better to diſſemble his deſeigne, hee had ſent to intreat the King of Arragon to aſſiſt him in this warre with tenne Gallies, and ſome ſhips of burthen, and with fiue hundred horſe, to whom hee promiſed good entertainement. Don Fernand de la Cerde Viceroy and Lieutenant generall in Spaine for his father, did not deſcouer that theſe forces were prepared for Caſtille, vntill they had paſt the ſtraight, being then at Burgos, hee was aduertiſed of the League betwixt theſe Mooriſh Kings, and of the reconciliati-
D on of them of Malaga and Guadix with the King of Granado, all which inconueniences grew by the Kings abſence, wherefore, both of himſelfe, and at the inſtance of Don Nugno de Lara, who was at Cordoua, hee made the ſpeedieſt preparation hee could, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the violence of theſe Infidels.

The King of Maroc paſſeth into Spaine.

Don Nugno knowing that the Miralmumin tooke the way of Eccia, drew neere vnto that quarter, with ſuch forces as he could gather together: but finding the paſſage ſtopt, hee was forced for to fight with the Moores, where after a long fight hee was defeated and ſlaine, yet moſt of his men which eſcaped entred by night into Eccia.

E The victorious Moores hauing found the body of Don Nugno, cut off his head and ſent it to Mahumet King of Granado, who was glad of this victory, but very much diſcontented for the death of the Earle Don Nugno, who had beene the cauſe that hee raigned, wherefore hee ſent his head to Cordoua, to bee buried with his body. The like misfortune happened to Don Sancho of Arragon Archbiſhop of Toledo, who hauing gathered together all the ſouldiars of Toledo, Guadalajara, Madrid and Talauera, preſented himſelfe vpon the frontier, where hee incountred the King of Granados army, inuading the Dioceſſe of Iaen, where hee was ſlaine and his army put to route. His body, head and hand, where he ware the Pontifical Ring, beeing ſeperated, were recouered from the Moores, and brought to Toledo, where they were bu-
F ried with great ſorrow of all the people, taking it for a mournfull preſage for the affaires of Spaine: D. Gonçalo, Biſhop of Burgos ſucceded him in this dignity, and was afterwards made Cardinal, the firſt amongſt all the Biſhops of the Church.

D. Nugno de Lara vanquiſhed by the Moores and ſlaine.

Rout and death of D. Sancho of Arragon Archbiſhop of Toledo by the Moores.

They write that the Archbiſhop Don Sancho did not die fighting, in the charge, but that beeing taken, there grewe debate betwixt ſome captaines Moores, ſome ſtriuing to lead him to the Miralmumin Iacob Aben Ioſeph, and others to King Mahumet, and that the Gouernor of Malaga, called Aben Atar arriuing; foreſeeing that by the contention for this priſoner, there might happen ſome great ſlaughter amongſt the captaines Moores, he caſt an Azagaye, or Mooriſh dart at the Archbiſhop, and peerced his belly through, ſaying, God forbid ſo many braue men ſhould kil one an other for a dogge. The day of this defeat, there arriued D. Lope Dias de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, with a great number of ſouldiars, horſe and foote, which he had ſodainely leuied, and lead by great iourneies towards the frontier, by fauour whereof many which had remained at the battaile, ioyntly with his troupes, and without any delay went all ioyntly together to incounter the Moores, who receiued them couragiouſly, ſo as neither party could vant of the victory, when as the night parted them. The greateſt deeds of armes in theſe incounters, were done about the Archbiſhop D. Sanchos croſſe, the which he cauſed to be carried before him, as primat, and had fallne into the Moores hands: but the Chriſtians recouered it againe, which made them hope for better.

Caſtille.

19 Theſe loſſes were augmented by the death of the Infant D. Fernand, the Viceroy, being in villa Real, ſince named city Royal, where he attended the reſt of his forces which were leauied in all the countries ſubiect vnto Caſtille, to goe himſelfe in perſon to this warre. This Prince finding himſelfe neere his end, he recommended his eldeſt ſonne D. Alphonſo, being but an Infant, to D. Iohn Nugnes of Lara, eldeſt ſonne to the Earle D. Nugno, coniuring him to take the charge and gard of him, and of his right vnto the realme, wherein he ſhould by right ſucceed his grand-father Don Alphonſo the wiſe; the which Don Iohn Nugnes promiſed him, and being dead, he cauſed his body to bee carried to Burgos, where it was buried in the Monaſtery of Las Huelgas. The miſeries which enſued brought the realme into great trouble, and if God had not ſtayed the enterpriſes of the Infidels, by ſome admirable and vnknowne meanes, they were likely to haue giuen a great and mortall wound to the Chriſtians Eſtate in Spaine, but he ſpared them. The Infant D. Sancho who had beene ſent backe by King Alphonſo, from Perpignan being aduertiſed of his brothers death, went with al ſpeed to Villa Real, where he was receiued by the army, as Lieutenant to the King his father. The Myralmumin not able to take Eccia, and finding the Chriſtians forces to be much augmented, he retired to Algezire and Tariffe: and ſeeming to himſelfe that he had done ynough, and likewiſe the King of Granado, they reſolued to make a truce for two yeeres with the Chriſtians a the which being concluded and ſworne, Iacob Aben Ioſeph retired into Affrike, holding ſtill the townes of Tariffe and Algezire, where he left good garriſons: this was the ſucceſſe of the Arabians warre, King D. Alphonſo being abſent.

Death of the Infant D. Fernand de la Cerde.

Truce betwixt the Chriſtians and Moores.

An. 1276. Being returned into Spaine about the end of the yeere 1276. he found the ſtate in great diſorder, whereof he had beene alwaies aduertiſed during his aboad in France. That which moſt grieued him, was the death of his eldeſt ſonne D. Fernand, & not without cauſe, for his other ſonne D. Sancho made ſhew that he had ſome diſordred enterpriſe in his conceit, the which he put in execution, to the diſhonor and preiudice of his father, and elder brothers children, wherein D. Lope Dias de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, did animate, councel and conduct him: for as ſoone as the Infant D. Sancho arriued at Villa Real, where his brother died, D. Lope Dias came vnto him: whereas D. Sancho knowing that he was ill affected to the King D. Alphonſo, and the deceaſed D. Fernand, and his familiar friend, he did freely acquaint him with the deſire he had to reigne, ſaying, it was fit that he who was a knight, and had learned to gouerne a realme, were it in warre or peace, ſhould reigne after his father, rather then his Nephews, the ſons of his brother D. Fernand, who were yet very yong, hauing need of Regents & Gouernors, charges which were effected by great perſonages, who by reaſon therof, grew into quarrel one with the other, to the oppreſſion of the people, and hazard of the Eſtate, the which was chiefly to be feared in theſe reuolts & tumults of the Moores; who could imbrace ſuch an occaſiõ, to augment their Eſtate with the preiudice of the Chriſtians: intreating him to aſſiſt him to effect his deſeigne, adding therewithal great promiſes: wherevnto D. Lope Diaz anſwered, according to the Infants deſire, incorraging him to proceed in his enterpriſe, with aſſurance to aide him: with this reſolution they paſt with the army by Cordoua, and repulſt the Moores in ſuch ſort, as the Miralmumins retreat, & the abouementioned truce followed.

D. Sanchos reſolution to diſpoſſeſſe his Nephewes of the Kingdome.

Here-

A Hereupon the King D. Alphonſo, did ſomewhat ſtay his ſonnes enterpriſe, but not quite ouerthrow it: for not long after D. Sancho not only aſſured himſelfe to ſucceed his father in the Kingdome, but would alſo raigne in his life time.

Arragon. D. Iaime King of Arragon, being intreated by the Caſtillans, had inuaded the Moores by Murcia during this warre, but with as bad ſucceſſe, as the reſt, for his men were put to rout nere to Xatiua, wheras D. Garcia Ortis of Açagra with many others were ſlaine. The King reſoluing to goe in perſon in his army, being old and broken, he fell ſicke, and died at Valencia, whether he cauſed himſelfe to be carried, hauing raigned threeſcore yeeres and ten monthes. A Prince whom Spaine, and eſpecially his realme of Arragon, ought much to commend, for his great, pollitike, and millitary vertues, and his great zeale to

B the religion of his age. They write of three notable precepts which hee gaue vnto D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, being with him at Toledo. That hee ſhould make the townes and common people his friends, againſt the Inſolencies of great men. That he ſhould neuer puniſh offenders ſecretly; and that hee ſhould neuer ſeeme fearefull in doing well. The Authors of Arragon write, that in his time hee built aboue two thouſand Churches and Chapells, and that he fought thirtie times in battaile againſt the Moores; Hee left his ſonne Don Pedro ſucceſſor in his realme of Arragon, Valencia and Cattelogne. To D. Iames his ſecond ſonne, he left the Iſlands of Majorca and Minorca, with the title of a Kingdome, and the right of Soueraignty, but it continued not long. He gaue by teſtament to the children of D. Thereſa Gil of Bedaure, that is,

It is credible that he did marry this Lady ſecretly, yet after the death of Queene Iolant, which was about the yeere 1251. hauing accompanied with her before, it may be betwixt theſe two marriages, and not as ſome haue written, before his firſt marriage with D. Leonor of Caſtille. Theſe two ſonnes D. Iames and D. Pedro, borne of D. Thereſa, were the Authors of the families of Xerica and Ayerbio. He alſo gaue by teſtament to D. Pedro Fernandes, whom hee had by D. Berenguela Fernandes, Ixar: and did ſubſtitute vnto his lawfull ſonnes, the children of his daughters D. Iſabel, Conſtance and Iolant: hee was interred in

D. Pedro the third of that name, and the ninth King of Arragon.

DOn Pedro his eldeſt ſonne, was King in the yeere 1276. being ſurnamed the great, by reaſon of his great exploits, ſome good, ſome bad. His ſonne D. Alphonſo had the yeere before, by the care of D. Iames his Grandfather, beene ſworne King of Arragon and Valencia, after D. Pedro his father, by the Eſtates aſſembled to that end at Leride. He had him by D. Conſtance, daughter to Manfroy, baſtard to the Emperor Fre-

Genealogy of Arragon.

E deric the ſecond King of Sicile and Naples, of whom hee alſo begat D. Iames, who was King of Sicile; whoſe elder brother dying without children, he came to ſucceed in the Realme of Arragon. Beſides theſe, he had D. Fadrique, or Frederic, to whom was giuen the realme of Sicile, and D. Pedro, who alone of all the brethren was no King, and two daughters. D. Iſabel, who was married to Don Denis King of Portugal, and Conſtance or Violant, wife to Robert King Naples. In the right of his wife Conſtance, daughter to Manfroy the vſurping King of Naples and Sicile, hee challenged theſe realmes for him and his ſucceſſours, who in the end enioyed them, and thus the Hiſtorie records it.

William the ſecond of that name King of Naples and Sicile, being dead, being of the Sicile and Naples held by the Normans.

F Normans race, about the yeere 1189. Pope Clement the 3. then raigning, pretended that theſe realmes were fallne to the church of Rome. But the noblemen and barons of the realm, for diuers conſiderations, did make Tancred baſtard ſon to Roger the 3. their King, who firſt intitled himſelfe King of Naples and Sicile, whereat Pope Celeſtine the 3. ſucceſſor to Clement, being diſcontented, he would haue diſpoſſeſſed Tancred, to inueſt the Emperor Henry the ſixth ſonne to Frederic Barbaroſſa Duke of Suabe, in the realmes of Naples and Sicile. And the better to aſſure him the royall title, he cauſed him to marry Conſtance Neece or lawfull daughter of Roger, who was a profeſſed Nunne in the Monaſtery of Saint Mary, or as ſome write at Saint Peters of Palermo, diſpenſing with her vow and profeſſion, by his papal authority, by whom the Emperor Henry had Frederic, who was afterwards Emperor, the ſecond of that name. Henry ſought long to diſpoſſeſſe Tancred, but it was in vaine. He beeing dead, his ſonne Roger raigned little, after whoſe deceaſe, Queene Sibille cauſed an other ſonne called William, to be preſently crowned, being very yong, whom the Emperor Henry found meanes to circumuent, vpon collour of making ſome good accord with him: and hauing by policy drawne him to Palermo, without entring into any conference, he cauſed him to be gelt, and ſent him into Germany, with his three ſiſters. By this meanes the Normands command in Naples and Sicile, fell into the hands of the houſe of Suabe. After the death of Henry, Frederic his ſonne being Emperour, and duke of Suabe, ſucceeded in theſe realmes, the which hee enioyed, notwithſtanding many croſſes which the Popes gaue him, againſt whom Gautier of Brene, husband to Queene Sybille, who had eſcaped out of priſon, led an army, but hee was taken and ſlue himſelfe in priſon. Frederic had by many wiues many children: by Conſtance of Arragon, Henry the elder, duke of Suabe, and King of Romains: by Iolant of Brenne, daughter to the King of Ieruſalem, Conrad, alſo duke of Suabe, and King of Romains, after the deceaſe of his brother, and moreouer by teſtament King of Naples. By Mahaut, or Iſabel, according vnto ſome, daughter to Iohn King of England, he had Henry the yonger, who was King of Sicile by Teſtament, and by a concubine Manfroy, Conrad and Henry ſucceeded after their father Frederic, reſpectiuely, in the realmes of Naples and Sicile. And for that they were young and abſent, Manfroy was appointed to be Gouernor of theſe Eſtates by the Emperor, in his brothers names. Againſt whom Pope Innocent did choſe the King of Englands brother to bee King of Naples and Sicile, but he neuer paſt into Italy. By the practiſes of Popes, theſe realmes were in great combuſtion, ſo as Manfroy was obeyed but by the leſſer part. Wherefore Conrad King of Romains was forced to paſſe into Italy, with a great army, by meanes whereof he reduced theſe realmes vnder his obedience, who was afterwards ſo tranſported with a deſire of raigne, as he cauſed his brother, Henry the younger, to bee ſlaine at Saint Felix, in Baſilicata, and Frederic his Nephew, ſonne to the elder Henry, to bee poyſoned, hauing inuited him to ſupper: for which parricide God ſuffered that hee himſelfe ſhould die of poyſon, which Manfroy his baſtard brother gaue him.

Sicile and Naples in the houſe of Suabe.

Parricids committed by Conrad.

By theſe deathes the realmes of Naples and Sicile came by lawfull ſucceſſion to Conradin, brother to Frederic that was poyſoned, ſonne to Henry the elder. But Manfroy who had gouerned in an others name, and taſted the ſweet of command, reſolued then to keepe theſe realmes for himſelfe, ſending men into Germany to diſpatch Conradin, if it were poſſible, were it by poiſon or otherwiſe: in the meane time he held his authority of Lieutenant or Viceroy, againſt the Popes attempts: and after a while faigning that Conradin was dead, he clad himſelfe in mourning, and making a great ſpeech in an aſſembly of the Noblemen and States of the realme, ſeeming to bee very ſorrowfull for the death of his Nephew, he perſwaded them to chooſe him King of Naples and Sicile by a generall conſent, where he raigned thirteene yeeres: and the better to maintaine himſelfe, he made a league with the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy: Againſt whom Pope Vrbain the fourth, called out of France Charles brother to Saint Lewis, Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, who had married D. Beatrix of Arragon, Proprietary of that Earldome, according to the Arragonois, who was inueſted by him in the realmes of Naples and Sicile, in the yeere 1262. with charge that hee ſhould expel Manfroy, and pay a rent vnto the Church as feudatarie. Charles, by the perſwaſion of D. Beatrix his wife, who was iealous to ſee her two ſiſter Queenes, the one of France, the other of England, vndertooke the voiage of Italy, where his inueſtiture was confirmed, and he crowned with his wife, at Rome, at Saint Iohn of Latran, by Pope Clement the fourth. Then paſſing on againſt Manfroy, who came to incounter him, both armies met about

Charles of Anjou made king of Naples and Sicile.

A about at Benеuent, in the yeere 1266. whereas Manfroy was ſlaine in battaile, and his men vanquiſhed; ſo as Charles remained peaceble King of Naples and Sicile. The body of Manfroy was not buried in holy ground, for that he ſtood excommunicate, but in a field nere vnto Beneuent, from whence he was afterwards tranſported vnto the confines of Campania, his wife and children, being taken by the French, died in priſon. Some yeeres after Conradin (the right heire of theſe realms) paſt into Italy, being perſwaded by many Italians of the Gibeline faction, who hauing incountred the French army neere vnto Arezzo, vanquiſhed it: wherefore marching boldly on, hee had a ſecond incounter with King Charles his army, neere vnto Alba, the which was vnfortunate for him; for his army was not onely defeated, but himſelfe taken priſoner (thinking to ſaue himſelfe, B in a diſguiſed habit) and carried to Naples, whereas King Charles by a deteſtable inhumanity (thruſt on by Pope Clement) in the yeere 1269. cut off his head, with that of his couſin Frederic Duke of Auſtria, and of many Noblemen of Naples and Sicile, which had followed Conradins party. By theſe meanes the Popes gaue theſe realmes vnto the French, and called them the two Sicilles, the one on this ſide, the other beyond the Far. Henry brother to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtille, Lieutenant of Rome, was partiſan to Conradin in this warre, and was taken, as hath beene ſayd.

Manfroy vanquiſhed and ſlaine by the French.

If the Sultan of Egipt, a barbarous Prince, hauing the King Saint Lewis, and his brother Charles priſoners, had intreated them in like manner, the French would haue held it very ſtrang. But God powred forth his vengeance vpon the French ſome yeeres after, in the Iſland of Sicile, whether they called D. Pedro King of Arragon, who had ſucceeded D. Iaime his father, in the yeere 1276. who without delay cauſed himſelfe to be crowned in Saragoſſa, by D. Bernard Oliuelia Archbiſhop of Tarragone: but before he receiued the crowne, he made proteſtation, that he would not be bound to any ſubmiſſion, nor promiſe, which D. Pedro his Grandfather had made vnto the Pope, or the church of Rome, to the preiudice of the liberty of his realme, to the end they ſhould not pretend that hee was their Leege-man, or vaſſal.

In the ſame aſſembly of Eſtates of Sarragoſſa, he cauſed the oth to be confirmed to his ſon D. Alphonſo, to raigne after him, as heire preſumptiue, and for that at his comming to the crowne, he had not aſſembled the Eſtates of Cattelogne at Barcelona, ac- D cording to the ancient cuſtomes, there to promiſe and ſweare the obſeruation of the rights, lawes and preuiledges of the country, the Noblemen of Cattelogne, being long inured to tumults, they made a league and conſpired with the townes, for the preſeruation of their liberties: the chiefe of which conſpiracy, were D. Roger Bernard Earle of Foix holding many fees, and much land in Cattelogne, Arnold Roger Earle of Pallars, Ermengaud Earle of Vrgel, and Aznar his brother, Raymond Foulques Vicont of Cardone, Bernard Roger Eril, Raymond Angleſol, and William Raymond Ioſſe, whereof we will hereafter make mention: But wee muſt returne into Caſtille, where we haue left King D. Alphonſo the wife much troubled, for the diſorders which had happened during his abſence.

E 21 Being arriued at Toledo, euery man repaired thether, and eſpecially the Infant D. Sancho, who had made truce for two yeeres with the Moores. Thether came alſo D. Lope Diaz of Haro, who was ſo hardy, as to deliuer a meſſage for them all, that it would pleaſe him to declare his ſonne D. Sancho his ſucceſſor in the realmes of Caſtille, Toledo, Leon and other places, ſeeing hee had already giuen ſome proofes of his vertue and valour againſt the Moores, and that he was the eldeſt of his ſons lyuing: to whom the King made but a cold anſwere in the beginning, but hauing afterwards aſſembled the Eſtates in the towne of Segobia, by the councel of the Infant D. Manuel his brother, he reſolued to gratefie D. Sancho, whom he made heire of the crowne after his deceaſe, and in this qua- lity hee was receiued by them all. Thus D. Alphonſo and D. Fernand, the children of F Don Fernand de la Cerde, were put from the royall ſucceſſion, which did belong vnto them by right, although that ſome excuſe this fact of D. Alphonſo, ſaying that there was no law at that time which did binde him to leaue the realme more to one then to an other; as ſince there was made and receiued in the time of D. Fernand the fifth, in the city of Toro, where it was decreed vpon this difficultie that the children of the elder brother deceaſed, ſhould in that reſpect be preferred before the vncle, repreſenting their fathers A perſon.

The Queene D. Violant, and D. Blanche widow to D. Fernand, were ſo diſcontented with this reſolution of the Eſtates of Segobia, as taking his young children with them, they went out of the country of Caſtille, to D. Pedro King of Arragon, brother to the Queene D. Violant. Many Noblemen and townes of the Realme did alſo hold it to bee very vniuſt, foreſeeing many great miſeries which would enſue, if the children did liue. King D. Alphonſo finding this diſcontentment, came to Burgos, where tranſported with choller, he cauſed his brother D. Fadrique, or Frederic, to bee ſmothered, without any forme of iuſtice, and commanded that D. Symon Ruis of Haro, Lord of Los Cameros, ſhould be burned in the towne of Treuigno, for that they had aſſiſted the Ladies in their B retreat into Arragon, the which terrefied euery man. He ſent alſo to D. Pedro King of Arragon, to complaine that he had receiued theſe Princeſſes, and the children; whereof he excuſed himſelfe with good words.

Cruelty of King D. Alphonſo.

An. 1278. Going from Burgos, he paſt through the country of Leon, and then tooke the way to Seuile, being reſolued to make warre againſt the Moores, ſo as in the yeeere 1278. hee laied ſiege to Algezire, where there was a ſmall garriſon of the Miralmumins of Affrike; D. Pedro his ſonne was chiefe at this ſiege; but notwithſtanding they preſt it both by ſea and land, yet the Chriſtians loſt their labour.

The Queene D. Violant vnchaſt.

During this enterpriſe the Infant D. Sancho cauſed the Queene his mother to returne into Caſtille, to whom it was tedious to liue out of that Realme, where ſhee had ſome Mignons, as Hiſtories report, who tax her of adultery: and he procured D. Pedro King of C Arragon, to detaine the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, his Nephewes, priſoners in the caſtle of Xatiua, to the end they ſhould not carry them into France, to King Philip the 3. their mothers brother: who after ſhe had done her vttermoſt endeauor for the deliuery of her children, in the end ſhe came to the King her brother, to implore his aide and protection. The ſiege of Algezire was vnfortunate, for the army at ſea was in a manner all loſt, by the ambuſhes of the Miralmumin, who victualed the place; and as for that at land, there died ſo great a number of men as they were forced to riſe, for the King of Maroc was vpon the paſſage, and came to Algezire, where the truce was renued not Portugal. He was a very gallant Prince, whoſe Eſtate King D. Alphonſo his father had begun to E ſet vp the yeere before, giuing him 40000. pounds of currant money yeerely: but this yeere 1279. he had the whole realme, by the deceaſe of King D. Alphonſo his father, who was buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Dominike of Lisbone, which he himſelfe had built. This King Alphonſo had raigned two and twenty yeeres, and died ſeuenty yeeres old. Ten yeere after his body was tranſported to the Monaſtery of Alcouaça.

D. Denis the firſt of that name, and the ſixth King of Portugal. F

23 THe King D. Denis his ſonne was ſeuenteene yeeres old when he began to raigne, and was ſurnamed the builder, for that he made many goodly buildings in his realme,

A Realme, as well holy, as prophane, Churches, Monaſteries, Towers, Ports of the ſea, and whole townes, wherof mention is made, that he did build and re-edifie, to the number of foure and fortie. At his comming to the Crowne, and before, there had beene ſome diſcontentment betwixt him and his mother D. Beatrix, daughter to D. Alphonſo king of Caſtile, the which (it may be) did ſtay him from going to him to Badajos: for being come to Yelbes vpon the confines of Portugal, three ſmall leagues from Badajos, he fell into a ſudden diſtruſt, and turned head, wherewith the King his Grandfather was much diſcontented.

King Don Alphonſo thereupon parted from Badajos, and came to Seuile, where he had Caſtille.
newes that the Infant D. Sancho came towards the citty of Iaen, with great troups of ſol-
B diers from Caſtile, Leon and Toledo. Wherefore he ſent him thoſe men he had, where there were certaine skirmiſhes rather to the Chriſtians loſſe then the Moores. Beeing at Seuile, there came certaine meſſengers vnto him from Philip of France, to bee a meanes for the deliuerie of the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, who were detained at Xatiua, and for other affaires. There it was concluded, that the two kings ſhould meet at Bayone in December, in the yeare 1280. The king of Caſtile came thither with his children, and An. 1280.
Philip the French king came to Salueterre in Bearne, where by Mediators it was concluded, that the realme of Iaen ſhould be giuen to the children of la Cerde, the which they ſhould hold in fee, and do homage to the king of Caſtile, and the Infant D. Sancho: but he being aduertiſed of that which his father had concluded, would not conſent thereunto, ſo as by his meanes they returned without any effect, euen touching the warre againſt the C Moores, for the which there had an vnion bene propounded betwixt the kings of France and Caſtile, to inuade and conquer Affricke with their vnited forces, but it was left vnreſolued. Beeing returned, D. Sancho made an enterprize vpon the king of Granado, but his men were charged by the Moores neere vnto Moclin, who ſlue aboue 2800. whereas Gonçalo Ruis Giron maſter of S. Iames, was ſore hurt, and died within few daies after, to the great griefe of D. Sancho, and many others: whereupon he entred into the territories of Granado, where he made a wonderfull ſpoile, euen to the citty gates.

The yeare following 1281. there was an interview betwixt the king D. Alphonſo, the An. 1281.
infant D. Sancho, and D. Pedro king of Arragon, at a place called Campillo, about Agre- League betwixt the king of Caſtile and Arragon.
D da, where there was a League ſworne betwixt them againſt all Princes, and there were townes and caſtels deliuered for aſſurance of either ſide: yea they concluded to make war againſt Nauarre, and to diuide the conqueſt betwixt Caſtile and Arragon: it was at ſuch time as the king D. Pedro plotted the warre of Sicily, whereof wee ſhall make mention. King D. Alphonſo being afterwards come to Burgos, he married his two ſonnes, D. Pedro to the daughter of the Earle of Narbone, and D. Iohn to the daughter of his ſonne-in-law, William of Montferrat, to whome he gaue two millions of Marauidis of the money of thoſe times. The Infant D. Sancho did afterwards meet with D. Pedro at Tarraſſone, where they renued their contract, but it tooke no great effect. The Realme of Caſtile beeing in great want, there was a decree to make copper money, and ſome peeces of ſiluer.

E 24 About the end of the yeare 1281. the king being importuned to releaſe the children of his ſonne D. Fernand, did ſomewhat relent, ſending D. Fredulo Biſhop of Ouiedo to the French king, vnder colour to ſend him vnto the Pope to procure a Croyſado againſt the Moores: but the Infant D. Sancho was aduertiſed of all, and beeing diſcontented, that his father had diſguiſed this buſineſſe, he came to Cordoua, and made a league againſt his father with Mahomad Mir k. of Granado, who promiſed to pay him the third of the reuenues of his Realme for a tribute. Then did D. Sancho begin a miſerable purſute, the which he neuer ceaſed, vntill he had driuen his aged father, with griefe and heauineſſe, into the graue: who indeed had worthily deſerued all the miſeries which fell vpon him: for he ſhewed himſelfe wilfull in his conceptions, and many times without iudgement in his
F prodigality without reaſon, and tractable to his owne loſſe: ſharpe and very ſeuere vnto thoſe which did not applaud his actions, but ſought to perſwade him to the contrarie. And he was ſo vniuſt in his iudgements (as appeared by his grand-children, the ſonnes of D. Fernand de la Cerde) as it was an admirable thing, ſo many imperfections ſhould bee found in a king ſo ſtudious: yet it did not befit a ſon to be the ſcourge of his fathers vices.

D. Sancho of Caſtile makes a league with the Moores to diſpoſſeſſe his father.

The

Portugal.

The new King of Portugall, who would not truſt king D. Alphonſo his Grandfather, A was now in quarrell with his brother, called alſo D. Alphonſo, whome he pourſued with Armes, but aſwell this controuerſie, as that he had with his mother, were pacified by the meanes of Don Sancho of Caſtile, and of Don Pedro King of Arragon, to whoſe daughter called Don Iſabel, borne of the Queene Don Conſtance, daughter to Manfroy King of Naples this Prince was married, which marriage was celebrated at Troncoſo, in the yeare 1282. with royall pompe, about that time Don Sancho burſt forth into open rebellion againſt his father. This King Don Denis did afterwards enter into league with Don Sancho, who drew vnto his ſeruice D. Iohn his brother, beſides D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Diego Lopes his brother, Ramir Diaz, D. Nugno de Lara, Don Pedro Aluares of the Aſturies, Fernand Roderigo of Cabrera, and many others, which were out of the coun- B trie ſince the death of the Infant Don Fredericke, and of Symon Ruis de los Cameros.

Caſtille.

The Infant Don Sancho was ſo well beloued, as in a ſhort time all men followed him, leauing the king D. Alphonſo poore and miſerable. The conſpirators beeing aſſembled at Vailledolit, they were all of opinion, that D. Sancho ſhould intitle himſelfe king of Caſtile, and of the other dominions which his father had enioyed: but hee ſhewed himſelfe
D. Sancho takes vpon him the regency, and refuſeth the title of king. ſo newhat modeſt, ſaying, that he would not do his father that wrong, to intitle himſelfe King during his life time: but would reſt ſatisfied to be tearmed Infant of Caſtile, the el-deſt and heire of thoſe Realmes. So D. Sancho carried great reſpect vnto the king his father, in words and vaine titles, but he made himſelfe king in effect, ordayning lawes both for peace and warre, diſpoſing of Captaines and Gouernors, and of the treaſure at his owne will: the king D. Alphonſo beeing driuen to that extremity as hee was forced to C ſend his royall Crowne, with Iewels of ineſtimable value, in pawne for 70000. doublons to Iacob Aben Ioſeph Miralmumin of Maroc, complaining vnto this Infidell king, of the wrongs he had receiued from his ſonne and ſubiects who were Chriſtians. They ſay, that king Iacob beeing a Barbarian, did heare of D. Alphonſos afflictions with teares in his eyes, and ſhewing this royall Crowne vnto his Knights, he ſayd, That he did willingly imbrace this occaſion, to ſuccour a King of an ancient race, with his perſon and goods againſt the impietie of a wicked ſonne: giuing ſo good an anſwer vnto the King D. Al- phonſo, as he was much eſteemed and commended of all men. Neceſſitie and indignitie did ſo tranſport D. Alphonſo, as he accepted the Moores offer, intreating him to paſſe the ſtreights with his forces, the which he did: In the meane time D. Sancho married D. Mary D daughter to D. Alphonſo, Lord of Molina, his great vncle, brother to the king D. Fernand the third, who ſeeing himſelfe ſupported by the kings of Arragon and Portugal, came to Cordoua, where by the aduice of the Noblemen and Knights of Caſtile that were preſent, and by a decree pronounced by the mouth of D. Manuel, in the name of the whole Nobilitie, the king D. Alphonſo was depriued of all his Realmes: the cauſes they pretended, were the death of D. Fredericke and of Symon Ruis, obſeruing no forme of Iuſtice, nor any orderly proceeding: the breach of the rights and priuiledges of the Nobility, and the waſting of the treaſor. D. Iohn Nugnes de Lara, nor D. Iohn Nugnes, and Nugno Gon- çales his children, D. Aluaro Nugnes, D. Fernand Perez Ponce, with many others, would E not aſſiſt at this aſſembly, nor conſent vnto this act of ſo pernicious a conſequence.

The Miralmumin Iacob Aben Ioſeph paſt at Algezire, with great troupes of horſe, and the two kings had an enterview at Zahara in Granado, whereas he of Maroc arriued firſt.
The manner of this interview is worthy obſeruation, for the humanitie and courteſie which this mightie Mooriſh King vſed to a Prince of a contrarie Religion, ſometimes his enemie, and deiected from his dignitie. Hee cauſed a great and rich Pauillion to bee ſet vp in the open field, in the which were two ſeates made like throanes, the one beeing higher and more eminent then the other: and hauing placed the chiefe Noblemen of the family of the Merins (from whence he was deſcended) at the entry, he commanded them all to kiſſe k. D. Alphonſos feet, and that they ſhould not ſuffer him to light from his horſe before he were neere vnto the Pauillion, where beeing arriued, King Aben Ioſeph and hee F imbraced one another like breethren, and ſo entred into the Pauillion holding hands.
The royall and magnificent ceremonies which they vſed in their ſitting downe, were great and long, either ſtriuing to giue the more honorable place vnto the other: but in
the

A the end the king of Caſtile was forced to ſit in the higheſt, the king of Maroc ſaying: It was reaſonable that D. Alphonſo, a king deſcended of kings, and borne of a king, ſhould be ſet aboue rather then himſelfe, whom God by his mercy had aduanced to that dignitie of late time. Humanity and modeſtie of the Moriſh king.

Theſe Monarkes beeing ſet, they conferred of their affaires, and hauing reſolued, king D. Alphonſo returned to Seuile, to gather together thoſe ſmall forces which were faithfull vnto him. The Moore marched with his army towards Oſuna and Eſtepa, and then came to Eccia, where the two kings ioyned, and hauing taken Caſtro, they preſented themſelues before Cordoua: but the Infant Don Sancho had entred into it the night before with great troupes of horſe, where as they ſpent twenty dayes in vaine, without any me-

B morable act done by either ſide. Riſing from thence, the king of Maroc, with the conſent of D. Alphonſo, did ouer-runne the champian country, and going through the pace of Muradal, he entred into the fields of Montiel, deſtroying all he incountred, and finding no reſiſtance. Returning towards Eccia, D. Alphonſo parted from Seuile to go and meet him, according to the king of Marocs deſire. Beeing come vnto the campe, king Don Alphonſo grew into ſo great a diſtruſt, vppon reports, or ſome other vaine imagination, that the king of the Moores would ſtay him, as he parted by night in great haſt, and returned to Seuile. The Miralmumin beeing much diſcontented at this iealouſie, ſent vnto him to excuſe himſelfe, and to aſſure him that he neuer had any ſuch thought, intreating him to ſend him his troupes, the which he would entertaine, and ſo enter into the coun-

C trie of Granado againſt king Mahomad his enemy, hauing conſpired with Don Sancho his ſonne: whereunto D. Alphonſo yeelded, and ſent him a thouſand horſe, who preſently receiued pay: but growing ſuddenly into a iealouſie that they would leade them into Affricke, they abandoned the Miralmumin, and ſent him the remainder of his money. The King of Maroc ſeeing theſe proceedings, grew diſcontented, and returned into Affricke, yet nothing eſtranged in his affection to pleaſure D. Alphonſo. D. Fernand Perez Ponce of Leon, Commander of theſe thouſand horſe, durſt not returne to king D. Alphonſo, hauing no lawfull excuſe to haue abandoned king Iacob Aben Ioſeph: but whileſt he intertained himſelfe about Cordoua, there was an oportunitie offered which did deface this ble-

D miſh. D. Alphonſo diſtruſts the King of Maroc

It was ſtrange, that theſe thouſand horſe did charge ten thouſand which ſallyed out of the citty, the which were aſſembled from all the parts of Spaine for Don Sancho, and defeated them. Wherefore returning to Seuile they were well receiued: D. Sancho (who was then abſent from Cordoua) was much diſcontented at this route, and did ſo ſharpely rebuke his men for their raſhneſſe, daring to preſent themſelues againſt his fathers Standard royall, the which he did euer greatly reuerence. Thus Don Sancho did honour the Images and royall enſignes, but not the king his father: who beeing much incenſed with the continuall vexation of his ſonnes rebellion, who had vſurped his Realmes, hee pronounced in the preſence of many men of marke, both Clergie and Secular, in the Cittie

E of Seuile, about the end of that yeare 1282. the curſe of God and his vppon D. Sancho, a ſonne, ſayd he, diſobedient, rebellious, and a parricide, declaring him incapable and vnworthy to raigne; depriuing him of his ſucceſſion and inheritance, and diſcharging the ſubiects, as much as in him lay, from all oath and homage which they had done vnto him. This act was done with great ſolemnitie and maieſtie, but they were but words, which D. Sancho did not much eſteeme; who at the ſame time returned to Cordoua, and conferred with the king of Granado at Priego, to whome hee reſtored Arenas, and renewed their League. Hypocriſie of the Infant D. Sancho. An. 1282. Curſe of the father vpon D. Sancho.

In the yeare 1283. D Sancho beeing come to Carceres, to Pont d'Alcantara, and to Ledeſma, he forced the Infant D. Pedro his brother to hold his party, who notwithſtanding had a great deſire to follow his fathers, who intended to giue him the countrie of 1283.

F Murcia, with the title of a king. He did the like to the Infant D. Iohn, who aſpired to haue the kingdome of Leon for himſelfe, all which was forced. Many knights which followed theſe Princes, and which were well affected to king D. Alphonſo, eſcaped, and paſſing thorough Portugal came to Seuile. The towne of Agreda reuolted and followed the kings partie, the Infant D. Sancho beeing come againſt it, he had newes that Martin d'Arbar, Gouernour

Gouernor of Treuigno, was alſo reuolted, and had receiued Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara, with a great bootie which he had taken in the territories of Burgos, into Treuigno, from whence he made roads, and did annoy his people. D. Sancho ſent D. Lope Diaz de Haro againſt them, who made them to keepe within their fort. Thus was the warre mannaged betwixt the father and the ſonne in Caſtile and other places depending. A

Nauarre. 25 During the which D. Pedro king of Arragon, had giuen libertie to his ſoldiers vpon the fronter, who were daily in skirmiſh againſt the Nauarrois, eſpecially they of Sos and Filera, againſt the Inhabitants of Sangueſſa; and they were ſo incenſed one againſt another, as they could not be pacified: yet the diligence of Euſtache Bellemarche Gouernor of Nauarre, made them to lay aſide armes, and to conclude a truce for a time. Bellemarche returned into France, and in his place a Knight called Guerin of Amplepuis, gouerned the Realme of Nauarre. Philip the third King of France, beeing Protector of this Realme for his Neece Queene Iane, had alſo occaſion to thinke of the affaires of Spaine, for that the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, borne of his ſiſter D. Blanche, had not only beene deiected by the King D. Alphonſo from the right of ſucceſſion to the Crowne of Caſtile, which did belong vnto them, as children to the eldeſt ſonne, but alſo theſe two young Princes, D. Alphonſo and D. Fernand de la Cerde, were kept priſoners in the caſtell of Xatiua by the king of Arragon: and moreouer beeing aduertiſed, that beſides the Arragonois attempts in former times, their king had made a new accord at Campillo with D. Sancho of Caſtile, where among other things it was concluded, that they ſhould inuade the Realme of Nauarre at their common charges, and diuide the conqueſt equally. Moreouer, that at another enterview betwixt D. Sancho of Caſtile, and D. Pedro of Arragon, the Infant had reſigned vnto D. Pedro all the right he pretended to Nauarre, promiſing neuer to make warre there without his liking, to the end he might bee the more freely aſſiſted with the forces of Arragon, to diſpoſſeſſe his father. King Philip was wiſe, and of power to preuent all theſe practiſes, all which he made fruſtrate in regard of Nauarre. Yet he did in vaine ſollicite the kings of Caſtile and Arragon for the deliuerance of his Nephewes, who were at Xatiua. He ſent good troupes of horſemen into Nauarre, for the guard of the countrie, and to be readie vpon all occaſions. B C

Practiſes of the Caſtillans and Arragonois againſt Nauar.

The factions betwixt the Nobilitie of Caſtile (ſome holding the partie of King Don Alphonſo, others that of Don Sancho his ſonne) fell out happily for the French and Nauarrois in many things: for Nauarre ſerued for a retreat to all thoſe that were in diſgrace with Don Sancho. Many of the chiefe of Caſtile, and other places depending, came and ioyned with the troupes of France and Nauarre, and making roades into Caſtile, did alwaies keepe the Realme of Nauarre in reputation, and made the forces to be redoubted, the which changed many Gouernors in a ſhort time: for after Euſtache Bellemarche and Guerin of Amplepuis, William of Broede was ſent thither, and then Iohn of Conflans L. of Dompierre, Marſhall of Champagne, in the yeare 1283. when as among other Noblemen of Caſtile, there fled into Nauarre Don Nugno de Lara, Don Pero Aluarez of the Aſturies, Don Ramir Diaz, Don Fernand Ruis de Cabrera, and Don Fernand Ruis de Saldaugne, who ioyned with others which made themſelues ſtrong in the Countrie, which were the Infant Don Iaime of Caſtile, Don Iohn Nugnes, Don Aluar Nugnes and others, all beeing aſſiſted by the troupes of France and Nauarre, they made roades as far as Toledo, with great ruine of the country and people, for the French King hated Don Sancho, as an vſurper of his Nephewes right, neither was he leſſe enemie to Don Pedro King of Arragon, as well for the detention of his nephewes, and his practiſes with Caſtile, as for that which had happened in the Realme of Naples, betwixt the Arragonois and the French, as you ſhall heare.
